

*MASTER NEGATIVE
NO. 91-80438-1*

MICROFILMED 1991

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES/NEW YORK

as part of the “Foundations of Western Civilization Preservation Project”

Funded by the
NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Reproductions may not be made without permission from Columbia University Library

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the United States -- Title 17, United States Code -- concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material...

Columbia University Library reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgement, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

AUTHOR:

BRIGHT, JAMES FRANCK

TITLE:

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND

...

PLACE:

LONDON

DATE:

1896-1904

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
PRESERVATION DEPARTMENT

BIBLIOGRAPHIC MICROFORM TARGET

Original Material as Filmed - Existing Bibliographic Record

942

B761

Bright, James Franck, 1832-

A history of England, by the Rev. J. Franck Bright ...
[New ed.] London, New York and Bombay, Longmans,
Green, and co., 1896-1904.

5 v. maps, plans. 18^{cm}.

Earlier editions issued under title: English history for the use of public schools.

v.1, 5th ed., 1897; v.2, 7th ed., 1896; v.3, 8th
ed., 1900; v. 4, new ed., 1896.

1. Gt. Brit.—Hist.

Library of Congress

942

DA32.B859

4-17771/2

(Continued on next card)

F45

PC-11-47F

Bright, James Franck, 1832-

A history of England ... 1896-1904. (Card 2)

Contents.--Period I. Mediaeval monarchy ... 449-
1485. 1897.--Period II. Personal monarchy ... 1485-1688. 1896.--Period III. Constitutional monarchy
... 1689-1837. 1900.--Period IV. Growth of democracy: Victoria, 1837-1880. 1896.--Period V.
Imperial reaction: Victoria, 1880-1901. 1904.

~~D942~~~~B76~~

Copy in History Reading Room. v.1-4. 1896-1904.

PC-11-47F

Restrictions on Use:

TECHNICAL MICROFORM DATA

FILM SIZE: 35mm

REDUCTION RATIO: 11x

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA (IIA) IB IIB

DATE FILMED: _____

INITIALS MED

FILMED BY: RESEARCH PUBLICATIONS, INC WOODBRIDGE, CT

REEL 1
VOLUMES 1-3

AIM

Association for Information and Image Management

1100 Wayne Avenue, Suite 1100
Silver Spring, Maryland 20910

301/587-8202

Centimeter

Inches

MANUFACTURED TO AIM STANDARDS
BY APPLIED IMAGE, INC.

VOLUME 1

942

B761

Columbia University
in the City of New York

DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND

MEDIAEVAL MONARCHY

449—1485

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

By the Rev. J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D.,
Master of University College, Oxford; late Master of the Modern School in Marlborough College.

With numerous Maps and Plans. Crown 8vo.

This work is divided into four Periods of convenient and handy size, especially adapted for use in Schools, as well as for Students reading special portions of History for local and other Examinations.

Period I.—MEDIÆVAL MONARCHY: The Departure of the Romans to Richard III. From A.D. 449 to A.D. 1485. 4s. 6d.

Period II.—PERSONAL MONARCHY: Henry VII. to James II. From A.D. 1485 to A.D. 1688. 5s.

Period III.—CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY: William and Mary to William IV. From A.D. 1689 to A.D. 1837. 7s. 6d.

Period IV.—GROWTH OF DEMOCRACY: Victoria. From A.D. 1837 to A.D. 1880. 6s.

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.
LONDON, NEW YORK AND BOMBAY

[All rights reserved]

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND

BY THE REV.

J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D.

MASTER OF UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, AND HISTORICAL LECTURER IN BALLIOL, NEW, AND UNIVERSITY COLLEGES, OXFORD; LATE MASTER OF THE MODERN SCHOOL
IN MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE

PERIOD I.

MEDIÆVAL MONARCHY

From the Departure of the Romans to Richard III.
449—1485

With Maps and Plans

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON
NEW YORK AND BOMBAY

1897

[Fifth Edition]

P R E F A C E.

THE object of this book is expressed in the title. It is intended to be a useful book for school teaching, and advances no higher pretensions. Some years ago, at a meeting of Public School Masters, the want of such a book was spoken of, and at the suggestion of his friends, the Author determined to attempt to supply this want. The objections raised to the school histories ordinarily used were—first, the absence of historical perspective, produced by the unconnected manner in which the facts were narrated, and the inadequate mention of the foreign relations of the country; secondly, the omission of many important points of constitutional history; thirdly, the limitation of the history to the political relations of the nation, to the exclusion of its social growth. It was at first intended to approach the history almost entirely on the social and constitutional side; but a very short trial proved that this method required a too constant employment of allusions, and presupposed too much knowledge in the reader, to be suitable for a book intended primarily for schools. It was therefore resolved to limit the description of the growth of society to a few comprehensive chapters and passages, and to follow the general course of history in such a way as to bring out as clearly as possible the connection of the events, and their relative importance in the general national growth. This decision, though taken against his inclinations, the Author can no longer regret, as the social side of our history has been so adequately treated by Mr. Green in his History of the English People, of the approaching publication of which he was at the time quite ignorant. On the same grounds of practical utility, it has been thought better to retain the old and well-known divisions into reigns, rather than to disturb the knowledge boys have already gained by the introduction of a new though more scientific division.

The Author has not scrupled to avail himself of the works of modern authors, though, in most cases, he has verified their views by reference to original authorities. In the earlier period the works of Professor STUBBS, Mr. FREEMAN, and Dr. PAULI; in the Tudor and Stuart period those of FROUDE, RANKE, and MACAULAY; in the later period the histories of Miss MARTINEAU and Lord STANHOPE have been of the greatest assistance. Greater stress has been laid upon the later than the earlier periods, as is indeed obvious from the divisions of the work. With regard to the starting-point chosen, it may be well to explain that the English invasion was fixed upon, because it so thoroughly obliterated all remnants of the Roman rule, that they have exerted little or no influence upon the development of the nation—the real point of interest in a national history. It is hoped that the genealogies of the great families will assist in the comprehension of mediæval times in the history of which they played so large a part; and that the maps supplied will suffice to enable the reader to follow pretty accurately, without reference to another atlas, the military and political events mentioned. A brief and rapid summary for the use of beginners was originally projected to preface the work, but the brevity required by a book of this description rendered such an addition impossible without injury to the more important part. An attempt has been made to replace it by a very full analysis, which, in the hands of a careful teacher, has been proved by experience a useful method of teaching the main facts of history.

OXFORD, 1875.

A LIST OF SOME USEFUL AUTHORITIES.

BEFORE THE CONQUEST.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Lappenberg's England under the Anglo-Saxon Kings. Lingard's History of England. Sharon Turner's History of the Anglo-Saxons. Freeman and Palgrave have each published short books for the young on the period.

CONSTITUTIONAL.

All that is necessary to be known is to be found in Stubbs' Constitutional History. Treated more at length in Kemble's Saxons in England, and Sir F. Palgrave's History of the English Commonwealth. An excellent sketch in Freeman's Norman Conquest. All the ancient laws are collected in Thorpe's Ancient Laws; sufficient extracts to be found in Stubbs' Illustrative Documents. The whole history, including literature and society, is given in Green's History of the English People in a brief and very interesting form.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Bæda's Ecclesiastical History, for a century and a half after the landing of Augustin. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, which becomes very important after the time of Alfred. Milman's Latin Christianity.

THE ENGLISH CONQUEST.

Gildas, and the earlier part of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CHURCH.

Kemble's Saxons. Stubbs' Constitutional History. 143

ALFRED.

Asser's Life. Dr. Pauli's Life.

DUNSTAN.

Stubbs' Preface to Life of Dunstan (Master of the Rolls' series). E. W. Robertson's Essay on Dunstan.

EADWARD THE CONFESSOR AND FAMILY OF GODWINE.

Lives of Eadward, edited by Luard (Rolls' series). Freeman's Norman Conquest, vol. ii. 143

NORMANDY.

Palgrave's History of Normandy and England. Freeman's Norman Conquest. William de Jumièges. Orderic Vitalis. William of Poitiers.

NORMAN AND PLANTAGENET KINGS.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Lingard. Lappenberg. Pearson's Early and Middle Ages of England. Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury. Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors. Foss's Judges of England.

CONSTITUTIONAL.

Stubbs' Constitutional History and Illustrative Documents.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Orderic Vitalis. Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

WILLIAM I.

Eadmer's Historia Novorum. Domesday-Book with Ellis' Introduction.

WILLIAM II.

Palgrave's William Rufus. Eadmer's Life of Anselm. Church's Life of Anselm.

HENRY I.

William of Malmesbury. Henry of Huntingdon (Surtees Society).

STEPHEN.

Gesta Stephani (Surtees Society).

HENRY II. and BECKET.

Dr. Giles' Collection of the Letters of Becket, Foliot, and John of Salisbury. Gervais of Canterbury till 1200 (Twisden's Decem Scriptores). Benedict of Peterborough, 1169-1192, and Roger of Hoveden to 1201, with Stubbs' Prefaces in the Rolls' series. William of Newbury, to 1198 (English Historical Society). Lord Lytton's Life of Henry II.

IRELAND.

Geraldus Cambrensis' Conquest of Ireland (Rolls' series, translated in Bohn).

RICHARD I.

Itinerarium Regis Ricardi (Rolls' series). Richard of Devizes (English Historical Society). Ralph of Diceto, 1200 (Twisden). Several chronicles are translated in Bohn as Chronicles of the Crusades.

JOHN AND THE GREAT CHARTER.

Roger of Wendover, who was continued by Matthew of Paris, and William Rishanger (Rolls' series). Chronicles of various abbeys, such as Waverley and Dunstable. For the English reader, Stubbs' Illustrative Documents.

HENRY III.

Matthew of Paris. Rishanger. The Royal Letters (edited by Shirley in the Rolls' series). The Rhyming Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester to 1270. Blaauw's Barons' War. Wright's Political Songs (Camden Society). Brewer's Monumenta Franciscana (Rolls' series).

LATER PLANTAGENETS.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Sharon Turner's Middle Ages. Lingard. Dr. Pauli's Geschichte von England. Hook's Archbishops. Campbell's Chancellors.

CONSTITUTIONAL.

Stubbs. Hallam.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Rymer's Federa. Public Documents published chiefly by the Record Commission. Various Rolls, especially Rolls of Parliament, Statutes of the Realm, Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council. Walter of Hemingburgh, to 1346. Thomas of Walsingham, a compilation from the Annals of St. Albans Abbey (Rolls' series).

FOR SCOTCH HISTORY.

Hill Burton's History of Scotland.

FOR FRENCH HISTORY.

Martin or Sismondi's History.

EDWARD I.

Trivet (English Historical Society). Rishanger. Palgrave's Documents and Records illustrating History of Scotland. Freeman's Essay on Edward I. Modus tenendi Parliamentum (Stubbs' Documents). Rotuli Scotia (Record Commission).

TOWNS.

Ordinances of the English Guilds (Early English Text Society), with Brentano's Preface.

EDWARD II.

Trokelowe, to 1323 (Rolls' series). Anonymous Monk of Malmesbury, to 1327. Thomas de la Moor (Camden Society). Adam of Murimuth (English Historical Society).

EDWARD III.

Froissart. John le Bel. Robert of Avesbury, to 1356 (Hearne). Knyghton (Twisden's Decem Scriptores). Longman's History of Edward III.

WICLIFFE.

Shirley's Preface to Fasciculi Zizaniorum. Vaughan's Life of Wicliffe.

BLACK DEATH.

Seebohm's Essays in the Fortnightly Review for 1865.

NORMANDY.

Palgrave's History of Normandy and England. Freeman's Norman Conquest. William de Jumièges. Orderic Vitalis. William of Poitiers.

NORMAN AND PLANTAGENET KINGS.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Lingard. Lappenberg. Pearson's Early and Middle Ages of England. Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury. Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors. Foss's Judges of England.

CONSTITUTIONAL.

Stubbs' Constitutional History and Illustrative Documents.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Orderic Vitalis. Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

WILLIAM I.

Eadmer's Historia Novorum. Domesday-Book with Ellis' Introduction.

WILLIAM II.

Palgrave's William Rufus. Eadmer's Life of Anselm. Church's Life of Anselm.

HENRY I.

William of Malmesbury. Henry of Huntingdon (Surtees Society).

STEPHEN.

Gesta Stephani (Surtees Society).

HENRY II. and BECKET.

Dr. Giles' Collection of the Letters of Becket, Foliot, and John of Salisbury. Gervais of Canterbury till 1200 (Twisden's Decem Scriptores). Benedict of Peterborough, 1169-1192, and Roger of Hoveden to 1201, with Stubbs' Prefaces in the Rolls' series. William of Newbury, to 1198 (English Historical Society). Lord Lytton's Life of Henry II.

IRELAND.

Geraldus Cambrensis' Conquest of Ireland (Rolls' series, translated in Bohn).

RICHARD I.

Itinerarium Regis Ricardi (Rolls' series). Richard of Devizes (English Historical Society). Ralph of Diceto, 1200 (Twisden). Several chronicles are translated in Bohn as Chronicles of the Crusades.

JOHN AND THE GREAT CHARTER.

Roger of Wendover, who was continued by Matthew of Paris, and William Rishanger (Rolls' series). Chronicles of various abbeys, such as Waverley and Dunstable. For the English reader, Stubbs' Illustrative Documents.

HENRY III.

Matthew of Paris. Rishanger. The Royal Letters (edited by Shirley in the Rolls' series). The Rhyming Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester to 1270. Blaauw's Barons' War. Wright's Political Songs (Camden Society). Brewer's Monumenta Franciscana (Rolls' series).

LATER PLANTAGENETS.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Sharon Turner's Middle Ages. Lingard. Dr. Pauli's Geschichte von England. Hook's Archbishops. Campbell's Chancellors.

CONSTITUTIONAL.

Stubbs. Hallam.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Rymer's Fœdera. Public Documents published chiefly by the Record Commission. Various Rolls, especially Rolls of Parliament, Statutes of the Realm, Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council. Walter of Hemingburgh, to 1346. Thomas of Walsingham, a compilation from the Annals of St. Albans Abbey (Rolls' series).

FOR SCOTCH HISTORY.

Hill Burton's History of Scotland.

FOR FRENCH HISTORY.

Martin or Sismondi's History.

EDWARD I.

Trivet (English Historical Society). Rishanger. Palgrave's Documents and Records illustrating History of Scotland. Freeman's Essay on Edward I. Modus tenendi Parliamentum (Stubbs' Documents). Rotuli Scotiae (Record Commission).

TOWNS.

Ordinances of the English Guilds (Early English Text Society), with Brentano's Preface.

EDWARD II.

Trokelowe, to 1323 (Rolls' series). Anonymous Monk of Malmesbury, to 1327. Thomas de la Moor (Camden Society). Adam of Murimuth (English Historical Society).

EDWARD III.

Froissart. John le Bel. Robert of Avesbury, to 1356 (Hearne). Knighton (Twisden's Decem Scriptores). Longman's History of Edward III.

WICLIFFE.

Shirley's Preface to Fasciculi Zizaniorum. Vaughan's Life of Wicliffe.

BLACK DEATH.

Seeböhm's Essays in the Fortnightly Review for 1865.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

Rogers' History of Prices.

RICHARD II.

Walsingham. Annales Ricardi Secundi et Henrici Quinti (Rolls' series). Chronique de la Traison et Mort de Richard (English Historical Society). M. Wallon's Richard II. is said to be the best modern book on the subject. Wright's Political Songs (Rolls' series).

HOUSES OF LANCASTER AND YORK.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

As before, with Brougham's History of England under the House of Lancaster.

OLD HISTORIES.

Fabyan, died 1512 (edited by Sir Henry Ellis). Hall, Henry IV. to Henry VIII. Polydore Vergil (Camden Society). Stowe, published 1592. Ellis' Collection of Original Letters illustrative of English History.

HENRY IV.

Walsingham (Rolls' series). Knyghton. Royal Historical Letters (Rolls' series).

HENRY V.

Walsingham. Memorials of Henry V. (Rolls' series). Titus Livius Vita Henrici Quinti (copied in part in the Gesta). Gesta Henrici Quinti (Historical Society). Monstrelet.

HENRY VI.

William of Worcester to 1491 (completed by his son). English Chronicle (Richard II. to 1471) (Camden Society). Continuator of Croyland, 1459-1485. John of Westhampstead (Hearne). Paston Letters, 1434-1485 (E. D. Gairdner). Memoir of John Carpenter. Wars of the English in France (Rolls' series). Procès de Jeanne d'Arc (Historical Society of France).

EDWARD IV.

Arrival of Edward IV. (Camden Society). Warkworth, 1461-1474.

EDWARD V.

Life, by Sir Thomas More.

RICHARD III.

History, by Sir Thomas More. Miss Halsted's Life. Letters of Richard III. and Henry VII. (Gairdner, Rolls' series).

CONTENTS.

ENGLAND BEFORE THE CONQUEST. 449-1066.

	PAGE
Departure of the Romans,	1
Settlement of the various English tribes,	1
449 The Jutes,	1
477 The Saxons,	2
520 The Angles,	2
597 Conversion to Christianity,	3
Struggle for supremacy among the Saxon kingdoms,	3
Supremacy of Northumbria,	3
716-819 Supremacy of Mercia,	4
800 Ecgbert ,	5
Supremacy of the West Saxons,	5
Period of Danish Invasion,	5
836 Ethelwulf ,	6
858 Ethelbald ,	6
860 Ethelberht ,	6
866 Ethelred ,	6
970 Danish Conquest of East Anglia,	7
871 Alfred ,	7
Appreciation of Alfred's character,	8
Continued superiority of Wessex,	10
901 Eadward the Elder ,	10
925 Ethelstan ,	11
940 Eadmund ,	11
946 Eadred ,	11
Rise of Dunstan,	12
955 Edwy ,	13
957 Eadgar ,	13
Dunstan's government,	13
Division of Northumbria,	14
975 Eadward the Martyr ,	15
Fall of Dunstan,	15
979 Ethelred the Unready ,	15

	PAGE
Third Period of Danish Invasion,	15
991 Battle of Maldon,	16
994 First Danegelt,	16
Æthelred's Marriage with Emma,	17
1002 Massacre of St. Brice,	17
Pernicious influence of Eadric Streona,	17
1008 Thurkill's invasion,	17
1013 Swegen's Great Invasion,	18
England submits to Swegen,	18
1014 Restoration of Æthelred,	18
1016 Edmund Ironside ,	19
Five great battles,	19
Division of the Kingdom,	19
1017 Cnut King of all England,	19
His patriotic government,	20
Disputed succession,	21
Importance of Earl Godwine,	21
1037 Harold ,	21
1040 Harthacnut ,	21
Restoration of the English Line,	21
1042 Edward the Confessor ,	21
Rivalry of Godwine and the French Party,	22
1051 Godwine banished,	22
1052 His return and death,	23
1053 Harold succeeds to his influence,	23
He subdues Wales,	24
1066 Harold made King,	24
Claims of his rivals, Tostig and William of Normandy,	24
William's preparations,	25
Tostig's invasion,	26
William lands,	26
Battle of Hastings or Senlac,	26
Death of Harold,	27

STATE OF SOCIETY AT THE CONQUEST.

THE CONQUEST.

WILLIAM I. 1066-1087.

1066 Intended resistance of the English,	40
Election of Eadgar,	41
William marches to London,	41

	PAGE
1066 William is crowned,	41
His position as King,	42
Transfer of Property,	43
The form of Law retained,	43
Castles built,	43
Appointment of Earls,	43
1067 William revisits Normandy,	44
Misgovernment by his Viceroy,	44
Consequent rebellion,	44
Insurrections call him home,	44
1068 His position in the North and West,	45
1069 His devastations in Yorkshire,	47
1070 Complete subjugation of the North,	47
William's legislation,	48
His reform of the Church,	48
Appointment of foreign Bishops,	48
Stigand deposed,	48
Lanfranc Archbishop,	49
His Legislation,	49
He connects the Church with Rome,	49
But William still Head of the Church,	49
1071 Final Struggle of the English under Hereward,	50
Wales held in check by the Counts Palatine,	51
Savage invasions from Scotland,	51
1072 Malcolm swears fealty,	52
1075 Troubles in Normandy,	52
1076 Conspiracy of Norman nobles suppressed,	52
Waltheof executed,	53
Quarrel between William and his Sons,	53
1079 Reconciliation at Gerberoi,	54
Odo's oppressive government,	54
1084 Cnut's threatened invasion,	54
1085 The Domesday Book,	55
1087 William's death and burial,	55

CONQUEST OF NORMANDY AND ORGANIZATION OF ENGLAND.

WILLIAM II. 1087-1100.

1087 William crowned by Lanfranc,	56
Appeases the English,	56
Checks Norman opposition,	57
1089 Lanfranc dies,	57
Flambard succeeds him,	57

	PAGE
1090 William's quarrels with his Brothers,	57
1091 War with Scotland,	58
1094 Continued War with Wales,	59
Troubles in Normandy,	59
1095 Conspiracy of Mowbray,	59
1100 Size of his Dominions at his death,	60
Causes of his inferiority to his Father,	60
1089 Disputes with the Church,	61
Bishoprics left vacant,	61
1098 Anselm made Archbishop,	61
William opposes his reforms,	62

HENRY I. 1100-1135.

1100 Henry secures the crown,	63
Conciliates all classes,	63
His policy,	64
His opponents,	65
1101 Robert seeks the crown,	65
Withdraws without bloodshed,	65
Henry attacks his partisans,	65
1102 Defeat of Belesme and Norman Barons,	66
Establishment of royal power,	66
Belesme received in Normandy,	66
1105 Consequent invasion of the Duchy,	66
1106 Battle of Tenchebray, defeat of Robert,	66
1107 War with France,	67
Louis supports William Clito,	67
End of the War,	67
1113 Treaty of Gisors,	67
Prince William acknowledged heir,	68
1115 Renewed War with France and Anjou,	68
1119 Battle of Brenville,	68
Complete prosperity,	68
1120 Death of Prince William, and its consequences,	68
1124 War with Anjou,	69
1128 Death of William Clito,	69
Attempt to secure the succession to Matilda,	69
1135 Death of Henry,	70
Wales held in check by colonies of Flemings,	70
Constant insurrections,	70
Henry's Church policy,	70
1100 Anselm refuses fealty,	71
He has to leave England,	71

	PAGE
1106 Unsupported by the Pope,	71
Makes a compromise at Bec,	71
1102 Synod of Westminster,	71
Frequent bad Church appointments,	72
Henry corrects them when possible,	72
Wretched condition of the People,	72
Their chief complaints,	73
Baronial tyranny,	73
Heavy taxation,	73
Henry cures what evils he can,	74
His strict Police,	74
Administrative machinery,	74
Local Courts,	75
Curia Regis,	75
Its political effect,	76
The National Assembly,	76

FEUDAL OUTBREAK.

STEPHEN. 1135-1154.

1135 Strange character of the Reign,	77
Great power of the Church,	78
Stephen's Charter,	78
Affairs in Wales,	78
Early signs of disturbance,	79
1137 War with Scotland,	79
Last national effort of the English,	79
1138 Battle of the Standard,	80
Growth of Anarchy in England,	80
Creation of Earldoms and castles,	80
Robert of Gloucester renounces his fealty,	81
Stephen's mercenaries,	81
Jealousy between the old and new Administrations,	81
Stephen's quarrel with the Church,	82
1139 Consequent arrival of Matilda,	82
Civil War,	82
Continued quarrel with the Church,	82
1141 Robert of Gloucester, to bring matters to a crisis, fights the Battle of Lincoln,	83
Matilda seeks help from the Church and becomes Queen,	83
Importance of the Londoners,	83
Matilda offends both Church and Londoners,	84
Consequent revolution of affairs,	84

	PAGE
1142 Gloucester taken prisoner and exchanged for Stephen,	84
1146 Renewal of the old anarchy,	84
1147 Appearance of Prince Henry,	84
1148 Death of Robert of Gloucester,	85
1152 Henry's marriage and increased power,	85
The Church sides with him,	85
1153 Meeting of the armies at Wallingford,	85
The Church mediates a Compromise,	86
1154 Death of Stephen,	86
Quotations from Chroniclers showing the miseries of the Reign,	86

RECONSTITUTION OF THE MONARCHY—FORMATION OF THE NATION.

HENRY II. 1154-1189.

1154 Main Objects of Henry's Reign,	89
He restores order in the State,	90
Friendship with Adrian IV.,	90
1157 Master of England, Henry attacks Wales,	91
Rise of Thomas à Becket,	92
1158 He is employed in foreign negotiations,	92
1159 Nevertheless there is war with France,	92
Interesting points in it,	92
The Scotch King serves Henry,	93
Introduction of Scutage,	93
Having reduced the State to order, Henry turns to the Church,	93
General friendship of England and France with the Pope,	94
1161 Election of Becket to Archbishopric,	95
He upholds the Encroachments of the Church,	95
1164 Quarrel with Becket, and Constitutions of Clarendon,	95
Becket refuses them,	96
Lukewarmness of Alexander III.,	96
The quarrel takes a legal form,	97
Comes before the Council,	97
Henry presses him with charges,	97
Becket leaves the Court before judgment is given,	98
1165 He is received by the Pope,	98
But Henry refuses to oppose Alexander,	99
1166 Meanwhile he attacks Wales, and secures Brittany,	99
Becket excommunicates his enemies,	99
1167 The Pope temporizes,	99
Critical position of Henry,	100

	PAGE
1170 Coronation of young Henry,	100
Finding this step unpopular,	101
Henry submits,	101
Becket ventures to return to England,	101
Becket's death,	101
Henry retires to the Invasion of Ireland,	102
Condition of Ireland,	102
1169 Invasion by Strongbow,	102
1171 Henry himself invades Ireland,	102
Irish Church adopts Romish discipline,	102
Henry's reconciliation with Rome,	103
1174 Great Insurrection,	103
Crisis of the danger,	104
Henry's penance at Canterbury,	104
Capture of the Scotch King at Alnwick,	104
Henry's complete success,	105
Small diminution of Henry's power, either temporal or ecclesiastical,	105
Henry's Judicial and Constitutional changes,	106
The Curia Regis,	106
Itinerant Justices,	106
Origin of the Jury,	108
Assize of Arms, Scutage,	109
Closing troubles with his Sons and with France,	109
The causes of these troubles,	109
1183 First War, against Young Henry,	110
1184 Second War, against Richard,	111
1187 Third War,	111
1188 Saladin Tax,	111
1189 Last War, with Richard and Philip,	112
Henry's ill success,	112
Disastrous Peace and Death,	112
Importance of the Reign,	113

RICHARD I. 1189-1199.

1189 Persecution of the Jews,	115
All Offices put up for sale,	116
1190 Richard starts for the Crusade,	116
Leaving England to Longchamp,	116
Richard quarrels with Philip in Sicily,	117
1191 He conquers Cyprus,	118
Miserable condition of the Kingdom of Jerusalem,	119
1187 Jerusalem taken by Saladin,	119

	PAGE
1189 Acre besieged,	119
1191 Arrival of the Crusaders,	119
Richard saves Acre,	120
Philip goes home,	120
Richard quarrels with Austria,	120
1192 Truce with Saladin,	121
1191 John's Behaviour in England,	121
Return of Philip,	122
Need of Richard's return,	122
1192 His imprisonment in Germany,	122
John and Philip combine against him,	122
England ransoms him,	123
1194 Richard's return, John's defeat,	123
War with France,	123
1199 Richard's death at Chaluz,	124
Development of the Administrative System,	124

STRUGGLE BETWEEN THE CROWN AND THE NATION.

JOHN. 1199-1216.

1199 John secures the crown,	126
His strong position,	127
1200 His danger from France,	127
Peace with Philip, and marriage treaty,	127
Marriage with Isabella de la Marche,	128
1201 Homage of Scotland,	128
Outbreak in Poitou,	128
1202 John's French Provinces forfeited,	128
1203 Death of Arthur,	129
1205 Loss of Normandy,	129
1206 Peace with Philip,	129
1205 Election of the Archbishop of Canterbury,	130
Stephen Langton,	131
1207 Consecration at Viterbo, and John's violence,	131
1208 Interdict and flight of Bishops,	131
1209 Excommunication,	131
1210 Attack on Scotland, Ireland and Wales,	132
Disaffection of the Northern Barons,	133
The King's rapacity,	133
1211 European crisis,	133
League with Northern Princes,	133
1213 John's deposition,	133
Surrender of the Crown to the Pope,	134

	PAGE
1213 John's improved position,	134
Renewed difficulties with Stephen Langton,	135
John hopes to secure his position by victory in France,	135
1214 Battle of Bouvines,	136
1215 Insurrection in England on his return,	136
Meeting at Brackley,	136
Capture of London,	137
Runnymede,	137
Political position of England,	137
Terms of Magna Charta,	138
John attempts to break loose from it,	139
1216 Louis is summoned,	139
John's death,	140

HENRY III. 1216-1272.

1216 Henry's authority gradually established,	141
Difficulties at his accession,	142
Pembroke's measures of conciliation,	142
1217 Fair of Lincoln,	142
Louis leaves England,	142
Renewal of the Charter,	142
1219 Papal attempt to govern by Legates,	143
Pandulf's government,	143
1221 His fall,	143
Triumph of national party under Hubert de Burgh,	143
Parties in England,	144
1223 Opposition Barons at Leicester,	144
Resumption of royal castles,	145
1224 Destruction of Faukes de Breauté,	145
Danger from France,	145
1223 Death of Philip,	145
1226 Death of Louis VIII.,	145
English neglect this opportunity,	146
Poitou remains French,	146
1227 Hubert's continued power,	146
Langton supports his policy,	146
Change of Popes—increased exactions,	147
1228 Death of Langton,	147
Quarrel of Henry and De Burgh,	147
1229 Henry's false foreign policy,	147
1231 Return of Des Roches,	148
1232 Twenge's riots,	148

	PAGE
1232 Fall of De Burgh,	148
1233 Revolution under Des Roches,	149
Earl of Pembroke upholds De Burgh,	149
1234 Edmund of Canterbury causes Des Roches' fall,	150
1235 Henry becomes his own minister,	151
1236 Henry's marriage,	151
1237 Influence of the Queen's uncles,	151
1238 Formation of a national party under Simon de Montfort,	152
Revival in the Church,	152
Grosthète,	153
1243 Loss of Poitou,	153
Prince Richard joins the foreign party,	154
1244 Exactions in Church and State,	154
1247 Inroad of Poitevin favourites,	155
1248 Discontent of the Barons,	155
Continued misgovernment,	155
1249 Tallages on the cities,	155
1250 Diversion of the Crusade,	156
De Montfort's government of Gascony,	156
His quarrel with the King,	156
1253 By his aid Gascony is saved,	156
The King's money difficulties,	157
1254 The Pope offers Edmund the Kingdom of Sicily,	157
Henry accepts it on ruinous terms,	157
1256 Consequent exactions,	158
1257 Terrible famine,	158
Parliament at length roused to resistance,	158
Parliament at Westminster,	158
1258 The "Mad Parliament,"	159
Provisions of Oxford,	159
Opposition to the surrender of Castles,	160
Exile of aliens,	160
Proclamation of the Provisions,	160
Government of the Barons,	160
1259 Final treaty with France,	161
Henry thinks of breaking the Provisions,	161
1261 The Pope's absolution arrives,	161
Quarrel between De Clare and De Montfort,	161
1262 Return of De Montfort,	162
1263 Outbreak of hostilities,	162
1264 The Award of Amiens fails,	163
War—Battle of Lewes,	163
The Mise of Lewes,	163
Appointment of revolutionary government,	163
The exiles assemble at Damme,	164

	PAGE
1264 De Montfort desires final settlement,	164
Royalist movements on the Welsh Marches,	164
1265 Parliament assembles,	165
Conditions of Prince Edward's liberation,	165
De Clare forsakes the Barons,	166
He joins the Marchers,	166
Escape of Edward,	166
Leicester opposes Edward in Wales,	166
Defeat at Kenilworth,	166
Battle of Evesham,	167
1266 Dictum of Kenilworth,	168
1267 De Clare compels more moderate government,	168
Constitutional end of the reign,	168
Views of the people on the war,	168

SETTLEMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

EDWARD I. 1272-1307.

1272 Edward's accession and character,	171
The first English King,	172
His political views,	173
His legal mind,	173
His success,	173
His enforced concessions,	174
1275 His first Parliament,	174
Statute of Westminster,	174
Establishment of Customs,	174
1278 Edward's restorative measures,	174
New coinage,	175
1279 Statute of Mortmain,	175
Affairs in Wales,	175
1275 Llewellyn's suspicious conduct,	175
1277 War breaks out,	176
Llewellyn submits, and is mercifully treated,	176
1282 Second rising in Wales,	176
Death of Llewellyn,	176
1283 Execution of David,	176
1284 Statute of Wales,	177
Annexation of Wales,	177
1282 Foreign affairs call Edward abroad,	177
1284 The Sicilian Vespers,	177
1286 Edward acts as mediator between France and Aragon,	178

	PAGE
1288 His award is repudiated,	178
1289 Disturbances in England during his absence,	178
He returns, punishes corrupt judges, banishes the Jews,	179
Second period of the reign,	179
Relations with Scotland,	180
1290 Extinction of the Scotch royal family,	181
Proposed marriage of the Maid and Prince Edward,	181
Invitation to Edward to settle the Succession,	182
Death of the Maid,	182
1291 Meeting at Norham,	182
Edward's supremacy allowed,	182
The claimants to the Scotch throne,	182
1292 Edward gives a just verdict,	183
Balliol accepts the throne as a vassal,	183
1293 Scotland appeals therefore to the English Courts,	183
The appeals not pressed to extremities,	184
Quarrel with France,	184
Edward is outwitted, Gascony occupied,	184
Balliol in alliance with France,	184
1295 First True Parliament,	185
1296 Edward marches into Scotland,	185
Defeat of the Scotch at Dunbar,	185
Submission of Balliol and Scotland,	186
Constitutional opposition of Clergy and Barons,	186
1296 Refusal of the Clergy to grant subsidies,	186
1297 The Clergy outlawed,	187
The Barons refuse to assist Edward,	187
Compromise with the Clergy,	187
Edward secures an illegal grant,	187
The Earls demand the confirmation of the Charters,	188
They are granted with reservations,	188
Scotch insurrection under Wallace,	189
1299 English Treaty with France,	189
Edward invades Scotland,	190
Defeats Wallace at Falkirk,	190
Comyn's Regency,	190
1301 Parliament of Lincoln,	190
The Pope's claims rejected,	191
1303 Third invasion and conquest of Scotland,	191
1306 Bruce murders Comyn and rebels,	192
Preparations for a fourth invasion,	192
1307 Edward's death near Carlisle,	192
Constitutional importance of the reign,	193

RENEWAL OF THE STRUGGLE OF THE NATION AGAINST THE CROWN.

EDWARD II. 1307-1327.

	PAGE
1307 Edward's friendship for Gaveston,	198
1308 The Barons demand his dismissal,	198
1309 Gaveston's return,	199
General discontent,	199
Statute of Stamford,	200
1310 Appointment of the Lords Ordainers,	200
1311 Useless assault on Scotland,	200
The Ordinances published,	201
Policy of the Opposition,	201
Gaveston banished,	201
1312 He reappears with the King,	202
He is beheaded at Warwick,	202
1314 Renewal of the War with Scotland,	203
Battle of Bannockburn,	203
Edward refuses to treat,	204
Consequent disasters,	204
1315 Wars in Wales and Ireland,	204
Edward Bruce's invasion of Ireland,	204
1316 He is crowned King,	205
1318 He is killed at Dundalk,	205
1316 Distress in England,	205
Lancaster temporary Minister,	205
Power of the Despensers,	205
1318 Temporary reconciliation,	206
1320 Truce with Scotland,	206
The Welsh Marchers quarrel with the Despensers,	206
Edward supports his favourites,	206
1321 Hereford and Lancaster combine,	206
The Despensers are banished,	206
An insult to the Queen rouses the King to energy,	207
Edward recalls the Despensers,	207
1322 Pacifies the Marches,	207
Attacks Lancaster,	207
Battle of Boroughbridge,	207
Lancaster worshipped as a Saint,	207
Triumph of the Despensers,	208
Renewal of war with Scotland,	208
1323 Peace for thirteen years with Scotland,	208
Dangers surrounding the King,	208
1324 Difficulties with France,	209

	PAGE
1325 The Queen and Prince in France,	209
1326 She lands in England,	210
Her party gathers strength,	210
The King is taken,	210
1327 The Prince of Wales made King,	210
Murder of Edward,	211

BEGINNING OF HUNDRED YEARS' WAR, AND CONSTITUTIONAL PROGRESS.

EDWARD III. 1327-1377.

1327 Measures of reform,	214
Mortimer's misgovernment,	214
Fruitless campaign against Scotland,	214
Opposition to Mortimer,	214
1330 Conspiracy and death of Kent,	215
Edward overthrows Mortimer,	215
Edward's healing measures,	216
1332 Balliol invades Scotland,	216
Edward supports him,	216
Siege of Berwick,	217
1333 Battle of Halidon Hill,	217
1334 Temporary Submission of Scotland,	217
Edward's claims on France,	218
The Scotch, with Philip's help, renew the War,	218
Edward therefore produces his claims,	218
Edward attacks France,	218
1338 His alliances on the North-east,	219
He is made Imperial Vicar,	219
Great taxation,	219
He lands in Flanders,	220
1339 Deserted by his allies, he returns home,	220
1340 Returns, and wins the Battle of Sluys,	220
Fruitless expedition to Tournay,	220
Sudden visit to England,	221
Displacement of the Ministry,	221
1341 His dispute with Stratford,	221
Edward yields,	221
1342 Loss of all his allies,	222
New opening in Brittany,	222
1343 Mediation of the Pope offered,	223
Decay of Papal influence,	223

	PAGE
1344 His mediation accepted conditionally, it fails,	224
Edward's commercial difficulties,	224
1345 War breaks out again,	224
Derby hard pressed in Guienne,	224
1346 Edward, to relieve him, lands in Normandy,	225
Marches towards Calais,	225
Battle of Cressy,	227
Battle of Neville's Cross,	228
1347 Siege of Calais,	228
Truce,	229
1349 The Black Death,	229
1355 Renewal of the War,	229
Destructive March of the Black Prince southwards,	229
The "Burnt Candlemas,"	231
1356 The Black Prince's expedition northwards,	231
Battle of Poitiers,	231
Release of King David,	232
1357 Peace with Scotland,	232
Terrible condition of France,	232
1359 Reviving power of the Dauphin,	232
Edward again invades France,	233
1360 Want of permanent results induce Edward to make The Peace of Bretigny,	233
The Treaty is not carried out,	234
1364 The War in Brittany continues,	234
1365 Affairs of Castile,	234
1366 France and England support the rival claimants,	234
1367 Battle of Navarette,	235
1368 Taxation in Aquitaine,	235
The Barons appeal to Charles,	235
1369 Renewal of French War,	235
Gradual Defeat of the English,	236
1370 The Black Prince takes Limoges,	236
His final return to England,	236
1374 Loss of Aquitaine,	236
1372 Naval victory of the Spaniards,	236
1375 Discontent in England,	236
Politics of the Time,	237
1376 The Good Parliament,	239
Death of the Black Prince,	240
Lancaster regains power,	240
1377 The Lancastrian Parliament,	240
Trial of Wicliffe,	240
Uproar in London,	240
Death of the King,	240

BEGINNING OF THE FACTION FIGHT AMONG THE NOBILITY.

RICHARD II. 1377-1399.

	PAGE
1377 Difficulties of the new reign,	242
Regency and administration of Lancaster,	242
Patriotic government,	243
1380 Money wanted for the War in Brittany,	243
The Poll Tax,	243
1381 Insurrection of the Villeins,	244
Death of Wat Tyler,	244
The insurrection suppressed,	245
Parliament rejects the Villeins' claims,	245
1383 Suspicions of Lancaster's objects,	245
He deserts Wicliffe,	245
He is charged with the failure in Flanders,	246
1385 Jealousy of him thwarts the Scotch invasion,	246
He is glad of the excuse to leave England to support his claims in Castile,	246
Gloucester takes Lancaster's place,	246
The King's Favourites,	247
1386 Gloucester heads an opposition,	247
Change of Ministry demanded,	247
Impeachment of Suffolk,	247
Commission of Government,	247
1387 The King prepares a counterblow	248
The Five Lords Appellant,	248
They impeach the King's friends,	248
Affair of Radcot,	248
1388 The Wonderful Parliament,	248
1389 Gloucester's unimportant Government,	249
Richard assumes authority,	249
1393 Final Statute of Provisors,	250
1394 Expedition to Ireland,	250
1397 Marriage with Isabella of France,	251
Richard's vengeance after seven years' peace,	251
1398 Hereford and Norfolk banished,	252
His arbitrary rule alienates the people,	253
1399 During his absence in Ireland,	253
Hereford returns and is triumphantly received,	253
He captures Richard,	254
Makes him resign the Kingdom,	254

STATE OF SOCIETY.

MONARCHY BY PARLIAMENTARY TITLE.

HENRY IV. 1399-1413.

	PAGE
1399 Henry's position in English History,	275
Reveral of the Acts of the late King,	276
Tumultuous scene in the First Parliament,	276
The King's insecure position for nine years,	276
1400 Insurrection of the late Lords Appellant,	277
Imprisonment and secret death of Richard,	277
Hostile attitude of France and Scotland,	278
Useless and impolitic march into Scotland,	278
1401 Insurrection in Wales,	278
Owen Glendower,	278
1402 Quarrel with the Percies,	278
The pretended Richard,	279
Causes of the quarrel with Northumberland,	279
1403 The Percies combine with Glendower,	279
Battle of Shrewsbury,	280
1404 Submission of Northumberland,	280
Widespread Conspiracy,	280
1405 Flight of the young Earl of March,	280
Renewed activity of Northumberland, Scrope and Mowbray,	281
Events which secured Henry's triumph,	281
Capture of James of Scotland,	281
1407 Murder of Orleans,	282
1408 Final defeat and death of Northumberland,	282
Henry's improved position,	282
His enforced respect for the Commons,	282
Climax of their power,	283
Explained by the King's failing health,	283
1412 Renewed vigour at the end of his reign,	283
Henry's foreign policy,	283
His alliance with the Church,	284
1401 His persecuting Statute,	285
Views of the nation with regard to the Church,	285
1408 Henry's jealousy of the Prince of Wales,	285

RENEWAL OF THE HUNDRED YEARS' WAR.

HENRY V. 1413-1422.

1413 Fortunate opening of his reign,	287
General amnesty and release of prisoners,	288

	PAGE
1414 Signs of slumbering discontent,	288
The Lollards,	288
Henry's reason for the impolitic French War,	289
State of France,	290
Expulsion of the Burgundians from Paris,	290
Attempt at national government,	290
Henry's double diplomacy and outrageous claims,	291
His preparations,	291
1415 He lands in France,	292
Conspiracy of Cambridge,	292
Capture of Harfleur,	292
Henry compelled to retire upon Calais	293
Battle of Agincourt,	295
The French Government falls into the hands of the Armagnacs,	296
1416 Visit of Sigismund,	297
His position in Europe,	297
His close union with Henry,	297
Failure of his mediation,	298
1417 Armagnac attacks Queen Isabella,	298
She allies herself with Burgundy,	298
Henry's second invasion,	298
1418 The Parisians, anxious for peace, admit the Burgundians,	298
1419 Fall of Rouen,	299
Negotiations for peace,	300
Attempted reconciliation of the French parties,	300
Murder of Burgundy,	300
Young Burgundy joins England,	300
1420 Treaty of Troyes,	300
1421 English defeat at Beaugé,	301
Henry hurries to Paris,	301
1422 While re-establishing his affairs he dies,	301
Death of Charles VI.,	302

LOSS OF FRANCE AND DESTRUCTION OF THE BARONAGE.

HENRY VI. 1422-1461.

1422 Arrangements of the Kingdom,	303
Position of affairs in France,	304
1423 Bedford's marriage,	304
Release of the Scotch King,	304
1424 Battle of Verneuil,	305
Consequent strength of the English position in France,	305

	PAGE
It is disturbed by the consequences of Gloucester's marriage,	305
The first blow to the Burgundian alliance,	305
1425 Rivalry of Beaufort and Gloucester,	306
1426 Gloucester's marriage with Eleanor Cobham,	307
Bedford again secures Burgundy,	307
1428 And attacks Orleans,	307
1429 Battle of the Herrings,	308
Danger of Orleans,	308
Joan of Arc,	308
Causes of her success,	310
The siege is raised,	310
March to Rheims to crown the Dauphin,	310
Unsuccessful attack on Paris,	311
1430 Capture of Joan of Arc,	311
Coronation of King Henry,	311
1431 Joan's death,	311
1432 Increasing difficulties of the English,	312
State of England,	312
Conduct of Gloucester,	312
Death of the Duchess of Bedford,	312
Bedford re-marries. Second blow to the Burgundian alliance,	312
1433 Efforts at peace, and	313
1434 Rise of a War party under Gloucester,	313
1435 Great Peace Congress at Arras,	314
Bedford's death,	314
Consequent defection of Burgundy,	314
1436 Obstinacy of the War party,	314
Continued ill success,	315
Danger from Scotland,	315
1437 James's death,	315
1440 Peace party procures the liberation of Orleans,	316
1442 Peace becomes necessary,	316
Rise of Suffolk,	316
1445 Marriage of Henry with Margaret of Anjou,	316
1446 Pre-eminence of Suffolk,	317
1447 Gloucester's death,	317
York takes his place,	317
1448 Ministry of Suffolk,	318
His unpopularity,	318
Renewal of the War,	318
1449 Fall of Rouen,	319
Popular outbreak against Suffolk,	319
1450 Murder of Suffolk,	319
Continued discontent,	320

	PAGE
1450 Jack Cade,	320
1452 York's appearance in arms; Civil War begins,	320
He is duped into submission,	321
1453 Imbecility of the King,	321
1454 Prince of Wales born,	321
York's First Protectorate,	322
Recovery of the King,	322
1455 York again appears in arms,	322
First Battle of St. Albans,	322
Character of the two parties,	323
1456 York's Second Protectorate,	324
1457 With the Nevilles he retires from Court,	324
1458 Hollow reconciliation of parties,	325
1459 Renewed hostilities,	325
Battle of Blore Heath,	325
Flight of the Yorkists from Ludlow,	325
Lancastrian Parliament at Coventry,	325
1460 Fresh attack of the Yorkists,	325
Battle of Northampton,	326
Yorkist Parliament in London,	326
York at last advances claims to the throne,	326
The Lords agree on a compromise,	326
York is defeated and killed at Wakefield,	326
1461 The young Duke of York wins the Battle of Mortimer's Cross,	327
The Queen, advancing to London, wins second Battle of St. Albans,	327
Sudden rising of the Home Counties,	327
Triumphant entry of Edward,	327

HEREDITARY ROYALTY WITHOUT CONSTITUTIONAL CHECKS.

EDWARD IV. 1461-1483.

1461 Edward secures the crown,	328
Battle of Towton,	328
Yorkist Parliament,	328
1462 With French help Margaret keeps up the War,	328
1464 Battle of Hedgeley Moor,	328
Battle of Hexham,	328
1465 Edward's triumph and popular Government,	329
Apparent security of his Throne,	330
Destroyed by his marriage, and the rise of the Woodvilles,	330

	PAGE
1466 Power of the Nevilles,	331
Their French policy,	331
Edward's Burgundian policy,	331
1467 Defection of the Nevilles,	332
1469 Popular risings inspired by them,	332
Clarence's weakness drives them to the Lancastrians,	333
1470 Wells' rebellion,	333
Flight of Warwick,	333
He returns and re-crowns Henry VI.,	334
1471 Edward escapes and gets help from Burgundy,	334
Clarence joins him,	335
Battle of Barnet,	335
Margaret lands in England,	335
Battle of Tewkesbury,	335
Edward's triumphant return to power,	335
Murder of Henry,	335
Clarence's quarrels,	336
1476 With Richard,	336
1477 With Edward,	336
1478 His trial and death,	337
1475 Edward joins Burgundy against France,	337
Failure of his expedition,	337
Treaty of Pecquigni,	338
Ambitious projects of marriage for his daughters,	338
1482 Affairs in Scotland,	338
Edward supports Albany,	339
He gains Berwick,	339
1483 His death and character,	339

EDWARD V. 1483.

1483 State of parties at Edward IV.'s death,	340
Richard overthrows the Queen's party,	340
He is made Protector,	340
He quarrels with the new nobles,	340
Hastings' death, and fall of his party,	341
Richard, with Buckingham's help, secures the crown,	341

RICHARD III. 1483-1485.

1483 Richard's position, and policy of conciliation,	345
His strong position,	345

	PAGE
1483 Weak points in it,	346
Disaffection in the South,	346
Death of the Princes,	346
Projected marriage of Elizabeth and Richmond,	346
Defection of Buckingham,	347
Richmond's first Invasion,	347
Death of Buckingham,	347
Failure of the Conspiracy,	347
1484 The great Act of Confiscation,	347
Richmond's continued schemes,	348
Richard's efforts to oppose him,	348
Attempts to win the Queen,	348
Death of the Prince of Wales,	348
Lincoln declared heir,	348
1485 General uneasiness in England,	348
Richard has recourse to benevolences,	349
Richmond lands at Milford,	349
Conduct of the Stanleys,	349
Battle of Bosworth,	349
Richard's character and laws,	350

LIST OF MAPS.

1. SAXON ENGLAND	At end of Book.
2. CRUSADES	" "
3. FRANCE	" "
4. ENGLISH POSSESSIONS IN FRANCE	" "
5. NORTH OF FRANCE	" "
6. ENGLAND AND WALES	" "

INTRODUCTION.

THE history of civilization can be traced in great lines which have more or less followed a similar direction throughout all Europe. The interest of a national history is to observe the course which these lines have followed in a particular instance; for, examined in detail, their course has never been identical. The period occupied by what we speak of as English history is that, speaking broadly, during which the great mediæval systems—feudalism and the Church—have by degrees given place to modern society, of which the moving-springs are freedom of the individual, government in accordance with the popular will, and freedom of thought. The object of a History of England is therefore to trace that change as it worked itself out amid all the various influences which affected it in our own nation. The peculiar circumstances of the Norman conquest prevented the complete development in England of either of the great Continental systems. Neither the feudal system nor the system of the Roman Church are to be found in their completeness in England. The separation of England from the Empire, the entire destruction of the Roman occupation by the German invaders, prevented that contact between German and Roman civilization from which Continental feudalism sprang. And though, if left to itself, the civilization of the early English would have ripened into some form of feudalism, it was caught by the Conquest before the process was completed. The Normans brought with them, indeed, the external apparatus of the completed system; but in the hands of their great leader, and grafted upon the existing institutions of the country, it assumed a new form. The power of the King was always maintained and the power of the barons suppressed, while room was left under the shadow of a strong monarchy for the growth of the lower classes of the nation. In the same way, the Church was always kept from assuming a position of supremacy, and its subordinate relations to the State maintained. The establishment of this new form of government may be held to occupy the first period of our history since the Conquest, lasting till the reign of John. During that time the barons, who had more than once attempted to establish the same virtual independence as was enjoyed by their fellows abroad, were taught to recognize the power of the Crown. The legislation of Henry I. and Henry II., and the establishment under the latter of a new nobility dependent for their status upon their ministerial services, coupled with the incorporation of the national system of justice with the feudal system of the conquerors, united all classes of Englishmen and consolidated the nation, but in so doing raised to an alarming degree the power of the Crown. The miserable reign of John, and the tyrannical use he made of the power thus placed in his hands, called attention to the dangers which beset the administrative arrangements of his father. The total severance of England from France, which took place in his reign, and his rash quarrel with the Church, completed the work of national consolidation, but placed the united nation in antagonism to the throne. The nobility, which in other countries were the natural enemies of all classes below them, were thus forced to assume the lead of all who desired a reasonable amount of national freedom.

The struggle to harmonize the relations which should exist between the Crown and the subject occupies the second period of our history. It assumes several forms; sometimes the dislike of foreigners, sometimes a desire for self-taxation, sometimes it seems little more than an outbreak of an over-strong nobility. But whatever its form, the fruits of the struggle were lasting. The rival claims of King and nation, acknowledged and regulated by the wisdom of Edward I., gave rise to that balanced constitution which in its latest development still exists among us. But it would seem that this great advance in government had been somewhat premature. In other nations institutions resembling our Parliament sprang into existence, and faded away before the power of the Crown, an effect which can be traced chiefly to the strong line of division separating the commonalty from the nobles. Without support from the nobility, and in all its interests in direct antagonism to it, the commonalty, after supporting the Crown in the destruction of the baronage, found itself in presence of a power to which it was unable to offer any resistance. Several causes already mentioned had in England weakened the sharp definition of classes, but there was a great risk even there of a similar failure of constitutional monarchy. It was as the leader of the nobility that Henry IV. first rose into importance in the reign of Richard II., and subsequently obtained the crown. The limitation of the franchise in the reign of Henry VI., and the consequent subserviency of Parliament, were steps towards the elevation of an aristocratical influence, which, had it grown till its suppression by the Crown was rendered necessary, would have reproduced in England the historical phenomena visible in France. Fortunately the nobility were not at one among themselves. The various sources from which they derived their origin, the close family connections, and personal interests, split them into factions, which, taking advantage of a disputed succession, brought their quarrel to the trial of the sword with such animosity that the nobility of England was virtually extinguished.

But while this faction fight, and the great French war which preceded it, attract the attention chiefly during the third period of the history, a quiet advance of great importance had been going on, sheltered by the more obvious movements of the time. The same spirit which had found its expression in the establishment of the Constitution, had indirectly, if not directly, influenced every class of the nation. The exclusive merchant guild had given place to the craftsman's guild. The wars in France, the alienation of property fostered by the legislation of Edward I., the Black Death, which had robbed the country of at least a third of its labouring hands, had sealed the fate of serfdom, and established in England the great class of free wage labourers. The same alienation, the gradual increase and importance of trade, and the formation and introduction of capital, had formed a middle class of gentry, from which the successful merchant was not excluded. Nor had this political growth been unaccompanied by an advance of thought. The failure of the crusades, the last great exhibition of material religion; the Franciscan revival; the philosophy of Bacon and his successors; the bold declaration of independence on the part of Wicliffe, and the grasping and repellent character of the Roman Court, had shaken the Church to its foundations. The storm which had shaken the surface of English society had left its depths unmoved and undisturbed by the great work of extermination proceeding overhead; these processes of growth had been gradually continuing their course during the whole of the third period. Thus, then, when Edward IV. emerged from the troubles of the Wars of the Roses as King of England, his position, though it might seem very similar to that of a king who had triumphed over his nobility, was yet considerably modified. The nobility were no doubt gone, but it was not the Crown which had crushed them. The Church, indeed, threw all its influence on the side of the Crown, but it was in the consciousness of the insecurity of its position in the hearts of the people that it did so. The King and his Commons stood face to face, with no intermediate class to check their mutual action, but the Commons were already free, and headed by a rapidly rising body of wealthy secondary landowners or merchants. Nevertheless, the immediate effect of the destruction of the nobility was completely to check constitutional growth, and to establish a government which was little short of arbitrary.

The Italian statecraft, which the influence of the Renaissance rendered paramount, for the moment increased the tendency to absolutism; and in the reign of Henry VIII., though a shadow of popular government yet remained, the will of the king was little short of absolute. What may be called the fourth period of our history is occupied by the establishment of this arbitrary power, and the gradual awakening of national life, under the influences of the Renaissance, and of the circumstances which accompanied the Reformation, which tended to modify it in the reign of Elizabeth. When Protestantism and the vigorous young thought of the reawakened nation became linked indissolubly with the fortunes of the sovereign in her national war against Spain, the mere necessity of the union tended much to put a practical limit to the arbitrary of character of the new monarchy. It was the miscomprehension the necessity of this union between king and people which produced the contests which occupy our history during the reign of the Stuarts.

Bred in the theory of monarchy by Divine right, the logical offspring of feudalism, when separated from the Empire and the Church, the Stuarts were willing to accept the arbitrary power of their predecessors, but would not acknowledge the necessity of harmonious action with the people, on which alone, as things then were, such arbitrary authority could rest. The middle class of gentry had been increasing in power and influence till they were now in a position to assume that leadership in the nation which the destruction of the nobles had left vacant. And behind them there was the bulk of the people, whose Protestantism, the religious character of the late national struggle, and the love of truth engendered by the Renaissance, had raised to enthusiastic Puritanism.

The constitutional life, checked for a time by the Tudor monarchy, again sprang into existence. In the struggle which ensued it was the enthusiastic party which ultimately triumphed, and its leader, Cromwell, is seen mingling his conscientious efforts at the establishment of constitutional government with a religious fervour too great to be sustained.

But his rule, freed from those parts for which, as yet, the gentry at all events were unprepared, established, definitely and for ever, the necessity of recurring sooner or later to the constitutional principles of the fourteenth century. In the Revolution of 1688 those principles triumphed. But they triumphed in the hands no longer of a great enthusiastic leader, but of a party, which found its chief supporters in a limited number of noble houses, whose aristocratic pride was injured by the arbitrary power of the sovereign, and whose influence in the formation of Parliament promised them political superiority under the establishment of parliamentary government. From that time till the present the scene of the contest has been changed. A party struggle of some thirty years gave place to the unchecked predominance of parliamentary rule. And the last period of our history has been occupied by the efforts of the excluded nation to make their voice heard above that of a nominal representation, consisting in reality of the representatives of a dominant class, under the influence either of the great Whig families or of the Crown.

(The founder of the family a kinsman of William I.)

DE BOHUNS (HEREFORD, ESSEX, NORTHAMPTON).

Henry de Bohun = Maud, daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex.
1st Earl of Hereford. Hereditary Constable of England. One of the Guardians of the Charter. Taken prisoner at battle of Lincoln. Died 1220.

Humphrey, 2nd Earl of Hereford. Made also Earl of Essex by Henry III. Godfather to Prince Edward. On Barons' side. Taken prisoner at Evesham. Restored to favour.

Humphrey = Eleanor, daughter of Eve and William de Braose.
Commanded on Barons' side at Lewes. Taken prisoner at Evesham. Died 1266.

Humphrey, 3rd Earl of Hereford = Maud, daughter of and Essex. Restored to favour by Edward I. Fought in Scotland. Refused to fight for Edward I. Compelled him to ratify the Charter. Died 1298.

Humphrey, 4th Earl of Hereford and Essex. Fought for Edward I. and II. in Scotland. Taken prisoner at Stryvelin; exchanged for Bruce's wife. Refused to obey Edward's order not to fight Despenser. Joined Lancaster's insurrection. Killed at battle of Boroughbridge, 1322.

1	2	3
John = Alice Fitz-Alan, 5th Earl of Hereford and Essex. Died 1335.	Humphrey, 6th Earl of Hereford and Essex.	William = Elizabeth, daughter of Badlesmere, widow of Edmund Mortimer. Fought at Cressy. Made Earl of Northampton, 1337. Died 1360.

Humphrey = Joan, daughter of Richard, 9th Earl of Arundel.
7th Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton. Died 1372.

Eleanor = Thomas of Woodstock, sixth son of Edward III., who thus became Constable.
Mary = Henry IV., who thus became Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton.

(Family founded at the Conquest.)

BEAUCHAMP

(WARWICK).

Walter de Beauchamp = Bertha de Braose.

Fought against John.
Made peace with Henry III. One of the Barons-Marchers.
Died 1235.

Walcheline = Joan, daughter of Roger Mortimer,
Died 1235. who died 1215.

William = Isabel, sister and heiress of William Maudit,
Earl of Warwick.
Fought in Gascony.
and in Scotland.
Died 1268.

William = Maud Fitz-John,
widow of Girard de Furnival.
1st Earl of Warwick.
Distinguished in Edward I.'s wars. Died
1298.

Guy = Alice de Toni.
2nd Earl, "The Black Dog of Ardenne." Caused Gaveston to be beheaded. Died 1315.

Thomas = Catherine, daughter of Roger Mortimer, 1st Earl of March.
3rd Earl. Fought at Cressy and Poitiers.
Died of the plague at Calais, 1369.

Thomas = Margaret Ferrars.
4th Earl. Governor of Richard
II. Joined Thomas of Gloucester. Condemned to death.
Banished to Isle of Man. Kept in the Tower. Restored by Henry IV. Died 1401.

Richard = 1. Eliz. de Lisle.
5th Earl. Fought against the Percies at Shrewsbury.
Governor of Henry VI.
Lieutenant-General of France. Died 1439.

Henry = Cicely Neville.
6th Earl, Premier Earl of England. Duke of Warwick (married at ten years old). Died 1445.

Ann.
Died 1449.

Anne = Richard Neville,
"The Kingmaker."
Became heiress on her niece's death.

Isabel = George,
Duke of Clarence
Ann = Prince Edward.
= Richard III.

(Family founded at the Conquest.)

MOWBRAY (NOTTINGHAM, NORFOLK).

William de Mowbray = Agnes, daughter of Earl of Arundel.
Strong against John. One of the 25 Guardians of the Charter.
Taken prisoner at battle of Lincoln. Made peace with Henry III. Lands restored.
Died 1222.

Roger = Maud, daughter of Beauchamp of Bedford.
Died 1266.

Roger = Rose, daughter of Richard de Clare,
Earl of Gloucester.
Fought in Wales and Gascony.
Died 1298.

John = Aliva de Braose.
Fought in Scotland.
Warden of the Marches towards Scotland, 1314. Joined Lancaster. Hanged
at York 1322.

John = Joan, daughter of Henry,
Earl of Lancaster.
In favour with
Edward III.
Fought in France.
Died 1361.

John = Elizabeth, granddaughter and heiress of Thomas de Brotherton, Earl Marshall, and Earl of Norfolk.
Died fighting against the Turks at Constantinople, 1363.

John, made Earl of Nottingham,
1377. Died
1379.

Thomas = Elizabeth, daughter of Richard, Earl of Arundel.
Earl of Nottingham, 1383. Earl Marshall, 1386. Governor of Calais. Helped to execute Arundel, his father-in-law, and Thomas of Woodstock.
Had the lands of Arundel
and of Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick. Duel with Hereford. Banished for life. Died at Venice, 1400.

Thomas = Constance, daughter of
Earl Marshall. Joined Scrope.
Beheaded 1405.

John = Kate
Neville.
Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk.
Died 1432.

Margaret = Robert Howard.
John, became Duke of Norfolk, and Earl Marshall after Anne's death, 1483

John = Eleanor Bouchier.
3rd Duke of Norfolk.
Died 1461.

John = Elizabeth, daughter of Talbot,
Earl of Shrewsbury.
Earl of Warrenne
and Surrey 1451.
4th Duke of Norfolk. Died 1475.

Anne = Betrothed to Richard, son of Edward IV.

MORTIMERS (MARCH).

Roger, related to William I.

Ralph, fought at Hastings for William. Conquered and succeeded Edric at Wigmore.

Hugh, opposed accession of Henry II. Conquered by him. Died 1185.
---	--

Roger, constantly fighting the Welsh. Died 1215.

Hugh—Strong partisan of John. Died
1227.

Ra
Strong agai
Welsh.

Ralph = Gladuse, daughter of Llewellyn, against widow of Reginald de Braose.

Roger = Maud de Braose.

Fought in Gascony and against Wales. On Henry III.'s side against the Barons. Escaped to Wales after battle of Lewes. Planned Edward's escape. Commanded 3rd division at Evesham. As reward was made Earl of Oxford. Sheriff of Hereford. Died 1282.

Edmund = Margaret, a Spaniard, Wedding at Edward I.'s expense. Died fighting against the Welsh, 1303.	related to Queen Eleanor.
--	---------------------------

Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Paramour of Queen Isabella. 1st Earl of March, 1327. Hanged at Smithfield, 1330.	Roger = Joan of Genevill, daughter of Lord of Trim in Ireland.
---	---

Edmund = Elizabeth, daughter of Lord Mortimer. Died 1331.	Lord Badlesmere.
---	------------------

Went to France with Edward III. Knighted there. Restored to his Earldom of March, 1355. Died 1360.	Roger = Philippa, daughter of Montague, 1st Earl of Salisbury.
--	--

3rd Earl of March. Treated for peace with France when only 18. Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, 1380. Died 1381.	Edmund = Philippa, daughter of Lionel Plantagenet, Duke of Clarence.
---	--

4th Earl of March, ward to Richard, Earl of Arundel. Lieutenant of Ireland. Made heir-apparent, 1386. Died 1398.	Roger = Eleanor Holland, daughter of Earl of Kent.
--	--

5th Earl of March. Ward to Henry IV. Fought in France. Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Died 1424.

Ann = Richard Plantagenet, son of Edmund of York, 5th son of Edward III. Beheaded 1415.

Baron Mortimer, Duke of York, killed at Wakefield, 1460.	Richard = Cicely Neville, daughter of the 1st Earl of Westmoreland.
---	---

Edward IV.

(Family founded at the Conquest.)
NEVILLES (WESTMORELAND, WARWICK).

Ralph de Neville = Alice de Audley.

Commissioner to Scotland 1334. Warden of the West Marches, conjointly with Henry de Percy. Died 1367.

Margaret = Henry Percy,
1st Earl of Northumberland.

John Lord Neville = Maud, daughter of
Lieutenant of Aquitaine | Lord Percy

1379. Died 1388.
Ralph de Neville = 1. Margaret, daughter of Hugh, 2nd Earl of Stafford, by whom he had nine children. Ralph his grandson by this wife became 2nd Earl of Westmoreland.

was made Earl Marshal of England. Fought against the Percies 1403 Died 1425. =2 Joan Beaufort, daughter of John of Gaunt.

[illegible][illegible]

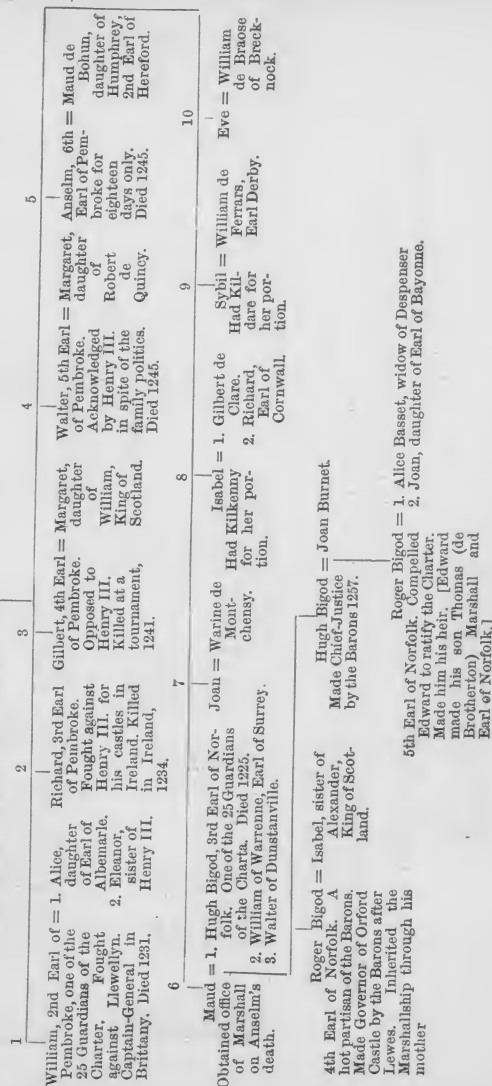

Margaret = De Vere, Earl of Oxford.
= Lord Hastings.

Anne = Edward, Prince of Wales.
= Richard III.

Isabel = George, Duke

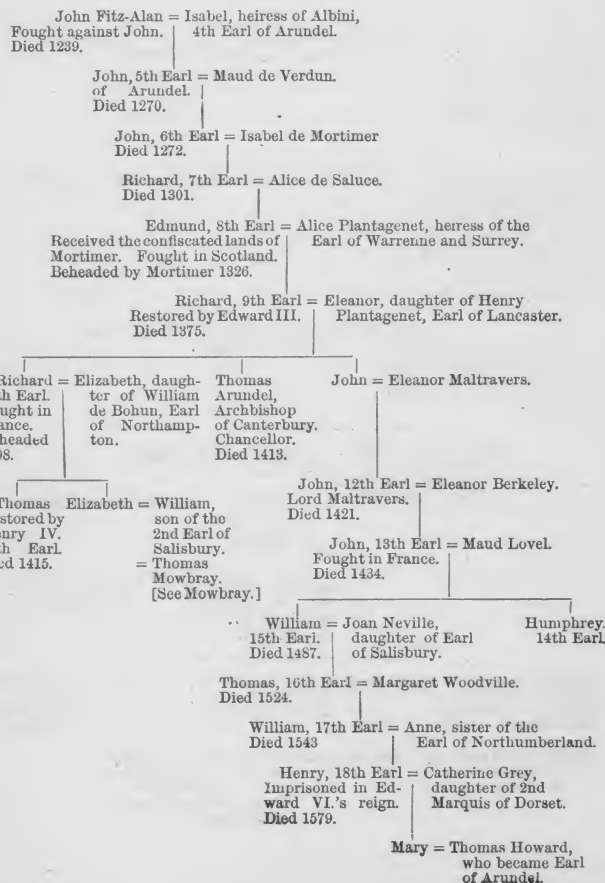

MARSHALLS AND BIGODS.

William Marshall = Isabel de Clare, heiress of Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke.
Governor while Richard at Crusade. Made Earl of Pembroke 1196. John gave him Leinster 1208. Guardian of Henry III. Died 1219.

(Family founded at the Conquest.)

FITZ-ALAN (ARUNDEL).

(Family founded in Henry I.'s reign.)

DESPENSERS.

Hugh = Aliva Basset of Wycombe, widow of Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk.
Joined Barons against Henry III. Made Justiciary 1260. Had custody of the King
after Lewes. Killed at Evesham, 1265.

Hugh = Isaoel, daughter of Beauchamp,
1st Earl of Warwick, widow of Patrick Chaworth.
Fought at Dunbar, 1296.
In favour with Edward
I. Favourite of Edward
II. Banished by Parliament. Recalled. One of Lancaster's judges.
Earl of Winchester.
Seized by Isabella.
Hanged, aged 90, 1326.

Hugh = Eleanor, daughter of Gilbert de Clare,
Earl of Gloucester.
The favourite of Edward
II. Excited the enmity of the Barons. Impeached and hanged,
1327.

Hugh, Baron in Parliament, 1338. Fought in France and Scotland. Died 1349.
Edward = Anne Ferrars.
Died 1342.
Edward = Elizabeth de Burghersh.
Fought at Poitiers.
Died 1375.

Thomas = Constance, daughter of Edmund, 5th son of
Edward III.
Made Earl of Gloucester, 1398. Degraded
by Henry IV. Beheaded, 1400.

2. Richard Beauchamp = Isabel = 1. Richard Beauchamp, 5th Earl of Warwick, Lord Abergavenny, nephew of Earl of Worcester. Earl of Worcester.
Richard = Eliz., daughter of Ralph, Earl of Westmoreland.

Cicely Neville = Henry Elizabeth = Edward Neville, son of Ralph,
d. of Earl 1st Earl of Westmoreland, of Salisbury. who thus obtained the Baronies of Despenser and Abergavenny.

LANCASTERS.

HENRY III.

Edward I. Edmund = Blanche, daughter of Robert of Artois, third son of Louis VIII., widow of
King of Navarre.
Proposed King of Sicilies.
Earl of Chester, 1246, was given the land of Simon de Montfort. Made Earl of Leicester. Fought in Scotland, Wales, Gascony.
Crusade, 1270-1272. Died
1295.

Thomas = Alice, daughter of de Lacy,
Earl of Lincoln
and Salisbury.
Earl of Lancaster,
Lincoln, Salisbury, Leicester, and Derby.
Fought in Scotland. Headed the party against both Gaveston and the Despen-sers. Taken prisoner at Boroughbridge.
Beheaded at Pontefract,
1321.
Henry = Maud, daughter and heiress of Sir Patrick Chaworth.
Earl of Leicester, 1324.
Helped to depose Edward II. Guardian to Edward III. Restored to his brother's Earl-doms, 1327. Captain-
General in Scotland.
Died 1345.

Henry = Isabel, d. of Lord
Beaumont.
Captain-General
in Scotland. Earl of Derby, 1338.
Fought in Flanders and Sluys.
Earl of Lancaster and Leicester, 1345.
Steward of England. Duke of Lancaster and
Earl of Lincoln,
1350. Died 1360.
2. Ralph = Maud = 1. William de Burgh, de Ufford. Earl of Ulster.
Thomas = Maud. Elizabeth = Lionel, de Vere. Duke of Clarence.
8th Earl of Oxford.
Died 1371.
Philippa = Edmund Mortimer (see Mortimer).

Maud = Lord Stafford.
= Duke of Zeeland.
No children.
Blanche = John of Gaunt, Earl of Richmond, who thus became Duke of Lancaster, Earl of Derby, Lincoln and Leicester.
Henry IV. (Earl of Hereford, Derby, Lincoln and Leicester, and Duke of Lancaster.)

DE LA POLES.

William de la Pole = Catherine, daughter of Sir John Norwich.
Great Merchant at Kingston, advanced £1000 to Edward III., for which he was made a Banneret.

Michael de la Pole = Katherine Wingfield.
Earl of Suffolk 1385.
Impeached and exiled.
Died at Paris 1388.

Sir Michael = Katherine, daughter of the Earl of Stafford.
Restored to his Earldom 1399. In the French wars. Died at Harfleur 1415.

Michael
3rd Earl of Suffolk.
Died at Agincourt
1415.

William, 4th Earl = Alice, granddaughter of Chaucer.
Commanded at Verneuil and Orleans. Brought Margaret of Anjou over. Duke of Suffolk 1448. Impeached, banished, murdered in the boat, 1450.

John de la Pole = Elizabeth, sister of Edward IV.
Duke of Suffolk 1463.
Died 1491.

John, Earl of Lincoln.
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.
Declared heir-apparent by Richard III. Joined Lambert Simnel. Died at Battle of Stoke 1487.

Edmund. Fought at first for Henry VII.
Subsequently took offence and withdrew to his aunt Margaret of Burgundy. Was given up. Imprisoned in the Tower. Executed as a Yorkist 1513.

Richard. Fought for the French.
Died at Pavia 1525.
His dukedom of Suffolk given to Charles Brandon.

BEAUFORT (SOMERSETS), AND STAFFORD (BUCKINGHAMS).

WOODVILLES

(COURTENAYS, GREYS).

Richard de Wille = Jacquette of Luxembourg, Seneschal of Normandy.
 Earl Rivers 1466. Beheaded 1469.

ENGLAND BEFORE THE CONQUEST.

THE dominion of the Romans in Britain had been complete. The country, as far as the Frith of Forth, had been brought under Roman civilization. But in England, as elsewhere, the continuance of that form of civilization had produced weakness; and the unconquered Britons of the North, known by the name of Picts, broke into the Romanized districts, and pushed their incursions far into the centre of the country. On all sides, the nations outside the Empire were breaking through its limits and threatening its existence. The danger which threatened the very heart of the Empire, from the advance of the Goths into Italy, compelled the Romans in 411 to withdraw their legions from Britain, and leave the inhabitants of the island to fight their own battles with the Picts. When these enemies formed an alliance with the pirates of Ireland, known by the name of the Scots, and with the German pirates of the North Sea, known as English or Saxons, the civilized Britons were unable to make head against them, and found it necessary to seek for aid among the invaders themselves. They therefore made an arrangement with two Jutish chiefs or Ealdormen, Hengist and Horsa, to come to their assistance. The German rovers consisted of three nations—the Saxons, the inhabitants of Holstein, who had advanced along the coast of Friesland; to the north of them the Angles or English, who inhabited Sleswig; and still further to the north, the Jutes, whose name is still perpetuated in the promontory of Jutland.

The first landing-place of the Jutish allies of the Britons was in the Isle of Thanet, separated at that time by a considerable inlet from the British mainland. Their aid enabled the Britons to drive back the Pictish invaders. But their success, and the settlement they had formed, enticed many

The Jutish
 settlement
 in Kent.
 449.

of their brethren to join them, and their numbers were constantly increasing. Increase of numbers implied increased demand in the way of payment and provisions. Quarrels arose between the new-comers and their British allies. War was determined on. The inlet which divided Thanet from the mainland was passed, and at Aylesford, on the Medway, a battle was fought, which, though it cost Horsa his life, put the conquering Barbarians into possession of much of the east of Kent. The victory was followed by the extermination of the inhabitants; against the clergy especially the anger of the conquerors was directed. The country was thus cleared of the inhabitants, and the new-comers settled down, bringing with them their goods and families and national institutions. This process was repeated at every stage of the conquest of the country, which thus became not only a conquest but a re-settlement. The Jutish conquest of Kent was followed, in 477, by an invasion of the Saxons,

The Saxons in Sussex.
477-496.

who, under Ella, overran the south of Sussex, and captured the fortress of Anderida near Pevensey; and in 495, by a fresh Saxon invasion under Cerdic and Cynric, who passed up the Southampton water and established the kingdom of the West Saxons. A momentary check was given to the advance of the conquerors, in 520, at the battle of Mount Badon. But almost immediately fresh hordes of Angles began conquering and settling the East of England, where they established the East Anglian kingdom, with its two great divisions of Northfolk and Southfolk. Between that time and 577, the date of a victory at Deorham, in Gloucestershire, the West Saxons had overrun what are now Hampshire and Wiltshire, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, and the valley of the Severn, reaching almost as far as Chester; while the Angles, entering the Humber and working up the rivers, established themselves on the Trent, where they were known as Mercians or Border men, and formed two Northern kingdoms, that of Deira in Yorkshire, and that of Bernicia, extending as far as the Forth. The capital of this last-named kingdom was Bamborough, founded by Ida, and called after his wife Bebba, Bebbanburgh, or Bamborough.

The Angles in East Anglia.
520.

The junction of these two kingdoms under Æthelfrith, about 600, established the Kingdom of Northumbria; thus was begun the process of consolidating the several divided English kingdoms. This tendency to consolidation is marked by the title of Bretwalda, which is given to the chief of the nation dominant for the time being. The name had been applied to Ella of Sussex, to Ceawlin of Wessex, and was held at the time of the establishment of the Northumbrian power by Æthelberht of Kent. There were thus two pre-eminent powers among the English—Northumbria, under its king Æthelfrith, claiming supremacy over the middle districts of England, including the Mercians and Middle English; and Kent, under Æthelberht, paramount over Middlesex, Essex, and East Anglia; while a third kingdom, that of Wessex, though large in extent and destined to become the dominant power, was as yet occupied chiefly in improving its position towards the west. Beyond these lay the district still in the possession of the Britons. The possessions of this people were now divided by the conquest of the English into three—West Wales, or Cornwall; North Wales, which we now call Wales; and Strathclyde, a district stretching from the Clyde along the west of the Pennine chain, and separated from Wales by Chester, in the hands of the Mercians, and a piece of Lancashire in the hands of the Northumbrians.

It was while the kingdoms of Northumbria and Kent were thus in the balance that the conversion of the English to the Christian faith began. Æthelberht of Kent had married Bereta, the daughter of the Frankish King of Paris.

Conversion of the English.
597.

She was a Christian; and Gregory the Great at that time occupying the Roman See, which was rapidly rising to the position of supremacy in the Christian Church, took advantage of the opening thus afforded, and despatched a band of missionaries under a monk named Augustine to convert the people. In 597 they landed in Thanet. By the influence of the Queen they were well received, and established themselves at Canterbury, which has ever since retained its position as the seat of the Primacy. The Kings of Essex and East Anglia followed the example of their superior Lord, and became Christians. The Northern kingdom was still heathen. But Eadwine, who succeeded Æthelfrith on the Northumbrian throne, surpassed his predecessor in power. On Æthelberht's death, he received the submission of the East Anglians and men of Essex, and conquered even the West Saxons. Kent alone remained independent, but was compelled to purchase security by a close alliance with Eadwine, who married a Kentish princess. With her went a priest, Paulinus; and priest and Queen together succeeded in converting Eadwine, and bringing the Northern kingdom to Christianity. Heathenism was however not extinct. It found a champion, Penda, King of the Mercians. In alliance with the Welsh king he attacked and defeated Eadwine, in 633, at the battle of Heathfield, and united under his power those who were properly called Mercians and the other English tribes south of the Humber. He also conquered the West Saxon districts along the Severn, and thus established what is generally known as the Kingdom of Mercia. Paulinus had fled from York after the battle of Heathfield. But the contest between heathen and Christian was renewed by Oswald, Eadwine's successor; for Paulinus' place was taken by Bishop Aidan, a missionary from Columba's Irish monastery in Iona, who had established an Episcopal see in the Island of Lindisfarne. From thence missionaries issued, who continued the work of conversion, to which Oswald chiefly devoted his life. Birinus, sent from Rome, with the support of Oswald, succeeded in converting even Wessex, and establishing a Christian church at Dorchester. Penda still continued in the centre of England to uphold the cause of heathendom. At the battle of Maserfield he conquered and slew Oswald, and re-established his religion for a time in Wessex. But at length, in 655, he succumbed to Oswi, Oswald's successor, and with him fell the power of heathendom. It seemed as though Irish Christianity, and not Roman, would thus be the religion of England. But Rome did not suffer her conquests to slip from her hand. A struggle arose between the adherents of the two Churches. The matter was brought to an issue in 664 at a Council at Whitby. The Roman Church there proved predominant. And this victory was followed by the appointment of Theodore of Tarsus, an Eastern divine, to the See of Canterbury. Under him the English Church was organized. Fresh sees were added to the old ones, which had usually followed the limits of the old English kingdoms. Canterbury was established as the centre of Church authority. Theodore's ecclesiastical work tended much both to the growth of national unity and to the close connection of Church and State which existed during the Saxon period. The unity of the people was expressed in the single archiepiscopal See of Canterbury and in the Synods; while the arrangement of bishoprics and parishes according to existing territorial divisions connected them closely with the State.

The contest for supremacy between Mercia and Northumbria still continued. After the fall of Penda, the supremacy of the Northern kingdom was for some time unquestioned. But sixty years later, during the reign of three Christian kings, Ethelbald, Offa, and Cenwulf (716-819), Mercia again rose to great power. Offa indeed came nearer to consolidating an empire than any of the preceding kings, although he is not mentioned among the Bretwaldas. It is said that he corresponded on terms of something like equality with Charlemagne; and the great dyke between the Severn and the Wye which bears his name is supposed to mark the limits of his conquests over the Britons.

Supremacy of Mercia.
716-819.

With these princes the supremacy of Mercia closed, for a great king had in the year 800 ascended the throne of Wessex. Egberht. Egberht had lived as an exile in his youth at the court 800-836. of Charlemagne, and there probably imbibed imperial notions. During his reign of thirty-six years he gradually brought under his power all the kingdoms of the English, whether Anglian or Saxon. In 823, at the great battle of Ellandune, he defeated the Mercians so completely that their subject kingdoms passed into his power. Four years later Mercia owned his overlordship, and Northumbria immediately after yielded without a struggle. These great kingdoms retained their own line of sovereigns as subordinate kings. Egberht continued the hereditary struggle against the British populations, with the West Welsh or Cornish, and the North Welsh or Welsh, and in each instance succeeded in establishing his supremacy over them. North of the Dee, however, his power over the British population did not spread. Thus the kingdom of the West Saxons absorbed all its rivals, and established a permanent superiority in England.

Consolidation
under the West Saxons.

Already, however, a new enemy, before which the rising kingdom was finally to succumb, had made its appearance; a year before his death, Egberht was called upon to defend his country from the Danes. This people, issuing from the Scandinavian kingdoms in the North of Europe, had begun to land in England, to harry the country, and to carry off their spoil. At first as robbers, then as settlers, and finally as conquerors, for two centuries they occupy English history. Their first appearance in this reign was at Charmouth in Dorsetshire. Subsequently, in junction with the British, they advanced westward from Cornwall. This led to the great battle of Hengestesdun, or Hengston, where the invaders were defeated (835). It seems not unnatural to trace the appearance of the Northern rovers in England to the state of the Continent. Driven from their own country by want of room, obliged to seek new settlements, they found themselves checked by the organized power of Charlemagne's empire. They were thus compelled to find their new home in countries they had not yet visited. The reign closed with the capture of Chester, the capital of Gwynedd, the British kingdom of North Wales.

Period of Danish invasion.
790-1013.

The reign of Æthelwulf, the successor of Egberht, was chiefly occupied in constant war with the Danes. Various success attended his efforts. The great battle at Ockley (851), where they were heavily defeated, for a time kept them in check; but, on the whole, the invaders constantly gained ground, and at last, in 855, for the first time so far changed their predatory habits as to winter in the Isle of Thanet. Another characteristic of Æthelwulf's reign is the connection with Rome which he established. When his youngest son Alfred was still a child, he sent him to Rome, where the young prince was anointed; and two years afterwards he himself took the same journey, was received on the road by Charles the Bald, King of France, and spent a whole year in Italy. He there re-established the Saxon College, and by his engagement to supply funds for its support seems to have originated the well-known Peter's Pence. His connection with Charles the Bald was further cemented by his marriage with Judith, daughter of that king. After Æthelwulf's death she married her stepson Æthelbald, was divorced by him, returned to France, married Baldwin of Flanders, and was the ancestress of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. These connections show the rising importance of England, and the entrance of the country into the general politics of Europe. Something in Æthelwulf's government, perhaps his lengthened absence abroad, or the step he had taken in getting Alfred anointed, excited discontent. His eldest surviving son, Æthelbald, conspired with other nobles to exclude him from the country, and he was forced to consent to a compromise, accepting as his own kingdom, Kent and the Eastern dependencies of Wessex, while his son ruled over the rest of the kingdom.

On his death he bequeathed his own dominions to Æthelberht, his second son, while Wessex was, upon the death of Æthelbald, to pass in succession to his two sons, Æthelred and Alfred. In spite of this will, on the death of Æthelbald five years later, Æthelberht of Kent succeeded in making good his claims to Wessex also, and upon Æthelberht's death, after a reign of five years, marked only by renewed attacks of the Danes, both kingdoms passed without question to Æthelred.

It was during the reign of Æthelred that the Danes first established themselves permanently in the country. In 867 Ingvar and Hubba, said to be the sons of Ragnar Lodbrog, a great Scandinavian hero, invaded England. Legend says

Æthelwulf
836-857.

Æthelbald.
858-860.

Æthelberht.
860-866.

Æthelred.
866-871.

that this invasion was intended to exact vengeance for the death of their father, who had been cruelly put to death by Ella of Northumberland. There are chronological difficulties in the way of accepting this story, which are increased by the fact that the Danish landing was really in East Anglia. Thence, in 867, they advanced into Northumbria and took York. The anarchy in which Northumbria lay, caused by the rival claims of Osberht and Ella to the throne, rendered its conquest easy. In 868, they marched towards Mercia, and took Nottingham. Burhred, the King of Mercia, then implored the aid of Æthelred and his brother Alfred, who so far succeeded that they drove the Danes back to Northumbria. From thence, in 870, an invasion, under many leaders, whose connection is not very clear, was directed against East Anglia. They were there joined by Guthrum, another Danish leader, and their combined forces pressed victoriously onwards through Croyland, to Peterborough, Huntingdon, and Ely. After defeating the English at Thetford, they took Edmund, the Saxon King of East Anglia, prisoner, and, upon his refusal to accept the pagan religion, put him to death. For his constancy he was honoured with the title of Saint Edmund. East Anglia was thus completely in possession of the Danes, and Guthrum took to himself the title of king. East Anglia became henceforward for some time the principal point of Danish settlement in England. From thence the invaders passed into Wessex, under the command of Bagsecg and Halfdene. They were vigorously met by Æthelred. They pushed on, however, as far up the Thames as Reading, near which town a series of battles was fought,—at Englefield, where the Danes were beaten; at Reading, where the fortune of the day was changed; and subsequently at the great battle of Ashdown, where the victory of the English was regarded as being due to Alfred, who, being in command of half the army, attacked and defeated the enemy, while his brother was losing the precious moments in prayer for success. Though the victory of Ashdown was complete, it did not close the war. Almost immediately afterwards we hear of battles at Basing and at Merton, in which the Danes were again successful. These battles took place just before the death of Æthelred.

He was succeeded at once by his brother Alfred. Another victory of the Danes at Wilton compelled Alfred to make peace. For a time the Danes withdrew from Wessex, and employed their energy in subjugating Mercia. Burhred, who had married Alfred's sister, was driven from the throne, and retired to

Danish conquest
of East Anglia.
870.

Alfred.
871-901.

Rome to die. A Danish agent, named Ceolwulf, was put in his place, and the country laid under heavy contribution. But Ceolwulf in his turn was displaced, and the Danes took possession of much of the country themselves, conquering among other places the five great towns, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, and Stamford, known as the five Danish Burghs, or, with the addition of York and Chester, the seven Burghs. They also carried their invasions northward, and Cumberland and part of Strathclyde were overrun and peopled by them, under the command of Halfdene. Nor was the treaty with the East Anglian Danes permanent. Guthrum sailed round the coast and captured Wareham and Exeter. To oppose them on their own element, Alfred introduced a new form of ship, of greater size and length than had hitherto been used, and succeeded in winning a great naval victory in Swanage Bay. But the Danish forces were gradually closing round him. London and Essex had been taken, and a colony of Danes had conquered South Wales. At length, attacked in all directions, his kingdom of Wessex was practically limited to the country of the Somersætas; and, unable to make head against his enemies, the King took refuge among the impassable morasses of the river Parret. It is during this time of his exile that the well-known story of the burnt cakes is told. But while apparently completely beaten, Alfred succeeded in gathering a new army, issued from his seclusion, and attacking the Danes at Edington (878), near Westbury, completely defeated them. The consequence of this battle was the Treaty of Wedmore. By this treaty the kingdom of East Anglia was surrendered to the Danes, and a line was drawn to separate their kingdom from that of Wessex. This line from the Thames ran along the Lea to Bedford, then along the Ouse till it struck Watling Street, and then followed Watling Street to the Welsh Border. The greater part of Mercia was thus restored to Wessex. In exchange, Anglia and Mercia beyond this line were ceded to the Danes, who were to hold them as vassals of the West Saxon king, and who were to become Christians. The limits of their occupation are still to be traced by the occurrence of the termination "by" in the names of the towns; it was in many instances appended to the name of the Danish holder of the manor. Guthrum, on his baptism, took the name of Æthelstan, and many difficulties in the chronology of the legends of the time may be solved by supposing that the Æthelstan mentioned in them is Guthrum, and not the Æthelstan who reigned in the year 925. This treaty, although it curtailed the supremacy of Wessex, made the kingdom in fact stronger, and secured a temporary rest for the whole of England. Mercia, that part of it at least which remained English, was governed by its Alderman Æthelred, and by the King's daughter Æthelflæd, known as the Lady of the Mercians. On the death of Guthred, the Danish King of Northumbria, Alfred re-established his power there, and the peace and prosperity of England were further increased by the fact that the energy of the Danes was for the present chiefly directed against France and Belgium. Guthrum died in 890, and though the treaty was confirmed by his successors, the defeat of the Danes in Belgium threw fresh invaders into the kingdom. In 893, Hasting, a well-known sea-rover, in alliance with the Anglians and Northumbrians, committed fresh ravages in all directions; but at last, having ventured up the Lea, Alfred hit upon the expedient of draining the river, and leaving their ships aground. After this they were glad to retreat, but lesser expeditions were constantly vexing the coast. The reign of Alfred is thus divided into two periods of Danish war, between which, and at the close of his life, there occurred intervals of peace.

Treaty of Wedmore.

It has been usual to attribute to Alfred most of the marked peculiarities of English civilization, the formation of shires, the establishment of juries, and so on. Such assertions will not bear examination. As a lawgiver, he collected the laws of the three principal states over which he ruled—Kent, Mercia, and Wessex—which had been already recorded by the Kings Æthelberht, Offa, and Ine. As a warrior he was on the whole victorious, and understood the necessity of establishing a fleet, which he appears to have constructed on a different principle from that of the Danes, the ships being longer, and serving less as mere stages on which to fight. As a governor he was impartial and strict; his police was severe, the system of mutual responsibility became universal, and under him the idea of morality began to mingle with the idea of injury to the commonwealth, which had been the Saxon notion of crime. His son Eadward, who succeeded him, was probably as great as his father, but he had not the love of literature which forms the marked characteristic of Alfred's public life. It has been questioned whether Alfred could himself read; however this may have been, he was so conscious of the necessity of literature for the people that he set himself to work to make translations for them. "The History of the World on Christian Principles," by Orosius, Bede's "History of the Anglo-Saxon Church," and Boethius' "Consolation of Philosophy," were the works he translated. Besides his own literary work, he established conventual schools at Shaftesbury and Athelney, and possibly a more general one at Oxford. The love of the people, whom his indefatigable energy saved from their barbarous and pagan invaders, has attributed to their hero an original genius of which there are no distinct proofs. What is really known of him is, that he was an able, honest, persevering governor, gifted with that power and habit of method and organization which is perhaps more useful in advancing early civilization than greater and more splendid gifts. Upon Alfred's death, though England, as a whole, had suffered by the loss of the country granted to the Danes, or, as it was called, the Danelagu, Wessex had assumed a position of superiority, and was regarded as the representative state of the English. This position it fully vindicated during the reigns of Eadward, Alfred's son, who succeeded him, and of the four next kings, till the kingdom of Wessex grew to be the kingdom of England, and exerted an imperial supremacy over the whole island.

Appreciation of Alfred's character.

Eadward's first difficulty was with his cousin Æthelwulf, the son of Alfred's elder brother Æthelred. This prince claimed the throne. He landed in England, was driven to Northumbria, where he was chosen king, and then, in company with Eohric, the King of East Anglia, marched up the Thames to Cricklade. He was however defeated, and with his ally killed by a portion of the English army near the Ouse. The consequence was the renewal of the acknowledgment of the supremacy of Wessex by Guthrum II. of East Anglia. In conjunction with his sister, the Lady of the Mercians, Eadward attempted to secure himself from further molestation by the erection of numerous stone castles. These castles, which seem to have been built on a new and better plan than any before erected, became also in many instances the origin from which towns sprang; for laws were passed creating them into markets, and forbidding bargains to be made without the walls. Some sort of monopoly of trade was thus secured for fortified posts. On the death of Æthelfræd, Mercia, both Anglian and Danish, submitted to Eadward's authority. He continued the active government of his sister, and went on with her work of fortress-building. An invasion by the Danes of Northumbria in conjunction with the Welsh, who hoped to find Mercia unguarded, was signally defeated. The Welsh kings swore alliance to Eadward, and the Danes of Northumbria, and even the Kings of Scotland and Strathclyde, acknowledged him as their "father and lord." Eadward was thus 901-925.

Eadward the Elder.

in fact master of the whole of England, and had completed more thoroughly the work of Egberht. The greatness of his position is clearly marked by the marriages of his children with the greatest Princes of the Continent. One married Charles the Simple of France, a second Hugh the Great, Count of Paris, a third Otto I., Emperor of Germany.

The greatness Eadward had thus secured descended to his son Æthelstan, with whom the grandeur of the Saxon monarchy reached its highest point. He married one of his sisters to a Northumbrian prince, Cytric, receiving his allegiance for Bernicia from the Tees to Edinburgh, and, on the death of Cytric, incorporated the country with his own dominions. Cytric's two sons fled, the one to Ireland, where the Danes received him willingly, the other (Guthrith) to Constantine, King of Scotland. The consequence of the escape of these princes became evident in after years. In 934, Constantine and his heir Eorca, Owen or Eugenius, King of Cumberland, made war upon England, but were defeated and compelled to acknowledge the supremacy of Æthelstan. The attention of the English King was subsequently drawn abroad, where he upheld the cause of his nephew, Louis de Outre-Mer, son of Charles the Simple, against the attacks of his brothers-in-law, the German Otto and Hugh of Paris. It was while thus employed that the Scotch kingdoms again rose in insurrection. A great conspiracy against Æthelstan appears to have been formed, at the head of which were Anlaf, son of that Guthrith who had fled to Scotland, Constantine, Owen, and several princes of the Danes from Ireland. Their object was the re-establishment of the Danish power in Northumbria. The attempt was completely thwarted by the great battle of Brunanburh, near Beverley, in Yorkshire. Not long after this decisive victory Æthelstan died. His splendid reign is further marked by legislation of a more original description than that of his predecessors. He ordered, among other things, that every man should have a lord who should be answerable for him to justice, and rendered more systematic the arrangement of mutual responsibility, which appears to have been one of the principles of Saxon police.

His younger brothers, Eadmund and Eadred, followed in his footsteps, defeating the Northumbrian rebels, who from time to time elected kings of their own, but were completely conquered by Eadred. He so thoroughly incorporated the country with his own, that its ruler could no

Æthelstan.
925-940.

Battle of Brunanburh.
937.

Eadmund.
940-946.
Eadred.
946-955.

longer claim the title of king. Both Bernicia and Deira were bestowed as an earldom on Osulf, who had assisted in the conquest of the rebels, and remained in the hands of his family till the Norman Conquest. Eadmund also maintained his supremacy over Scotland, with which country his relations were of a very friendly nature, as he granted a part of the kingdom of Strathclyde, consisting of Cumberland and Galloway, to King Malcolm, to be held by military service.

The policy of Eadred and of his successors seems so closely connected with the rise of Dunstan, that it may be justly attributed to him. The monkish historians, to whom we owe our knowledge of this great man, have overlaid his history with mythical stories, and have given him a character and policy to suit their own purposes. In their eagerness to secure the name of the greatest statesman of the age in support of their pretensions against the secular clergy, they have drawn him as a youth of miraculous gifts, of severe monkish asceticism, whose claim to greatness consisted in the establishment of the Benedictine rule. In the same way they have painted his opponent King Edwy [Eadwig] in the blackest colours. The common story tells us that, after a childhood passed in learning, so deep as to excite a suspicion of magic, illness drove Dunstan to the cloister at Glastonbury; that he there established the Benedictine rule, entering with such vehemence into its spirit that his asceticism almost turned his brain. On the accession of Edwy, the young king, it is said, deserted the assembly of the nobles, to pass his time in the company of the beautiful Ælfgifu [Elgiva], his mistress. Dunstan is represented as violently dragging the unworthy king back to his proper place, as securing the banishment of Ælfgifu, and with his partisans cruelly putting her to death upon her return. Edwy is then described as raging fiercely against all the monks in his kingdom. In truth, it is in politics rather than in ecclesiastical discipline that Dunstan's greatness must be sought, and he must take his place in history rather as a conciliatory and patriotic governor than as an ascetic and violent churchman.

Born at the beginning of King Æthelstan's reign, and trained partly at Glastonbury, where he found and studied books left by wandering Irish scholars, and partly at the King's Court like other young nobles of the time, an illness induced him to devote himself to the Church. His interest secured him the Abbey of Glastonbury at the early age of seventeen. He shortly returned to the Court, became the King's treasurer, and as an influential minister joined himself to the party which he found pre-eminent during the reign of Eadred. That king was a constant invalid, the influence of the Queen Mother was paramount, and she was supported by the chiefs of East Anglia and those whose views were national rather than provincial. The kingdom of Northumbria was in a state of ceaseless confusion. Again and again the Danes and Ostmen raised insurrections there. Wulstan, the Archbishop of York, with constantly shifting policy, at one time supported the insurgents, at another persuaded the Northern Witan to submit to Eadred. At length, in a final insurrection, he was overcome and imprisoned. The affairs in Northumbria had to be settled. It is here that the national policy of the dominant party made itself felt. Contrary to the views of the Wessex nobles, who would have wished for active interference of the government, the kingdom was reduced to the condition of an earldom under Osulf. But English supremacy being thus established, Wulstan was released, and self-government both in Church and State permitted. This conciliatory policy was interrupted by the death of Eadred.

The new King Edwy, nephew of Eadred, was a mere child, and a palace intrigue, headed by Æthelgyfu and her daughter Ælfgifu, who had obtained influence over the lad, drove the Queen Mother Eadgyfu from the Court, and established the power of the Wessex party. Unpopular among the Wessex nobles and in his own monastery, Dunstan was driven abroad, and took refuge in Ghent. But his party was still strong in England. Indignant probably at a violent resumption of grants from the Folkland, the nobles of England, with the exception of Wessex, set up Edwy's younger brother Eadgar as a rival king, and were sufficiently powerful to oblige Edwy to divide the kingdom and content himself with the territories of Wessex south of the Thames. Dunstan was recalled by his partisans. He received from King Eadgar the sees of Rochester and of London; and when, on the death of Edwy, Eadgar succeeded to the undivided sovereignty of the kingdom, Dunstan rose with him, and became his chief minister and Archbishop of Canterbury.

As minister, Dunstan had both Church and State to reform. In both, decay had made great progress. The increased importance of the English King had raised him to a position very different from that of the tribal monarch. Along with the King had risen his dependants, the old members of the Comitatus. His Thegns or servants, rendered rich by grants of the public land, had gradually succeeded the old nobility by birth, of the German

Rise of Dunstan.

Edwy.
955-957.

Eadgar.
957-975.

Dunstan's
government.

racés. The troubled situation of the country had driven the freeholders more and more to seek safety by placing themselves and their land in a state of dependence on the Thengs. Even as early as Alfred every man was obliged to have a lord. At the same time the spirit of provincialism was strong, each district which had been a separate kingdom wishing to maintain its own independence. Dunstan seems to have understood that a change in the character of the monarchy was inevitable, and that national unity could only be secured by upholding that change, placing the monarch in what may be regarded as an imperial position over the subject kingdoms, and allowing the separate districts as much self-government as possible. Within the kingdom of Wessex itself, and perhaps of Mercia also, he established a strict police, and suppressed disorder with a strong hand. Beyond that, the largest freedom was permitted. Thus, the subordination of Northumbria was further secured by its division into three parts. The district between the Tees and the Humber was intrusted to Oslac. From the Tees to the Tweed remained in the hands of Osulf, while the Lothians between the Tweed and the Forth were given out on military service to the King of Scotland; and in subsequent history it was this district, peopled with English and Danes, which formed the civilized centre of the Scottish kingdom. But, when the supremacy of Wessex was thus secured, the Danes of the North were allowed to keep their own customs and make their own laws. Similarly, friendship with the Northmen of Ireland was maintained, and through their friendship the King was enabled to keep up a powerful fleet, which constantly sailed round the coasts, and kept them free from foreign invasion. The tradition that Eadgar was rowed upon the Dee to Chester by eight tributary kings, whether the fact be true or not, points to the imperial position which Dunstan had secured for him. In the Church the same policy was pursued. The great disturbances of the kingdom had thrown much power into the hands of the Church, the most permanent element of society. This increase of influence had been followed by an increase of secularity. The bishops became statesmen, and even commanders of armies. The older form of monasticism died out. Marriage of priests was constant. Livings began to be handed on from father to son. There was some chance of the establishment of an hereditary priestly caste. In Ghent, Dunstan had become acquainted with the Benedictine rule lately established there. He saw its efficiency for securing discipline among the clergy. Like other strong rulers, he regarded anarchy with aversion.

Division of Northumbria.

and was therefore anxious to introduce the rule into England. He intrusted the work to his friend Æthelwold, whom he made Bishop of Winchester, and to Oswald, whom he raised to the See of Worcester. In Wessex and Mercia he carried out his reform with vigour, even with violence: but, as in his secular government, he kept himself under the restraints of prudence. Thus, when Oswald was appointed Archbishop of York, he made no efforts to restrain the marriage of the clergy, and in Dunstan's own see he yielded to the prejudices of the people, and allowed the abbeys to continue in the hands of secular clerks. The title of Eadgar the Peaceful, and a reign of seventeen years unbroken by any great foreign war, attest the success of Dunstan's policy.

But with Eadgar's death, and the accession of his son Eadward, this prosperous state of things ended. For a time Dunstan held his own, but not without strong opposition. Again and again he had to plead his cause before the Witan.

Eadward the Martyr.
975-979.

And at one synod, at Calne, it was intended to bring the matter to a crisis. Beornhelm, a Bishop of the Scottish Church, was brought forward as a champion by his enemies. His eloquence was carrying the assembly with him, and Dunstan could only appeal to heaven for assistance. Nor was that assistance denied; by accident or design, the floor of the upper chamber where the meeting was held gave way in that part where Beornhelm and his friends were seated, and they were hurried to swift destruction, while Dunstan's triumphant party remained uninjured on the floor above. But even miraculous interferences did not suppress the enemies of the Prelate. A conspiracy, in which Ælfthryth [Elfrida], the mother of Æthelred, seems to have been chiefly engaged, was formed; and Eadward, returning from the chase, was killed at her castle at Corfe.

Fall of Dunstan.

Eadward the Martyr, as his monkish chroniclers call him, being thus disposed of, his brother, Æthelred the Unready, ascended the throne. Dunstan, compelled to assist at the coronation, did so only to denounce curses on the new king. He had to withdraw from Court. His policy was at an end. Mercia and the North fell away from Wessex. The King's own character, at once weak and cruel, was not such as to inspire confidence; and we accordingly enter upon a period of almost inexplicable treasons, weakness, and disorder. The Danes reappear on the coast, and what has been spoken of as the third period of Danish invasion begins. The fleets were no longer

Æthelred the Unready.
979-1016.

Third Period of Danish invasion.

merely piratical expeditions, but were commanded by kings of whole countries, and towards the end of the period the object was no longer plunder, or even settlement, but national conquest. The change was closely connected with the gradual consolidation of the three Northern kingdoms of Europe—Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, in each of which, as in England, one sovereign had now become paramount. The chief personage in these invasions is Swegen or Swend, son of the King of Denmark. In the year 982 he made his appearance on the English coasts, and Southampton, Chester, and London were either taken or destroyed. The kingdom was in no condition to offer a firm resistance. Internal dissensions had already begun. The King was at enmity with the whole of Dunstan's party. We hear of a fierce quarrel with the Bishop of Rochester. The allegiance of Mercia and Northumbria was more than doubtful. East Anglia, where resistance to a kindred people might have been least expected, alone succeeded in checking the Danes. There,

Battle of Maldon.
991.

under Brihtnoth, the great battle of Maldon was fought, which forms the subject of one of the greatest of the Anglo-Saxon poems. Such single instances of resistance were of no real avail. Sigeric of Canterbury, who had succeeded to Dunstan's position and policy, and was therefore by no means unfriendly to the Danes as the opponents of Wessex, induced the King to entertain a fatal plan of buying off the invaders. With the consent of his Witan, he raised £10,000, with which he bribed the 994.

The first
Danegelt.

Danish hosts. This was the origin of the tax known as Danegelt, which became permanent, and lasted till the reign of Henry II. The effect of such a bribe was naturally only to excite the Northern robbers to further efforts. Accordingly, in 994, Swegen and Olaf of Norway made their appearance, and England was assaulted by the national fleets of Denmark and Norway. Divided by faction, undermined by treason, and without a leader, the English knew no expedient but the repetition of bribes. Olaf, as a Christian, was indeed induced to return to his own country, but Swegen's invasions were continuous. Supported by the disloyal chiefs of the North, he ravaged in turn Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Sussex, and Kent. And when, in the year 1000, a temporary lull occurred, Æthelred, with a madness which seems almost inconceivable, insisted on quarrelling, first with the King of Cumberland, who is said to have refused the disgraceful tribute demanded of him, though willing to serve with his forces against the Danes, and afterwards with the Normans in France. An expedition undertaken against this people with ridiculous ostentation was easily defeated. A peace was made, and hostility changed into alliance, cemented by the marriage of the King with Emma, a Norman Princess. In her train came certain followers, who obtained high office and military commands, and added a fresh element of weakness to already weakened England. But though contemptible in the field, with the craft and cruelty of a weak mind Æthelred planned the massacre of all the Danes in Wessex. Many of these were settled quietly in different parts of the country, or billeted and living on friendly terms with their landlords. On the 13th of November 1002, on the festival of St. Brice, the cruel plan was carried out. Among other victims was a sister of Swegen's who had become a Christian; she was put to death with circumstances of unusual barbarity, it is said, at the instigation of Eadric Streona, or the Gainer. This man henceforward plays a prominent part in the history. Though of low birth, he had contrived to make himself the favourite of the King, whose daughter he subsequently married. Selfish, unscrupulous, and treacherous, his influence as the King's adviser was most pernicious; while, if it suited his own ends, he never hesitated to betray his master. So completely is he identified with the disasters of England, that there is scarcely any criminal act of the reign that is not traced to him. But his repeated treasons do not seem to have destroyed the trust which Æthelred and his nobler son Edmund placed in him. After the massacre of St. Brice the Danes naturally sought revenge. Exeter was taken by the treachery of Hugh the Frenchman, one of Emma's followers. Wiltshire and Salisbury were deserted by the traitor Ælfrie. Again East Anglia, under Ulfcytel the Ealdorman, made the only show of resistance; but here too, treason, not of the commander but of the soldiers, themselves of Danish origin, proved fatal. Famine and civil quarrels added to the misery of the English. Again Eadric is visible, ruining rival thegns, and advising still further use of bribes. In 1006, he had succeeded in getting made Ealdorman of the Mercians. His family rose with him, and in 1008, when at last a great national fleet was collected, the quarrels of his brother Brihtic and his nephew Wulfnoth destroyed its utility.

In the same year, a fresh host, one division of which was commanded by Thurkill or Thurecytel, one of the most formidable of the Danish pirates, made its appearance. In 1010, the English were again defeated at the battle of Æthelred's marriage with Emma.

Massacre of St. Brice. 1002.

Pernicious influence of Eadric Streona.

Thurkill's invasions.

Ipswich, and the country was in a condition of absolute collapse. Mercia and Wessex itself were overrun. The cause of Æthelred looked so hopeless, that Eadric the Gainer thought it time to change sides, and after the capture of Canterbury and the death of the Archbishop St. Alphege, the Witan was collected under Eadric, without the participation of the King, and a further large tribute paid, while by some arrangement, probably the cession of East Anglia, Thurkill was drawn to the English side. This step of Thurkill seems to have opened Swegen's eyes at once to the inutility of single invasions, and to the possibility of himself effecting some similar arrangement. He felt confident of the support of Northumbria and Mercia against Wessex. He therefore moved his fleet to the Humber, and advanced to York. He had not miscalculated. The whole of the Danelagu joined him, and with this assistance, leaving his son Cnut behind him in command of the fleet in the Humber, he advanced into Wessex. His success was constant. Oxford was taken, and the royal town of Winchester. At Bath the Danish conqueror received the submission of the Thegns of the West. London, which we find constantly rising in importance, alone held out, nor was it till Æthelred deserted the city that it surrendered. But then, there being no longer any opposition, Swegen was, in fact, King of England. Æthelred sought and obtained an asylum in Normandy, till recalled by Swegen's death the following year.

Swegen's
invasion.

England submits to Swegen.
1013.

The Danes acknowledged Cnut as King, but the bulk of the English wished to retain the House of Cerdic, if Æthelred would pledge himself to rule better. This he promised to do, and his cause for a time was successful. Cnut had to retreat to his ships. Nevertheless, we hear of another large tribute, but it was paid probably to a fleet of Danish auxiliaries serving upon the English side. Eadric had of course again joined the victorious party; but again his persistent treachery was the destruction of the country. He enticed Sigeferth and Morkere, Thegns of the Five Danish Burghs, to Oxford, and there murdered them. Sigeferth's widow was kept a prisoner, and taken in marriage by Edmund Ironside, Æthelred's son. This prince thus acquired possession of the Five Burghs, and secured an influence which enabled him to take up a position in opposition to Eadric. On the renewal of the invasion by Cnut both Eadric and Edmund collected their forces; but, angry at the new rivalry he was experiencing, Eadric led his troops to join Cnut.

Restoration of Æthelred.
1014.

Wessex was thus thrown open, and by a strange inversion of affairs, Edmund, with Utrede of Northumberland, occupied the northern part of England, while the Danes, under Cnut and Eadric, held Wessex and the South. In 1016, Æthelred died.

The Witan of the South immediately, under the influence of the conquerors, elected Cnut as his successor, but London and the rest of the Witan chose Edmund. It was plain that Wessex could acknowledge Cnut only through fear, and thither Edmund betook himself, and collected troops. As if to prove what the English could do if well commanded, in a few weeks he fought, on the whole successfully, five great battles. At Pen Selwood in Somerset; at Sherstone, where the English were only prevented from winning by a trick of Eadric's, who, raising the head of another man, declared it was the head of the slain English king; at Brentford; and afterwards, when Eadric had again changed sides, at Otford in Kent; and Assandun in Essex. In this last battle the whole forces of England were arrayed. The sudden withdrawal of Eadric, who was commanding the Magesætas, or men of Hereford, secured a victory for the Danes, and Edmund had to retreat across England into the country of the Hwiccas, or Gloucestershire. Not yet wholly beaten, he was preparing for a sixth battle, when he was persuaded to make an arrangement similar, though not identical, with that which Alfred had made with Guthrum. He surrendered to Cnut Northumberland and Mercia, retaining for himself Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, and London. On St. Andrew's Day of the same year, Edmund Ironside died, a misfortune, like most other acts of villany of the time, attributed to Eadric. With him fell the hope of the English. The treachery of Eadric, the folly of Æthelred, met with their reward, and Cnut was acknowledged King of England.

Edmund Ironside. April to
Nov. 1016.

Five great battles.

Division of England.

Indeed, Edmund's sons were so young that it was not probable that the Witan would elect them. The only other claimant was Edwy, Edmund's brother. To secure himself against him, Cnut is said to have employed Eadric to put him to death; and though he escaped on that occasion, he was certainly outlawed, and all the old members of the royal family were kept abroad. The children of Æthelred and Emma, Edward and Alfred, were in Normandy with their mother. The children of Edmund Ironside, Edward and Edmund, were sent first to Sweden, and then to Hungary, where Edward married Agatha, niece of the Emperor Henry II. Cnut's object, on finding himself King of England, appears to have been to obliterate, as far as possible, the idea of conquest, to rule England as an English king, and making that country the centre of his government, to form a great Scandinavian Empire. To this end, pursuing the policy of Dunstan, he divided

Cnut. 1017.

*The four
Earldoms.*

England into four great earldoms, representing the old kingdoms. Northumberland and East Anglia were intrusted to Danes; Mercia was given to Eadric; Wessex he kept in his own hands. Eadric's influence had compelled Cnut thus to promote him, but he so mistrusted him, that within a year he caused him to be put to death. In the same year he sent for Queen Emma from Normandy, and married her, though she must have been much

*Cnut's patriotic
government.*

older than himself, with the object apparently either of connecting himself with the late dynasty, or of securing the friendship of the Normans. The next year the Danish fleet was sent home. Englishmen were again put in high office. Thus Leofric was made Earl of the Mercians, and Godwine, of whom we now first hear, and whose origin and rise is variously related, was made Earl of Wessex, presumably the second man in the country. Thus, too, Cnut flattered the feelings of the English by moving the body of St. Alphege, who had been killed by the Danes twelve years before, with all honour to his own Church at Canterbury; and thus, too, he did not scruple to fill the English bishoprics with Englishmen, and even to promote them to high office in Denmark. During his reign England was at peace within its own borders, while Scotland was brought to submission. In 1031, Malcolm, King of the Scotch, and two under-kings, did homage to the English King. A strong, well-ordered government was established, supported for the first time by a standing body of troops, known as the House-carls. Early in the reign Eadgar's law had been renewed with the advice of the Witan, and, in 1028, Cnut promulgated a code of his own, which is little else than repetition of former laws and customs. But the proof of his good government is this, that just as the law of the great Eadgar was looked on as typical, and demanded by Cnut's Witan, and as after the Conquest the Confessor's law was demanded, so we find the people of the North demanding Cnut's law,—in each case law meaning system of government. His importance as a king is marked by the respect shown him on his pilgrimage to Rome in the year 1027. There, as he tells his people in a letter which he sent them, he negotiated with the Pope, the Emperor, and King Rudolph of Burgundy, for the free passage of English pilgrims and merchants; he received large gifts from the Emperor, and made the Pope promise to lessen his extortions upon granting the Pallium or Archiepiscopal cloak. His daughter by Queen Emma, Gunhild, was, moreover, thought a fitting wife for Henry, afterwards the Emperor Henry III. Cnut died still young in 1035.

With him fell his plans, both of the Scandinavian Empire and of good government in England. His sons, Harold and Harthacnut, in no way inherited his greatness; they appear to have been little better than savage barbarians. The succession was disputed between them. Godwine and the West Saxons obtained the South of England for Harthacnut, while Harold reigned in the North. But as Harthacnut did not come to England, but remained in his kingdom of Denmark, Godwine was the practical ruler. This great Earl, whose sympathies succession.*

*Disputed

*Importance of
Earl Godwine.*

were wholly national, was accused of putting to death Alfred, the son of Æthelred and Emma, who seems to have taken advantage of the absence of Harthacnut to aim at re-establishing himself in Wessex. But as the actual murderers were the men of Harold whom Godwine had opposed, it would seem that the charge was a false one. The continued absence of Harthacnut enabled Harold to secure the whole of the kingdom, over which he reigned for two years. On his death, in 1040, Harthacnut stepped unopposed into his position. His short

*Harold.
1037.
Harthacnut.
1040.*

reign was marked by no great events. Godwine, having cleared himself by oath and by compurgation (in which a large number of Earls and Thegns joined) of the charge of murdering Alfred, remained in power. A tyrannical use of the King's House-carls in collecting a tax produced an outbreak in Worcester, which was punished with brutal severity. And when the King fell dead, while drinking at a bridal feast, the English were glad to be rid of a line of such barbarous sovereigns, and to restore the House of Cerdic in the person of the late king's half-brother Edward, who, in the absence of direct descendants of the Danish house, entered almost unopposed on the kingdom.

It was the eloquence of Godwine which overcame the slight opposition offered to Edward's election, and secured him the throne. This nobleman thus reached the summit of his power, and two years afterwards his daughter Edith became the King's wife. Edward's education and training had rendered his tastes and policy as decidedly French as those of Godwine were national. Thence arose, and continued throughout the reign, a constant enmity between the two parties—the Frenchmen, whom Edward brought

*Edward the Confessor.
1042.*

land, appears to have been to obliterate, as far as possible, the idea of conquest, to rule England as an English king, and making that country the centre of his government, to form a great Scandinavian Empire. To this end, pursuing the policy of Dunstan, he divided

*The four
Earldoms.*

England into four great earldoms, representing the old kingdoms. Northumberland and East Anglia were intrusted to Danes; Mercia was given to Eadric; Wessex he kept in his own hands. Eadric's influence had compelled Cnut thus to promote him, but he so mistrusted him, that within a year he caused him to be put to death. In the same year he sent for Queen Emma from Normandy, and married her, though she must have been much

*Cnut's patriotic
government.*

older than himself, with the object apparently either of connecting himself with the late dynasty, or of securing the friendship of the Normans. The next year the Danish fleet was sent home. Englishmen were again put in high office. Thus Leofric was made Earl of the Mercians, and Godwine, of whom we now first hear, and whose origin and rise is variously related, was made Earl of Wessex, presumably the second man in the country. Thus, too, Cnut flattered the feelings of the English by moving the body of St. Alphege, who had been killed by the Danes twelve years before, with all honour to his own Church at Canterbury; and thus, too, he did not scruple to fill the English bishoprics with Englishmen, and even to promote them to high office in Denmark. During his reign England was at peace within its own borders, while Scotland was brought to submission. In 1031, Malcolm, King of the Scotch, and two under-kings, did homage to the English King. A strong, well-ordered government was established, supported for the first time by a standing body of troops, known as the House-carls. Early in the reign Eadgar's law had been renewed with the advice of the Witan, and, in 1028, Cnut promulgated a code of his own, which is little else than repetition of former laws and customs. But the proof of his good government is this, that just as the law of the great Eadgar was looked on as typical, and demanded by Cnut's Witan, and as after the Conquest the Confessor's law was demanded, so we find the people of the North demanding Cnut's law,—in each case law meaning system of government. His importance as a king is marked by the respect shown him on his pilgrimage to Rome in the year 1027. There, as he tells his people in a letter which he sent them, he negotiated with the Pope, the Emperor, and King Rudolph of Burgundy, for the free passage of English pilgrims and merchants; he received large gifts from the Emperor, and made the Pope promise

to lessen his extortions upon granting the Pallium or Archiepiscopal cloak. His daughter by Queen Emma, Gunhild, was, moreover, thought a fitting wife for Henry, afterwards the Emperor Henry III. Cnut died still young in 1035.

With him fell his plans, both of the Scandinavian Empire and of good government in England. His sons, Harold and Harthacnut, in no way inherited his greatness; they

*Disputed
succession.*

appear to have been little better than savage barbarians. The succession was disputed between them. Godwine and the West Saxons obtained the South of England for Harthacnut, while Harold reigned in the North. But as Harthacnut did not come to England, but remained in his kingdom of Denmark, Godwine was the practical ruler. This great Earl, whose sympathies were wholly national, was accused of putting to death Alfred, the son of Æthelred and Emma, who seems to have taken advantage of the absence of Harthacnut to aim at re-establishing himself in Wessex. But as the actual murderers were the men of Harold whom Godwine had opposed, it would seem that the charge was a false one. The continued absence of Harthacnut enabled Harold to secure the whole of the kingdom, over which he reigned for two years. On his death, in 1040, Harthacnut stepped unopposed into his position. His short reign was marked by no great events. Godwine, having cleared himself by oath and by compurgation (in which a large number of Earls and Thegns joined) of the charge of murdering Alfred, remained in power. A tyrannical use of the King's House-carls in collecting a tax produced an outbreak in Worcester, which was punished with brutal severity. And when the King fell dead, while drinking at a bridal feast, the English were glad to be rid of a line of such barbarous sovereigns, and to restore the House of Cerdic in the person of the late king's half-brother Edward, who, in the absence of direct descendants of the Danish house, entered almost unopposed on the kingdom.

*Importance of
Earl Godwine.*

*Harold.
1037.
Harthacnut.
1040.*

It was the eloquence of Godwine which overcame the slight opposition offered to Edward's election, and secured him the throne. This nobleman thus reached the summit of his power, and two years afterwards his daughter Edith became the King's wife. Edward's education and training had rendered his tastes and policy as decidedly French as those of Godwine were national. Thence arose, and continued throughout the reign, a constant enmity between the two parties—the Frenchmen, whom Edward brought

*Edward the Confessor.
1042.*

over in great numbers and employed particularly as bishops, and the national party, headed by Godwine and his sons. It is the progress of this quarrel which forms the history of the reign, side by side with the efforts of Godwine to push his family prominently forward in opposition to the family of Leofric, Earl of Mercia. On the one hand, the King lavished favours upon his foreign followers. A Frenchman, Robert of Jumièges, became Bishop of London, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Ulf, another Norman, became Bishop of Dorchester in Oxfordshire; Ralph, the son of Edward's sister and the Count of Mantes, was made an Earl; and Eustace of Boulogne, her second husband, was loaded with honours. On the other hand, Godwine succeeded in securing for members of his own family the earldoms of Somersetshire and Herefordshire, and of the East and Middle Angles. The crisis of the rivalry at length arrived. It arose from an outrage committed by the followers of Eustace on the citizens of Dover. The townsmen rose against the insolent Normans and drove them from the city; and when Godwine, as Earl, was called upon to punish the citizens, he positively refused unless they were fairly tried before the Witan. Both sides took up arms,—Godwine and his sons on one side; the King, with Siward of Northumberland, Leofric of Mercia, and his own French partisans on the other. The armies faced each other in Gloucestershire; but Godwine, unwilling to press matters to extremity, accepted the proposal of Leofric that the question should be referred to the Witan. When the Witan assembled, the King was there with a great army. Overawed by this force, the Witan, recurring to the old charge against Godwine and to a late act of violence on the part of his son Swend, ordered Godwine and his sons to appear before them as criminals. This they refused to do unless hostages were given, and as this demand was refused, they would not appear, and banished.

Godwine
1051.

were outlawed. Godwine and three sons retired to Baldwin of Bruges, Leofwine and Harold to Ireland. The French party were triumphant. Robert, as we have seen, was made Archbishop, William, another Frenchman, succeeded him as Bishop of London, and Odda, probably an Englishman in the French interest, was given the western part of Godwine's earldom. Harold's earldom was given to Ælfgar, son of Leofric. At the same time, to complete the French influence, William of Normandy came over to England, and, as he always declared, received a promise of the succession from his cousin Edward.

The administration of foreigners was so unpopular and so unsuccessful, that Godwine and his family thought that an opportunity had arisen for their return. Unable to procure their restoration by peaceful means, they determined upon using force; and after various expeditions, but feebly opposed by the English, who at heart wished them well, Godwine found himself strong enough to sail up the Thames; and so preponderating was the feeling of the country in his favour, that, as the King refused justice, it was agreed that the matter should be referred to the Witan. What their decision would be was not doubtful, so the French prelates and earls and knights, who had been building feudal castles, at once fled, and Godwine and his sons came back in triumph. Stigand, a priest, who had been originally appointed by Cnut to an abbey raised at Assandun in memory of the Danish victory over Edmund Ironside, and who had acted as principal mediator, was elected to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, left vacant by the flight of Robert. The next year Earl Godwine died suddenly, while at dinner with the King.¹ His death restored the balance between the two great families. While Harold succeeded to the earldom of the West Saxons, and the vacant earldom of Northumbria was given to his brother Tostig, East Anglia was restored to Leofric's son Ælfgar. Earl Siward of Northumbria had died in 1055.²

Return and
death of Godwine.
1052.

The succeeding years are marked by the gradual increase of the power of Harold and his family. In 1055 Earl Ælfgar was outlawed, and his earldom given to Gurth, Harold's brother. The exiled Earl, making common cause with Griffith [Gryffydd] of Wales, defeated Ralph, the French Earl of Herefordshire. To repair this disaster the war was intrusted to Harold; he prosecuted it with success, and Herefordshire, which he had thus rescued, was added to his earldom. The death of Leofric still further increased the power of the House of Godwine, although Ælfgar, the late Earl, was allowed to succeed him; and finally, Essex and Kent were formed into an earldom for Leofwine, the remaining brother of Harold. Godwine's sons now possessed all England, with the exception of Mercia. The last probable heir to the throne—the Ætheling Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside—had been brought over from Hungary, but had died almost immediately after reaching England.

¹ French Chroniclers have made this sudden death a judgment of God. Godwine is described as wishing that the piece of bread he ate might choke him if he were guilty of the death of Alfred, whereupon the bread stuck in his throat.

² This is the Siward who occurs in the Macbeth of Shakspeare. Though the events connected with his invasion of Scotland are very obscure, the poet seems on the whole to have changed the real history but slightly.

And when, in 1063, Harold, by employing his men as light troops, succeeded in the final subjugation of Wales, his greatness was such that he must almost certainly have been regarded as the next king.

Death of Edward.
1066.

Three years afterwards, in January 1066, King Edward, the last male descendant of Cerdic who reigned in England, died. His last year had been troubled by a great insurrection of the Northern counties against the rule of Tostig. The house of Leofric had had a stronghold in the North, and Tostig's injudicious vigour in attempting to reduce the barbarous population to order had excited great discontent. His energy seems more than once to have led him into murder. The Northumbrians therefore deposed him, and elected Morcar [Morkere], the grandson of Leofric, in his place. His brother, Edwin of Mercia, who had succeeded his father Ælfgar, made common cause with him; and Harold, whose policy was always conciliatory, found it necessary to persuade the King to confirm Edwin and Morkere in their possessions. Tostig retired as an exile to Bruges. While England was thus troubled, the King died—a good man, devoted to the Church and the monks, and therefore afterwards canonized, but as a king unfitted by his pliant character, and more especially by his love of foreign favourites, to rule over England at such a difficult crisis.

The Witan at once assembled, and used its power of election. This power was usually exercised within the limits of the royal family; but on this occasion, as there was no claimant of the royal house but Edmund Ironside's grandson, the child Eadgar, the Witan looked beyond their usual limit, and elected almost unanimously the great Earl Harold. Though thus King of England by the most perfect title, he found himself opposed by two enemies. On the one hand was his brother Tostig, the exiled Earl of Northumberland, who had been a favourite of the late king, and had perhaps himself hoped to be elected; and upon the other king.

Harold elected
1066.

Claims of William of Normandy.

Duke William, who, out of a variety of small and insufficient pretexts, had constructed a very formidable claim to the crown of England. He asserted that the Confessor had promised him the kingdom, that he was the nearest of kin, and that Harold had himself sworn to him to be his man, to marry his daughter, and to own him allegiance. The circumstances under which this last event had taken place are not very certain; but it seems to be true that Harold, on some occasion, had been shipwrecked on the coast of France and taken prisoner, and held to ransom, according to the barbarous custom of that day, by Guy, Count of Ponthieu, lord of the country. The intervention of William as superior lord rescued him from his disgraceful position. He spent some time in friendly intercourse at William's court, and there probably, as was not unusual, made himself the Duke's man, and did homage. Such an act could be only personal, and could have nothing to do with the kingdom of England, and even as a personal tie was not very binding. It was his knowledge of this which induced William to play the well-known trick upon Harold. When the Earl had taken what he believed to be only a common oath of homage, the cover of the table on which his hands had been placed was withdrawn, and he found he had been swearing upon most sacred relics. With regard to the other claims, it may be said that Edward the Confessor, in accordance with the constitution of England, could not promise the crown to any one, and, moreover, had nominated Harold on his deathbed; while, although William was the cousin of the late king, it was only through Edward's Norman mother, Emma, that he was so. But when put forward artfully, and mingled with coloured accounts of the injuries suffered by the French in England at the return of Godwine, these claims seemed very plausible to the French, especially when backed by the influence of the Papal See wielded by Archdeacon Hildebrand, afterwards Pope Gregory VII. The Papal support was won partly by representing Harold as a perjured man, partly because the Normans in Italy were regarded as the great champions of the Papal See, but chiefly because Godwine and Harold had throughout sided rather with the party of the secular clergy in England than with that of the monks,¹ and had been national in their views with regard to the Church as well as in other matters. The Pope, Alexander II., was led by Hildebrand to see the opportunity offered, and expressed his approbation of the expedition by sending a consecrated ring and banner.

William, immediately after the death of the Confessor, sent to demand the crown, which was of course refused. He then proceeded to collect troops, not only his own Norman feudatories, but also large bodies of adventurers from other parts of France. Aware of the intended invasion, Harold collected his forces, and occupied the Southern coast. But William was so long in coming, that Harold's militia army, anxious to return to their agricultural works, and straitened for food, could not be kept

William's preparations.

¹ As an illustration of this, Harold's great Foundation of the Holy Rood at Waltham was occupied by secular canons, and had a school attached, while Stigand, one of his firmest supporters, was the uncanonical Archbishop of Canterbury.

together. He was left with his immediate followers, his House-carls and Thegns. Just then, when his great host had disappeared, news was brought to him that Tostig had invaded the North of England. Foiled in a weak attempt upon the South near Sandwich, and refused aid by William of Normandy, Tostig had fallen in with the fleet of Harold Hardrada, King of Norway. This king was a great warrior, who had served in the armies of the Byzantine Empire, and fought in Africa and Sicily. He was easily persuaded to join Tostig, and reinforced by the Earls of Orkney, they together sailed up the Ouse, and reached Fulford on the way to York. Edwin and Morkere, the sons of Ælfgar, whose sister Harold had lately married, honestly opposed them, but after a severe battle they were beaten. Arrangements by which the North was to join Harold Hardrada were being made at Stamford Bridge upon the Derwent, when Harold, who had hastened with extreme rapidity from the South, fell upon the invaders. They were taken by surprise, and some, but slightly armed, were overcome; but the bridge over the Derwent was held with determination, and a fierce battle was fought on the other side. The English were entirely triumphant, both Tostig and Harold Hardrada being slain. The Norwegian fleet was forced to withdraw. This was on the 25th of September.

On the 28th King William landed at Pevensey. Harold was still at York when the news reached him. He hastily gathered what troops he could round the nucleus of his own immediate followers who had been with him at Stamford Bridge. All the South of England joined him gladly, both from Wessex and East Anglia. But Edwin and Morkere, in their jealousy of the rival house, forgot their patriotism and Harold's good deeds to themselves, and deserted him. With such an army as he had, Harold took up his position upon the hill of Senlac, where Battle Abbey now stands. This hill runs out from the North Sussex hills southward like a peninsula. There Harold erected palisades, and arranged his men with a view to defensive action only. This step was rendered necessary by the difference of the armies; the English fought all on foot, a large proportion were irregularly armed militia, and the hand javelin—not the bow and arrow—was their national missile. The Normans, on the other hand, fought as chivalry on horseback, and had many archers. Once in the plain Harold's army might have been crushed by the charge of the mailed cavalry. But repeated charges uphill against an entrenched foe, stubborn and heavily armed, could not but wear out

Landing of William.

Battle of Hastings.
Oct. 14.

the mounted knight. Our descriptions are all from Norman sources, and the contrast between the religious Norman and the jovial Englishman is fully brought out. On the one side, the night is said to have been passed in prayer, and on the other in revelry. There were certainly, however, priests and monks upon the side of the English, and probably this story is a monkish exaggeration. Harold drew up his forces with his own picked troops upon the front of the hill, between the dragon banner of Wessex and his own banner adorned with a fighting man. The backward curves of the hill were occupied by his worse armed troops. He himself, with his brothers Gyrth and Leofwine, took their place beside the standard. The French advanced in three divisions,—the Bretons, under Alan, on the left; the Normans, under their Duke and his two brothers, Robert and Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, in the centre; the adventurers, under Roger of Montgomery, on the right. They galloped forward, preceded by Taillefer, a minstrel, tossing his sword aloft and singing songs of Charlemagne. But their efforts were vain. The heavy axe of the English hewed down man and horse if any reached the barricade, and the French had to draw back. The Bretons began the flight, and the Normans soon followed, but the English militia were not steady enough to withstand the excitement of victory. The veteran centre stood firm, but the troops opposed to the Bretons broke from their position in pursuit. William saw his advantage, rallied his troops, drove back the pursuers, and made a second vehement assault upon the barricade. The Earls Gyrth and Leofwine were killed, the barricade in part removed, but still Harold held his ground, and William had to have recourse to stratagem before he could secure a victory. His present comparative success had been caused by the accidental over-eagerness of the English. He determined to try whether he could not again induce them to break their line. The Normans turned in apparent flight, the English, heated by the long fight, rushed forward in pursuit. The Norman cavalry turned round and rode down their pursuers, and, driving them before them, again charged up the hill; while the archers, whose skill had been somewhat foiled by the shields of the English, were ordered to drop a flight of arrows upon the heads of Harold and his men. The plan was fatally successful; the battle was still stubbornly contested, though no longer in serried ranks, when Harold fell, pierced in the eye by an arrow. With him disappeared all hope of English success. His body was found, and buried under a cairn by the sea, till afterwards removed to his minster of Waltham.

Death of Harold.

STATE OF SOCIETY

449-1066

THE chief interest in the Conquest is the change that it is always said to have exercised in the character of the institutions of England. It used to be asserted that the feudal system was introduced, and completed as a wholly new system to the English, after the Conquest; and Hume speaks of the division of the kingdom into so many knights' fiefs, into so many baronies, as if there were complete reorganization of the whole constitution. Modern inquiry tends to confirm what would naturally have been supposed, that the whole of the elements of the feudal system existed in England as in other Teutonic countries before the arrival of the Normans. The form which the civilization of the Scandinavian and Teutonic nations took seems to have been that of a collection of village communities, such as may be seen at work at present in India. The district occupied by such community was called the Mark, and was divided into three parts, in each of which every free member of the community had his share, but which were cultivated in strict accordance with the customary system of agriculture which no one might break. There was first the village, then the arable mark (cultivated land), then the common pasture, and beyond that the waste. Every freeman had a share in the arable and in the common pasture, but he was bound to sow the same crops as his neighbours, and to follow the same arrangement, which appears to have been simple and barbarous. The common fields, or mixed lands as they are called, were divided into three strips by broad grassy mounds; one was sown with autumn crops, one with spring crops, and the third left fallow. In the same way, though under somewhat varying rules, the grass mark was partitioned. Frequently all enclosures were removed at the close of the hay harvest, and the cattle grazed in common, as they were allowed to do also in the stubble of the arable mark. Lands were probably redistributed at certain intervals of time, and the power of devising hereditary property by will was strictly restrained.

The Mark system.

Traces of common fields cultivated on the threefold system, and of customary cultivation, are still to be found in England, and were plentiful in the last century.

But though this system would appear to have been common in nations of Germanic origin, it can be gathered from the Germania of Tacitus that other political institutions existed in Germany. Thus, the subdivisions of the Tribe were called Pagi, which seem to answer to the English Hundred. The Pagus was under the official chieftainship of an elective head called the Princeps, answering to the Saxon Ealdorman. This Pagus, which may perhaps have been originally a division of a hundred heads of families, supplied a hundred warriors to the host, a hundred assessors at the Judicial Court of the Princeps. Below this we come to the Vicus or township, which was probably organized upon the Mark system above described, or on some modification of it. The commanders in war, or Duces, were elected, probably from among the Principes, for each special occasion. It is, moreover, clear that private property had begun to exist. In pastoral life, where the common right of grazing would be the chief common privilege, there would be no difficulty in one man possessing more cattle than another. Neither would it be a great step to grant to such wealthier men, upon the redivision of the common arable mark, extra shares for the support of slaves or dependent freemen whom his wealth had attracted around him. There also existed a variety of ranks, which may be roughly divided into three classes,—the noble or eorl, who must have owed his nobility to birth; the freeman or ceorl, possessing his own homestead, his own share in the common land, and dependent on no man; and the let or dependent workman, cultivating his lord's land. Besides these, there were actual slaves or theows, consisting of men who had lost their liberty either as captives, or for debt, or for some other easily conceivable causes. It does not appear that nobility of birth gave any additional political rights, although personal consideration was awarded to the noble. It was the possession of free land which made a man a full member of the tribe. The lets, however, were probably dependent only as regarded their lord, in every other respect free. Thus, like other members of the community, their death had to be atoned for by the payment of a sum of money or weregild, although the sum was smaller than in the case of freemen. They probably formed a considerable part of the armed force of the nation. The class may have consisted originally of a conquered population of kindred blood, or of men who voluntarily put themselves into a state of dependency upon their richer neighbours.

German institutions.

Division of ranks.

for security, or because for some reason they had become landless. Side by side with this democratic constitution, there was a peculiar institution known as the Comitatus. Each Princeps was allowed to collect around him, under a tie of personal dependence,

The Comitatus.

a body of professed warriors, who were bound to him by the closest ties of honour; and the importance of each chief must have depended in a great degree upon this following. In case of conquest, it would naturally be the duty of the conquering chief to see to the welfare of his followers, and to give them grants, which might either be grants in perpetuity, or only the right of present possession, and which would be drawn from the conquered land remaining over after its distribution among the body of freemen. To cultivate these grants, the comrades of the king would have had to employ their own dependants, and these dependants would settle in villages, which took the form of village communities, except that the rights, which in the free communities would be vested in the whole body of the freemen, were in this case vested in the lord. We here have the germ of the relation between vassal and lord. But this element of feudalism soon acquired greater strength. The conquering chief would take upon himself the title of king, claim descent from the gods, and make his line hereditary. As the position of the king advanced, the position of the comrade or Gesith would advance also. As the king of a tribe became the king of a nation his dignity would greatly increase, and with his that of his followers, who, as the court became more formal, would accept as honours duties about the household, and the word Gesith, comrade, changed into Thegn or servant.

*Growth of
feudalism.*

- In times of war such nobles by service became natural leaders of the people, and the position of the chief men of the village proportionately sunk. So that there arose a class of nobles in immediate connection with the crown, possessing property not belonging to a village community, and exercising rights of lordship over its inhabitants. It is not difficult to see in what a superior position they were thus placed; what powers of encroachment they might have; and how willingly, in times of danger, village communities would put themselves in the same position with regard to them, as that occupied by those settlers on the Thegn's lands, who had always acknowledged them as their lords. / We have therefore two sources from which feudalism might have arisen; the village headman, in accordance with what seems to be a general law, as his powers came to be legally defined (especially in the matter of collecting the king's taxes), would be regarded as the hereditary lord of the village, and would obtain the right of permanently enclosing his share of the common land; while the king's Thegn, side by side with him, would plant his own subject villages, and accept by what is called commendation the supremacy of such villages as might offer it to him.

The Saxons then brought with them, in their invasion of England, their threefold division of rank, their association or township, their Pagus or Hundred, the Mark system, the principle of election to public functions, and the Comitatus or personal following of their chiefs. The conquering Principes or Ealdormen became kings. The country in all probability was divided out with some degree of regularity between villages, similar in constitution with those of Continental Germany. There was no necessity for these apportionments being equal. But a certain number of villages, whatever their property was, were divided into Pagi or Hundreds. This explains the inequality of those divisions.

Saxon institutions introduced into England.

The unoccupied land was left in the king's hands to reward his chief followers. On these demesnes, and on the public Land. lands, the lets found their homes, with such of the conquered race as remained; and from time to time fresh estates were granted as fresh conquests increased the surplus land. From this land also the monasteries were endowed. The portion allotted to each free household was called the Hide. Land held by hereditary possession or by original allotment was called the Ethel. That held by grant from the public land and by charter was called Bocland (i.e. book-land). The land neither partitioned nor granted was the common property of the nation, and was called Folcland. As all land, whether bocland or folcland, could be let out, and was so treated on various conditions, there was much variety in the tenures of that class of people who did not possess free land of their own.

Whether the mark system prevailed to any great extent or not, (and this is a somewhat uncertain point,) practically it was the township which formed the lowest part of the general organization. The hundred was a collection of townships, the shire a collection of hundreds. The chief officer of the township, the town reeve, was elected by the freeholders of the township, and with four of their number represented that township in the Court of the Hundred, of which the township was a subordinate division. Townships established upon the lands of lords also had their reeve, but probably he was appointed by the lord. Their constitution was the same, but the proprietor of the soil took the duties and privileges which in a free township belonged to the freeholders. Such townships formed manors. It was from the township organization.*

*Judicial

also that the burghs or towns arose. The Saxons had a natural dislike for town life, and we must not look for the arrangements of the borough to the remnants of Roman civilization. But when the village grew very large the same constitution as existed in the township was employed, the freeholders within the limits of the borough forming the municipal body. Such boroughs may also frequently have arisen from an agglomeration of townships. They would then be analogous to the hundred. The existence of two or three parishes in most boroughs leads to the same conclusion; for, ecclesiastically, the limits of the township and the parish were the same. Such towns, growing up naturally round the dwellings of wealthy men or of the king, would generally be either on folcland, and as such, dependent upon the crown, or upon the land of some lord on whom they would then depend. When the national system became organized, there would thus be the Court of the Township, with its counterpart in the dependent Township of the Manor Court. Above that, the Hundred Court, presided over by the Hundred-man, while the township were represented by their Reeve and four members. And above that there was the Shire Court or Gemot. The shires were not, properly speaking, part of the original organization. They seem to be in most cases the old sub-kingdoms. The Court, therefore, of the Shire represented the National Court. Over these sub-kingdoms or shires was appointed a royal officer, shire-reeve or sheriff, representative of the king for judicial and fiscal purposes. There is no proof that he was an elective officer. Beside the sheriff, who represented the central authority, was the Ealdorman, who had the command of the military force of the shire and the third of the fines levied. He was the representative of the old sub-king. He was a national officer, appointed by the king and by the central assembly of the nation, the Witana-gemot. He sat with the sheriff in the Shire Court, but it would seem that the sheriff was the official whose presence constituted the court. In all the courts it was a principle that the suitors of the court, those, that is, who were liable to its jurisdiction, were also the judges; that is to say, the courts were essentially popular. The whole body present settled the disputes or judged the crimes of the individuals, the chief officer being, in fact, the chairman. Practically, in the Shire Court, twelve chief Thegns or chief freeholders sat with the sheriff as judges, representatives of the whole body. It was also a principle, at all events originally, that no superior court should have jurisdiction till the inferior courts had done their best towards the settlement of the disputed point.

Ecclesiastically, the parishes were co-extensive with the townships, the bishoprics in a great degree co-extensive with the shires or ancient kingdoms.

In process of time, the position of the king somewhat changed. He began to be regarded as the one lord of the land. From being the King of the Saxons he gradually became the King of England. His personal relation became territorial. The folcland became royal demesne, and the king came to be regarded as the origin of justice. This change, among other causes, tended much to the growth of a system which was in fact incipient feudalism. Growth of territorial jurisdiction. The national courts constantly became more the private courts of great lords. The connection between the possession of land and the judicial power grew constantly stronger. It had early been the custom to establish in the favour of lords to whom grants were made Liberties, or Soken, as they were called; that is, land was granted exempted from the jurisdiction of the Hundred. The judicial rights of the Hundred, together with the payments accruing from them, were vested in the lord who received the grant. These rights are implied in the words sac and soc. As townships on a lord's land became manors, so these Liberties, on which there were many townships, became private Hundreds. They were probably, before the Conquest, not exempted from the jurisdiction of the Shire. It has been already mentioned that, either by commendation or by the encroachment of local magnates, freemen (allodial proprietors as they were called) took in many cases the position of dependants. Their property then assumed the character of bocland, or land held by charter, instead of hereditary freehold. By commending themselves to a lord they would free themselves from the burden of military duty, which would then fall upon the lord as proprietor of the land. Justice would be more easily obtained from the neighbouring court of the lord than from the distant court of the Hundred or county. Protection from invasion or from the violence of neighbours would be gained. Again, the police regulation, by which all landless men were obliged to seek a lord, would strengthen the idea of the necessity of dependence.

Meanwhile, the Franchises and territorial jurisdictions went on increasing till the ideas of possession of land and jurisdiction began to go constantly together. The Thegn, who only possessed five Hides, had his court. In the time of Cnut a further step was taken. The wealthy landowner, under the name of Landrica, represented the king in his district, and had jurisdiction over the lesser freeholders. While, to crown all, the new position of the king gave him the sole jurisdiction over the holders of bocland, to which, as we have seen, allodial property was gradually assimilating itself. In all these ways private and territorial jurisdictions were strengthened, and enabled very largely to encroach upon the national and popular courts. The position of the Landrica was little else than that of a feudal baron, and the independence of the great hereditary official, so marked a characteristic of Continental feudalism, was almost reproduced in England, when Cnut divided the kingdom into four great Earldoms.

To pass from the local government to the central. It has been seen that justice and municipal law were carried on through a series of free assemblies or Gemots; so too the general meeting, or Gemot of the nation, constituted the chief legislative and judicial assembly. This was called the Witan or wise men, or the Witana-Gemot or assembly of wise men. It was doubtless—originally the National Assembly of all free men, but by an easy change which befalls all such assemblies, attendance on it grew awkward to the multitude, and was shortly confined to those who bore office about the court, the king's Thegns and bishops. The principle of representation was not understood, and the freemen, although they possessed an inherent right to be present, were not in fact represented, except in so far as the presence of friendly and neighbouring Thegns might be held to represent them. The power of the Witan was great—and various, being in theory the power of a free nation. They could elect and discrown a king, and practically did elect him, though usually from among the nearest relatives of the late king. A remnant of this elective form of the monarchy still exists in our form of coronation. Peace and war were discussed in the Witan. The co-operation of the Witan was necessary to authorize alienation of public land; and to them ultimate judicial appeals were made. Early in the eleventh century, however, the king had so far improved his position that he was able to grant land without their leave, and also to call to his court cases not yet completed in the lower courts. The same change in the character of the king, which has been already mentioned, shows itself here also. He was originally the leader of a free tribe, perhaps of a clan, but gradually as his dominion extended his power rose also; and his personal influence, though somewhat undefined, was paramount. The great king could always wield the Witan as he pleased. His office was, as has been said, elective, but under certain restrictions. It seems to have been regarded as necessary that he should be an Ætheling of the royal house

Central government. The Witan.

Increased power of the King.

(and born in wedlock), and in England. With this limit, and with a certain preference allowed to the eldest son, and to the one whom the dying king nominated, the choice of the Witan was free; and, practically, the prince of the royal house best fitted for the immediate circumstances of the kingdom was chosen. Thus the king's brother was sometimes chosen instead of his son, who, in his turn, might succeed his uncle to the exclusion of his uncle's children. This preference for the best man over the nearest relative continued after the Conquest, and renders erroneous the appellation of usurper when applied to the early Norman kings. The arrangements of finance, as far as they can be understood, were very simple. Upon every citizen, whether agricultural or urban, there was laid a trinoda-necessitas, that is to say, the duty of serving in war, the repair of bridges and public roads, and the maintenance of fortifications. It is plain, therefore, that the wants of the crown were chiefly personal, that what we consider the chief expenses of government, justice, maintenance of public works, and military expenditure, were supported by the people themselves, without the interposition of government. The expenses of the crown would be discharged very largely from the public property or folcland reserved to the nation, and from such taxes as were rendered necessary from time to time to support the grandeur and hospitality of the king as national representative.

The system of police was based on the idea of mutual responsibility. — Frankpledge or frithborh, by which is meant the division of the country into sections of ten men mutually responsible for one another, cannot be proved to have existed before the Conquest. On the other hand, its principle no doubt existed. Every man, by the law of Cnut, was bound to be in a Hundred and a tithing. This latter term cannot be accurately defined, but it was a subdivision of the Hundred. By the laws of Æthelstan and Eadgar every landless man was compelled to have a lord to answer for him in the courts, and every man a surety to answer for him if he were absent when legally required.

From this sketch it will be seen that, with regard to classes, there must have been at the time of the Conquest Thegns, who were to all intents and purposes feudal barons; Sokmen, those freemen who owed suit to the lord's soke or court; a certain number of Eorls or nobles by birth, who would most likely have become assimilated to the Thegns; freeholders, holding land in common where it had not yet come under the suzerainty of a lord (this same class of freemen degenerated under various circumstances and with varying tenures into villeins, or dependent cultivators, under lords); and absolute slaves, consisting originally probably of the conquered race, and added to by criminals and outlaws, or others who had lost their rights as freemen.

Finance.

Police.

There was here every element of the feudal system. Even the tenure of land upon military service existed. The main distinction between the condition of England and that of the Continent, where the feudal system had been fully established, lay in this,—there still existed a certain number of freemen whose land was their own. They were indeed obliged to acknowledge the jurisdiction of a lord, but they were free to choose their own lord. They were suitors to his court, but he did not possess their land. The feudal system in its completed form may be regarded as exhibiting two peculiar features:—jurisdiction was in the hand of large landowners; and the lord was regarded as the possessor of the land over which he exercised jurisdiction. In England, one feature alone had become prominent. The judicial power was in the hand of large landowners; but their jurisdiction extended over men whose land they did not possess, but who were owners of their own property, and able to attach themselves to any lord they liked. With the Conquest, while the judicial power was restrained, the connection between that power and the possession of land over which it was exercised became absolute.

The Church occupied a position of very great importance. It was the guardian of the morality of the country, and as such had a share in all secular jurisdictions; but it was the remnant of a national Church, not closely united to the Roman See. It was therefore inclined to be somewhat disorderly. Its bishops were appointed properly by the king and the Witan, but latterly the power had practically been with the king alone. These bishops obtained their license from the Pope. But the case of Archbishop Stigand, to whom the Pope had not sent the Pallium, shows how little weight was given to this proceeding. Similarly, the lower clergy had formed the habit of marrying, contrary to Papal laws, and although there was a growing feeling that this was wrong, the practice still continued, while the monks were constantly attempting to break free from their rules and establish themselves as canons.

To such a civilization came William, who had seen the evils of Continental feudalism in his own country, and had secured his position only after long struggles. He claimed England, not as a conqueror, but as the legitimate sovereign, nominated by Edward the Confessor, and as such was accepted by the Witan, and crowned in London after the battle of Senlac. His natural policy was, therefore, to continue such institutions as were not yet feudal, and thus his arrival checked that natural growth of feudalism which was running its course in England as in other Teutonic countries. On the other hand, it was impossible from his position that he should do otherwise than introduce many feudal institutions. He had brought with him many of his vassals, who held from him in feudal tenure; and it was necessary, when, from the confiscated lands of Harold and his family and of the other nobles who either opposed his entrance into England or afterwards revolted against him, he made large grants to reward the adventurers of whom his army mainly consisted, he should make those grants in accordance with the system with which he was acquainted in exchange for military service, and saddled with the usual feudal burdens. While he thus, on the one hand, was the national English sovereign, on the other he was the supreme landowner and feudal lord. Under this double influence, the tenure of land, following the universal tendency of Europe, became wholly feudal and military. But the other side of feudalism—with its isolation, the virtual independence of the feudatories (among whom the king was but the first among his peers), and the suppression of national jurisdiction, which were the chief characteristics of French feudalism—was kept in careful restraint. Thus, the whole machinery of justice, the Hundred Court and the Shire Gemot were retained under presidency of the sheriff, side by side with that territorial jurisdiction which he could not refuse to his feudal vassals. The police system of mutual responsibility was kept up and systematized under the name of frankpledge, and on the whole nation still lay the trinoda necessitas. The Witan remained, although its members were now feudal vassals; the laws as they existed were for the most part perpetuated, though certain emendations were made, such as the law of Englishry,¹ for the protection of his Norman subjects, and the liberty allowed to the different nationalities to be tried according to their own law. At the same time, the further to restrain the independent power of the great feudatories, the great earldoms which Cnut had created were broken up, with the exception of three border counties, Chester, Durham, and Kent; the business of the counties was transacted by the sheriff, who was a royal officer, and the earldoms were either of one county only, or if of more than one, of counties far apart. As a final court of appeal,

Effects of the Conquest.

Restraints upon
feudalism.

¹ See p. 43.

- he established the Curia Regis, formed of the Justiciary (who was the king's representative and regent when he left the country), with a staff of justices, consisting originally of the officers of the household, but tending gradually to consist of new nobility appointed by the king for the purpose. This was the final court of appeal, and could draw
- to it any suit from the county court. But the chief restriction upon military feudalism, which rendered its appearance in England impossible, was, that each freeholder swore allegiance, not to his immediate lord, but to the king. Abroad, if a great noble went to war with the king, his vassals were doing right in following him; in England, they were committing treason.

This oath was exacted after the great work of the Domesday Book was completed. This book consisted of a registration of all the lands in the kingdom, made by commissioners, after inquiry upon oath of the chief men and lesser freeholders of each district. By it not only were the limits of property settled, but the king knew what resources he could rely upon both in men and money. The king's power was nominally limited by the "counsel and consent" of the National Council, which was at once the old English Witan and a feudal assembly, but its power was really nominal. The taxes seldom called for interference, as they were derived principally either from the old national dues, the ferm of the shire (a fixed rent of the old public lands and royal domains), the danegelt, and the proceeds of fines or feudal aids. The army was also completely in the king's hands; as national sovereign, the old national militia was at his command; as feudal sovereign, he could claim the military service of his vassals, which was defined in every case by the William's position. Domesday Book, while the whole people were bound to him by oath. We thus see William the Conqueror occupying the position of a practically irresponsible monarch, with a mixed monarchy of national and feudal character, but, with the exception of some parts of the administration of justice, carried on wholly under feudal forms.

As regards the Church, two important changes were made. As —

The Church. the champion of orthodoxy, William, by means of his Archbishop, Lanfranc, restored the Roman discipline to the Church, and connected it closely with the See of Rome. And, — secondly, he separated the ecclesiastical jurisdiction from the secular. The bishops withdrew from the county court (perhaps finding their position there useless now that those courts had sunk in importance), and established courts of their own. During William's reign no inconvenience arose from this, but the inherent defects of the step became obvious when Henry II. attempted to reorganize the kingdom after the disorder of Stephen's reign. The Conqueror's police was unusually strict. It became the common saying that a man laden with gold could pass unharmed through the country. He abolished the penalty of death (which was, however, speedily resumed), and substituted mutilations of various kinds. He also repressed the right which the Saxon laws had allowed of killing the murderer or the thief when taken red-handed. It has been suggested that the great forests he created, and the care with which they were maintained, is to be attributed as much to the king's desire to maintain an efficient staff of police always ready as to his great love of hunting.

WILLIAM I

1066-1087.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Malcolm III., 1057.	Philip I., 1060.	Henry IV., 1056.	Sancho II., 1065. Alphonso VI., 1072.

POPES.—Alexander II., 1061. Gregory VII., 1073. Vacancy one year. Victor III., 1086.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Stigand, 1052-1070. Lanfranc, 1070-1089.	Odo of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osbern, 1067. William de Warenne, and Richard Fitz-Gilbert, 1073. Lanfranc, Geoffrey of Coutances, and Robert, Count of Mortain, 1078.	Herfast, afterwards Bishop of Elmham, 1068. Osbern, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, 1070. Osmund, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, 1074. Maurice, afterwards Bishop of London, 1078. William de Beaufeu, Bishop of Thetford, 1083. William Giffard, 1086.

THE death of Harold left England without a king. As yet, although William had expected the immediate submission of the whole country, no such course was thought of. The idea which occupied men's minds was the election of a new king, who might continue the defence of the country. The two sons of Ælfgar, the great northern Earls Edwin and Morkere, whose jealousy of Harold had been one of the chief causes of his disaster, found themselves, now that the House of Godwine was practically destroyed, the most prominent leaders of the English. They came to London, and there, collecting about them such nobles and important people as they could readily find, they held an assembly which in some sort represented the Witan. They probably expected that the crown would be given to one of themselves, and that the hour for the triumph of the Mercian house had arrived. They were disappointed in their hopes. Of properly qualified candidates there were none, but the Southern Witan preferred to place the crown upon the head of the grandson of Ironside, the heir of the old royal house, and elected the Ætheling Eadgar, young though he was.¹ It does not seem however that he was actually crowned, that ceremony being postponed till the feast of Christmas.

After the slaughters of the late battles, the means of resistance in the Southern counties must have been much diminished, and when Edwin and Morkere completed their treasonable conduct by again withdrawing their troops, and, though they had accepted the election, refused to give practical support to the defence of Wessex, immediate opposition to the Conqueror became hopeless. No further combined action was possible and no other great battle was fought.

Meanwhile William, disappointed in his hopes, proceeded with his own foreign forces to make good his conquest. He determined to subdue the South-eastern counties before he advanced against London. He marched eastward, took Romney, and captured the castle and town of Dover, and had reached Canterbury, when he was seized with an illness which kept him inactive during the whole month of November. Thence he sent an embassy which secured the great town of Winchester, and thence in December he moved to attack the capital, but contented himself with burning the suburb of Southwark, and passed on westward on the southern side of the Thames, which he did not cross till he reached Wallingford, intending to pass northward and thus cut the city off from the unconquered country. With this view he marched to Berkhamstead in Hertfordshire. But his progress had broken the spirit of the Londoners, and he was there met by Eadgar, Ealdred the Archbishop of York, and others, who submitted to him, and offered him the crown. After a feigned rejection of it, till he had further secured the kingdom, he accepted it at the earnest request of his followers, and marching into London, was crowned at Christmas. The ceremony was performed by Ealdred of York in the place of Stigand of Canterbury, whose appointment to the See had not been strictly canonical; it was impossible that William, one of whose professed objects was the reform of the uncanonical Church of England, should receive his crown from the hands of a schismatic. Stigand's importance as the chief official of the English prevented William from taking immediate steps against him. He was therefore present at the ceremony, but though William thus, and for some time afterwards, temporized with him, his ruin was already determined. The coronation was performed with the usual English ceremonies; the name of the King was proposed for election to those who were present, and the shout of acquiescence excited the alarm of the Norman troops outside the church. They proceeded to set fire to buildings in the neighbourhood; the assembled multitude rushed from the church to extinguish the flames, and William was left almost alone with the officiating ecclesiastics. But the ceremony was completed in the midst of fears and misgivings of those within the Cathedral, and of uproar and confusion without.

¹ It is not certain how old Eadgar was. His father died in 1057. He must have been therefore at least nine years old, and was probably some years older, as we hear of his executing several acts of kingly authority.

William was thus crowned King of England, having received the crown from the hands of the Witan, and having been nominally elected by the popular voice. His position was in strict accordance with the claims he had raised, and he proceeded to pursue a policy in harmony with it. He had come to claim his rights against a usurper, he had obtained those rights, and would henceforth make them good while strictly following the forms of law. As crowned King of England, opposition to him was treasonable, and the property of traitors legally confiscated. It is clear that this position gave him great advantages, and would induce many a weak-hearted or peaceful Englishman to accept without opposition the de facto king, while it enabled William to hide the harsh character of the conqueror under the milder form of a monarch at war with rebellious subjects.

In pursuance of this policy, no sudden change was made in the constitution or social arrangements of the country. In the first period of his rule, William merely stepped into the place and exercised the rights of his predecessor; but those rights he found sufficient to secure his own position and to reward his followers. For these purposes it was necessary for him to give to Normans much of the conquered land, by which means he would spread as it were a garrison throughout the country, and at the same time gratify his adherents.

He started from the legal fiction that the whole of the land, as the land of traitors, was confiscated. The folcland he made crown property, thus completing a change which had been long in progress. The large domains of the House of Godwine were by the destruction of that house naturally at his disposal, as was also the property of those who had fallen in arms against him at Hastings or been prominent in opposition. The land thus gained he granted to his followers, not making a new partition of it, but putting a Norman in the place of the dead or outlawed Englishman who was legally regarded as his ancestor. To complete this process, and appropriate all the conquered land, would obviously have been impolitic; and very shortly after his coronation he appears to have allowed a general redemption of property. Proprietors submitted, paid a sum of money, and received their lands back as fresh grants from the Conqueror. In addition to this, many of the smaller thegns and free Ceorls were too insignificant to be disturbed, and in many instances some little fragment of their dead husband's property was given in contemptuous pity to the widows, saddled frequently with some ignoble tenure. Still further to complete the subjection of the country, in every conquered town of importance a castle was erected.

In addition to his grants of land, William had the government of the country to attend to, and the vacant earldoms to fill. In doing this he was guided by his past experience, and in the fully conquered parts of England was careful not to put any earl into the position occupied by the great earls of the last days of the Anglo-Saxon monarchy. In this respect, as in some others, the spirit of feudalism had been making rapid strides in England, and the great earls, as well as the great cities, were bidding fair to assume the position of the feudatories and free cities of the Continent. William was careful to return to older precedent, and to confine his earldoms to one shire. The importance of this in English history is great, as it obliged the nobility to work in alliance with the commonalty, and secured national rather than aristocratic progress. Thus his two most trusted servants, to whom in his absence he left the vice-regency of the kingdom, William Fitz-Osbern and his brother Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, were respectively but Earls of Hereford and of Kent. William thus arranged that part of England which he had really conquered. In the North property.

Transfer of
The form of law retained.

Castles built.

Appointment of Earls.

William's position
as king.

he as yet continued the existing state of things. Edwin and Morkere did homage and received their Earldoms back again. Waltheof remained Earl of Nottingham, and Copsige (Copsi or Coxo) was given the earldom of the Northern province of Northumberland. To secure the allegiance of these great unconquered Earls, William took them with him when in March he went to revisit his native duchy. The kingdom he left in charge, the South to Odo of Bayeux, the North to William Fitz-Osbern.

His retirement from England has sometimes been traced to an evil intention of enticing his new subjects into a more serious rebellion, that he might conquer them more completely. His natural desire to display his triumph in his own country would seem to supply a sufficient reason, without attributing to him such double dealing. The effect of his absence, however, was in fact to produce such an insurrection. In the midst of his conquests and confiscations he had always kept a strong hand upon his followers, and his police was good. The case was different under the government of his viceroys. The rapacity and licentiousness of the conquerors made itself heavily felt. Discontent began to show itself in the North, in the West, and in the South; and the native English, despairing of their unaided efforts, began to seek assistance from abroad. The news of this danger brought William back to England in the December of 1067. But already a revolt in Bernicia, as the Northern division of Northumberland was called, had produced the death of the newly-made Earl Copsige. Eadric the Forester in the West of England, in union with the Welsh, had ravaged Herefordshire, and the men of Kent had obtained assistance from Eustace of Boulogne in a fruitless attack upon Dover. It was the dread of more important foreign allies which brought William back. The English efforts to get aid from Henry IV. of Germany, or from the King of Norway, had been frustrated either by William's intrigues or by the character of the Princes to whom they applied, but Swend of Denmark seemed likely to embrace their cause.

On his return, William found that although his lieutenants had repressed actual insurrections, the unconquered districts both of the North and West of England were gloomy and threatening. Want of union was still the bane of the English; the insurrection of Exeter and the West had been suppressed before York and the North moved. The party of Harold and his family was strong in Exeter and the Western shires. At Exeter, indeed, it

William revisits
Normandy.

Misgovernment
by his viceroys and consequent rebellion.

William
returns.

is probable that what remained of the family of Godwine was at this time collected. William marched against the city, harrying Dorset as he passed. The position of Exeter was characteristic. As in the case of the great earldoms, so in that of the great cities, the feeling of local independence had been rising, and the chief men of Exeter seem to have had some thought of making their city a free town. They offered to own the King's supremacy and to pay his taxes, but refused to admit him within their walls. The one point of William's policy which is most prominent is his determination to establish the strength of the monarchy, as against local interests. He therefore rejected the proposition, and marched upon the city. The civic chiefs offered to submit, but the people repudiated their arrangements, and stood the siege. The city was captured by means of a mine. Harold's family fled—Gytha, his mother, to the islands in the Bristol Channel, his sons to Ireland. As usual, a castle was built in the city; the tribute of the town considerably increased; both Devonshire and Cornwall completely subdued, and the same process of partial confiscation which had marked the first steps of the Conqueror carried out there. The earldom of Cornwall, and a large quantity of property, was given to Robert of Mortain, William's half-brother. The conquest of the West was completed by the subjugation of Gloucestershire and Worcestershire.

This insurrection was hardly over when a general confederation against the Conqueror was set on foot in the North. Edwin and Morkere, and Eadgar, the nominal king, combined with Eadric the Forester, and had good hopes of assistance from the Welsh, from Malcolm Canmore of Scotland, and from Swend of Denmark. This help was not forthcoming; civil war hindered the Welsh, and Malcolm and Swend were not ready. The feeling against the Normans was, however, very strong, many of the inhabitants of Yorkshire taking to the woods rather than submit. The insurrection was a failure. Again Edwin and Morkere showed complete want of energy, submitted, and were received into favour. Such a desertion destroyed all unity of action; their armies dispersed to their own homes. A certain number of the insurgents retired and held Durham, others took refuge in Scotland, but William found no opposition; York submitted, and the usual castle, the constant badge of conquest, was built there. On his homeward march through Lincolnshire, the town of Lincoln and that part of England was in the West.

Insurrection
Taking of Exeter.

Insurrection in the North.

William's position in the North and West.

also subjugated, while, at the same time, Malcolm of Scotland sent an embassy, and commended himself to William. At the close of 1068 William was actual possessor of England as far northward as the Tees; but Cheshire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, and part of Herefordshire were still unconquered; Durham, Northumberland, and Scotland were his only by the tie of homage.

At this time it is said that a considerable number of his Norman followers, disliking to leave their homes so long, returned to Normandy, throwing up their estates in England. This movement has been exaggerated, as Hugh de Grantmesnil, who is mentioned as the leader of the returning Normans, undoubtedly held property in England afterwards. It is, however, probable that some returned, for William at this time discharged many of his mercenaries, acting henceforward more completely as English king.

At the midwinter meeting of the Witan he proceeded to act as though the North was completely conquered, and granted the earldom of Northumberland, vacant by the flight of Gospatric, to his follower Robert de Comines. But the reception of this new earl showed how unsubdued as yet the northern earldom was. He reached Durham, and was received by the Bishop Æthelwine; but when his troops treated the city as though they had conquered it, the inhabitants rose and put him and his men to death. The spirit of insurrection spread, and the citizens of York at once also rose and slew one of the commanders there, Robert Fitz-Richard. This blow, which seems to have been concerted, was immediately followed by the return of Eadgar and the other exiles from Scotland. William hurried thither in person, re-established his authority, and built a second castle, which he put into the hands of William Fitz-Osbern. He then withdrew into the West of England, conscious probably that the Northern insurrection was only one of his dangers, for Swend of Denmark had at length sent a fleet to the assistance of the English, the sons of Harold were landing in Devonshire, and Eadric the Wild was threatening the north-west of his dominions. In fact, we have in this year the great final struggle of the English, and the Norman dominions were assaulted upon all sides.

As usual, however, the want of proper concert and of any acknowledged and heroic leader rendered the English efforts futile. The sons of Harold were disastrously defeated by Count Brian of Brittany, their wandering and ill-disciplined troops conquered in two battles in one day, and they themselves, escaping to Ireland, are heard of no more. This was in July. In September the Danish fleet approached. It touched, but was beaten off, both in Kent and in East Anglia, and finally entered the Humber, where it was joined by the great English exiles. Thence the combined English and Danish army moved upon York, while Eadric, in Staffordshire and the Welsh border, moved forward and besieged Shrewsbury, and the men of the West, though unaided by the sons of Harold, rose and besieged the castle of Montacute in Somersetshire. These two lesser insurrections William could afford to leave to his lieutenants; Bishop Geoffrey of Coutances relieved Montacute, and William Fitz-Osbern and Earl Brian apparently completed the subjugation of the West, compelling Eadric the Forester to retire after he had destroyed Shrewsbury, and re-establishing the Norman influence in Devonshire. William himself hastened to the scene of greatest danger. Already the castles of York were taken, as the story tells us chiefly by the prowess of Waltheof; but having completed this object the army had foolishly dispersed, and the Danes, lying in the Humber, were occupying Lindesey and the north of Lincolnshire. There William's sudden march surprised them, and they were compelled to withdraw to the other side of the Humber. William then set quietly to work, with his army, which had now joined him, at the reconquest of Yorkshire. Staffordshire and Nottingham were secured, and after a lengthened delay at the passage of the Aire, during which he was probably engaged in negotiations with the Danes, he moved on practically unopposed to York. He there re-established his two castles, and proceeded to give the inhabitants of the country a lesson they were not likely to forget. He set to work systematically to lay waste the whole of the territory from the Humber to the Tees. Every house, every store of food, the very cattle themselves were included in the great burning. The completeness of the destruction is marked by the entries of "Waste," following each other in unbroken succession in the Domesday Book. For nine years the country was left untilled, the towns wholly uninhabited, and the few survivors lived like beasts of the field, feeding upon unclean animals, and reduced even, in their utter want, to eat human flesh. Having completed this terrible work, William kept his Christmas in state at York. He pursued his advantage further, and, as the winter went on, advanced and secured the hitherto unconquered town of Durham. The North of England was at length completely conquered.

Revolt in the North.

Futile insurrections against the Normans.

William's devastation in Yorkshire.

Complete subjugation of the North. 1070.

But the North-west, the counties of Cheshire and Shropshire, was still unsubdued, and in the dead of the winter William made his way, in the midst of unspeakable difficulties, through the wild moorland and hill country which joins the Peak district with the higher mountains of the Pennine range. The conquest of Chester, and the ravaging of the neighbouring counties, completed his work. And when, early in the year Osbern, the commander of Swend's fleet, yielding to the diplomacy and bribes of William, sailed away to his own land, the conquest of England may be said to have been finished.

For the moment free from military difficulties, William proceeded to the regulation of his Conquest. He is said now to have re-enacted the laws of Edward, and although it is probably a legend that he issued a complete code of laws, it is likely that he took the opportunity of declaring the re-enactment of existing laws, with such changes as he chose to introduce. Two ordinances which seem to belong to this period exist. One, ordaining that peace and security should be kept between English and Normans, and the laws of Edward, with regard to land and other matters, upheld, with the addition of such as the King had added for the advantage of the English people. The second, enacting a heavy fine for the death of any one of his soldiers, which fine is to be made good by the Hundred in which the murder was committed; this was for the defence of his troops against lawless patriotism, and grew into the law of Englishry, by which an unknown corpse was always presumed to be that of a Frenchman, and the fine inflicted, unless the English nationality of the murdered man was proved.

But William had always kept before him, as an object, the change and reform of the English Church, which till this time had been strictly national, its laws having been enacted by the mixed secular and ecclesiastical Witan, and the bishop having presided side by side with the secular judges in the shire gemot. The intention of William, whose enterprise had been undertaken with the full concurrence of the Roman See, whose interests he, as well as the Normans of Sicily, had much at heart, was to Romanize this national Church. For carrying out that scheme he looked to the gradual displacement of bishops of English birth, whose places could be filled with foreigners. This connection with Rome is marked by the re-coronation of the King in 1070 by the Papal Legates, immediately after which the attack upon the English Church began. The Primate Stigand was the first victim. With him the King had hitherto temporized;

His reform of the Church.
Appointment of foreign Bishops.

Stigand deposed.

when he was charged with holding the See of Winchester with his own archbishopric, with having obtained the Pallium from the false Pope Benedict X., and with having accepted his bishopric during the lifetime of his predecessor Robert. He was deprived of both his bishoprics, and kept a prisoner at Winchester. His brother Æthelmaer was removed from the bishopric of the East Angles. Æthelwine of Durham was also deprived and outlawed, and Ethelric, Bishop of Selsey, deposed. The Archbishopric of York, too, was vacant by the death of Ealdred, so that William had here a good opportunity for carrying out his plans.

The most important appointments were the two archbishoprics. For his new Primate he selected Lanfranc, an Italian priest, at this time Abbot of the little monastery at Bec, whose learning and importance were such that he had already been offered and had refused the Primacy of Normandy. It was not without much show of opposition on his part that he accepted the Archbishopric of Canterbury; but, when once appointed, he proved himself a most efficient instrument in carrying out the plans of the King. To the other vacant bishoprics, in almost every case, chaplains of the King were appointed. The changes thus begun were carried out gradually during the whole reign, and were in fact an offshoot of the great movement for the revival of the Papacy being carried out in Europe by Hildebrand. Having first, for the purposes of centralization, established the supremacy of the See of Canterbury over that of York, Lanfranc set on foot the habit of holding separate ecclesiastical councils after the great National Meetings had been dissolved; the bishops withdrew from the county court, and established ecclesiastical courts of their own; as far as possible regular canons were put in the place of the secular canons, of whom many of the chapters consisted; and although the archbishop had sufficient sense to tolerate those of the clergy who were already married, for the future such marriages were strictly prohibited.

The effect of such legislation was to separate the clergy from the laity, and to connect the Church much more nearly with Rome. This policy, which in after times was the source of so much evil, was rendered harmless during the reign of William by his great power and decision. He always claimed the position of supreme head of the Church in England, nor would he suffer any encroachments from the Papal See. On more than one occasion he exhibited this determination. To the end of his reign

But William
still head of the Church.

- he insisted upon giving the ring and staff to his bishops. He would
- not allow any of his soldiers to be excommunicated without his leave, and when Hildebrand, occupying the Papal throne as Gregory VII., demanded that he should both pay Peter's pence and declare himself the Pope's man, he replied, the money he would pay, as his predecessors had, that the homage he would refuse, as he had neither himself
- promised it, nor had his predecessors paid it. In many respects the

The change good on the whole.

change was doubtless for the better. The bishops were on the whole more learned men, and education was improved. The spirit of self-denial for the sake of the Church, and the consequent establishment of foundations and cathedrals, was revived, and the Church, brought into better discipline, was more able to play its proper part of mediator and peace-maker in an age of violence. The distribution of patronage was not, however, without its dark side. In many instances ecclesiastical position was given in reward of services to men qualified rather to be soldiers than clergymen; and complaints exist of the tyrannical manner in which these soldier-abbots or bishops behaved to their English inferiors.

The conquest of England was completed, as we have seen, in 1070. But it was six years more before William enjoyed the throne in peace. The remnant of the conquered nation gathered around

Final struggle against the Normans under Hereward.
1070.

a national hero, called Hereward, in the Fen country. His origin is not certain, but he seems to have been a Lincolnshire man who had been deprived of his property by a Norman intruder. He first appears as assailing with a host of outlaws the monastery of Peterborough, where one of those soldier abbots just mentioned, Turolf by name, had been lately appointed. He is next heard of when, in 1071, the Earls Edwin and Morkere, who had seen the destruction of their old earldoms, while living in inglorious ease, half prisoners half guests at the Norman court, at length awoke from their lethargy and attempted to renew the war. Edwin was killed as he fled, stopped by the flooding of some river; Morkere succeeded in joining the insurgents at Ely. Hereward's fastness was known by the name of the Camp of Refuge. There were collected many of the noblest of the old English exiles; and legend speaks of the presence of several people who were undoubtedly not there; but, at all events, Æthelwine, the deposed Bishop of Durham, was with the patriots.

The attack was intrusted to William of Warenne, Earl of Surrey, and Ivo of Taillebois, under the superintendence of William himself, who came to Cambridge. The difficulties of the situation were overcome by the building of a great causeway across the fens. The defence of the camp is described as lengthened and heroic, but before the end of the year it seems to have been captured, and Morkere and Æthelwine both prisoners. Hereward himself escaped, and in 1073 is mentioned as leading the English contingent in William's attack on Maine. The legend describes how, while living in peace with the king, he was surprised at his meals by a band of Normans, and after a terrific combat, in which he slew fifteen or sixteen Frenchmen, was finally overpowered by numbers. In sober fact, his end seems to have been peaceful, as he appears in Domesday Book as holding property both in Worcester and Warwick.

From the English William had no further trouble; with the neighbouring kingdoms he had still some difficulties. With the Britons in Wales, the old Earls of Mercia and the house of Leofric had had friendly connection; but all sign of this had ceased upon the Conquest. The wars carried on against them were however local in character; for, contrary to his usual practice, William had established upon the West March two palatine counties of Chester and Shrewsbury. In these counties the whole of the land belonged to the earl and his tenants, and the king had no domain. They were, therefore, like the great feudal holdings of France. Chester he at first placed in the hands of Gerbod the Fleming, his stepson, and, upon his withdrawal to the Continent, in those of Hugh of Avranches, surnamed Lupus, a man of whom the chroniclers speak much evil as at once licentious and tyrannical. Together with his lieutenant, Robert of Rhuddlan, he waged continual war with the Welsh. The same task fell to Roger of Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, who took advantage of the disputes among the Welsh Princes, and succeeded so far as to build and hold, far in Wales, the castle of Montgomery, called after his own property in the neighbourhood of Lisieux in Normandy.

Malcolm Canmore had throughout appeared as the supporter of the conquered English, and at his court the exiles had been constantly received. This did not prevent him from pushing his ravages into the Northern counties; nor did they cease when he received Eadgar Ætheling and his sisters on their flight to the North (1070). This was followed by acts of extraordinary barbarity. Gospatric, who had found favour with William, and accepted the Earldom of Northumberland, attempted a counter invasion into the Scotch district of Cumberland. In rage

William con-
quers him.
1071.

Wales held in check by the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury.

Scotland's savage invasions.

at this Malcolm gave orders to spare neither sex nor age. The old and the infants were slaughtered, the able-bodied men and maidens were carried off into slavery, so that there were few Scotch villages where there were not English slaves. Malcolm, however, grew milder under the influence of his wife Margaret, Eadgar's sister, and the effect of the presence of the numerous English, either refugees or slaves, was such that the Lowlands became thoroughly Anglicised.

In 1072, William himself revenged the inroad of the year 1070, by marching into Scotland and receiving the oath of fealty of Malcolm at Abernethy on the Tay. It is mentioned that the last great noble who had held out against him, Eadric the Wild, accompanied him on this expedition, which marks not only the Conquest of England, but the assumption on the part of William of that Imperial position in Great Britain which the great English kings had held.

His foreign neighbours also gave William some trouble. The province of Maine, which he had conquered in 1063, threw off his allegiance. The citizens of Le Mans had risen in insurrection against their lords, and formed themselves into a free commune; but Geoffrey of Mayenne, a nobleman whose help they had sought, betrayed the burghers in their efforts to reduce one of the neighbouring nobility, and they were obliged to call in the assistance of Fulk of Anjou, who had claims upon the province. William reduced Le Mans, but was obliged to make a peace with Fulk, who had strengthened himself by an alliance with the Bretons; and, by the treaty of Blanchelande, William's son Robert took the government of Maine, but did homage for it to Anjou.

While affairs on the Continent were thus occupying his attention, in 1075 a conspiracy of his own nobles in England broke out. Ralph of Gwader (or Wader), the son of Ralph the Staller and a Breton lady, had been intrusted with the Earldom of Norfolk. Roger, the son of William Fitz-Osbern, had succeeded to the Earldom of Hereford. These two nobles sought to ally their houses, and, against the will of William, Ralph married Emma, Roger's sister. At the bridal feast Waltheof of Nottingham, the one remaining English Earl, was present, and there a conspiracy was entered into, apparently on account of the strong hold which William kept over his nobles, and in the interests of more perfect feudalism. The kingdom was to be divided among the three earls, one of whom was to be king. Waltheof had been well treated

William makes Malcolm swear fealty.
1072.

Trouble in Normandy.
1075.

Conspiracy of Norman nobles suppressed.
1076.

by the King, and married to his niece Judith. His conscience seems to have pricked him, and he confessed all to Lanfranc, at that time governing England. The conspiracy was at once suppressed; Norwich alone, under Emma, the new married bride, made a brave defence. Ralph fled to Brittany. Roger was taken prisoner, and spent his life in captivity. Waltheof was at first received into favour, but afterwards, it is believed at the instigation of his wife, he was tried before the Witan and found guilty of death. The sentence was executed in secret outside the town of Winchester. During his imprisonment the Earl's penitence had been deep, and it was while still on his knees uttering the Lord's Prayer that the impatient executioner smote off his head. The national hero, dying in this religious state of mind, speedily became the national saint. His remains were removed to Crowland, which he had much benefited, and miracles were worked at his tomb. The confiscation of the property of these two earldoms, and the death of Queen Edith, the widow of the Confessor, threw great property into the hands of William, who did not reappoint to the earldoms.

From this time onward William lived generally in Normandy, leaving England to the care of Lanfranc and Odo of Bayeux. The great success of his reign had indeed been reached, and the remaining years were disturbed by constant disputes with his sons and with his suzerain the King of France. Already, when pursuing Ralph of Gwader on his retreat into Brittany, and besieging him in the town of Dol, he had found himself checked by the union of Philip of France with Alan Fergant of Brittany, and had found it advisable to marry his daughter Constance to that nobleman as the price of peace. So, too, to lessen the jealousy the King of France might naturally have felt at his vassal's great aggrandisement, he had made the Norman barons swear fealty to his son Robert as his heir, and had caused him to do homage in his place for Maine. Robert desired to make this nominal position real; and, as a part of the same feudal movement perhaps which produced the conspiracy of 1075, he demanded Normandy and Maine of his father. His demand was refused; and when, during an expedition of William against the Count of Mortagne, an accidental quarrel arose between Robert and his brothers, in company with many of the younger nobility he broke into open rebellion. With these, after an unsuccessful attempt at Rouen, he fled to Hugh of Neufchâtel. Beaten thence, he wandered from court to court, assisted by his mother Matilda, against William's will. At length he found an ally executed.

Waltheof
1076.

Quarrels between William and his sons.

in Philip, who established him in 1079 in Gerberoi, near the borders of Normandy. It was there that father and son met face to face, and that William was unhorsed by Robert. The siege of Gerberoi had to be raised, and William underwent the humiliation of seeking a reconciliation with his son, a reconciliation which was of short duration, as in 1080 Robert again fled from court.

In all directions ill success was attending William. He had been defeated at Dol and at Gerberoi; his son Robert in the period between his two quarrels had failed in an expedition against Scotland; he had just lost his son Richard in the New Forest; and in 1083 he lost his wife, to whom he was deeply attached. Meanwhile Odo had been ruling with extreme severity. In suppressing an insurrection in Northumberland he had been guilty of extortion and of cruel punishment even of the innocent. In his general government he seems to have been extremely avaricious. In the year 1082 his wealth and pride had risen to such a point that he thought of attaining to the Papacy. This he intended to secure by violent means. He purchased a magnificent palace in Rome to win the favour of the people, and even collected an army, in which Hugh of Chester took service, to cross the Apennines. William met him and apprehended him at the Isle of Wight; nor could the complaints of the Pope, which we cannot conceive to have been very earnest, produce any effect. He was seized, as the King affirmed, not as Bishop but as Earl of Kent, and remained in prison till the King's death. Odo's oppressions had been very severe, and the condition of England no doubt had become much worse since the complete subjugation of the country, and now, in addition to a famine which had just wasted the country, a heavy direct tax was laid on all land, and worse than that, a vast host of foreign mercenaries was quartered on all the King's tenants, for a great danger was threatening.

Cnut was on the throne of Denmark. He had been one of the commanders in Swend's disastrous expeditions; he had married Adela the daughter of Robert of Flanders, one of William's chief Continental enemies, and had now determined to invade England. He had induced the King of Norway to join him, and their combined fleets were expected. William took ruthless precautions against his enemies. The old tax of the Danegelt was reimposed, and all the land along the coast was laid waste. The people were even ordered to shave and change their dresses, that the Danes might not easily recognize them. Disputes at Gerberoi.

Reconciliation
1079.

Odo's oppressive government.

Cnut's threatened invasion.
1064.

among the leaders, and the death of Cnut, prevented the invasion. But it was probably the difficulties which William had found in collecting his taxes and troops on this occasion which induced him to set on foot the great survey which produced the Domesday Book. For this purpose commissioners were appointed, who went through England, and in each shire inquired of the sheriff, priests, reeves, and representatives of the inhabitants, the condition of the land and its value, as compared with what it had been in the reign of the Confessor. The whole of this great work was completed in one year. On its completion a great assembly was held on Salisbury Plain. It was, in fact, a vast review, attended by no less than 60,000 persons. In this assembly was passed the important ordinance which ordered that every man should be not only the man of his immediate lord, but also the man of the king. This was in direct opposition to the usual rule in feudal countries. The whole assembly took the oath to William. This great piece of work, which rendered England one nation, was a fitting conclusion to William's reign.

In the following year a war broke out for the possession of the Vexin claimed by the King of France. Angered by a coarse jest of that monarch, William entered the country and ruthlessly ravaged it, and, at the destruction of the town of Mantes, his horse stepped upon a burning coal and threw him forward upon the pommel of the saddle; the bulk of the King aggravated the injury, which in a few days caused his death. Before he died he released his prisoners. No sooner had the breath left his body than his attendants are said to have fled. He owed his burial not to his son, but to the kind offices of a neighbouring knight, and when brought to his Church of St. Stephen's at Caen, it was not till the clergy had paid the price of the grave that Anselm Fitz-Arthur, whose property had been seized to make room for the Church, would allow his body to be buried.

The Domesday Book.
1085.

William's death and burial.
1087. Sept. 9.

WILLIAM II.

1087—1100.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Malcolm III., 1057. Donald Bane, 1093. Duncan, 1094. Donald Bane, 1094. Edgar, 1097.	Philip I., 1060.	Henry IV., 1056.	Alphonso VI., 1072.

POPES.—Urban II., 1088. Pascal II., 1099.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Lanfranc, 1070—1089. Anselm, 1093—1109.	Odo of Bayeux, 1087. William de S. Carlepho, 1088. Ranulf Flambard, 1094.	William Giffard, 1087. Robert Bloett, 1090. Waldric, 1093. William Giffard, 1094.

WHILE the late King was on his deathbed, he had been induced to declare his wishes with regard to his kingdoms. In pursuance, perhaps, of a wise policy, and with the wish to keep up and increase the nationality of England, he gave his hereditary dominions to his son Robert, England to his second son William. He told his son Henry to bide his time, and gave him £5000 in money.

William at once hurried to England to secure his succession, and, winning the support of Lanfranc, was in less than three weeks crowned by him. At Winchester he found the King's treasure, from which he distributed gifts among the churches in England, and a sum of money for the poor in every shire. A promise of laws more just and mild than their forefathers had known, attached the English to him for a time. Thus supported by the Church and by the conquered people, who could not but rejoice at the separation of England from Normandy, it was only the Norman Baronage he had to fear.

In Normandy the character of the new Duke Robert, who was a

1088]

NORMAN OPPOSITION

57

mere knight-errant, induced the great nobility to get rid of the royal garrisons from their castles, and otherwise to establish their feudal independence. A similar movement was begun in England, where Odo of Bayeux, liberated at the late King's death, had returned to his county of Kent, and now found himself at the head of a strong party who disliked the separation of their conquered possessions from their hereditary property. Among the adherents of the party we find such names as the two great bishops, Geoffrey of Coutances and William of Durham, Robert, Count of Mortain, Roger of Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, his son Robert of Belesme, and Hugh of Grantmesnil, with others. Odo occupied the castle of Rochester, and against it William led a body of English, collected by a threat that all who had remained behind should be proclaimed "nithing," or worthless. The efforts of the discontented barons in other parts of England were checked, and finally the castle of Rochester was captured. Odo of Bayeux and the Normans of the garrison were allowed to march out, which they did amid the revillings of the besiegers, and to retire to France. The King thus secured his position in England.

He had hitherto been kept in some restraint by the influence of Lanfranc; but when that prelate died in 1089, his coarse, licentious, sceptical and avaricious character began to display itself. His chief minister was Ralph Flambard, a Churchman, who, like many others, was of low parentage, but who seems to have recommended himself to William by his skill as a financier. One of the plans attributed to him was a more accurate completion of the Domesday survey, and the measurement of the hides of land there returned. This would have been harmless enough, but there must have been many other more flagrant exactions, though very likely covered by some form of law, to account for the hatred with which he was regarded. Although his office is not mentioned, he was probably justiciary.

While England was groaning under the exactions of this man, so that "men would rather wish to die, than to live under his power," the attention of the King was chiefly engaged in intrigues with the nobles of Normandy. The easy character of Duke Robert, and the rising anarchy among the nobles, afforded abundant opportunity. On one occasion it was the citizen Conan of Rouen with whom he was in correspondence; and when this plot was discovered, and Prince Henry, at that time acting with Duke Robert, had thrown the traitor from the cathedral tower, it was a quarrel between Grantmesnil and Curci on the one side, and Robert of Belesme on the other, which gave him an opportunity of mixing in the affairs of the duchy. In 1091, however, the brothers came to an agreement, and a treaty was made at Caen, by which they engaged that the survivor should succeed to the possessions of his brother; and meanwhile Eu, Fécamp, Mont S. Michel, Cherbourg, and some other territories, were given to William, who in return promised to conquer Maine for Robert. Twelve barons of either party swore to the observance of this treaty.

Opposition of the Normans checked. 1088.

Lanfranc dies. Ralph Flambard succeeds him. 1089.

William's quarrels with his brothers in Normandy. 1090.

Prince Henry, finding himself completely ignored by this arrangement, took possession of the rock of St. Michel, and bade defiance to his brothers. After a siege of some duration he was driven thence; but in the general anarchy of the duchy he found a home at Domfront, where the citizens begged him to be their lord, on the condition that he would not give them up to any other. It is doubtful whether he could have kept possession of this strong place, had not William's attention been engaged by the affairs of Scotland.

Malcolm had renewed hostilities, and William found it necessary to march in person against him. His expedition was not successful. The weather destroyed a fleet which accompanied it, and, by its inclemency, caused much loss to his army. His presence, however, was sufficient in some degree to overawe Malcolm; a compromise was effected; Malcolm again did homage, and received back certain properties in England of which he had been deprived, and which were perhaps manors which had been given him as resting-places when he came to do homage to his suzerain. At the same time, William turned aside into the district of Cumberland, which was a dependency of the Scotch crown. He re-established Carlisle, and filled the county with peasants brought from the South of England from destroyed villages in the neighbourhood of Winchester. In this he disregarded the interests of the Scotch King, the immediate lord of the country, who therefore complained, and was invited to meet William at the next assembly at Gloucester. There, on the refusal of William to do him justice, a new quarrel broke out, and Malcolm was shortly afterwards killed, while invading England, at Alnwick, by Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland.

In the neighbourhood of Wales, too, fighting was almost perpetual. Not only did the great Earldoms of Shrewsbury and Chester increase their borders, but many knights took advantage of the

Feb. 1091.

Henry obtains Domfront.

War with Scotland. 1091.

1093.

frequent civil divisions of the Welsh to push westward and set up their castles. The course of the war had lately been in favour of the Welsh rather than of the Normans, and in 1095 William thought it necessary to lead an army against them. His attempt was not successful, nor was a repetition of it two years later more so. The nature of the ground was too difficult for the advance of a great army, and William, thus a second time repelled, had again to trust to the self-interest and courage of individual Norman settlers. This plan he strengthened by granting to Normans portions of land as yet unconquered. Thus two members of the house of Montgomery, brothers of Hugh, Earl of Shrewsbury, Roger and Arnulf, did homage for lands in Powys and Dyfed, and Hugh de Lacy for lands to the west of Herefordshire. This guerilla warfare was successful, and Hugh of Chester was just succeeding in winning back Anglesey, which had been taken from him, when an invasion of Magnus of Norway checked for the time the Norman success. The Earl of Shrewsbury, while assisting Hugh of Chester, lost his life, and was succeeded by Robert de Belesme, his brother. On the whole, the English frontier constantly advanced, and the border counties were thronged with castles either of the great Earls or of individual adventurers.

Intrigues and irregular fighting had meanwhile been constant in Normandy. In 1094 King Philip of France had been called in by Robert, but nothing of importance arose from this. But it gave rise to a curious act of extortion on the part of William, who summoned 20,000 men from England, evidently the old English County Militia, and on their arrival at the coast dismissed them, taking from them the ten shillings a head, viaticum, or journey-money, they had received from their counties. In 1095 a great conspiracy of the nobles in England, headed by Mowbray of Northumberland, came to light. Mowbray threw himself into Bamborough castle, which could not itself be taken, but immediately opposite to it another castle, called Malvoisin, was raised, and the garrison of this "ill-neighbour" found means to decoy Mowbray out of his stronghold and to take him prisoner. The danger which threatened William was thus got over; while the following year the object of his wishes came into his hands, when Robert, eager to join a crusade which had just been preached, pledged Normandy to him for the sum of £6,666. His new situation as ruler of Normandy brought William into hostility with the neighbouring countries, and especially with Maine, where Hélié de la Flèche made head against him, and, with the assistance of Fulk IV.

Continued war with Wales. 1094.

Troubles in Normandy 1094.

Conspiracy of Mowbray crushed.

William obtains Normandy from Robert. 1096.

of Anjou, succeeded in beating him off from Le Mans. William's power was now, in spite of this repulse, very great, and the King of France, with whom he became involved in war in 1097 on the old subject of the Vexin, looked with anxiety at the growth of his great vassal, especially when a close friendship arose between him and the Duke of Poitiers and Guienne. This conjunction, giving the English King a grasp of France all round the seaboard, made men believe that his ambition reached to the throne of France, especially as Philip had but one son, Louis. The strange death of William put an end to all such thoughts. He was hunting in the New Forest, whither he had been warned not to go, and there met his death; whether by an accidental arrow from the bow of Walter Tyrrel, or falling forward upon the point of an arrow as he stooped over his prey, or slain by the hands of some of those whom his cruelty and avarice had made his implacable enemies, is uncertain. The flight of his attendants, and the unceremonious treatment of his corpse, seemed to favour the last supposition.

Size of his dominions at his death.
1100.

In spite then of his unamiable character; of the difficulties which had beset him from his somewhat questionable title; of the natural impulse towards feudal isolation of his barons; of troublesome neighbours; and occasional want of success in his expeditions; Rufus had on the whole succeeded in his plans, as far as his external circumstances were concerned. It was in his domestic government, especially with regard to the Church, that his inferiority to his great father is most obvious. Unlike the Conqueror, he was unable to see, or if he saw, to care for the national advantages which sprung from a well-organized Church. With a similar determination to be a perfect king in his own dominions, he asserted that opinion by violent acts against the Church itself, by appointments of the worst description, and by a life from which all show of decency was banished. As long as Lanfranc lived, he kept some restraint upon himself, but upon his death he began to show his real temper.

It was a critical time in the history of the Church. The quarrel about investitures was raging in Europe. The skill of Lanfranc and the power of the Conqueror had, as we have seen, prevented the quarrel from reaching England during that King's reign; and to the end of Gregory's life, 1085, he had kept up friendly, even flattering, relations with the English King. When Henry IV. had, in 1080, raised the Anti-Pope Guibert to the Papal throne under the name of Clement III., Lanfranc had contrived not

Disputes with
the Church.

Causes of William's inferiority to his father.

to commit himself to either party, but, on the whole, it is probable, that during his life the regular Popes, Victor III. and Urban II., who succeeded him in 1088, were acknowledged in England. On his death advantage was taken of the Schism practically to acknowledge neither Pope, and to leave the abbeys and bishoprics vacant. Indeed, we are told that it was openly asserted that it was a privilege of the King of England to acknowledge the Pope or not as he pleased. Thus for four years the archbishopric was unfilled, along with several other important ecclesiastical preferments, and the want of discipline in the Church grew worse and worse. Ralph Flambard, as administrator of the diocese of Lincoln, was unlimited in his extortions. The Norman Church dignitaries marched between lines of armed men to church. The Bishop of Wells demolished the houses of the canons to build his own palace, and even the religious and moral scruples of the English monks were laughed at by their licentious superiors. In 1093 the King fell very ill, and for the time became repentant and religious; he proceeded to listen to the wishes of his people and fill up the vacant appointments. The most important of these was the archbishopric. For this post he selected Anselm of Aosta, Abbot of Bec. This man was a Piedmontese, who had been attracted to Normandy by the fame of Lanfranc, and had entered the Abbey of Bec under him. Upon Lanfranc's removal to Caen he was made Prior, and afterwards Abbot. Both his character and attainments commanded the veneration of the age; and at the present time he had been invited by Hugh the Fat, Earl of Chester, to come over and assist him in establishing a Benedictine abbey at Chester. For this purpose, and charged with a mission from his monastery, he was induced much against his will to come to England. In the first access of the King's repentance—after issuing a royal proclamation promising afresh the freedom of captives, the good laws of King Edward, and the punishment of evil-doers—he proceeded so far to action as to appoint Anselm Archbishop. It was not without something like actual violence that Anselm was forced to accept the Episcopal staff. The great importance of the primacy and Anselm's view of the King's character are well shown by some words that are attributed to him: "England's plough is drawn by two supereminent oxen, the King and the Archbishop of Canterbury. . . . Of these oxen one is dead, and the other, fierce as a savage bull, is yoked young to the plough, and in place of the dead ox you would yoke me a poor feeble old sheep with vacant.

Bishoprics left

Repenting after illness, he makes Anselm
Archbishop.

Anselm unwill-ingly accepts.
1093.

the wild bull." The feeble old sheep, however, was a very decided ecclesiastic. He insisted at once upon the restoration of the whole of the lands of the See of Canterbury, more even than Lanfranc had held. He declared that he would publicly acknowledge Pope Urban. And when, after his consecration, on his presenting the King with £500 of silver, the King demanded £1000, he withdrew his intended present and distributed all to the poor. Nor was it as a defender of ecclesiastical rights that he was pre-eminent. He set himself to check as far as it was possible the shameless and abominable vice that was rampant in England. Among other signs of the degraded licentiousness of the times was the effeminate foppiness of the courtiers. Against their long hair and sharp-peaked shoes the Archbishop was never weary of inveighing. The King's absence from England put an end for a time to the disputes between the Archbishop and the King, but upon his return Anselm demanded leave to obtain his pall from Pope Urban. This open acknowledgment of the Pope William wished to avoid, and at a council, summoned to consider the matter, the deposition of Anselm appears to have been suggested. The bishops, creatures of the King, basely deserted their chief; and the wisdom of the Baronage of England, under the guidance of Robert, Count of Mellent, who throughout this and the preceding reign appears as the good adviser to the sons of the Conqueror, alone saved him from that disgrace. Unable to refuse Anselm's wish absolutely, the King contrived to persuade the Pope to send him the pall, but Anselm stoutly refused to receive it from secular hands, and ultimately triumphed so far as to be allowed to take it himself from the high altar of the Cathedral of Canterbury.

For the moment the primate was triumphant, the cowardly bishops sought his absolution. Bishops which fell vacant were at once filled up. The Irish and Scotch prelates acknowledged Anselm's superiority. But William, cunning and implacable, was not to be thus foiled. If the churchman could not be touched, the feudal tenant could; and Anselm was accused of insufficient performance of his duty in supplying military followers for an expedition into Wales. In 1097, unable to withstand the royal violence, he left England, and made his way to Rome. He there was present at two great councils, that of Bari in 1098, where the orthodox doctrine as to the Holy Ghost was established; and one at Rome in 1099, where a curse was laid on all laymen who conferred ecclesiastical investitures and upon all churchmen who received them. Upon William's death Anselm returned to England.

HENRY I.

1100–1135.

Born 1068 = Matilda of Scotland.

William, Duke of Normandy.
d. 1119.Henry V. = Matilda = Geoffrey of Anjou.
d. 1167.

Henry II.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Edgar, 1097.	Philip I., 1060.	Henry IV., 1056.	Alphonso VI., 1072
Alexander I., 1106.	Louis VI., 1108.	Henry V., 1106.	Alphonso VII., 1109.
David I., 1124.		Lothaire II., 1125.	Alphonso VIII., 1134.

POPES.—Pascal II., 1099. Gelasius II., 1118. Calixtus II., 1119. Honorius II., 1124.
Innocent II., 1130.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Anselm, 1093–1109.	Robert Bloett, 1100.	William Giffard, 1100.
Ralph of Escures, 1114– 1122.	Roger the Poor, Bishop of Salisbury, 1107.	Roger the Poor, 1101.
William of Corbeil, 1123– 1135.		William Giffard, 1103.
		Waldric, 1104.
		Ranulf, 1108.
		Geoffrey Rufus, 1124.

HENRY had been hunting in the New Forest when his brother William was killed, and rode at once to Winchester to secure the King's treasure. As the rights of primogeniture had not yet been established, and he was very obviously a fitter man to be King than his brother Robert, the slight opposition offered by the treasurer was speedily overruled, and the Sunday following (August 5, 1100) he was crowned at Westminster. To secure his position, however, he found it necessary to conciliate all parties. The Church he won by the immediate filling of vacant sees, and by the recall of the exiled

Henry secures the Crown.
1100.

He conciliates
all classes.

Anselm. William Giffard, the chancellor of Rufus, was made Bishop of Winchester; Girard of Hereford, Archbishop of York; while both Norman and Saxon laity were bound to him by a charter, by which he laid some constitutional restrictions upon the despotism established by his father. In that charter he promised to abolish all oppressive duties, and to confine his demands to his just claims as feudal lord; rendering the same agreement obligatory on his tenants towards their vassals. False coining was checked, the right of leaving personal property by will granted, and the law of King Edward, which meant the old institutions of the country, re-established. He likewise thought it well to win the heart of the people by marrying a Princess of English descent, Matilda, niece of Eadgar Ætheling, daughter of Margaret and Malcolm of Scotland. Further to show his disapproval of his brother's policy, he arrested Ralph Flambard, who, however, found means to escape to Normandy, and was made Bishop of Lisieux.

Henry had thus declared the policy he intended to pursue, the policy of his father rather than of his brother. He meant to be at once a friend and master of the Church, and a national sovereign of the English, a character which became a prince who had been born in that country. That position implied a power much more centralized than that of a feudal suzerain; and in England his chief policy was directed throughout his reign to upholding his mastery over the Church and over refractory barons who aimed at more perfect feudalism. He was in heart however a Norman, and, in pursuit of his objects, did not shrink from using his English subjects with great severity. Similarly, his chief foreign difficulties were produced by his wish to win the Duchy of Normandy, and having won it to rule it in the same masterful spirit in which he ruled England. We find then in his reign ecclesiastical disputes, disputes with the feudal barons of both England and Normandy, wars for the conquest of the duchy, and consequent complications with his suzerain the King of France. Mixed with these are stories, chiefly from Saxon sources, of cruel and unjust exactions and acts of injustice, tolerated, if not ordered, against his Saxon subjects.

His views found supporters in the two sons of that Roger de Beaumont, to whom his father had left the regency of Normandy when he first came to England. These were the two great Earls, Robert, Count of Mellent,¹ afterwards Earl Leicester, and his younger brother Henry, Earl of Warwick, the elder of whom had received no less than ninety-one manors from the Conqueror, and was the most influential and wisest statesman of the day. On the other hand, he was constantly opposed by his brother Robert, a military prince of the feudal type, and Robert de Belesme of the House of Montgomery, possessor of the Earldoms of Alençon in France and of Shrewsbury in England, and by right of marriage of the county of Ponthieu.

¹ Called also Count of Meulan.

His policy.

His supporters.

Robert heard of his brother's accession to the throne while on his journey home from the Holy Land. He had served with credit throughout the first crusade, especially at Dorylæum and at Ascalon. He had declined the offer of the crown of Jerusalem, and on his return home had married Sibylla, the daughter of Geoffrey of Conversana. He was a man of extravagant and profligate habits, and speedily squandered the fortune which his wife had brought him, but the entreaties of English exiles, and of those discontented nobles who longed for an easier rule than they could expect from Henry, roused him to assert his claim to the English crown. Robert of Belesme and his brothers, Walter Giffard, Robert Malet, Ivo of Grantmesnil, even William of Warrenne, Earl of Surrey, closely connected with the royal house, joined his party.

But the English were true to the King. Fitz-Hamon, Bigot, and the Earl of Mellent, added their influence to the same side. It was probably chiefly the talents of Mellent, and the threat of excommunication from Archbishop Anselm, which brought about a peaceful solution of the difficulty. A treaty was arranged by which Robert renounced his claims in exchange for the Cotentin and 3000 marks a year. It was also stipulated that a complete amnesty should be extended to the partisans of either prince in his brother's country. It was not Henry's intention however to carry out this part of the stipulation, and no sooner had Robert left the country than the King proceeded to take steps against the two leaders of his brother's faction, Ivo of Grantmesnil and Robert of Belesme. Ivo had been a crusader, and was one of those who had fled from the siege of Antioch, being let down the wall with a rope. He had thus earned the title among the witty Normans of the "Rope-dancer," and finding his credit gone he withdrew from England. His share in the earldom of Leicester was given to Robert of Mellent, who subsequently acquired the rest of the earldom. Alarmed by these measures of the King, William de Warrenne induced Robert foolishly to come over to

His opponents.

Robert of Normandy seeks the English Crown. 1101.

Withdraws without bloodshed.

Henry attacks his partisans.

England to negotiate for the safety of his partisans. His position there was one of great jeopardy, and he was glad to retire, having renounced his money payment, but having secured the restitution of William in his Earldom of Surrey, of which he had been deprived. The withdrawal of Robert from the contest allowed Henry to turn his undivided attention to the destruction of Robert de Belesme, the head of the Norman party in England. From him he won the Defeat of Belesme.

Establishment of royal power
in England.

castles of Nottingham and Tickhill, and subsequently that of Bridgenorth, to which he had retreated. When many of the barons combined to seek his pardon, Henry, still resting on the support of the English, refused to listen to them, and proceeded to win from him his last stronghold, the Castle of Shrewsbury. Upon this Belesme withdrew with his two brothers into Normandy, and the disaffection of the aristocracy was permanently checked.

It had been stipulated that the brothers should not receive each other's exiles. In spite of this Robert of Normandy, enraged at the persecution of his partisans, restored to Belesme his continental property. Henry consequently on his side continued his measures against Robert's partisans. He first banished the Count of Mortain, Earl of Cornwall, who claimed also the Earldom of Kent in succession to Odo of Bayeux, the possession of which would have rendered him the most powerful noble in England, and then proceeded to Normandy to continue his attacks upon Belesme. He alleged not only the reception of his exiles, but the general misgovernment of Robert, as an excuse for his proceedings; and in truth, under that Prince, Normandy had become a scene of anarchy. As an instance of this it is mentioned, that on his arrival a church was pointed out to him full of property sent there for safety from the hands of the marauding barons. He captured the towns of Caen and Bayeux, and found allies in the persistent enemies of the Dukes of Normandy, Fulk Count of Anjou, and Hélie de la Flèche, who had succeeded in regaining the County of Maine. With Count Robert of Flanders also he renewed friendly relations. With such support he proved too strong for the Norman Duke, and before the Castle of Tenchebray a battle was fought, which, though most obstinately contested, ended in favour of the King. Duke Robert himself, the Count of Mortain, and Eadgar Ætheling, who had been serving with the Duke, were taken prisoners. Eadgar was liberated, and died in peace in England some years after; but Duke Robert and the Count of Mortain were imprisoned for the rest of their lives. Normandy and England were thus again united.

Battle of
Tenchebray,
Sept. 28, 1106.

The possession of Normandy brought Henry into more immediate contact with France. Louis VI. was upon the throne of that kingdom, the first of those great kings to whom the monarchy owed its ultimate triumph over feudalism.

Wars with France.
1107.

It was natural that he should look with jealousy on the vast strength of his great vassal, and should attempt to curtail that power which the supineness of his predecessor had allowed to accumulate. A constant border warfare was the consequence, rendered the more possible by the doubtful position of such counties as Maine, Evreux, the Vexin, Blois, and Alençon, the counts of which were for ever changing their allegiance. Louis had no difficulty in finding a pretender to the Norman Duchy whom he might use as his instrument in opposing the English King.

Louis upholds
William Clito as claimant to the Duchy.

William, the son of Robert, had fallen into Henry's hands, and had been by him intrusted to the care of Hélie de St. Saen. In 1110, in connection apparently with a movement of disaffected nobility (for Braiose, Malet, and Bainard are mentioned as being exiled at that time), Hélie fled with the young Prince, and sought to raise all the neighbouring princes in his cause. Their efforts were not successful. Henry's arch-enemy, Robert of Belesme, fell into the King's hands at Bonneville, where he had presented himself with extraordinary effrontery, trusting that a message with which he was charged from the King of France would give him the security due to an ambassador. The same year Theobald of Blois, acting for Henry, defeated the French King at Puyssac. And when Henry himself succeeded in capturing the town of Alençon, and in attaching the Count of Anjou to his interests, by giving him his heir, William the Ætheling, as a husband for his daughter, Louis found it desirable to conclude a peace at Gisors, by which he resigned his claim of suzerainty over Maine, Belesme, and Brittany, and left entirely unmentioned the rights of William, son of Robert. There followed a period of some years, during which Henry was able to live in tolerable peace in England.

End of the war.
Treaty of Gisors.
1113.

His position was, indeed, unusually strong. His son was contracted to the daughter of the Earl of Anjou; his natural daughter to Conan, son of Alan Fergant of Brittany; and, in the following year, his daughter Adelaide or Matilda was married to the German Emperor Henry V. He took this opportunity of securing the succession to his son William, to whom, in the years 1115-1116, he succeeded in inducing the barons both of England and Normandy to promise their allegiance. But this cessation of hostilities was not of long duration.

Prince William acknowledged heir.

The causes of war had not been removed. There was still chronic disaffection among the Norman barons, who disliked the firmness of Henry's rule; constant jealousy upon the part of the French King; and the Pretender William, the Clito as he is called, was an ever-ready instrument for their hands. Thus the border warfare was renewed, and we hear of the disaffection, not only of the King's great barons, but of his allies, both Robert of Flanders and Fulk of Anjou adopting William's cause. Other distresses likewise came upon Henry. He lost his wife Matilda, and his firm and sagacious minister, Robert of Mellent. But, in 1118, prosperity again returned to him. The Count of Flanders was killed in an attack upon the Count of Eu. Money or negotiation won back the friendship of Fulk, and in the following year a battle between a few knights at Brenneville, at which both Henry and Louis were present in person, was regarded as so decisive a victory for the English, that, by the mediation of Pope Calixtus, a new Treaty was arranged, and William's interest completely disregarded. Thus was triumphantly closed the second of Henry's wars in France.

Renewal of the war.

Depression of Henry.

Battle of Brenne-ville, and complete prosperity.
1119.

At this period of his greatest prosperity a blow fell upon Henry which he is said never to have recovered. He was returning in triumph to England, when a certain Thomas Fitz-Stephen, whose father had conveyed the Conqueror to England, claimed the privilege of conveying the royal party. To gratify him, Prince William, with the king's natural daughter Matilda, the Countess of Perche, and other young nobles, consented to embark in his ship called the "Blanche Nef." They remained behind the rest of the fleet and celebrated the occasion in festivity, which ended in the drunkenness of the crew. As they rowed from the harbour of Barfleur in the moonlight they suddenly struck upon the rocks of the Ras de Catte, and there was barely time for the young Prince to escape in a boat from the sinking ship. The cries of his sister are said to have induced William to return towards the wreck, when the hurried rush of the despairing crew capsized his boat, and all on board were drowned. Of the whole crew of the ship

Death of Prince
William and its consequences.
1120.

one only, Berold, a butcher of Rouen, survived, owing his safety to the warmth afforded him by his rough garb of undressed sheepskins. With fear and trembling the news was broken to Henry by the young son of Count Theobald of Blois. Henry is said to have fallen fainting from his seat, and from that time onwards never to have relaxed into a smile.

The death of Prince William was not only a domestic misfortune. By it was broken also the tie which bound the Count of Anjou to Henry's interests. It was a natural jealousy of his great neighbour, the Norman Duke, which had induced Fulk to act in alliance with Henry. When Robert's imprisonment put Henry on the throne of Normandy, he in turn became the object of Fulk's enmity. The state of the Duchy, where a disaffected party constantly existed, afforded him ample opportunity of giving effect to that enmity. Thus, in 1124, Henry was again recalled to Normandy to suppress a rebellion in favour of William Clito, who was supported by Anjou. Not only Anjou but France was inclining to join the rebels, and it was only by instigating his son-in-law the Emperor to attack France that Henry could manage to make head against his opponents. As it was, however, a fortunate surprise by which all the leaders fell into his hands enabled him to crush the rebellion, and again induced the foreign powers to desert William. The King of France indeed did not wholly give him up; but in 1127, after investing him with several important territories, he brought him forward as a claimant to the throne of Flanders, to which he had a claim through his grandmother, Matilda, the Conqueror's wife, who was a daughter of Baldwin, Count of Flanders. Against him Henry supported the claims of Diederik or Dirk, Count of Alsace, the last count's nephew, and his rightful heir. The matter came to war, and in July 1128, before Alost, Prince William was wounded, and died of his wounds. Henry was thus rid of his most formidable opponent.

Insurrection of the Duke of Anjou.

Death of William Clito.

It remained for him to secure the succession for his daughter Matilda, and he induced all the great men of England to acknowledge her, and swear to support her claims. The list of those who swore was headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, followed by the King's nephew, Stephen of Boulogne, and his natural son, Robert of Gloucester. They always declared that they accepted the oath on the condition that she should not be married to a foreigner without their consent, and therefore many of them held themselves absolved from their

Attempt to secure the succession to Matilda.

oath, when she was betrothed and ultimately married to Geoffrey, son of the Count of Anjou.

The close of his reign was chiefly occupied in arranging disputes in consequence of this marriage. It was while still in Normandy on this business, though his presence was imperatively demanded in England to suppress an insurrection in Wales, that he died, as it is said, of the effects of a hearty meal of lampreys on the 1st of December 1135.

Throughout the reign he had had considerable difficulties with the Welsh, for although, as has been said, many Norman knights and barons had established strongholds among them, they were by no means subdued. They took part in the insurrection of Robert of Belesme; and Henry, conscious that they would be difficult to conquer, hit upon the plan of establishing among them colonies of Flemings, many of whom had come over with the Conqueror, and still more about the year 1106, driven from their country by inundations. The land granted them was in the western part of Wales, near Haverfordwest and Tenby, where they acted at once as a military post, and, through their knowledge of manufacture and agriculture, as an instrument of civilization. In 1114 the Welsh rose under Gryffith. The occupation of Caermarthen and Cardigan, where Gilbert Strongbow, Earl of Strigul, was at that time commanding, separated the Flemings from the English, and Henry was compelled to march to their rescue. This insurrection was suppressed by Robert of Gloucester, himself perhaps the son of Gryffith's sister.¹ Small insurrections continued. In 1122 Henry again went in person to Wales, but, on the whole, the inhabitants were kept in subjection by the Flemings and by numerous Norman castles till 1134, when they were provoked to a new outbreak, so important that the King was preparing to cross from Normandy to suppress it, when he died.

At home the great points of Henry's reign were those which form the domestic history of all feudal monarchies, the relation of the Church and State, and the maintenance of police. With regard to the Church his views were those of his father. He was ready to support and increase its influence; he was not ready to give up any of the prerogatives which his predecessors had possessed. He thus reversed all the action of his brother, recalled Anselm at once with marked honour, and filled up the vacant benefices. But the Archbishop during his exile had mixed in Continental politics, at that time consisting almost entirely of the question of investitures. He returned home determined to assert to the full the independence of the Church. He therefore refused to swear fealty, and do homage to the King, Anselm refuses fealty. or to consecrate those bishops who had received their investitures from him. Henry, supported by his lay counsellors, was equally determined to uphold the rights of the crown. The matter was referred to the Pope, Pascal II. The Papacy had enemies enough already, and could not afford to drive to extremities a Prince so powerful, and in the main so friendly, as Henry. The reply which was returned was ambiguous. Henry again commanded the Archbishop to perform his usual duties. A second application to Rome produced no better result. Anselm was urged to perseverance. Henry's ambassadors were given to understand that, as long as his appointments were good, the King should not be interfered with. Firm in his own views, but uncertain as to the Pope's wishes, Anselm had no course open to him but to visit Rome in person. He Anselm has to leave England. there met with but lukewarm support, and withdrew to Lyons, while Henry laid hands upon all the revenues of the archbishopric. For some time Anselm rejected all offers of compromise; but when, after all his efforts, he could induce the Pope to go no further than the excommunication, not of the King, but of some of his ministers, he lost heart, and, in 1106, a compromise was arranged at Bec, by which Henry retained the really important part of investiture, the oaths of fealty and homage, while resigning the idle symbol of the gift of ring and crozier. This compromise, which was the same in effect as that made sixteen years afterwards at Worms between Henry V. and Calixtus II., set at rest for the present that rivalry between Church and State which the policy of the Conqueror had introduced. The decrees of a Synod held at Westminster, 1102, by Synod of Westminster. Anselm before going to Rome, show the abuses which the ecclesiastical disputes of the last reign had introduced. They are directed against such habits as simony, marriage of the clergy, the assumption of lay dress by ecclesiastics, the holding of secular courts by bishops, the adoration of unauthorized saints and relics, and vindicate the claims of the Church to be considered as the chief civilizing agent of the time by forbidding the selling of men for slaves.

¹ Her name was Nest. She married Gerald of Windsor, who, as constable of Arnulf of Shrewsbury, commanded the castle of Pembroke. Their grandson was the historian Geraldus Cambrensis. It seems most probable that Robert was not her son. Cf. Freeman, v. 853.

Unsupported by the Pope, makes compromise at Bec. 1106.

It was not always that the Church appeared in such an amiable light. Henry no doubt, on the whole, attempted to make good appointments, but interest or desire to reward an ardent partisan sometimes put an unfit person into office. Thus Henry of Poitou was given the Abbey of Peterborough, although he already held an abbey in France, apparently as a reward for the support he gave the King in upholding the illegality of the marriage between William Clito and Sibylla of Anjou on the score of consanguinity. "He came like a drone to a hive," says the chronicler; "all that the bees draw towards them the drones devour and draw from them, so did he." It is fair to say that Henry, when he found out how bad a person he had appointed, had him removed. "It was not very long after that that the King sent for him, and made him give up the Abbey of Peterborough, and go out of the land." Thus, again, after a great distribution of abbeys in 1107, it is remarked "that the abbots were rather wolves than shepherds." Such complaints are however usually uttered by English writers, and the plight of the conquered people was evidently very miserable.

It was a time of great suffering on more accounts than one, and the suffering was of a kind to fall chiefly upon the lower orders. Agriculture was so rough that any little irregularity in the seasons produced a failure of the crops, and the habits of the people were such that any infectious disease was liable to become a pestilence. The constant warfare, either against his vassals or his enemies, which the King carried on, was the cause of frequent taxation, against which no class in the State had it in their power to remonstrate; while the natural and artificial causes of suffering were further aggravated by the frequent issue of false coin. Thus we find year after year such entries as these in the chroniclers:—"The year 1105 was very miserable, because of the failure of the crops, and the ceaseless taxation." "The year 1110 was full of wretchedness, because of the bad season, and the tribute the King demanded for his daughter's dowry." "In this year (1124) were many failures in England in corn and all fruit, so that between Christmas and Candlemas the acre seed of wheat was sold for six shillings; and that of barley, that is three seedlips for three shillings, the acre seed of oats for four shillings, because there was little corn, and the penny was so bad that a man who had at market a pound could by no means buy therewith twelvepenny-worth." "In this same year

Frequent unfit appointments in the Church. Henry corrects them when possible.

Wretched condition of the people.

Extracts from old chroniclers.

(1125) was so great a flood on St. Lawrence's mass day that many towns and men were drowned, and bridges shattered; corn and meadows totally destroyed, and for all fruits there was so bad a season as there had not been for many years before." "In that year (1131) there was so great a murrain of cattle as never was in the memory of man." This carried off neat, swine, and domestic fowls alike. And when the harvest was good the pestilence came. "This year (1112) was a very good year, and very abundant in wood and field, but it was a very sorrowful one through a most destructive pestilence." Or again, the year 1104, "It is not easy to recount all the miseries the country suffered this year through various and manifold illegalities and imposts which never ceased nor failed, and ever as the King went there was plundering by his followers on his wretched people, and at the same time often burnings and murders."

In these extracts, which might be largely multiplied, the chief causes of the people's misery are mentioned. Heavy taxes, famines, floods, pestilence, false money, and purveyance. To attempt to rectify such of these as were within the power of man, was one main part of Henry's duty. To that was added the work of suppressing, by a centralized royal power, the excesses of the feudal barons. What crying necessity there was that they should be suppressed is made plain by the stories related of Robert of Belesme, their chief. He is spoken of as guilty of the most unheard-of barbarities, as having scorned the ransoms of his captives to torture them by newfangled instruments; he found delight in seeing men and women impaled and struggling in the agonies of death. "He was a man," says William of Malmesbury, "intolerable for the barbarity of his manners, remarkable besides for cruelty;" and, among other instances, he relates how, on account of some trifling fault of its father, he blinded his godchild, who was his hostage, by tearing out the poor little creature's eyes with "his accursed nails."

One complaint of his people Henry systematically disregarded. He could not afford to do without his taxes, and on all classes on this point he leant with a heavy hand. But in other respects, as far as in him lay, he rectified abuses of administration, and established a vigorous and effectual police. The evils of purveyance had become extreme; no property was safe from the hands of the followers of the court, and when they found larger supplies than they wanted, "if it was liquor they washed their horses' feet in it, or food they wantonly destroyed it." But Henry made a regulation for the followers of his court, at whichever of his residences he might be, stating what they should take without payment from the country folk, and how much, and at what price they should purchase, punishing the transgressors by heavy fine or loss of life. So with regard to false coinage, immediately after the complaint of high prices in the year 1124, it is mentioned that Henry at once sent from Normandy to England, and commanded that all the moneymen should have their right hands cut off, and be otherwise mutilated. Bishop Roger of Salisbury sent all over England, commanded them all to come before him, and then and there punished upwards of fifty. Henry was careful, indeed, in other ways with regard to the money, having the whole of the coinage broken to prevent the refusal of broken silver pennies; for it seems to have been the custom to break the coinage to see that the money was good, and tradesmen not unfrequently refused the broken coins.

Their chief complaints.

Baronial tyranny.

Heavy taxation.

Against offences of violence Henry was equally vigorous. At one single court held in Leicestershire by Basset the Justiciary, during the King's absence in 1124, no less than forty-four thieves were condemned and hanged, besides others mutilated. "He sought after robbers and counterfeiters with the greatest diligence, and punished them when discovered," says William of Malmesbury. Rivalling his father also in other respects, he restrained by edict the acts of his courtiers, thefts, rapine, and the violation of women, commanding the delinquents to be deprived of sight. He also displayed singular vigilance against the mint masters, suffering no man who had been guilty of "deluding the innocent by the practice of roguery" to escape without losing his hands. "A good man he was," says the Saxon Chronicle, "and all men stood in awe of him; no man durst misdo against another in his time. He made peace for man and beast. Whoso bare his burden of gold and silver, no man durst do him aught but good."

To carry out this strict police some apparatus was necessary, which at the same time should serve the purpose of diminishing the power of the great nobles, and that of beginning at all events, by its centralizing influence, to re-form the conquered people and their conquerors into one nation. The rudiments of such an apparatus Henry found already existing in the arrangements which the Conqueror had made. The system of frankpledge, increased and adapted to the more general feudal form of society, supplied him

Henry cures
what evils he can.

His strict police.

Administrative machinery.

with an efficient system of police. There was no man in the kingdom but some one was answerable for him. If he was a vassal, his lord. If he was a freeman, the knot of freemen of which he was a member. As courts to carry out this system, there were the old Hundred and Shire gemots. These Henry strengthened and, it would seem from one existing order, restored when in any way decayed to their original purity. To these courts criminal cases belonged, and civil suits between vassals of different lords. Questions between vassals of the same lord seem to have fallen within the jurisdiction of the lord. But these inferior courts, although they were excellent for police purposes, and as a check upon the powers of the baronial courts, would have done little towards the formation of nationality had they not been brought into connection with a superior court of which the king was chief. This central court consisted of the King in his ordinary council, which, since the Conquest, was known as the Curia Regis. Over it was the justiciary, who was the King's representative, his regent during his absence, the head of his administration, both judicial and financial, at all times. Under him was a selection of barons, the chief officers of the royal household, and those best qualified for judicial purposes. The clerks of this court were placed under a head, who was the chancellor. The judges themselves sat for financial purposes in the exchequer chamber, and were spoken of as the barons of the exchequer. For general business they were called justices, and their head the chief-justice. The organization of this court dates from the reign of Henry I. The office of chief justiciary had been founded by William the Conqueror, but the regular formation of the Exchequer Court was the work of Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, in the hands of whose family the direction of the machinery remained for nearly a century.¹ It was afterwards, as we shall see, brought to its completion by Henry II., but all its essential parts are to be found in the reign of his grandfather. It was as officers of finance that the justices first began to traverse the country. The sheriffs could not always be trusted in their own localities, and change of property and other causes gave rise to difficult questions, requiring to be settled by the immediate intervention of the King's officers. From financial questions their authority naturally passed to questions of justice, and their connection with the local courts was further strengthened when Henry united several sheriffdoms under one of his justices. Following a natural tendency, the men employed for these offices were not the great barons, but new men, who rose by their talents, and were naturally upholders of the royal power and of order in opposition to the anarchical baronial party.

Local courts.

Curia Regis.

¹ Stubb's Select Charters.

To sum up; after the year 1108, when the local courts were re-established, both the Hundred and county courts were the same in constitution and in arrangement as before the Conquest. But they were connected with the central government; because matters in which the King was interested were set aside for the consideration of the Curia Regis, or travelling judiciary sent out from that body; and because the Norman lawyers had introduced the practice of issuing writs from the King's court, whereby the King, in virtue of what is called his "equitable power," that is, his power of securing justice where the law did not give it, prescribed the method of action in certain difficult cases. The Hundred court was sometimes a lower court for the arrangement of small debts; the Bailiff of the Hundred then presided. Sometimes it was the great court held only twice a year; the sheriff then presided, the court exercised criminal jurisdiction, and was known as the "Court Leet." It also saw to the filling up of the divisions of ten men required by the system of Frankpledge; this was called "the view of frankpledge." The court was then known as "the Sheriff's Tourn." Below these local courts were the feudal manor courts, the old motes of the township, now become the courts of the lord. But we must not suppose that the authority of the sheriff and the local courts (now virtually royal courts) was universal. Certain great lords enjoyed franchises, that is, exercised jurisdiction over several manors. If the lord had "sac and soc," his court had the authority of the Court Leet. If he had "the view of frankpledge," the suitors at his court were free from attendance at the Sheriff's Tourn. His court was then in all points like the Hundred court, but independent of the sheriff. This double system Henry had apparently to submit to, watching the baronial power as well as he could, by means of the local courts and travelling justices.

It is to be carefully remembered that though the Curia Regis, representing the King's council, attested charters, and revised and registered laws, it had no legislative authority. Both the imposition of taxes and the making of laws still rested with the King and his great council, the representative of the Witan, which had become a feudal court, and consisted chiefly of the King's vassals. Their "counsel and consent" was a necessary condition of all legislation.

STEPHEN.

1135-1154.

Born 1105=Maud of Boulogne.

Eustace, Earl of Boulogne.
d. 1152.William, Earl of Boulogne.
d. 1159.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
David I., 1124.	Louis VI., 1108.	Lothaire II., 1125.	Alphonso VIII., 1134.
Malcolm IV., 1153.	Louis VII., 1137.	Conrad III., 1138.
		Frederick I., 1152.

POPES.—Innocent II., 1130. Celestine II., 1143. Lucius II., 1144
Eugenius III., 1145. Anastasius IV., 1153.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
William of Corbeil, 1123—1130. Theobald, 1139-1161.	Roger, Bishop of Salisbury. 1135-1139.	Roger the Poor, 1135. Philip, 1139.

ON Henry's death, according to the oath of the nobles, Matilda, late Empress, now wife of Geoffrey of Anjou, should have become Duchess of Normandy and Queen of England. But the principle of hereditary succession was by no means firmly established; a female sovereign was not desirable for a feudal country; her child Henry was an infant; and the nobles held that the conditions of their oath of fealty had been broken when Matilda had married a foreigner. There was therefore almost a unanimous feeling that one or other of the Princes of Blois, grandsons of the Conqueror, Theobald the elder brother, or Stephen, Count of Mortain and Boulogne, should ascend the throne. Steps were being taken in Normandy to induce Theobald to come forward, when news was brought to him that the superior quickness of his brother Stephen had already secured the crown in England, where, though not without some demur, the influence of the Church, headed by his brother Henry of Winchester, had secured him success.

There followed a period of twenty years without a parallel in the history of England. It was the only time during which the feudal baronage assumed that position of practical independence which it was always aiming at, which it frequently enjoyed abroad, but which the wise management and strong government of the Conqueror and his two sons had rendered impossible in England. The weak title of the King, and the constantly urged claim of the Empress, joined with the personal character of Stephen, who seems to have been unable to refuse a request, afforded an opportunity to the barons of asserting virtual independence and fighting for their own interests, while nominally upholding one or other of the claimants to the throne. The same causes affected the Church, which was now able to make good that commanding position which the legislation of the Conqueror had given it, although up to this time the strong hand of the King had rendered the position worthless. The only organized power in the midst of anarchy, it was enabled to use its influence to the full. It was the Church that set Stephen on the throne; it was his quarrel with the bishops which lit up the civil war in England; the success of the Empress was of no avail till she was accepted by the Church; her attack upon Henry of Winchester was the signal for her discomfiture; it was the mediation of the Church which ultimately produced a cessation of the war.

The facts of the reign are few and in themselves unimportant. To the growth of the constitution it added nothing. It is nevertheless interesting as exhibiting the effects of unbridled feudalism, and as preparing the way for the great work of consolidation perfected by Henry II.; on the one hand by the misery and disgust excited by the lawless outrages of the barons; on the other by the overwhelming power thrown into the hands of the Church, which could not co-exist with any true national monarchy.

On his coronation, Stephen, in general terms, promised to uphold the good laws of his predecessors. At the first great council of his reign he issued a more explicit charter, securing to the Church their property and privileges, and promising to suppress illegalities on the part of the sheriffs. The character of the reign rendered such a charter quite inoperative. The insurrection in Wales, which had been bringing Henry to England when he died, continued. Its conduct fell chiefly to Ranulf, Earl of Chester, and Richard Fitz-Gilbert of Clare. Stephen's Strange character of the reign.

Great power of the Church.

The interest of the reign.

Stephen's charter.

Affairs in Wales.

presence on the borders did not succeed in checking it. Richard Fitz-Gilbert was killed, and he left the country as before to be conquered by the gradual advance of the lords marchers.

Already, it would seem, the yielding character of Stephen had been discovered. Already barons began to take advantage of it. Roger Bigot seized the Castle of Norwich, and wrested from the King the earldom of that county and of East Anglia. Robert of Bathenton and Baldwin of Redvers, in Devonshire, began to rebel. They were indeed both conquered, but such movements mark the temper of the times. In 1137 Stephen found himself strong enough to cross to Normandy, where Geoffrey of Anjou was making war upon his provinces. His success there was not great. He purchased from Geoffrey a cessation of hostilities. Meanwhile the Northern frontier of England had become a scene of war. David of Scotland, the nephew of Eadgar Ætheling, and uncle through his sister Matilda of the Empress, had himself some claims to the English throne. But these he declared that he waived, wishing to abide true to the oath he had taken to support his niece. He, however, demanded that his son Henry should be allowed to do homage to Stephen for Cumberland, and that he himself should receive the counties of Northumberland and Huntingdon, which he claimed in right of his wife, the daughter of Earl Waltheof. Though he himself declared that he had no desire for the English throne, there is mentioned by one chronicler¹ a general conspiracy of the native English with their exiled countrymen, of whom the south of Scotland was full, for the purpose of taking advantage of the condition of the country to put to death the Normans, and to place the crown upon David's head. The plot was discovered by the Bishop of Ely, who was at once Bishop and Governor of that district, which had been formed by the last king into a modified county palatine. He told his discovery, and many of the conspirators were hanged, but many others found a refuge in Scotland. At length, in 1138, David entered England with a large army, and pushed forward as far as Northallerton in Yorkshire. He was there met by the forces of the Northern bishops and barons, gathered under the command of Walter Espec, Thurstan, the aged Archbishop of York, William of Albemarle, Roger of Mowbray, and other barons. They gathered round a tall mast borne upon a carriage, on which, above the standards of the three Northern Saints, St. Peter of York,

¹ Ordericus Vitalis.

Early signs of disturbance.

War with Scotland. 1137.

Its connection with an English conspiracy.

St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon, was displayed a silver pyx bearing the consecrated wafer. The motley army of the Scots, some armed as the English, some in the wild dress of the Picts of Galloway, after a well-fought battle, broke against the full-clad Norman soldiers, and were killed by the arrows, which had now become the national weapon of the English; 11,000 are said to have fallen on the field. But, in spite of the victory, Stephen, conscious of his general weakness, accepted an unfavourable peace, by which Northumberland was given to Prince Henry.

All this time the spirit of lawlessness had been increasing. "Many persons," says the chronicler,¹ "emboldened to illegal acts, either by nobility of descent or by ambition, were not ashamed, some to demand castles, others estates, and indeed whatever came into their fancy, from the King. When he delayed complying with their request . . . they, becoming enraged, immediately fortified their castles against him, and drove away large booties from his lands." "He created likewise many earls where there had been none before; appropriating to them rents which had before belonged to the crown. They were the more greedy in asking, and he more profuse in giving, because a rumour was pervading England that Robert of Gloucester would shortly espouse the cause of his sister." The creation of earldoms had been rare under the three first Norman kings, and as those offices died out their places had not been filled. It is said, indeed, that in 1131 there were but three earls in England, Robert of Gloucester, and the Earls of Chester and Leicester.² As the earl received the third penny of the fines of his earldom, the creation of earls manifestly impoverished the crown. But Stephen appears to have gone beyond the filling up of regular earldoms, and to have created titular earls,³ with grants of royal demesne lands to support their dignity. The building of castles⁴ was the great sign of the anarchical condition of England, implying private war and all the other horrors of the worst forms of continental feudalism.

This anarchy began to assume a form when Robert of Gloucester, alleging his previous oath to Matilda, and asserting that the conditions on which he had accepted Stephen had not been kept, renounced

Battle of the Standard.
Aug. 22, 1138.

Growth of anarchy in England.

Creation of earldoms and castles.

¹ William of Malmesbury.

² Lappenberg, Thorpe's translation, page 377. There were certainly several more at the time of the accession, as their names occur attesting the charter of Stephen.

³ Fiscal earls.

⁴ Adulterine Castles. Will. Malm. Hist. Nov. I. § 13.

his fealty. His influence was in his earldom, and in the West of England; the headquarters of his party was Bristol; and his agent during his absence was Milo, Constable of Gloucester, afterwards Earl of Hereford. Nearly all the West, and by no means the West only, declared for Matilda. But in most cases the rival claims to the throne were used as an excuse merely. Change of sides was common, and there are instances of leaders excluding their own nominal partisans from strongholds they had won.¹ At first the insurrection was unsuccessful. Stephen, conscious of his weakness, had collected mercenaries from Flanders and from Brittany. The condition of the country made them eager to come. In Stephen's time numbers of freebooters from Flanders and Brittany flocked to England in expectation of pillage.² The chief leader of the Flemings was William of Ypres; the Bretons were commanded by Alan the Black of Richmond, Hervé of Léon, and Alan of Dinan. With the aid of these Stephen speedily regained the great castles he had lost, such as Bath, Castle Cary, Harptree, and Shrewsbury; and might perhaps even yet have established his authority, when an act of supreme folly set him at variance with the Church.

The new administrative class was represented by Roger of Salisbury, who had succeeded in procuring for his nephew Alexander the bishopric of Lincoln, for Nigel the bishopric of Ely, while his illegitimate son Roger was Chancellor. The vast wealth and influence of this family encouraged them to build castles, and Devizes, Sherborne, Malmesbury, and Salisbury were strongly fortified. The family of Beaumont, Earls of Mellent, had been generally firm supporters of the crown and of authority. They now seem to have seen with jealousy their position as chief advisers to the crown occupied by men of law, ecclesiastics, yet without the sanctity which befits the ecclesiastical profession. At their instigation, and at that of their friends, the King took the ill-advised step of beginning his assault on his castle-building barons by demanding the surrender of these bishops' castles. The Bishops of Lincoln and Salisbury were suddenly arrested at an assembly held at Oxford (1139); the Bishop of Ely took refuge in the castle of Devizes. Thither the King betook himself, with his two prisoners, as some accounts assert, kept entirely without food, one in a cow-stall and the other in a hovel. This

Robert of Gloucester
renounces his fealty.
1138.

Stephen's mercenaries.

Jealousy between the old and new administration.

¹ See the conduct of Fitz-Hubert and Fitz-Gilbert at Devizes and Marlborough, page 82.

² William of Malmesbury, Hist. Nov. II. § 84.

treatment of the bishops, and a threat of hanging Roger the Chancellor, produced the surrender of Devizes as well as the other three castles.

The success was dearly bought. The King's brother, Henry of Winchester, upheld the dignity of his order. He summoned a council, produced a Papal letter declaring him legate, proceeded to lay his charges against the King before the council, and advised him to submit to canonical punishment. Stephen's case was defended by Aubrey de Vere, who, when the aggrieved bishops spoke of an appeal to Rome, declared that the King advised them not to do so, as whoever went might find it difficult to return; and himself appealed to the jurisdiction of the Pope. This threat, and an ominous appearance of drawn swords around the meeting, prevented the bishops from proceeding to extremities; but none the less had Stephen forfeited their support. The immediate effect was the arrival of Gloucester and the Empress in the South of England.

After a short stay at Arundel, the Empress withdrew to join her brother, who had preceded her, at Bristol. There had been a friendly meeting with Henry of Winchester upon their arrival, and it was the same Henry who escorted the Empress to join her brother.¹

The scene of confusion became still more confused. Brian Fitz-Count² held Wallingford for the Empress; Milo of Gloucester regained many of the Western castles which Stephen had won. In Cornwall, Reginald of Dunstanville, a brother of the Earl of Gloucester, upheld, though without much success, the cause of the Empress. In Wiltshire, Fitz-Hubert, a Fleming, and Fitz-Gilbert fought nominally for the Empress, really for themselves, till Fitz-Gilbert enticed Fitz-Hubert, who had refused admission to the partisans of the Empress for whom he was nominally fighting, to the Castle of Marlborough, and there hanged him.

The quarrel between Stephen and his bishops grew worse and worse. Roger of Salisbury died in 1139. The Bishop of Winchester demanded the See for his nephew. Again Waleram of Mellent thwarted the Church, and his request was refused. At the Whitsuntide festival (1141) held in London, but one bishop,³ and that a foreign one, was with the court. The quarrel with the Church.

Stephen's

Consequent arrival of Matilda.
Sept. 30, 1139.

Civil war.

Continued
quarrel with
the Church.

¹ The Bishop seems to have been appointed by Stephen as her escort. William of Malmesbury says that no gentleman could refuse an escort even to his enemy.

² Son of Count Alan Fergant of Brittany. Ang. Sax. Chron. ann. 1127.

³ Bishop of Seéz, in Southern Normandy.

state of uncertain anarchy was becoming highly distasteful to Robert of Gloucester. An opportunity occurred of bringing matters to a crisis. Ranulph, the Earl of Chester, had hitherto played fast and loose with both parties, and the King had parted from him at Lincoln, which he possessed in right of his mother Lucia, believing him to be his partisan. But, a few days after his departure, Ranulph and his brother William of Roumare, surprised the castle, on which the King, who was a good soldier and very rapid in his movements, suddenly came back and besieged it. Ranulph escaped from the castle to Robert of Gloucester, who seized the occasion to bring on a pitched battle. With Ranulph, his own partisans, and the Welsh, he reached the Trent, passed it with some difficulty, and appeared suddenly before Lincoln. A great battle ensued, in which the victory fell to Gloucester, and Stephen was himself taken prisoner.

Of course this defeat somewhat changed the balance of affairs. Cornwall was regained for the Empress, and her influence reached eastward as far as Bedford and Nottingham. But she could not hope in any true sense to obtain the crown without the consent of the all-powerful Church. At once therefore negotiations were opened with Henry of Winchester. Having won his adherence, and with it that of the greater part of the bishops, she went from Gloucester, accompanied by the Bishop of Ely and other supporters, to Winchester. In an open plain without the city she swore to follow the advice of the Legate on Church matters. Her oath was attested by Milo, afterwards Earl of Hereford, Earl Gloucester, Brian Fitz-Count, and others. A council of the Church was held a few days after. The Legate addressed the assembly, and declared his adhesion to Matilda. It is to be observed that he waited a day to receive the citizens of London, who were "as it were nobles by reason of the magnitude of the city." Both the Londoners and many of the nobility besought for the release of Stephen, but their request was refused, and many of the royal party executed. Having obtained the castle of Oxford from Robert of Oilli, Matilda proceeded to London; but there the haughtiness of her behaviour soon produced the ruin of her cause.

It seems as though, if he could only have regained his liberty, Stephen himself and his partisans would have been willing now to retire from the contest. The Earls of Leicester and Mellent, hitherto staunch supporters of the King, together with his old friend Hugh, the Bishop of

Robert, to bring matters to a crisis,
fights the battle of Lincoln.
Feb. 2, 1141.

Matilda seeks help of the Church, and becomes Queen.

Importance of the Londoners.
1141.

Rouen, went so far as to offer the crown to Stephen's brother Theobald. But that prince declined to receive it, and even advised them to transfer their offer to Geoffrey of Anjou, on the sole condition that Stephen should be liberated. Taking advantage of such an opportunity as this, while supported by the friendship of Henry of Winchester and the Londoners, Matilda might have made her throne secure, but she at once took steps which alienated both. To Henry of Winchester, who must naturally have felt the ties of relationship towards his brother, she refused the natural request that Stephen's son Eustace might be placed in possession of his father's foreign fiefs. From the Londoners she demanded a heavy tallage, in spite of their complaints that they had been already stripped by taxations. King Stephen's Queen, to whom many of the fugitives from Lincoln had betaken themselves, made use of the discontent thus excited to advance against London. The inhabitants rose, and the Empress barely escaped with a few followers to Oxford. The insurgents demanded the liberation of Stephen. In this demand the Bishop of Winchester now joined, and the Empress besieged him in his castle outside the town of Winchester. But her besieging army was soon itself besieged, its communications and means of subsistence cut off, and she found herself obliged to retire. The Earl of Gloucester therefore despatched her before him to Devizes, while he himself covered her retreat. But he was hotly pursued and taken prisoner. This neutralized all his previous successes. After some negotiations the great prisoners were exchanged, and the state of parties fell back very much to its position before the battle of Lincoln.

Of decided successes on either side there were none. In 1142, the Empress, hard pressed at Oxford, barely made her escape with two knights, all clothed in white, across the snow. In the following year, Stephen, on the other hand, suffered a defeat at Wilton. The same struggle for individual liberty on the part of the barons was apparent everywhere. Thus the Cathedral of Coventry was changed into a fortress by a baron of the name of Marmion, the Abbey of Ramsey by Mandeville. Nor did the retirement of several of the hotter spirits from the contest to join in a crusade which St. Bernard was then preaching materially change the aspect of affairs. But, in 1147, new actors began to appear upon the scene. Wearied with the long useless struggle, Matilda withdrew to France. But to take her place

Matilda's opportunity, but she offends both Church and Londoners.

Consequent revolution of affairs.

Gloucester taken prisoner, and exchanged for Stephen. 1142.

Renewal of the old anarchy. 1146.

Appearance of Prince Henry.

her son Prince Henry came over to England. As it were to match him, Stephen brought his son Eustace prominently forward. This change of persons is still more clearly marked by the death of the great Earl of Gloucester, a man to whom many acts of cruelty in accordance with the temper of the time could be attributed, but who, if we may judge from the testimony of William of Malmesbury, was far superior in character and civilization to most of those by whom he was surrounded.

The withdrawal of the Empress and the appearance of Henry made a considerable difference in the views of those barons in England who were not wholly selfish. Stephen had been tried and failed. They had no longer to fear the rule of a woman. And thus we find Robert of Leicester, second son of the great Earl of Mellent, who had hitherto served Stephen and done him good service in Normandy against the Angevins, giving in his adherence to the young prince. In company with his cousin Roger of Warwick, he held the town and castle of Worcester for him, and succeeded in driving off the royal army. Henry's accession to the county of Anjou upon the death of his father Geoffrey, in 1151, and still more his marriage with Eleanor, the divorced wife of Louis, and heiress of Poitiers and Guienne, changed the character of the war. He was no longer a poor claimant, at best the son of a count, but had been suddenly transformed into one of the most powerful princes in Europe. In addition to this, since the death of Pope Innocent in 1144, the Papal See had been taking a more decided course against Stephen. The legatine authority had been withdrawn from Henry of Winchester, whose relationship with Stephen made his action always doubtful, and been given to Theobald the Archbishop, but Stephen, with his usual want of address, contrived to quarrel with him, and he therefore threw his whole weight upon the side of Henry.

Thus, when Henry contrived to form a truce with his rival the French King, and to enter England with a considerable army, the country was much disposed to receive him. Many of the nobility began to declare for him. The Beaumonts, as we have seen, were already his friends. The Countess of Warwick placed her castle in his hands. Robert of Leicester supplied him with provisions, and he marched in good hope to relieve Wallingford, which, defended by Brian Fitz-Count, Stephen was now besieging. There the two armies met; but the desire for peace was so general, that they both demanded that negotiations should be

Death of Robert of Gloucester. 1148.

Henry's marriage and increased power.

Church sides with him.

Meeting of the armies at Wallingford. 1153.

opened. Nothing was then settled, but the armies separated. Stephen proceeded to besiege Ipswich, where Bigot had declared for Henry, and Henry, taking Nottingham on the way, was marching to relieve it, when the heads of the Church saw their opportunity, and Theobald and Henry of Winchester combined to mediate a peace. This was the more easy on account of the death of the young Prince Eustace. On the 7th of November the Treaty of Pacification was concluded at Winchester. It was a compromise. Stephen was to remain King of England during his life; Henry was to be accepted as his son and heir; Stephen's son William was to do homage to Henry for all his large possessions in England and in Normandy. There then followed an arrangement for restoring the administration which the war had ruined. The castles were to be razed, the coinage reformed, the sheriffs replaced, the crown lands resumed, the new earldoms extinguished, foreigners banished, and administration of justice restored.¹ After this treaty

Church mediates
a compromise.
1153.

Death of Stephen.
1154.

Henry's duties summoned him chiefly to France; and Stephen, for the short remnant of his life, remained undisputed King of England. He died on the 25th of October 1154.

Two short extracts from chroniclers give a more complete view of the misery which attended this lawless period than any fresh description could do. William of Newbury says: "Wounded and drained of blood by civil misery, England lay plague-stricken. It is written of an ancient people, 'In those days there was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes;' but in England, under King Stephen, the case was worse. For, because at that time the King was powerless, and the law languished because the King was powerless, though some indeed did what seemed right in their own eyes, many because all fear of King and law was taken off them, did all the more greedily what by their natural instincts they knew to be wrong. . . . Neither King nor Empress was able to act in a masterful way, or show vigorous discipline. But each kept their own followers in good temper by refusing them nothing lest they should desert them. . . . And because they were worn out by daily strife, and acted less vigorously, local disturbances of hostile lords grew the more vehement. Castles too rose in great numbers in the several districts, and there were in England, so to speak, as many kings, or rather tyrants, as lords of castles. Individuals took the right of coining their private money, and of private jurisdiction." We have here the effects of the loosened hold of the crown,—castles, private war, private coinage, private justice. The Saxon Chronicle supplies us with a picture of the effect of these feudal usurpations upon the lower ranks of the people:—

¹ Stubb's Select Charters, page 21, from Matthew of Paris, 1153.

"When the traitors perceived that Stephen was a mild man, and soft and good, and did no justice, then did they all wonder. They had done homage to him and sworn oaths, but held no faith; for every powerful man made his castles and held them against him, and they filled the land full of castles. They cruelly oppressed the wretched men of the land with castle works. When the castles were made, they filled them with devils and evil men. Then they took those men that they imagined had any property, both by night and by day, peasant men and women, and put them in prison for their gold and silver, and tortured them with unutterable torture; for never were martyrs so tortured as they were. They hanged them up by the feet and smoked them with foul smoke; they hanged them up by the thumbs or by the head, and hung chains on their feet; they put knotted strings about their heads, and writhed them so that it went to the brain. They put them in dungeons, in which were adders, and snakes, and toads, and killed them so. Some they put in a 'cruset hūs,' that is in a chest that was short and narrow and shallow, and put sharp stones therein, and pressed the man therein, so that they brake all his limbs. In many of the castles were instruments called a 'lað (loathly) and grim;' these were neck-bonds, of which two or three men had enough to bear one. It was so made, that is, it was fastened to a beam, and they put a sharp iron about the man's throat and his neck, so that he could not in any direction sit, or lie, or sleep, but must bear all that iron. Many thousands they killed with hunger; I neither can nor may tell all the wounds or all the tortures which they inflicted on wretched men in this land; and that lasted the nineteen winters while Stephen was King; and ever it was worse and worse. They laid imposts on the towns continually; and when the wretched men had no more to give, they robbed and burned all the towns, so that thou mightest well go all a day's journey, and thou shouldest never find a man sitting in a town, or the land tilled. Then was corn dear, and flesh and cheese and butter; for there was none in the land. Wretched men died of hunger; some went seeking alms who at one while were rich men; some fled out of the land. Never yet had more wretchedness been in the land, nor did heathen men ever do worse than they did; for everywhere at times they forbore neither church nor churchyard, but took all the property that was therein, and then burned the church and altogether. Nor forbore they a bishop's land, nor an abbot's, nor a priest's, but robbed monks and clerks, and every man another who anywhere could. If two or three men came riding to a town, all the township fled before them, imagining them to be robbers. The bishops and clergy constantly cursed them, but nothing came of it, for they were all accursed, and forsworn, and lost. However a man tilled, the earth bare no corn; for the land was all foredone by such deeds, and they said openly that Christ and His saints slept. Such, and more than we can say, we endured nineteen winters for our sins."

A people who had suffered these things must certainly have sighed for a strong government, by whatever hand it should be wielded; and miserable though the reign had been, it tended towards the consolidation of nationality.

HENRY II.

1154-1189.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Malcolm IV., 1153. William, 1163.	Louis VII., 1137. Philip Augustus, 1180.	Frederic I., 1152.	Alphonso VIII., 1134. Sancho III., 1157. Alphonso IX., 1158.

POPES.—Adrian IV., 1154. Alexander III., 1159. Lucius III., 1181. Urban III., 1185.
Gregory VIII., 1187. Clement III., 1187.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Theobald, 1139-1161. Thomas à Becket, 1162-1170. Richard, 1174-1184. Baldwin, 1185-1190.	Robert, Earl of Leicester, 1154-1167. Richard de Lucy, 1154-1179. Ranulf Glanvill, 1180-1189.	Thomas à Becket, 1154-1162. Ralph de Warneville, 1178-1181. Geoffrey, the King's son, 1181-1189.

THE consolidation of the nation was the great work of Henry of Anjou. He brought to it great gifts, sagacity, masterful courage, a legal and judicial mind; while his training, as the prince of widely extending countries, prevented the intrusion of petty local interests into his views for his people's good. The lessons of the last reign were not lost on him. Before all things he desired a strong government and good order. In pursuing these objects he took for his model his grandfather and great-grandfather, and worked out in greater and more systematic detail the policy they had begun. And though in his efforts to subordinate the Church he may seem to have run counter to the legislation of his great-grandfather, it will be seen that in many points his policy was really the same. In the earlier part of his reign work lay ready to his hand, and the compromise at Winchester had already marked out his line of action. He could not immediately come to England, being detained by an insurrection in Guienne. But when he had settled this, and, by a humility of bearing he knew well how to feign, secured the friendship of Louis VII., he crossed the Channel, and at once proceeded with his reforms.

He renewed the charter of the City of London; fixed a short period during which the Flemish auxiliaries, who had already probably begun to return home, should leave the country; recalled grants of the royal domains which had been made in Stephen's reign; re-established the old number of limited earldoms; and proceeded to lay hands on both the royal castles which individual barons had appropriated and those private fastnesses with which the country had become covered. Their number is variously estimated, by some it is put as high as 1150.¹ It was not without some opposition that he carried out this work. It was chiefly in the North and West that difficulty occurred. Before the year was over he had received the submission of William of Albemarle, who was nearly independent in Yorkshire. In February of the next year he expelled Peveril, who had been guilty among other things of poisoning the great Earl of Chester, from his Earldom of Nottingham. He followed up his success by compelling the border barons, Roger, son of Milo, Earl of Hereford, and Hugh Mortimer, a descendant of the same family as Robert de Belesme, to surrender their fastnesses. To complete his dominion at home he marched against Malcolm of Scotland, who was occupying the three Northern counties. These he compelled him to resign, obliging him to do homage for the county of Huntingdon, which he claimed as a descendant of the old Earl Waltheof. Throughout all the earlier part of the reign the Scotch King appears as a great English baron, following the King to his wars.

Henry even thus early began to think of curbing the overgrown power of the Church; and Henry of Winchester, in fear of what might happen, thought it better to lay aside his episcopal robes and retire for a time to Clugny, from which, however, he was soon induced to return. An event, indeed, soon occurred which rendered the King's position with the Church peculiarly strong. In 1154 Nicolas Breakspear ascended the Papal throne, the only Englishman who ever attained that honour. The connection between England and the Papal See, always close since the Conquest, was drawn even closer, and the Pope made a grant of the schismatical country Ireland to the English King; a grant the enjoyment of which Henry postponed till a more convenient season. Henry's widely spread dominions kept him constantly moving, and in 1156 the affairs of his native county summoned him to France. He left his kingdom in charge of Robert of Leicester, his great justiciary.

Friendship of
Adrian IV.

¹ This is possibly a misreading of letters meaning 850.

The difficulty in Anjou arose from the claim raised by his younger brother Godfrey to that province. This claim rested upon a doubtful will, by which his father was said to have intended Anjou for Godfrey if Henry was called to the throne of England. By force of arms Henry reduced the country; and his brother withdrew on the receipt of certain payments, being shortly after called by the burghers of Nantes to become lord of their town. This affair was scarcely settled when Henry hurried back to England, there to complete his conquest of the Scotch King, by obliging him to surrender his strong castles of Bamborough, Newcastle and Carlisle, and again to do homage for Huntingdon, on which occasion, however, the clause "Salvis omnibus dignitatibus suis" was introduced into his oath. This, with the surrender of castles by Hugh Bigod in Norfolk, and of William, called of Warrenne, son of the late King, and Earl of Surrey, completed the subjugation of the feudal nobles, and rendered him absolute master of England.

Wales alone gave him further trouble. Thither, in 1157, he led an army against Owen Gwynneth at the instigation of his fugitive brother Cadwallader. The expedition was not successful; on this, as on subsequent occasions, Henry found it impossible to reduce the Welsh in their mountain strongholds. It is noteworthy, as affording the first instance of scutage, or money payment in exchange for personal service, which was in this instance demanded of knights holding from the clergy; and for the shameful flight of Henry de Essex, the royal standard-bearer, which gave rise afterwards to a remarkable judicial duel. In the year 1163 Robert de Montfort impeached Henry de Essex for cowardice and treachery. The matter came to the ordeal of battle, and Essex being conquered forfeited all his lands, and retired as a monk to the Abbey of Reading. This, and the confiscation of the property of Peveril, already mentioned, are the only two instances of confiscation during the reign.

It was during this prosperous period of the King's reign that Thomas à Becket becomes prominent. The son of a citizen of

Master of England, Henry attacks Wales.

London, his talents had been early seen and employed by Archbishop Theobald. In 1143 he had succeeded in getting for his patron the legatine authority over England, and afterwards that Papal bull which prevented the crowning of King Stephen's son Eustace. He was richly rewarded by livings in the Dioceses of Oxford, London, and Lincoln, and, in 1154, with the position of Archdeacon of Canterbury. The recommendation of the Primate soon placed him about Henry's court. He was appointed chancellor, and as such was the chief clerk of the Curia Regis, kept the King's seal, and had the management of vacant ecclesiastical benefices. He was further intrusted with the guardianship of the Tower of London, and with the castle of Eye in Berkhamstead, thus occupying a position partly secular, partly ecclesiastical. In this situation he exhibited all the splendour of a great noble; kept a magnificent table, followed the sports of the field, and was a proficient in knightly exercises. Henry found much pleasure in his society, and employed him in delicate negotiations. Thus, in the year 1158, he was sent to arrange a match between Margaret of France and Henry's son Henry. His magnificent embassy dazzled the eyes of the Frenchmen and was completely successful. The object of the arrangement was to win the friendship of Louis, and prevent him from interfering with the King's plans on Nantes, where he meant to make good his claim as successor to his brother Godfrey, who had lately died. A meeting with Louis was effected on the river Epte. Henry accompanied him back to Paris, and received from him the child princess, whom he intrusted to the care of Robert of Neuburg, Justiciary of Normandy. Strong in this new-formed friendship, Henry found no difficulty in securing Nantes, and thereby a hold upon Brittany.

In spite however of his apparent agreement with Louis he soon found himself at open war with him. Queen Eleanor's grandfather, on going to the Crusades, had mortgaged the county of Toulouse to Raymond of St. Gilles. The mortgage money had not been repaid, as Raymond of St. Gilles still held the city. This nobleman had married the French King's sister Constance. When therefore Henry raised the claim of his wife, the French King openly adopted the cause of Raymond.¹ Henry determined to have recourse to arms, and in 1159 raised an army for the purpose. The war is interesting, not so much in itself, as in two or three collateral points connected with it.

¹ While Eleanor had been his wife, Louis had systematically pressed her claim.

Rise of Thomas & Becket.

He is employed in foreign negotiation.
1158.

Nevertheless there is war with France.
1159.

Interesting points in it.

Thus Malcolm of Scotland came with forty-five ships, and a Welsh prince likewise joined the army. Again, the presence of Becket at the head of an unusually well-equipped body of 700 men is mentioned. He is said to have urged the King to active measures against the French monarch. But Henry—who was surprised at finding his lately made friend in arms against him, and opposing with all his power a claim he had once himself urged, and who by no means wished to drive matters to extremity—showed some scruple in attacking his suzerain, and contented himself with gaining his object by laying waste the country and capturing the castles. At the same time he contracted an engagement between his son Richard and Berengaria, the daughter of Count Raymond of Barcelona, the son-in-law of the King of Aragon,¹ and in fact Governor of that country. But the most important point about the war was the introduction of the habit of money payments in exchange for military service. This measure had been adopted previously with respect to the Church in the war with Wales. On the present occasion the sum is said to have amounted to £180,000.² There were many advantages in the change. The King was enabled to hire mercenaries, and dispense with the irregular services of his feudal followers; he got contributions from the Church lands, and was enabled to do without the hated tax of the Danegelt, at the same time that he struck a blow at the military importance of his feudal barons.

Thus far the course of Henry's reign had been one of unbroken prosperity. He had settled and increased his dominions both in England and on the Continent, had on the whole gained in his opposition to his suzerain the King of France, and had strengthened himself by prudent marriages for his children. He was henceforward, except for a very few years, to be plunged in disputes and difficulties. It has been mentioned that the Church in England had reached a position of great pre-eminence during the troubled period of Stephen's reign.

¹ Ramiro of Aragon, a monk, who, for the sake of continuing the succession, was taken from his monastery, and married. His only daughter was the wife of Raymond of Barcelona. Their son became King of Aragon.—Robert de Monte.

² The individual payment in Normandy was sixty shillings in Angevin money. The knights' fees of England were popularly put at 60,000: at the same rate this would have amounted to £180,000. The scutage in England was, however, only two marks on a knight's fee. The scutage was repeated two years afterwards. On the supposition that the sum mentioned applies to both those scutages, there would have been a payment of four marks, or £2, 13s. 4d., on a knight's fee. This would give £160,000. The sum actually paid seems not to have been more than a fifth of that sum.

Scotch King
serves him.

Introduction
of scutage.

Having reduced the State to order, Henry turns to the Church.

The policy of the Norman kings had been always to support the Church to the utmost, to keep on good terms with Rome, but at the same time to make good the supremacy of the power of the king in his own dominions. William the Conqueror, it will be remembered, had entirely separated the spiritual from the temporal jurisdiction. Before the arrival of the Normans, all offences not strictly ecclesiastical had been tried and punished in the County and Hundred courts, where both bishop and ealdormen presided side by side. In withdrawing the bishop from the secular courts, William had desired to raise the character of the clergy by confining them more completely to spiritual matters. But an abuse had easily grown up, which produced a directly opposite effect. As the pretensions of the Church rose, not only were spiritual questions to be tried in the spiritual courts, but spiritual men were also withdrawn from the secular jurisdiction, and the doctrine became prevalent that the clerk could be only tried by his ecclesiastical superior.¹ Now ecclesiastical courts could not inflict corporal punishments. Censures, excommunications, and penances were their weapons. Consequently clerks might and did commit every sort of crime without suffering any punishment. To Henry's love of justice and order this was most repugnant. But at the same time that he wished to curtail the license of the clergy, and to establish the superiority of the royal jurisdiction, he distinctly upheld the policy of his predecessors in supporting the Roman See. It was a critical time for that power. The great Frederick Barbarossa was upon the throne of Germany, and attempting to establish with regard to himself and the Pope on a larger scale what Henry was anxious to do in England. With a comprehensive view of the struggle, he had invited the Kings of England and France to join him in united action for the establishment of the supremacy of the secular power. His overtures had not been received; and when, upon the death of Hadrian, in 1159, after a stormy conclave, the Italian party elected Rolando Bandinelli, under the title of Alexander III., and the imperial party Cardinal Octavian, as Victor IV., the two Western kings gave in their adhesion to Alexander. When expelled from Italy, they received him with extreme honour at Chateauroux, where they acted as his grooms, leading his horse between them. He finally found shelter in the French town of Sens.

¹ This view rested chiefly on the False Decretals, a body of false edicts purporting to be the decisions of very early Popes, which was produced in the ninth century.

General friendship of England and France with the Pope.

In 1161, Theobald the Archbishop died, and it seemed to Henry that the opportunity had arrived for carrying out his reforming plans. Without difficulty he secured the election of his Chancellor, believing that he would serve him still in that capacity. But such were not the views of Becket. He found himself in a position where he might not only serve but rival the King, and he at once became the ambitious and fanatical ecclesiastic. His manner of life was wholly changed, fasts and penances took the place of his former gaiety; the ostentation which he still exhibited was for others and not for himself; he scarcely touched food while his guests were feasting; and poor saints and beggars took the place of the courtiers who had formerly thronged his hall. He did not wait to be attacked, but himself began the quarrel with the King. He at once insisted on resigning his temporal offices. He then demanded homage from some barons whom he declared to be liegemen of the See of Canterbury and not of the King. He refused in bold outspoken words to pay the usual tax for the sheriff at a court at Woodstock. But these were only slight beginnings. A meeting of the clergy was held at Westminster, and the great subject of ecclesiastical jurisdictions was raised. A very bad instance had just excited the King's attention. A clerk of the name of Philip Brois had committed a murder and received no punishment. At the assizes of Dunstable, Simon Fitz-Peter, the King's Justice, had found him guilty of the murder, but Becket insisted on his being withdrawn from the secular jurisdiction, and sentenced him to two years' loss of his benefice. To Henry this seemed at once an insult to his authority and a mere fostering of crime. He determined upon action, and demanded of the bishops whether they would accept the ancient customs of the country. Many of the clergy Henry knew he could rely upon, such for instance as Becket's old enemy Roger of York, and Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London. He did not expect to meet much opposition anywhere. With much persuasion Becket certainly accepted the customs. Henry, determined that there should be no question on this matter, caused these customs to be drawn up in the form of Constitutions, and presented to a great council held at Clarendon. There Becket distinctly broke his word and retracted.

Bishops and laymen, knowing the King's character, besought Becket not to risk the fortunes of the Church by further opposition. For a moment he seemed to yield, but the next day, when his final answer was to be given, he again refused to sign them. He stated his objections fully. His arguments were based principally on the Canon law of Gratian¹ and the False Decretals. The Body of Customs, as presented to him, consisted of sixteen clauses. By these, which did not pretend to be new legislation, but a recapitulation of the old practices of the country, the line was sharply drawn between criminal and ecclesiastical cases; the criminal clerk being amenable to the civil jurisdiction: questions with regard to land claimed by the clergy were to be referred to a jury: as also cases of crime where there was no accuser: the King was made the ultimate hearer of appeals, except by his own special leave: bishops were restrained from leaving the country without leave, or from excommunicating the King's men: elections to bishoprics were to be held in the King's chapel, in the presence and with the consent of those whom he should summon: and the newly-elected officer was to swear fealty to the King.² Other minor matters with regard to the position of the Church were also settled, but it is these chiefly which were to secure the supremacy of the crown. Becket is said to have particularly objected to any subordination of clerks to secular jurisdiction; to have held that one punishment for one offence was enough, and that the Church should look to; and to have regarded with displeasure any restrictions laid upon the right of clerical jurisdiction or excommunication.³ Ultimately, however, he was certainly induced to accept and to seal them. On retiring from the council he at once began to show signs of repentance, and got absolution for what he had done from the Pope.

Election of Becket to Archbishopric. 1161.

Becket upholds encroachments of the Church.

Henry produces Constitutions of Clarendon. 1164.

Alexander's position was peculiar, and, as in the case of Anselm, it was too important to him in his present difficulties to retain the friendship of England for him to allow himself to side very strongly with Becket. Throughout the quarrel it is the Archbishop who urges the Pope onward, and not the Pope the Archbishop. Such lukewarmness suited neither party, and Henry summoned another council for 8th of October at Northampton.

Lukewarmness of Alexander
III.

¹ The Decretal of Gratian was produced about the end of Stephen's reign. Gratian, a Tuscan Canonist, produced a collection of Papal decisions, known by his name, in 1151. The Decretals are collections of letters written by the early Popes in answers to questions addressed to them by the Bishops. The first collection was made at Rome by Dionysius in 550. In this collection, letters exaggerating Papal authority were subsequently introduced, known as the False Decretals. They received the Papal sanction from Nicholas I. about 860.

² These Constitutions will be found in full in Stubbs' Charters, p. 132.

³ He is said to have objected especially to Articles 1, 3, 4, 7, 8 and 12.

Two days before the council the Archbishop arrived. He did not receive the kiss of peace, and it was plain that matters were coming to extremities. Again the Archbishop began the attack. He lodged some complaint against a nobleman, and had justice promised him; but was then in his turn charged with delaying justice, in the case of an official of the Treasury called John the Marshall, who demanded a piece of land in his court. Marshall summoned him before the royal court, and he was now told that the case would come on before the council on the following day. On that day therefore the court sat in judgment upon the Archbishop. He was found guilty. The extreme penalty, which would have been the seizure of all his moveables, was remitted, and a heavy fine of £500 substituted. No sooner was this charge finished than a fresh charge was brought against him, and £300 demanded of him, which he had borrowed upon the castles of Eye and Berkhamstead. On the following day a sum of 500 marks, which he had borrowed for the expedition to Toulouse on the King's security, was demanded. Becket declared it was a gift. He found fresh securities, and retired in dudgeon. He found his hall deserted by the knights and barons. Then followed the final blow. As chancellor he had had the administration of vacant ecclesiastical and baronial benefices; and now he was ordered to account for a sum of not less than 30,000 marks. On accepting the bishopric, he had been discharged from all liability by Prince Henry and Richard de Lucy the Justiciary. The demand was manifestly an unjust one, and the greater part of the bishops appealed against it. The temporal nobles refused to allow the appeal, as it had yet to be proved that the King was a party to the discharge. Sickness kept the Archbishop confined to his house for some days. Meanwhile the bishops attempted to make him yield, and finally for the most part deserted him, and betook themselves to the court. The Archbishop was determined to meet the charge in all the magnificence of his office, and went to the council with his cross and other insignia. The bishops, overawed by this unusual demonstration, which they regarded as a challenge to the King, went to him, leaving the accused Archbishop sitting alone with a few friends. They tried in vain to get the King's demand lessened, and changed for the fine usual in Kent, which was only forty shillings. Henry, in wrath, merely asked whether the Archbishop had made up his mind to accept the Constitutions. Becket refused to plead upon any charge except that of John the Marshall, and at length openly declared that

The quarrel takes a legal form.

Comes before
the council.

Henry presses him with charges.

he placed himself and the Church under the guardianship of the Pope and of God. The disturbance was great. The King wished the bishops to declare the sentence. They earnestly entreated not to be called upon to judge their superior, and finally the duty was left to Robert of Leicester the Justiciary. But the Archbishop would not let him speak. "How can you judge me who appeal to a higher power? And do not thou Earl of Leicester venture to judge thy spiritual father!" He rose, and, leaning on his cross, swept from the hall. As cries of "traitor" arose behind him, his old worldly vehemence got the better of him, and he turned and cried, "Might I but wear weapons, I should soon know how to clear myself of the charge of treason." As he passed on his way through the streets people knelt and demanded his blessing. A final answer was required of him the following day, but in the night, in the midst of wild weather, he secretly left Northampton, and after a difficult flight, on the 2nd of November contrived to cross to Gravelines.

On the very same night, an embassy, consisting of his chief enemies—the Bishops of York, London, Exeter, Chichester and Worcester, together with John of Oxford, the King's chief adviser in this matter,—crossed to seek the Pope. The Archbishop put himself under the protection of the King of France at Soissons; and the two parties carried their case before the Pope at Sens, where John of Salisbury, Becket's emissary, had already been winning him friends. The King's embassy entreated that legates might be sent to finish the case in England. But Alexander, although the Peter's Pence from England were absolutely necessary to him, refused their request. Upon receipt of this information, the King drove abroad all friends and dependants of the Archbishop, who had succeeded meanwhile in getting a favourable reception from Alexander. Till 1170 he remained abroad, carrying on his struggle with the King.

Of course, during that time Henry could not afford to let his other business rest. But it is the quarrel with the Archbishop which gives its complexion to the history of those years. In 1165 the Pope was enabled to return to Italy, but Frederick of Germany, still refusing to acknowledge him, at an Assembly at Wurtzburg caused Cardinal Guido to be elected under the title of Pascal III. in the place of Octavian, who was just dead. Henry seized the opportunity. He had already forbidden all intercourse between England and the Pope, and he now despatched an embassy, headed by John of Oxford and Richard of Winchester, to attempt to act in consort with Frederick.

Becket leaves the court before judgment is given.

He is received by the Pope. 1165.

This was in reply to a demand on the part of the Emperor, who had sent his chancellor, Reginald of Cologne, to ask for two of Henry's daughters in marriage, the one for his son, the other for Henry the Lion of Saxony. The ambassadors declared that there were fifty bishops ready to accept the anti-pope. However, matters did not reach this point: Alexander still temporized. The clergy of England were very averse to deserting the legitimate Pope, and the old policy of the Norman kings had yet a strong hold upon Henry.

Meanwhile, leaving the quarrel in abeyance, he again invaded Wales, again without much success. He was more successful in the following year in his designs on Brittany. "He dealt," says the Chronicler,¹ "with the nobles of the district of Le Mans according to his pleasure, and the region of Brittany, and with their castles. . . ." A treaty of marriage between his son Geoffrey, and Constance, the daughter of Conan of Brittany and Richmond, having been entered into, this Earl made a grant to him of the whole of Brittany, with the exception of Guingamp, which had descended to him from his grandfather. The King received the homage of all the barons of Brittany at Thouars. Thence he came to Rennes, and by taking possession of that city, the capital of Brittany, he became lord of the whole duchy. While thus triumphing, he received news that Becket, weary of the Pope's procrastination, had gone to the Church at Vezelay, and there, after explaining the Constitutions of Clarendon, had excommunicated John of Oxford, Richard of Ilchester, and Richard de Lucy, the King's Counsellors, and Joscelin of Balliol, and Ranulph de Broc, who had entered into possession of his confiscated estates. This step caused considerable anxiety, and the bishops and abbots of England met and appealed to the Pope, thus postponing the execution of the excommunication. The Archbishop, in reply, bid them carry the excommunication at once into effect, and at the same time excommunicated Godfrey Ridel, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, for not remitting to him the income of his see. In anger, the King threatened to expel from England the whole Cistercian order, as a punishment for allowing the Archbishop to dwell in their monastery. To avoid this, Becket withdrew to Sens.

The appeal however went on, and, to the surprise of every one, the Pope, who had perhaps been bribed, at length appointed legates to examine the dispute. In 1167, John of

But Henry refuses to oppose Alexander.

Meanwhile he attacks Wales, and secures Brittany. 1166.

Becket excommunicates his enemies.

The Pope temporizes.

¹ Robert de Monte.

Oxford, the King's ambassador, came home in triumph, declaring that the excommunications had been removed. Naturally therefore Becket dreaded the approach of the legates. By means of his influence with the French many obstacles were thrown in their way, and as a fresh declaration that his views were unchanged, he excommunicated Gilbert of London. At length the legates obtained meetings both with Becket and Henry. In neither instance were they satisfactory. Becket refused to withdraw the convenient words "saving our order," and Henry would hear of no half measures. However, their temper was on the whole conciliatory, and they removed the excommunications conditionally. This friendly feeling on the part of the Pope was still further shown by his suspending the Archbishop for a time from the exercise of his office. In fact, the Pope had just been driven from Rome by Barbarossa, and Henry's support was indispensable to him. All this made no difference to Becket, who, on Palm Sunday, repeated his excommunications, and contrived at length to get them smuggled over into England, where, with striking effect, Gilbert of London was suddenly suspended in the midst of the celebration of mass in his own church.

The political difficulties under which Henry was at this time struggling may have given fresh courage to the Archbishop, for, both during 1167 and 1168, there was war with Louis of France and with his other neighbours. The Count of Flanders was even threatening a descent on England, while the Counts of Marche, Angoulême, and Limousin, counting on the succour of the French, were laying waste Henry's southern dominions. This difficulty he left in the hands of his General, Count Patrick of Salisbury, while he himself was called upon to suppress disturbances in Brittany. His fortunes were indeed at a very low ebb. In presence of these difficulties, Henry found it necessary to lower his tone; a peace with his enemies was patched up at Montmirail. There too a commission from the Pope awaited him, and he found himself obliged to consent virtually to the demands of Becket. As however he refused to give his refractory Archbishop the kiss of peace, which was regarded as the only sure sign of reconciliation, the quarrel was not yet terminated. Although the point at issue was a small one, both parties continued obstinate.

Henry, determined to show his authority, caused his son Henry to be crowned in England by the Archbishop of York. This was a distinct invasion of the rights of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the coronation was performed

Coronation of Young Henry.
June 14, 1170.

Critical position of Henry.

in the southern province. It produced so great an outcry, that Henry felt he had gone too far, especially as he had neglected to have Henry's wife, the French princess, crowned with him, which Louis regarded as a great insult. With this feeling against him, Henry consented to a meeting at Fretheval, and there yielded what was required of him, embracing the Archbishop, raising him from the ground, when he knelt before him, and holding his stirrup for him to remount. The quarrel seemed ended, but some slight delays occurred before Becket could return to England, and more than one warning message was sent to him that England was no safe place for him. When he demanded a safe conduct from Henry, it did not promise any true reconciliation that John of Oxford was sent as his escort. He ventured however, but found the feeling in England, among the laity at all events, very strong against him, and was bidden to withdraw to his city of Canterbury. Although conscious of the power of his enemies, he continued his obstinate course, excommunicated the Archbishop of York, De Broc, and other lay holders of the property of the See, whom he found it difficult to dispossess. When the King heard of this conduct, the anger which had been boiling within him, but which circumstances had obliged him to suppress, broke loose, and he accused his courtiers of caring nothing for him since they suffered this audacious priest to live. Four knights took him at his word, hurried across to England, collected followers among his enemies, and proceeding to Canterbury, demanded the immediate removal of the excommunication. The monks in terror hurried the Archbishop to the Cathedral, and wished to shut the doors, believing him then in safe sanctuary, but he would not allow any sign of weakness. The knights, at the head of an armed mob, still demanded the removal of the excommunication, were still refused, and killed him at the altar.

The outcry which rose throughout Europe told Henry that he had lost his cause. He at once declared himself innocent, refused food, took on him all the outward signs of penitence, and despatched a mission to exculpate him at the court of the Pope. Though Alexander was very angry, he was persuaded to send legates for a formal inquiry. Henry did not await their coming, but as a means of employment and retirement, proceeded to carry out an intention he had long had of conquering Ireland.

His opportunity there indeed had fully come. The country, divided among petty chieftains, had from time to time been gathered

Finding this step unpopular,
Henry submits.

Becket ventures to return to England.

His death.
Dec. 29, 1170.

under the command of one chief king. When his authority was at all strong, some little order existed; when he was weak, wild disorder reigned. The present holder of that position was Roderic O'Connor of Connaught.

In 1153, Diarmid, or Dermot, King of Leinster, had carried off the wife of O'Ruark, Prince of Breffni, or Leitrim. When O'Connor gained the crown of Tara in 1166, he proceeded to punish the offender, who fled to England, and, collecting round him some Welsh adventurers, returned home.

Still unable to cope with his enemies, he sought Henry in Guienne, did homage to him, and received leave to collect an army in England. In 1169, the half-brothers Robert Fitz-Stephen and Maurice Fitz-Gerald crossed over to Wexford. This advance-guard was followed by a stronger party of Welshmen under Richard of Clare, Count of Strigul, surnamed Strongbow, who, deeply in debt,

*Invasion by Strongbow.
1169.*

had lost his possessions in England, and was glad to seek some elsewhere. He took Waterford, and married Eva, Dermot's daughter; while Dublin, which belonged to the Danes who had settled in Ireland, was captured by Milo of Cogan. In 1171 Dermot died, and Strongbow succeeded to the crown of Leitrim as his heir. Henry was not pleased with the rapid success of his vassal, and proceeded to deprive him of his English property. In vain were ambassadors sent to the King; he refused them admittance. It was only when the Earl surrendered Waterford, Dublin, and his other castles, to the King, that Henry secured to him his other conquests. Matters were in this condition when Henry determined himself to visit

Ireland. After a month spent in preparation, he reached Waterford with a fleet of 400 ships in October. Here

Strongbow did homage to him for Leinster, and several Irish princes acknowledged him for their chief. From Roderic O'Connor he had to be contented with such slight acknowledgment as the acceptance of his envoys, De Lacey and William Fitz-Aldelm, might imply. With the Church he was more successful. All the archbishops and bishops took the oath of fealty. At a synod held at Cashel the Roman discipline was introduced; and in 1174, bulls from Rome, authorizing the collection of Peter's Pence and the conquest of the country, were received and accepted. In a wooden palace, built outside the walls of Dublin, Henry exhibited the splendours of the English crown, and granted out the conquered lands to his vassals. Hugh de Lacey received the Earldom of Meath, and was made Viceroy; Fitz-Bernard received Water-

Henry retires to the invasion of Ireland.

Condition of Ireland.

*Henry himself invades Ireland.
1171.*

*Irish Church adopts Roman discipline.
1172.*

ford, De Courcey and others were instructed to carry on the work of conquest; and English colonists were placed in Dublin and other devastated towns. Having made these arrangements, Henry returned to Normandy, where his presence was much required. But his conquest was by no means completed; disturbances arose at once upon his departure; nor was it till 1175 that Roderic was subdued. He then sent delegates to make his submission to the King at a council held at Windsor. A treaty was arranged, which acknowledged him as chief of all the Irish princes, with the exception of Henry and his knights. He consented to pay a yearly tribute. But except in the conquered countries, Irish law (the Brehon law as it was termed) held good throughout Ireland, and English law only within those provinces which had been thoroughly subdued and were called the English Pale.

It was partly to meet the Papal legates that Henry returned from Ireland. He met them at Avranches, and there swore that he had nothing to do with the murder of the Archbishop, and promised adhesion to Pope Alexander in opposition to the German antipope, free intercourse with Rome, the abrogation of the Constitutions of Clarendon, and personal attendance at a crusade, either in the East or in Spain, within three years, meanwhile paying the Templars to undertake this duty for him. Although this seemed a complete submission, it in fact left the question of the supremacy of the civil power open.

All his dominions seemed now at peace, but a great danger was brewing. His son Henry, since his coronation, had already, at the instigation of the French King, his father-in-law, demanded the actual possession of some portion at least of his kingdom, and this combination caused him well-grounded apprehension. He took the opportunity of the general peace of his kingdom to negotiate a marriage for his son John with the daughter of Count Humbold of Savoy, and promised to give with him as her dowry Chinon, Loudon, and Mirabeau. The young king Henry protested against this treaty, and suddenly disappearing from court, took refuge with Louis VII. at St. Denis. The old king understood only too well what this meant. Shortly, there was a universal insurrection throughout all his dominions. It is not difficult to understand. His domestic relations were not happy, although he was very fond of his children; his wife was constantly urging them to disobedience. His dominions were widespread, and consisted of various races; his hand was heavy upon the feudal nobility, when the English nobles had not yet forgotten the charms of the late reign; while the defeat which the King had sus-

*Henry's reconciliation with Rome.
1172.*

Great insurrection of 1174.

tained in his quarrel with Becket gave a false impression of his weakness. The discontent was very general. While Louis recognized the young Henry as the rightful king, and entered into his quarrel in company with the Counts of Blois, Boulogne, Flanders, and others, the nobles of Aquitaine rose in insurrection, the princes Richard and Geoffrey made common cause with the insurgents, William the Lion of Scotland was engaged to take part with them, and the great Earls of the middle and north of England, Leicester, Ferrars of Derby, Chester, and Bigod, joined in the general alliance. Henry, though alarmed, did not despair. His policy had led him to trust much to his auxiliaries, and with these he determined to withstand the feudal malcontents. Leaving his generals to resist the attack from Flanders and France, he won a great battle before Dol in Brittany, took the great Earl of Chester prisoner, and re-established his power in that province. Meanwhile, Leicester had been besieged by Lucy, his justiciary in England; the efforts of William the Lion, who demanded Northumberland and refused homage for Huntingdon, were thwarted by the brave defence of the border castles; and an invasion of Flemings from the East, headed by the Earl of Leicester, was defeated at Farnham, near Bury St. Edmunds. But the existing truce with France terminated at Easter; the king of that country was able to enter actively into the war; and Henry's successes, and the large offers he made his sons, seemed alike unavailing. Hostilities began again, and Henry was obliged to take the command in person in his hereditary provinces, Maine and Anjou, where he was received with enthusiasm. The troops of his son Richard were conquered; while in England the King's natural son, Geoffrey Plantagenet, and Richard de Lucy, made head against the nobles in the East and a fresh invasion from Scotland; but were still so pressed, that messengers were sent in haste to summon Henry across the Channel. It was indeed a moment of great danger.

Crisis of the danger.
1174.

Philip of Flanders and his allies, to whom Kent had been promised, were assembling a fleet at Whitsand; the Scotch invaders had reached Alnwick. Henry hastened home. But before he proceeded to active measures, in deference to the popular feeling, which attributed his difficulties to the Divine anger at Becket's death, he made a pilgrimage and did penance at the shrine of the martyr. Immediately after this, while still in anxious doubt as to the fate of his kingdom, news was brought him that Ranulf de Glanvill had surprised the Scotch at Alnwick, and that William the Lion and many of his nobility

Henry's penance at Canterbury.

Capture of the Scotch King at Alnwick.

were prisoners. A few days afterwards the town of Huntingdon was taken, and Hugh, the Bishop of Durham, who had joined the insurgents, conquered. By July all the English nobles had returned to their allegiance, and Prince David had withdrawn the Scotch troops. The same rapidity which saved England saved Normandy also. The sudden arrival of the King before Rouen raised the siege of that place, which had been hard pressed, and before long a peace between Henry and Louis was made, by which all the French conquests were restored, and the young King Henry's dependants had to abjure the fealty which they had taken to him. The great insurrection which for a moment had threatened the existence of Henry's monarchy was thus over. To his sons Henry was merciful. To Richard he granted two castles in Poitou, with half its revenues; to Geoffrey, similar terms in Brittany. They were required to renew their allegiance. William of Scotland was forced to content himself with harder terms. He was only released upon condition of appearing at York in the following year with all his barons, and swearing fealty to Henry as his suzerain. He and his brother did homage for Scotland, for Galloway, and for their English possessions; while the Scotch clergy acknowledged the supremacy of the Archbishop of York. In the following year the young Henry left his French patron and reconciled himself completely with his father.

This outbreak may be regarded as a consequence of Henry's defeat in his dispute with Becket. The King had shown how little that defeat had weakened his real power in temporal matters. His appointments to the vacant bishoprics, which were a necessary consequence of the termination of that quarrel, prove how little he had really lost even in ecclesiastical influence. Of the six bishoprics which were filled up, three were given to avowed partisans of the King. Winchester fell to Richard of Ilchester; Ely, to Godfrey Ridel, Becket's great opponent; and Lincoln to Geoffrey Plantagenet; while, shortly after, the Bishopric of Norwich was given to John of Oxford, who had been Henry's chief agent throughout the Becket difficulty. Such disputes as still existed in the Church ceased to have political meaning, and assumed the form of quarrels between the monks and the secular clergy. It was thus that Richard, the Prior of Dover, a man in the royal interests, was elected to succeed Becket after a lengthened dispute between the monks of the Holy Trinity at Canterbury, who claimed the right of election, and the bishops of the province. Henry's influence was

Henry's complete success.

Small diminution of Henry's power, either temporal or ecclesiastical.

naturally employed in favour of the episcopal candidate, but he contrived to confine the dispute within the limits of the ecclesiastical body.

The period which elapsed between the suppression of the great rebellion and the outbreak of the quarrel between Henry and his sons is the period of his greatest power. It is at this time that we find the greatest marks of his activity as a lawgiver. The year 1176

Henry's judicial and constitutional changes.

is marked by the great Assize of Northampton, an expansion of a similar Assize of Clarendon in the year 1166, the fruit perhaps of his experience in the late rebellion, and the knowledge gained by his inquiries into the conduct of the sheriffs in 1170. That inquiry, which was called for by the complaints of the exactions of the sheriffs, proved to him that their conduct had not been free from peculation, and led him to believe that the employment of local nobles as his chief officials was dangerous. He took the opportunity of making a general examination of the judicial system of the country, the fruit of which was the concentration and organization of the Curia Regis, and the arrangements embodied in the Assize of Northampton.

The Curia
Regis.

The King's court consisted originally, as has been already mentioned, of all those tenants who held their land direct from the crown (tenants in capite), and was the ordinary feudal court, and the natural parent of our present Parliament, and especially of the House of Lords. But for the ordinary despatch of business, whether judicial or financial, what may be regarded as a permanent committee of this body of immediate holders was employed. This committee consisted of the great officers of the household, such as the chancellor, treasurer, marshal and others, and other selected barons closely connected with the royal household. The head of this committee, or Curia Regis, was the great justiciary, the King's representative. The royal chaplains or clerks were formed into a body of secretaries, at the head of which was the chancellor. The Curia Regis at first attended the King and had a twofold duty; when they sat as judges its members were called justices, in financial questions they sat in the exchequer¹ chamber, and were called barons. This administrative system, which had been organized in Henry I.'s reign, was entirely destroyed by the wild reign of Stephen. Its reconstitution was the great work of Henry II. In the earlier part of his reign the visitations were renewed upon justices.

Itinerant

the old system, the itinerant justice being usually either the great justiciary, chancellor, or some other great household officer. In the year 1168 four barons of the exchequer performed this duty; in 1176 the country was divided into six circuits. This number was not permanent, several alterations were made in it. Nor was the number of visitations thoroughly established. By Magna Charta in John's reign commissions are promised four times a year, but shortly afterwards it would seem that the general journey of the itinerant justices was every seven years, until the reign of Edward I. It is to be remembered that these visitations were for all sorts of objects; for hearing civil cases, for inspecting the working of criminal jurisdiction, and, perhaps before all things, for arranging the financial matters of the country, and superintending the sheriffs in all matters connected with the exchequer. The itinerant justices during their circuits superseded the sheriff's authority and presided in his courts. They were also allowed to enter and preside in the baronial courts. It has been mentioned that these courts were in most respects complete Hundreds. The two parallel systems, now on certain occasions presided over by the same official, were thus assimilated and brought into immediate connection with the central authority. This administrative organization gave rise to what is of much political importance, a new class of barons, new men who had risen by their talents and by the King's favour, whose interests were therefore on the side of order and of the crown. At one period, in 1178, Henry II. appears to have found his new ministers untrustworthy, at all events in that year he restricted the Curia Regis to five persons, keeping the highest appellate jurisdiction in the hands of himself and the old Curia Regis, which may henceforth be regarded as the King's ordinary council. The name Curia Regis has thus passed through three phases; a feudal court, a permanent committee of the feudal court, and a restricted committee of that committee. In these various bodies we have the sources of all the judicial bodies in England. The feudal court, with certain additions, became the Parliament; without those additions the Great Council, retaining its natural prerogative of final court of appeal, and represented now by the House of Lords. The permanent committee, or ordinary council, is represented by the privy council, still retaining some of its judicial powers. From its body of clerks, headed by the chancellor, arose the courts of Chancery. While the limited committee was divided shortly after the Magna Charta into three courts, the exchequer, the common pleas, and the king's bench, at first with the same judges for all, but by the end of Edward III.'s reign with a separate staff.

¹ So called from a table chequered like a chessboard, and used for reckoning.

Henry's legal mind, which thus organized the administration, introduced many improvements in judicial procedure. It is to this reign that can be traced the origin of trial by jury. This method was not employed first in criminal cases, but in carrying out inquiries of various kinds. As soon as such inquiries came to be made on oath, the beginning of the jury system had arrived. As early as the great Domesday survey, the sheriff, barons, freeholders, the priest, the reeve, and six villeins of each township, had been all examined upon oath. Judicially this method of inquiry was first applied in civil cases. By the ordinance of the Grand Assize, a choice was given to any person whose right to the possession of land was called in question. He might either if he pleased defend his claims by the old-fashioned appeal to battle, or he might have his right examined by twelve freeholders on their oath, selected by four freeholders also on their oath, nominated by the sheriff. These sworn freeholders were evidently at first witnesses; twelve others were subsequently added to them, who, from their neighbourhood or other reasons, might be supposed to be better acquainted with the facts. This took place in Edward I.'s reign. The double jury was then separated, the original twelve playing their part as jurors of the present day, judging of the facts asserted by the second twelve, who represent the witnesses. In 1166, by the Assize of Clarendon, the same process was extended to criminal cases; that is to say, twelve lawful men from each hundred, and four from each township, were sworn to inquire whether there were any criminal, or receiver of criminals, in their district, and to present the same to the itinerant justices or to the sheriffs. These criminals were then put to the ordeal without further investigation. This was the origin of the grand jury. The abolition of ordeal rendered some substitute necessary, and ordinary trial by jury was the consequence.

The Assize of Northampton in 1176 was, as has been said, a repetition in stronger terms of the Assize of Clarendon. It is moreover interesting, as giving a notion of the duties of the itinerant justices, who on this occasion were six in number. Not only was the examination of crimes in their hands, but they had to arrange the law with regard to tenure of land, reliefs of heirs, dowers of widows, and other such matters, and to exact fealty from all classes of the commonwealth, and to see to the complete destruction of private castles, and the secure guardianship of those of the crown. These latter points were probably rendered necessary by the Rebellion of 1174. The same feeling of mistrust of his feudal barons which dictated these precautions was the cause of two other measures of this reign. The military service of the tenants in chief was changed into a money payment called scutage. This money enabled the King to hire men for his foreign wars, and to dispense with the service of his barons; while, by the Assize of Arms in 1181, the national militia of England, the old fyrd of the Saxons, to follow which was one of the duties of the trinoda necessitas, was reorganized, and the arms required of each class in the country carefully defined.

At the same time that Henry was thus organizing his authority in England, his position in Europe was a great one. Two of his sons were married or betrothed to daughters of the King of France. Of his three daughters, the eldest was the wife of Henry the Lion of Saxony, the rival of Frederick Barbarossa; the second, Eleanor, was Queen of Castile; the third, Joanna, though still a child, was taken to Sicily as the bride of the Norman king of that country, which at this time was the dominant power of the Mediterranean. His importance indeed was such that he seemed of all the kings in Europe most firmly seated on his throne, and was selected on account of his power and character, as well as for family reasons, as arbitrator between Alphonso of Castile and his uncle Sancho of Navarre, and as the strongest ally to whom Henry the Lion could have recourse when he was stripped of his German possessions. This befell him in consequence of his desertion of Frederick Barbarossa before his invasion of Lombardy, which terminated in the great battle of Legnano. But in the midst of his greatness there were two dangers constantly besetting Henry; on the one hand was the King of France, on the other were his own children. Not only did the great power of a feudatory naturally excite the French King's jealousy, Henry had pursued a crooked policy with regard to the marriage of his sons; he had refused to surrender to Louis the Vexin and Bourges as he had promised to do upon their marriages. There was thus a constant opportunity for quarrel. On the other hand, with regard to his sons, his measures had been still more unfortunate. Anxious to secure his succession, and conscious probably that his kingdom was too large to be held by one hand, he had caused his eldest son to be crowned, thus exciting the envy of his brothers; while, at the same time, he had given them large duchies, which rendered them nearly independent of him. In addition to this, his dislike for his wife had rendered her a constant enemy, while his foolish affection for his youngest son John gave still further cause of offence. When there-

Scutage.

Assize of arms.

Henry's importance in Europe.

Closing troubles with his sons and France.

fore, as was likely to happen, any of his sons determined to oppose him, they were certain of assistance from France, and of bad advice from their mother.

It is difficult to arrange the constant brief wars which characterized the close of his reign, complicated as they are by the rising interests in the affairs of the East, which were gradually bringing on the third Crusade. They may perhaps be divided into four; the first extending to the death of young Henry; the second to the death of Geoffrey of Brittany; the third from 1184 to a peace negotiated in the interests of the crusades in 1188; and the last, the quarrel with Richard and John, which terminated with the King's death. The first of these broke out in 1183. Richard had entered with zest into the wild feudal life of Poitou and Aquitaine, and had been very successful there. He had even pushed his arms to Bayonne, in the territories of the Basques, and to the borders of Navarre. This had aroused the envy of his elder brother. This young prince, who regarded himself, and was regarded by many, as the flower of knighthood, was capable of any amount of hypocrisy and double dealing, and seems to have so far cajoled his father as to persuade him to demand from his younger brothers homage to the elder. This Richard positively refused to give. But his arbitrary rule in Poitou and Aquitaine had made him many enemies, at the head of whom was the wild intriguing noble, at once warrior and troubadour, Bertram de Born. With these young Henry allied himself, and, with the aid of his brother from Brittany, pressed so heavily upon Richard, that the old king had to come to his assistance. At this crisis the young king caught a fever and died, forgiven but unvisited by his father. The King took advantage of his son's death to pursue his success, and succeeded in subjugating the refractory barons, and re-establishing peace. Conscious that the young King Philip II. of France, who had succeeded to the throne in 1180, and over whom he had once had much influence, had been mixed in his son's rebellion, Henry tried to make peace with him too. Philip met the request by a demand for the restitution of Gisors and the dower of his sister Margaret, young Henry's widow, and it was with much difficulty that temporary peace was patched up; but it was finally arranged that part of the dowry should be restored, and Gisors transferred to Richard on his marriage with the Princess Alice.

Constantly unwise in his conduct to his sons, Henry now demanded from Richard, perhaps as a recompense for his assistance, a part of Aquitaine, to be given to his favourite son John. This Richard refused

First war; against young Henry.
1183.

to give, and consequently both John and Geoffrey of Brittany attacked him. But though Geoffrey was thus ready enough to quarrel with his elder brother, it was from no love of his father that he did so. He, as well as Richard, was hurt by Henry's evident partiality for John. He took the opportunity of putting in his own claim for Anjou. On Henry's refusal, he at once fled to France, where he was as usual well received. His death relieved his father for the time from his opposition, but sowed the seed of further difficulties; for on the one hand his province Brittany was at once divided between the French and English faction, and on the other King Philip II. raised claims as overlord to the guardianship of his young son Arthur. There was a growing disinclination however on all sides to plunge into war; for the Pope was constantly urging a general peace, and the combination of Christian princes for the great Eastern Crusade. A succession of weak princes, and the unnatural and artificial character of the feudal kingdom of Jerusalem, together with the rise of the new Mahomedan power of the Saracens under Saladin, had reduced European power in the East to a very low ebb; and in 1184, Heraclius, the Bishop of Jerusalem, had found it necessary to come over, to attempt to persuade the Kings of England and France to embark in a new crusade. But to Henry, although under a pledge to join such an expedition, the idea of leaving his European dominions in their present critical situation was very distasteful, and he consequently postponed taking action. The feeling however that a crusade was imminent rendered hostilities more difficult; so that when, in 1187, the arbitrary behaviour of Richard in Aquitaine had produced fresh difficulties with France, which as usual terminated in the flight of Richard and the junction of his interests with those of his father, the news of the great battle of Hettin, in which the flower of the Christian army of Jerusalem had been entirely destroyed, and the arrival of William of Tyre for the purpose of exciting the enthusiasm of the West, put a sudden end to the hostilities; and, in 1188, the two kings met in perfect friendship under the old elm in the neighbourhood of Gisors, which was their usual place of treaty, and joined with apparent heartiness in taking the Cross. Upon this occasion Henry imposed upon England the tax, known as the Saladin tax, which was a tenth on all property, and in the collection of which the King's officers were to work hand in hand with the Church.

But nothing could keep the restless Richard in order; before the year

Second war, against Richard.
1184.

Third war.
1187.

was over, he was engaged in fresh quarrels with Geoffrey of Lusignan and Raymond of Toulouse. After mutual demands for the ransom of some captives, Richard advanced in arms against Raymond, who applied to his suzerain Philip for assistance. This open attack on his dominions Philip could not put up with. At length he declared himself the open enemy of the English. It was in vain that his great feudatories reminded him that he was under the crusader's vow, in vain that a meeting was held at Gisors. The enmity of the kings was only thereby enflamed, and, in token of his eternal hostility, Philip had the old elm of reconciliation hewn down. One would have supposed that Richard, the cause of the quarrel, would have clung to his father; nor is the reason for his not doing so very plain. Perhaps it may be traced to his father's refusal to give him up Alice, the French King's sister, for his wife, wishing it is said to make her his own; perhaps it was continued jealousy of his brother John. Certainly he did betake himself to the French court, and with him many others of Henry's French feudatories fell away. Henry thus found himself in a difficult situation; broken in mind and body, his resources strained to the utmost by the late heavy taxation of England, and his nobles rapidly deserting him.

His health appears to have influenced his mind. He remained inactive at Le Mans, while Philip overran Maine and threatened to besiege Tours. At length Le Mans, where Henry was with his son Geoffrey, was taken. The city where he had himself been born was the particular object of Henry's love. He felt its loss as a heavy blow, and though he knew his weakness, could not bring himself to retreat to Normandy, where his chief strength lay. With a sudden accession of energy, he reappeared in Anjou. But his appearance had no effect. One by one the fortresses of Maine were captured, and Philip constantly approached Tours. When that town fell, Henry's spirit was quite broken. He agreed to an interview with Richard and Philip on the plain of Colombières, to make his submission. Almost fainting, and held upon his horse by his attendants, in the midst of a violent thunderstorm, he met his undutiful son, and brought himself to give him the kiss of peace, whispering as he did so, however, "May God not let me die until I have taken me due vengeance on thee." The terms of his submission were complete. He promised to give up the Princess Alice; he allowed his nobility to swear fealty for their lands to his son Richard; he promised to pay Philip 50,000 marks for the restoration of his conquests. He had asked, in exchange, for a list of those 1189.

Last War; with Richard and Philip.

Henry's disastrous peace and death.

nobles who had joined Richard in rebellion. When he found at the head of the list the name of his beloved son John, his heart was broken. "I care no more for myself nor for the world," he said. A day or two longer he lingered, and was carried to Chinon, murmuring at intervals, "Shame, shame, on a conquered king," and there died, attended only by his natural son and Chancellor Geoffrey.¹

It is scarcely possible to place the importance of this reign too high, or to overvalue the work of Henry II. We find in his reign the organization of almost all departments of the government subsequently completed by Edward I. The arrangements of the Curia Regis and the reforms in judicial procedure have been already mentioned. The exchequer also was put on a new footing. It now becomes possible to see with some clearness the sources and amount of the royal revenue. To the revenues derived from the domain lands and from the Danegelt, the Norman kings had added feudal dues. Both the proceeds of the royal domain and of the Danegelt appear to have been farmed. The farm of the counties amounted in Henry II.'s reign, after the deductions caused by the grants both of Stephen and of Henry, to about £8000 a year. The Danegelt, originally two shillings on every hide, amounted in Henry I.'s reign to about £2500. As this is about a tenth of what the tax would have produced had it been fully exacted, it must probably also have been farmed to the sheriff, who collected what he could of it, and paid a fixed sum to the exchequer. This unsatisfactory tax came to an end in Henry II.'s reign, perhaps through the agency of Becket. The other source of revenue was the Donum and Arcilium, contributions paid by vassals to assist their lords. The first term applied to the counties, the second to the towns. These names became the general names of all irregular imposts, which are also sometimes called hidage, scutage, or tallage, the tallage being the aid raised from towns, the scutage the aid raised from knights' fees, the hidage the aid raised from tenants in socage. The importance of the scutage as a commutation for military service has been already dwelt upon. Recourse appears to have been had to these scutages only three or four times during the reign. To these sources of revenue are to be added the fees from the law courts, and the incomes arising from feudal incidents, such as wardship, marriage, and reliefs. The whole income of the country was perhaps about £50,000. The taxes seem to have been assessed by Barons of the Exchequer, aided by the declaration of the knights as to their own holdings, by juries in the case of minor tenants. But it was not only in details of administration that Henry showed his character. He constantly summoned great councils, and as his power was so great and centralized that he could certainly have acted without them, this appears to show a fixed intention on his part to assume the position of a national and constitutional king. The general effect of his work at home was to form the nation. Normans became English. The English no longer felt themselves a conquered people. Their oppressors, the feudal nobility, were destroyed or kept in restraint. The new nobles were chiefly ministers of the crown, and all sections of the people looked to the King as the national representative. The importance of Henry's reign abroad was scarcely less striking. His immense continental dominions made him one of the great powers of Europe. His close contact with France, and the difficulties which it produced, began the hereditary policy of opposition to that country which has characterized the whole of English history. On the other hand, though he may have had no clear view of what he was doing, he set on foot also the lasting friendships of the nation. The marriage of his daughter with the Guelph Duke brought England into constant friendship with Germany, and caused Otho, the son of Henry the Lion, to be brought up in England, and to be regarded as an English prince. The marriage of his other daughter with Spain set on foot that connection which lasted even beyond the Reformation. His work as a whole may be summed up in the words of Professor Stubbs: "He was faithful to the letter of his engagements. He recovered the demesne rights of the crown, so that his royal dignity did not depend for maintenance on constant taxation. He restored the usurped estates; he destroyed the illegal castles, and the system which they typified; he maintained the royal hold on the lawful ones, and the equality and uniformity of justice which their usurpers had subverted; he restored internal peace, and with it plenty, as the riches of England in the following reign amply testify. He arranged the administration of justice by enacting good laws and appointing faithful judges. He restored the currency; he encouraged commerce, he maintained the privileges of the towns; and, without encouraging an aggressive spirit, armed his people for self-defence. He sustained the form, and somewhat of the spirit of national representation. The clergy had grounds of complaint against him for very important reasons; but their chief complaints were caused by their preference for the immunities of their class to the common safeguard of justice."

¹ The details of the King's last days are to be found in Giraldus Cambrensis, and in Hoveden. They are thrown together in an eloquent passage by Professor Stubbs in his Preface to Hoveden.

RICHARD I.

1189—1199.

Born 1157 = Berengaria of Navarre.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
William, 1165.	Philip Augustus, 1180.	Frederick Barbossa, 1155. Henry VI., 1191. Philip, 1198.	Alphonso IX., 1158.

POPES.—Clement III., 1187. Celestine III., 1191. Innocent III., 1198.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Baldwin, 1185—1190. Reginald Fitz-Jocelin, 1191. Hubert Walter, 1193.	Hugh of Durham, and William Earl of Essex, 1189. William Longchamp, 1190. Walter of Rouen, 1191—1194. Hubert Walter, 1194—1198. Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, 1198—1199.	William Longchamp, 1189. Eustace, Bishop of Ely, 1197.

RICHARD began his reign with some show of penitence. He got absolution for his disobedience to his father, and gave his friendship to the existing ministers, with the exception of the Seneschal of Anjou and Ranulf de Glanvill. It is possible that the government of this great justiciary had been over arbitrary, for in England, where his mother acted principally for him, Richard is said to have freed all those prisoners who were confined by the orders of his father or the justiciary, but demanded bail for those who were legally imprisoned. He also seems to have punished the severity of some of the sheriffs. His coronation pomp was interrupted by a strange disturbance. The Jews had been ordered to absent themselves from the ceremony. This strange people had been admitted to England by the Conqueror; the only capitalists of the time, their ability and willingness to lend money rendered them invaluable both to the rising industry of the country and to the crown; and to their knowledge is due much of the growth in science which was beginning to be made in this century. So great was their use, in spite of the heavy usury they demanded, that they were allowed to establish themselves in various towns, in districts known as Jewries, to build synagogues, and follow their own customs. They were not however admitted to full citizenship. The Jewries, like the forests, were not under the protection of the common law of the country, but were entirely in the King's power. In spite of the evident advantages derived from their presence in England, their wealth, their foreign manners, their high usury, and their strange worship rendered them objects at once of contempt and hatred to the people. Some of them, in spite of the order forbidding their presence, showed themselves at the ceremony of the consecration. They were assaulted by the soldiery. This gave a signal to the crowd who attacked the detested people in all parts of the city. Nor was this all; the same feeling spread throughout England. In some places the Jews gained safety by conversion; but early in 1190, in Norwich, in Stamford, and in York, many were put to death. In the last-mentioned place, the Jews sought refuge in the castle, and being besieged there, determined to die together. Firing the tower, they first killed their own women and children, and then sprang with them into the flames.

Persecution of the Jews.

In fact, the Crusades brought with them a passion for adventure and licentiousness, as well as religious enthusiasm. This spirit was now abroad in England, and the King, with his wild love of adventure at any price, was its fitting representative. For the sake of adventure, honesty, good government, and national honour, were sacrificed. Thus there was scarcely an office which was not openly put up for sale; cities bought their charters, judges their seats on the bench, bishops their sees. Thus too Hugh de Pudsey bought the Earldom of Northumberland for £1000; and Longchamp, the Bishopric of Ely for £3000; while the King relinquished all the advantages his father had won over William the Lion of Scotland for 10,000 marks; it was for Huntingdon alone that the Northern King did fealty to Richard.

All offices put up for sale.

Having by such unjustifiable means procured money for his purposes, entirely regardless of the misery he could scarcely fail to leave behind him, Richard crossed over to France to join his forces with those of Philip Augustus. Such precautions as he did take against maladministration in England were not of the wisest. He put the whole power into the

Starts for the Crusade, leaving England to Longchamp.
1190.

hands of William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, whom he made at once Chancellor and Chief Justiciary, securing for him also the authority of Papal Legate. But Longchamp was a man who could not fail to have many enemies. Of low extraction, and regarded as merely the favourite of Richard, he was fond of exhibiting his grandeur in the most ostentatious manner; moreover, in making him justiciary Richard supplanted Hugh de Pudsey, to whom the office had already been given. Pudsey did not surrender without some opposition. He obtained from the King letters patent, naming him justiciary north of the Humber: when he exhibited these to Longchamp, the Chancellor contrived indeed to entrap him to London, and there made him surrender his claims, but he had made himself a powerful enemy for life. Richard also, as a second precaution, made his brother John, and his half-brother Geoffrey, who had got the Archbishopric of York in exchange for the chancellorship, promise not to enter England during his absence. But he afterwards unwisely absolved John from his vow. He thus left behind him in England a possible claimant to the succession, whose power as a baron was very great, for he was the possessor of Derbyshire, the inheritance of the Earl of Gloucester, which he had obtained by marriage, and of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, and Somerset, which Richard had himself given him.

The death of William II. of Sicily, and of the French Queen Isabella, delayed the Crusade till June 1190. But at the end of that month, the Kings set out towards their first point, which was Sicily, Philip by Genoa, Richard by Marseilles. At the same time, a fleet of more than a hundred sail left the harbours of Brittany and Guienne. On reaching Sicily the friendship of the two kings was at first most edifying, but it was not long before various causes of dispute arose between them. To the inhabitants of the island the Crusaders seemed a horde of new invaders. The overbearing character of Richard exasperated the feelings of jealousy thus aroused. The conciliatory manners of Philip, on the other hand, were such that he was known as the Lamb, in contradistinction to Richard, who was called the Lion. The difference of feeling with which they were regarded was plainly shown when, on the occasion of some quarrel, the town of Messina was closed against Richard, while Philip was admitted within its walls. The enemies of the French King suggested indeed that his mildness was a proof of treasonable lukewarmness towards his fellow Crusaders. These suspicions were afterwards confirmed. On the death of William II.,¹ Tancred, an illegitimate son of

Quarrels with
Philip in Sicily.

¹ See genealogy at the end of the chapter.

William's brother Roger, had seized the throne, despoiling of her rights Constance, the daughter of Roger and the wife of Henry VI. of Germany, and keeping in some sort of confinement Richard's sister Joanna, the widow of William the Good, and retaining the dowry secured her by her husband's will. The enmity thus excited in Richard's mind gave way, after a lengthened dispute, to the natural feeling of friendship between the two Norman houses. Joanna and her dowry were given back to Richard; and at one of the meetings between the two princes, Tancred informed him of a plot on the part of the French to fall treacherously on the English army. Philip does not seem to have denied the charge, and it was perhaps the consciousness of his guilt which prevented him from making any effectual opposition when Richard repudiated his sister Alice. Contrary to the national feelings, and on purely political grounds, Richard had been contracted to this princess by his father. He now, throwing over this unnatural match, sought for himself a wife from Spain, a country then and for long afterwards connected by close friendship with England. This wife was Berengaria, the daughter of Sancho I. of Navarre. Though unavenged, the insult was felt. From that time onwards Philip and Richard were enemies.

At length the armies broke up from Sicily and sailed for Acre. With the three leading ships of the English fleet were Berengaria and the King's sister Joanna. Richard brought up the rear. Two of the Queen's vessels were wrecked upon the Isle of Cyprus, and their crew imprisoned by Isaac, the ruler of that island. This monarch, a descendant of the Emperor John Comnenus, banished from Byzantium, had established himself with the title of Emperor in the Isle of Cyprus. He was an inhuman tyrant, the dread of pilgrims and of shipwrecked sailors. He tried to entice the two queens to land, but luckily Richard's fleet arrived. The Cyprians were driven from

Conquers
Cyprus.
1191.

Lymesol, where the King established his court. He there received Guy of Lusignan, the nominal King of Jerusalem, completed his marriage with Berengaria, and made a treaty with Isaac. But when the Emperor sought to evade his engagements, Richard conquered the rest of the island, and organized it in the feudal fashion. On the 8th of July he reached Acre. The arrival of this warlike prince raised the spirit of the besiegers, who were in a very depressed condition. The siege had lasted since 1189, having been undertaken by Guy of Lusignan, who saw the importance of the place, if he was to continue to hold his kingdom. This was indeed a doubtful question. The Christian fortunes had sunk very low. Among the Mahomedans power after power had arisen with rapid success, and sunk as rapidly under the attacks of its own slaves or vassals. As the Abbassid Caliphs yielded to the Seljukian Turks, the Seljukians in their turn yielded to the Atabeks. The power of this race was brought to its height by Nouredin, who established his rule at Damascus, and extended it even into Egypt. Saladin, the son of Ayub, had attended his uncle Shiracouh, when he destroyed the rule of the Fatimite Caliphs in Egypt, and brought that province under the power of Nouredin. On Nouredin's death, Saladin acquired possession of Egypt, to which he subsequently added the provinces of Damascus and Aleppo, and raised an empire which reached from Tripoli in Africa to the Tigris. It was this new warlike power which had overwhelmed the kingdom of Jerusalem. Baldwin IV.,¹ King of Jerusalem, became a leper. His sister Sybilla married Guy of Lusignan, a French prince of weak character, who succeeded to the throne. His elevation excited the jealousy of Raymond, Count of Tripoli, the greatest of his vassals. By his treacherous advice, Saladin attacked Tiberias. To complete his treachery, Raymond persuaded the Christians to take up a position in a camp destitute of water, and withdrew with his forces at the moment of attack. Jerusalem taken by Saladin. 1187. The destruction of the Christians was complete. In a few months Jerusalem itself was taken, and Tyre and Tripoli the only places left in Christian hands. Tyre was defended with success by the bravery of Conrad of Montferrat, who, in consequence of this success, was regarded as the great champion of the Christians. He had married a young sister of Sybilla of Lusignan, and upon the death of Sybilla, holding that the right went to the living princess, his wife, rather than to Lusignan, the husband of the dead princess, he demanded the throne. Meanwhile Guy besieged Acre, thirty miles south of Tyre, and was there surrounded by an army under the command of Saladin, and cut off from all assistance except by sea. It was under these circumstances, in the midst of the disputed succession to the throne, that the third crusade had begun. Frederick Barbarossa, who had marched with the Germans by land, perished on the road, and the Duke of Swabia reached the camp with only five thousand wearied men. The arrival of the hosts of England and France by sea changed the aspect of affairs; and the kingdom might have been regained had it not been for the bad feeling which existed between Richard and Philip, which found new food in the rivalry of Acre besieged.

1189.

Arrival of the Crusaders.

¹ See genealogy at the end of the chapter.

the two claimants for the crown of Jerusalem. Conrad of Montferrat at once allied himself with the French monarch; Guy of Lusignan, whose family in Languedoc were English vassals, attached himself to Richard. Directed by the enthusiasm of Richard, who, whenever mere fighting was the question, came prominently forward, the arms of the besiegers were successful, and Acre fell. The superiority which Richard acquired in actual warfare added fresh fuel to Philip's anger. There were besides certain circumstances in his own kingdom, where he had lately acquired Flanders, which seemed to require his presence. He therefore withdrew from the crusade, leaving the Duke of Burgundy with a part of his army under Richard's command. Had Richard been a general as well as a soldier, he had still forces enough to have brought this crusade to a successful issue. As it was, it consisted but of a series of brilliant but useless skirmishes. Even the great battle of Arsouf, which Richard won in September on his way to Joppa, brought him no nearer his object.

The presence of Philip in France, in close proximity to his own dominions, made him wish to be at home; and in 1192 he began negotiations with Saladin. He might even yet have been successful. In the course of the year he marched within sight of the Holy City.

But his allies insisted that the capture was impossible, and he withdrew to Ascalon. There all causes for giving up his enterprise became stronger. The split with France widened. He quarrelled deeply with the Archduke of Austria, and with the faction of Conrad of Montferrat, who was also intriguing with Saladin. News of the disturbances in his own kingdom reached him. Everything urged him to go home. He summoned a council to settle the dispute as to the kingdom, was astonished when Conrad was named, but unwillingly gave his consent. At this very time, in what appeared to be only too opportune a moment for Richard, Conrad was murdered, as there seems no reason to doubt, by two members of the sect of the Assassins sent by the Old Man of the Mountain;¹ but the crime was soon fastened upon Richard. For the present, however, he was free to take advantage of the death of Montferrat. Sure of the incompetence of Lusignan, he gave the kingdom to Henry of Champagne. To save appearances, he made one quarrels with Austria.

Richard

Richard saves
Acre.

Philip goes home.

¹ A fanatical sect established in 1090 in the mountains of North Persia. They had two chief places, the one the fortress of Alamout in Persia, the other Masgat in the mountains of Libanus. Their name is derived from Haschisch, an intoxicating drink with which they raised their enthusiasm.

more rapid advance towards Jerusalem, but halted within sight of the city, apparently overborne by the argument that an attack on Egypt would be more profitable. Hearing that Saladin was besieging Joppa, he hastened to the relief of that town, and there won his final victory. Both he and Saladin were worn in health and weary of the strife. A three years' truce was arranged between them. By this it was agreed that Ascalon should be shared with the Turks, while the Christians should possess from Joppa to Tyre, the Counts of Tripoli and Antioch should be included in the treaty, and pilgrims have free access to Jerusalem. He then set off on his homeward voyage.

It was indeed time for the King to return. Richard had left William of Ely the chief command both in Church and State. An ambitious upstart, of ostentatious habits, William speedily roused against himself the bitterest hatred. He had one dangerous enemy who could give a voice to this unpopularity. This was the King's brother John, who wished to secure what he believed would be the speedy succession to the throne, while William sought to give a seeming legality to his position by upholding the claim of young Arthur of Brittany. Hence arose two great factions in the kingdom. The King, hearing in Sicily of the misdeeds of his Chancellor, had commissioned Archbishop Walter of Rouen, and William, the heir of Strongbow of Pembroke, if necessary, to remove him from the regency; at all events to join themselves with him and Fitz-Peter in a committee of government. Archbishop Walter shrank from the task. The quarrel came to an issue at Lincoln, which Gerard of Camville held in the interests of John, and which the Chancellor claimed for the crown. John seized the royal castles of Nottingham and Tickhill, and the question was brought before a meeting at Winchester, where a compromise was effected. A second cause of quarrel occurred, when the Bishop caused Geoffrey, the King's natural brother, the new Archbishop of York, who had landed in England contrary to his oath, to be apprehended in the very church at Dover. The two brothers made common cause. They demanded satisfaction for Geoffrey, and summoned a meeting between Reading and Windsor. Meanwhile the Chancellor suddenly left Windsor, and shut himself up in the Tower of London, and the meeting reassembled in St. Paul's. There all the charges against the Chancellor were produced; Hugh of Durham produced his old grievances, Geoffrey of York his late injuries. The Tower was ill provided with food; the Chancellor was obliged to 1192.

Truce with Saladin.

John's behaviour in England.
1191.

appear and to plead; but now at length Richard's envoys produced their authority. Longchamp was dismissed from his offices. Walter of Rouen was put in his place, and the fallen Chancellor took refuge in France. The Pope received him, and excommunicated his enemies; but as usual this proceeding, when against the popular feeling, had but little effect.

Meanwhile Philip Augustus had been returning from the Holy Land. In December 1192 he reached Paris, and early in the following year demanded from the Seneschal of Normandy the restoration of his sister Alice, the Castle of Gisors, and the towns of Aumale and Eu, which he said that Richard had promised him. On the refusal of this request he began to tamper with John, begging him to come to him, when Normandy and England should be assured to him. John was stopped from immediate action by the influence of Queen Eleanor, but the disorder in the country was becoming flagrant. Richard's French vassals in Aquitaine were with difficulty suppressed.

It was plain that the return of the King alone could save the kingdom. Yet those English pilgrims who returned home before Christmas were surprised to find the King yet absent. He did not come, and the gloomy news was at length noised abroad that he was in a dungeon in Germany. He had attempted to return by sea, but afraid to travel through France, he had made his way up the Adriatic, intending to cross Germany to the dominions of his friend and relative the Duke of Saxony. Travelling in disguise, he had been discovered while in the Duchy of Austria; and the Archduke, whose anger he had roused at Ascalon, made him his prisoner. He shortly after sold him to Henry Return of Philip Augustus.

Need of Richard's return.

His imprisonment in Germany.

John and Philip combine against him.

VI., Emperor of Germany. The capture of the King, whose name was in every one's mouth, strongly excited the feelings of Europe, and steps were immediately taken for his liberation. But to John his imprisonment served only as a means of aggrandizement. He hurried abroad, did homage to Philip, purchasing his favour with Gisors, the Vexin, and with Tours. and pledging himself not to make peace with his brother without Philip's permission. He tried to persuade the English justiciaries that his brother was dead, and secured, with his auxiliaries, Wallingford and Windsor. Philip, too, basely took advantage of his rival's position, used all his influence to lengthen his imprisonment, broke off the feudal connection between them, and invaded his dominions Richard's subjects were, however, remarkably true to him. The justiciaries, assisted by Queen Eleanor, boldly opposed John in England, and the burghers of Rouen put Philip to a shameful flight.

In Germany Richard did homage to Henry for England. The connection of England with Germany makes it possible that there may have been some political meaning in this act. Some general action against France, or against Apulia, may have been thought of. But it came to nothing. It was afterwards cancelled by Henry himself, and has been generally regarded as a mere formality. However formal the act of homage may have been, Richard was certainly much connected with the German Empire. He mixed authoritatively in the next imperial election, after the death of Henry VI. in 1198; and it was chiefly by his influence that Otho, his nephew, a prince of the Guelphic royal family, and generally regarded as an English prince, was elected to succeed him. Of more immediate importance to England than this connection was the sum of money demanded for the King's ransom. The form of a trial was gone through at Spiers. All the charges which had been brought against him in the East were repeated;—his friendship with Tancred, his victory over Isaac, the murder of Conrad, his insults to Austria, even his final treaty with Saladin. He replied frankly and eloquently to these charges, and it was finally agreed that he should be liberated on the payment of 100,000 marks of silver, and 50,000 additional as a contribution to the Emperor's proposed march against Apulia. He was to be liberated as soon as the first sum was paid; for the payment of the second hostages were to be left. With considerable difficulty the money was collected, chiefly from the estates of the Church; and after some further difficulties, caused by the intrigues of Philip Augustus, in 1194, on the 13th of March the King landed at Sandwich.

His appearance in England at once destroyed the influence of John's party. Hubert the Justiciary had been doing his best to suppress it; such castles as still held out surrendered at the presence of Richard. His residence in England was short. He caused himself to be re-crowned, to remove the stain of his captivity, had recourse to his old nefarious means of gathering money, and then, weary of idleness, crossed into the more troubled country of France. With Philip it was impossible that he should have peace. An almost continuous war between the kings occupied the rest of the reign. Richard never displayed the talents of a general, and the war dwindled into an uninteresting series of petty skirmishes. These were usually decided in favour of Richard. Once, in the year 1196, united action among the enemies of France seemed to threaten Philip with a heavy blow. Raymond of St. Gilles, Richard's old enemy, married his sister, Joanna of Sicily; the Count of Flanders, the Bretons, and the Count of Champagne joined in the league: and in the following year, Count Baldwin of Flanders succeeded in taking Philip prisoner, but he was freed on promising peace; nor for want of leaders did the alliance get much beyond the ordinary petty warfare of the time. At length, in 1198, a truce was patched up by the Papal influence, but before disbanding his troops, Richard led them to attack the Castle of Chaluz, where the Count of

England ransoms him.

Destruction of John's party.

War with France.

Richard's death
at Chaluz.
1199.

Limoges was said to be keeping some treasure which the King claimed. He was there wounded in the shoulder, as he rode round the walls, and the wound proved fatal. During his illness the castle was taken, and all the garrison hanged, with the exception of Bertrand de Gourdon, who had discharged the fatal arrow. He was reserved for the King's own judgment. "What have I done," asked the King, "that you should take my life?" "You have killed my father and my two brothers," answered he, "and I would willingly bear any torture to see you die." King Richard is said, in spite of his merciless temper, to have ordered his life to be spared. Mercadi, the chief of his mercenaries, was not so scrupulous; he had him flayed and hanged.

Although the King himself was but a few months in his own country, the conduct of affairs in England possesses some interest, as showing the further advance of the administrative system established by Henry II. After the King's return from his captivity, and final triumph over the machinations of John, the kingdom was left in the hand of Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury. He had been trained by Glanvill, and belonged to the class of officials created by the late King. It was through his activity that, while the ransom was still being collected, the kingdom was reduced to tranquillity, and John's castles captured in the name of the King. On Richard's withdrawal to his native dominions, Hubert held the three high offices of Justiciary, Archbishop, and Papal Legate. The whole government of the kingdom was virtually in his hands. It was carried on by him in harmony with the system in which he had been trained; and in the instructions given to the justices, for a great visitation of the kingdom in the year 1194, we find the superiority of the central to the local courts still further increased by an order, that sheriffs should not act as justices in their own counties. The dangerous power of these officers was for the time destroyed, when afterwards by the Magna Charta they were forbidden to hold the pleas of the crown at all, that is to say, all business in which the crown was interested was removed from their jurisdiction to that of the central courts. The demands of Richard for money were incessant. And on one occasion, when a large carucage, or tax upon every carucate of land, was demanded, which was in fact a renewal of the Danegelt in another shape, a fresh survey of the country, established by sworn and representative witnesses, and very similar to the Domesday survey, was ordered. In this system of representative inquiry for financial purposes is to be found the beginning of the representative system subsequently employed in Parliament. So heavy were the taxes, that opposition was finally excited, and Hugh of Lincoln followed the example of Thomas à Becket, and refused payment from his Church land. It was apparently in connection with this opposition that Hubert, in 1198, withdrew from his secular work, and was succeeded by Geoffrey Fitz-Peter. Politically, the strength of the crown exhibited in these transactions, the very completeness and excellence of Henry's system, tended to change the interests of the various classes in England. The crown, hitherto the champion of the people against the feudal barons, began to overstrain its power, and all classes were gradually forced into opposition to it,—a work completed by the greater and less glorious tyranny of John, and by the increased feeling of nationality excited among the barons, when the loss of Normandy severed them entirely from France.

Lines of Jerusalem and Sicily.

Godfrey de Bouillon, 1st King of Jerusalem; his brother Baldwin I., 2nd King.

Baldwin II., cousin of Godfrey, 3rd King.

Melisenda = Fulk of Anjou.

Baldwin III. Almeric.

Baldwin IV., the leper. Sybilla = Guy of Lusignan. Elizabeth = Conrad of Montferrat.

Tancred of Hauteville, descended from Rollo, Duke of Normandy.

Robert Guiscard, conquered Sicily,
1090.

Roger.

Roger, 1st King of Sicily, 1130—1154.

Roger, died 1148.

William I., 1154.

Constance = Henry VI., Emperor.

Tancred, 1189.

William II., 1166 = Joanna.

JOHN.

1199—1216.

Born 1167 = 1. Hadwisa of Gloucester.
= 2. Isabella de la Marche.

Henry III.	Richard. d. 1272.	Jane=Alex- ander II.	Isabella=Frede- rick II.	Eleanor=1. William of Pembroke. =2. Simon de Montfort.
------------	----------------------	-------------------------	-----------------------------	---

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland. William, 1165. Alexander II., 1214.	France. Philip 1180. Augustus,	Germany. Philip, 1198. Otho IV., 1209.	Spain. Alphonso IX., 1158. Henry I., 1214.
--	---	---	---

POPE.—Innocent III., 1198.

Archbishops. Hubert Walter, 1193—1205. Stephen Langton, 1207— 1228.	Chief-Justices. Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, 1199. Peter des Roches, 1214. Hubert de Burgh, 1215.	Chancellors. Hubert Walter, 1199. Walter Grey, 1205. Peter des Roches, 1213. Walter Grey, 1214. Richard de Marisco, 1214.
---	---	---

KING Richard had nominated John as his successor, having never renewed the recognition of Arthur of Brittany which he had made in Sicily. The new King at once set about securing his possession. He succeeded in laying hands upon the treasury at Chinon and the castles of Normandy. In Brittany, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, there were signs of opposition. The barons put forward the claim of Arthur; Constance, his mother, took the young prince to the court of Philip, and that king proceeded in his name to master the towns and fortresses. But the assistance of his mother Eleanor, who had taken possession of her old inheritance Poitou and Aquitaine, enabled John to make successful opposition to the invasion, and on the 25th of April he was crowned at Rouen, and felt himself strong enough to establish his claims in England. Thither he had already sent the chief of his brother's ministers—Hubert Walter, the Archbishop of Canterbury; Fitz-Peter, justiciary, and afterwards Earl of Essex; and William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke. These ministers had already obliged the nobles to tender their oath of allegiance; and John, on his arrival in May, was crowned at Westminster, taking the usual oaths to guard

1199]

JOHN'S STRONG POSITION

127

the Church, to do justice, and to repeal bad laws, but giving no further charter. The Archbishop is said to have begun the coronation with the declaration that the throne was elective, an assertion received with acclamation by those who were present. He is said afterwards to have declared that he took this step, knowing the King's character; he was, however, throughout his life a devoted servant of the crown.

John's position at the beginning of his reign was good. He was accepted in England; he was strong enough to refuse the Scottish King's demands on Northumberland and Cumberland; the Counts of Flanders and Boulogne made offers of friendship; and Otho of Germany even pressed him not to make peace with the French king, promising to come to his assistance. It was from Philip only that he appeared to have to dread any danger; for that king's early friendship for him had now changed to hatred, as he declared because he had accepted his continental dominions without asking leave of him, his feudal superior. We have thus early the key to the policy of Philip Augustus, who was determined to make use of the letter of the feudal law to bring his great vassal into subjection and establish royalty in France. He had a ready weapon in the person of young Arthur, who had already done homage to him for Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and Brittany. The efforts of the Church were however constantly exerted to keep the peace between these rivals; and Philip had a difficulty on his own hands which induced him to desire peace. He had married Ingelborga of Denmark, but had almost immediately separated from her and married Agnes de Méranie. The cause of the divorced princess was warmly taken up at Rome, and in this year Innocent III. had laid France under an interdict.

Under these circumstances a treaty was patched up. John promised to young Louis, the heir of France, the hand of his niece Blanche of Castile, and along with her the Earldom of Evreux; at the same time pledging himself not to assist his nephew Otho against the rival Emperor of Germany, Philip of Swabia. Philip in return secured to England the disputed province of the Vexin, and for the time dropped the claims of Arthur. A formal interchange of homage was then made; on the part of John for his French possessions, on the part of Louis for his newly acquired earldom, on the part of Arthur for his provinces in France. John at once began to destroy his good position. A large aid gathered before his coronation, and another for the purpose of paying a sum of money demanded by the late treaty, had already caused anger in England. He now proceeded to rouse the displeasure of some of his chief French nobles. He put away his wife Hadwisa, the daughter of the Earl of Gloucester, and was beginning to treat

Marriage with Isabella de la Marche.

for the hand of a Portuguese princess, when he suddenly fell in love with Isabella, the daughter of the Count of Angoulême, and carried her off from her betrothed husband, the Count de la Marche. Before the storm broke, however, he was able to oblige the Scotch king, with whom he had been in constant correspondence, to meet him at Lincoln, and there to do him homage, and to swear to be his liegeman for life, limb and land. It must be supposed that this was real personal homage for the kingdom of Scotland, as William the Lion's claims on the Northern counties were still postponed.

Homage of Scotland.

But the King's difficulties soon began. Wishing to collect an army to suppress disturbances in Poitou, he was met by a refusal from his barons, who assembled at Leicester, and demanded the establishment of their rights. The disturbances in Poitou

Outbreak in Poitou.

were caused by the insurrection of the Count de la Marche, full of anger at losing his wife. Deserted by his barons, John was unable to suppress the insurrection. He had been invited to Paris, and received with every demonstration of friendship; but while there the barons of Poitou, following the policy of Philip Augustus, and it is fair to believe induced by him, lodged formal complaints with the French king as their suzerain. John was called upon to plead before the feudal Court of Peers. He refused, averring that the Duke of Normandy had never transacted business with his suzerain except personally upon the borders of his own duchy. Philip seized the opportunity, urged that the Duke of Normandy was

John's French provinces forfeited.
1202.

at the same time Count of Poitou, obtained judgment against John, declared all his fiefs forfeited, and again raised the claims of Arthur. War was the immediate consequence. The defection of the Count of Boulogne opened the west of Normandy, and that side of the country was speedily in the hands of the French.

Arthur himself now appeared in arms, renounced John, and entered Poitou in alliance with the insurgent barons. He there besieged Mirabeau, where the old Queen then was lying ill on her return from a journey into Spain, whither she had gone to fetch the Princess of Castile, according to the treaty with the French King. The capture of the castle seemed inevitable, when John, with one of those sudden acts of vigour which broke his indolent life, suddenly came upon the besiegers, and surrounded them, rescued his mother, and took the young prince captive. The war became still more vehement. The Bretons claimed the restoration of their prince. Philip moved his army to the Loire, and town after town was captured, while John lay in sensual enjoyment at Rouen. The Norman barons, unused to an unwarlike governor, deserted to Philip, and John was compelled to return to England.

He had hardly reached it when the terrible rumour spread that the young Prince Arthur had disappeared. His fate is variously related. The more commonly accepted story is, that, imprisoned at Falaise, under the care of Hubert de Burgh, he escaped, by the good will of his custodian, from the designs of John, who had sent to have his eyes put out. He was thence removed to Rouen, to the charge of Robert de Vipont, and murdered, perhaps by his uncle's own hand, and his body thrown into the Seine.

Death of Arthur.
1203.

However he may have died, his death raised a storm of indignation. Philip pressed more boldly forward. In March 1204, Chateau Gaillard, the key of Normandy upon the Seine, was taken. One after the other, Caen, Bayeux, Coutances, Lisieux, and all the country to Mont St. Michel, were captured; Rouen alone remained. John was again summoned before the Peers at Paris. Philip even prepared to invade England, and to make good there the claims of the Counts of Brabant and Boulogne, who had married the granddaughters of King Stephen. In June, Rouen was compelled to capitulate, and in the following year, Loches and Chinon, south of the Loire, yielded, and Rochelle, Niort, and Thouars, in Poitou, were the only towns left in the possession of the English.

Loss of Normandy.
1205.

Meanwhile John had tried in vain to assemble an effective army in England. He had raised money and collected troops, but it would seem that they were disaffected; for, at the urgent entreaties of his faithful servants, Hubert of Canterbury and William Marshall, they were disbanded. One futile attempt was indeed made from Rochelle, and John boasted loudly of his capture of Montauban, but he was none the less compelled in October of this year to make a two years' peace with Philip. The connection between England and Normandy was thus for ever broken; henceforward the country was thrown upon its own resources, and its life and interests became more distinctly national.

Peace with Philip.
1206.

Many causes had been at work to separate the interests of the crown and nation, but before mentioning them it will be necessary to speak of the second great event of John's reign, his dispute with Innocent III.

In July 1205, had died Hubert of Canterbury, whose influence as minister of the crown had been paramount during this and the preceding reign. The right of election to the metropolitan see had been constantly disputed between the monks of the cathedral and the suffragan bishops of the province. The younger monks thought to steal a march upon their rivals, and, even before the Archbishop had been buried, had elected Reginald, the sub-prior. Without waiting for the King's approval, which had been invariably required during the reigns of the Norman kings, they hurried the Archbishop elect abroad, binding him not to disclose his election till he reached Rome. His vanity got the better of his wisdom; he boasted of his good fortune. A rumour of what had been done reached the ears of the King. The elder monks took fright, betook themselves to John, and received orders from him, in complete disregard of the claims of the bishops, to elect John de Grey, Bishop of Norwich, one of his ministers. He was elected, invested with the temporalities, and messengers stating the fact were at once sent to Rome. It was now the turn of the bishops to complain. In point of fact, the last three archbishops had been elected by the common consent of the bishops and monks, and with the approval of the crown. The older right was decidedly with the bishops, and they too despatched messengers to the Papal Court. A claim raised by three distinct parties, and brought to his court to settle, was exactly the opportunity Innocent desired. There was much in the position of England and the English Church which he would have wished to see changed. The election of bishops and archbishops, under whatever forms it had been carried on, had been virtually in the hands of the crown. Many of these appointments had been given to Churchmen, who had devoted their chief time to the great administrative system which Henry II. had perfected.¹ The mixture of lay and ecclesiastical elements was very objectionable to the Pope; while if there was one thing more than another which he was desirous of suppressing, it was the independence of national churches as represented by their bishops. Innocent, therefore, now ruled that the bishops had not the slightest voice in the matter, that the monks alone had from time immemorial possessed the right of election, although it had accidentally fallen into abeyance. He thus robbed both king and bishops of their share in the election, and then declaring that the election of Reginald in the present instance had been irregular, bade the monks, a considerable number of whom had come

¹ John de Grey belonged to this class.

Election of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

to Rome, proceed at once to the election of his old friend and fellow-student, Stephen Langton, cardinal priest of St. Chrysogonus. He so far acknowledged the existence of John as to write him several letters pressing him to receive the Archbishop. On the rejection of these overtures, foreseeing that he was entering on an important struggle, he arranged a peace with Philip of Swabia, the rival of Otho the Guelph, the Papal candidate for the throne of Germany, and proceeded to consecrate the new archbishop with his own hands at Viterbo.

John had already quarrelled with the bishops, because they had refused, at a council held at St. Albans, to give him a contribution which he had required, for the assistance of this same Otho, who was his nephew. The news therefore of the consecration at Viterbo at once moved him to violence. The monks of Canterbury were driven from their monastery, and when, in the following year, an interdict which the Pope had intrusted to the Bishops of London, Ely and Worcester, was published, his hostility to the Church became so extreme, that almost all the bishops fled; the Bishops of Winchester, Durham and Norwich, two of whom belonged to the ministerial body, being the only prelates left in England. The interdict was of the severest form; all services of the Church, with the exception of Baptism and extreme unction, being forbidden, while the burial of the dead was allowed only in unconsecrated ground; its effect was however weakened by the conduct of some of the monastic orders, who claimed exemption from its operation, and continued their services. The King's anger knew no bounds. The clergy were put beyond the protection of the law; orders were issued to drive them from their benefices, and lawless acts committed at their expense met with no punishment. While publishing the interdict, the Pope had threatened still further measures, and the King, conscious of his unpopularity among the barons, sought to secure himself from the effects of the threatened excommunication by seizing their sons as hostages. Nevertheless, though acting thus violently, John showed the weakness of his character by continued communication with the Pope, and occasional fitful acts of favour to the Church; so much so, that, in the following year, Langton prepared to come over to England, and upon the continued obstinacy of the King, Innocent, feeling sure of his final victory, did not shrink from issuing his threatened excommunication. John had hoped to be able to exclude the knowledge of this step from the island, as his father Henry had done; but the Election of Stephen

Langton.
1207.

John's violence.

Interdict and flight of bishops.
1208.

Excommunication.
1209.

rumour of it soon got abroad, and its effect was great. The fidelity even of the ministers was shaken, and one of them rose from the council table, asserting that it was unsafe for a beneficed clergyman any longer to hold intercourse with the excommunicated King.

In a state of nervous excitement, and mistrusting his nobles, the King himself perpetually moved to and fro in his kingdom, seldom staying more than a few days in one place. None the less did he continue his old line of policy. Sums of money were still frequently demanded, and sent out of the kingdom to support the cause of Otho, who, having procured the assassination of his rival, was again making head in Germany. Nor did he refrain from carrying out a policy which in any other king would have been accepted as national and good. The loss of the French provinces had thrown England back upon itself, and the country now seemed inclined to seek a surer foundation for its power in the more complete subjection of the immediately surrounding nations. Thus William the Lion of Scotland was compelled, by the advance of an English army, to make a treaty which was in fact a complete submission to England. He was obliged to pay a large sum of money, and to give up into the hands of John his daughters Margaret and Isabella, as well as hostages drawn from the noblest families of the country; while some years later, in 1212, his son Alexander appeared in London, and was knighted and swore fealty to the King.

Shortly after this success in the North, John betook himself to Ireland, where quarrels had arisen between the angry Irish nobles, and where Hugh de Lacy had suppressed his rival John de Courcy, and, being enfeoffed with the kingdom of Ulster, had arrogated to himself rights closely touching upon royalty. John raised supplies from the English towns, and crossed over to Waterford. He there succeeded in establishing order, and having introduced the English form of administration, returned to England, leaving John de Grey, Bishop of Norwich, behind him as his representative. He then directed his arms towards Wales. Along the marches of that country there was constant strife, as the Lords Marchers erected new castles and encroached upon their neighbours. In 1211 the King marched through the country, and received at the foot of Snowdon the submission of Llewellyn, his son-in-law,¹ and other princes. A fresh outbreak, accompanied by the usual cruel slaughter of the garrisons of the castles, roused his anger. At Nottingham he had all the Welsh hostages he had taken under the late treaty hanged, and was preparing for further vengeance when news reached him of the discontent of the Northern barons. He was induced therefore to direct his arms against them, filled Northumberland with his foreign mercenaries, and seized fresh hostages from his suspected nobles.

¹ He had married Joanna, John's natural daughter.

These wars had but afforded still further opportunities for the King's rapacity; from which every class in the kingdom was now suffering. Those classes even which John had hitherto somewhat spared now felt the pressure. There was a universal persecution of the Jews, who were all suddenly apprehended, and many of them tortured to declare their wealth. He is said to have extracted 60,000 marks from the race. The clergy too had been obliged to find him £100,000; the Cistercian monks some £30,000, or £40,000, and subsequently, in 1212, another £12,000 was wrung from them, because the chief of the order, acting as Papal Legate, had, during the Albigensian crusade, injured Raymond, the King's brother-in-law.

While he had been thus, even in the pursuit of national objects, estranging by his tyrannical conduct his own subjects, John had been carrying on his opposition to the Pope outside the limits of the kingdom; and events in Europe were rapidly approaching a crisis. Otho, the Guelphic Emperor, upon the death of his rival, had so completely succeeded, that in 1209 he had been solemnly crowned Emperor in Italy. But no sooner had he gained his object than the inevitable rivalry between Pope and Emperor again arose, and in a few years he had forfeited the Pontiff's favour so completely as to become the object of his greatest hatred; he had even been excommunicated, while the Pope found a new protégé in the young Frederick of Sicily, whose anti-papal tendencies were not at that time suspected. Similarity of circumstances rendered still closer the bond of union between John and his nephew, and in 1211 a league of excommunicated leaders was formed, including all the princes of the North of Europe; Ferrand of Flanders, the Duke of Brabant, John, and Otho, were all members of it, and it was chiefly organized by the activity of Reinald of Dammartin, Count of Boulogne. The chief enemy of most of these confederates was Philip of France; and John thought he saw in this league the means of revenge against his old enemy.

To complete the line of demarcation between the two parties, Innocent, who was greatly moved by the description of the disorders and persecutions in England, declared

Disaffection of the Northern barons.

The King's rapacity.

League with Northern princes.

John is deposed 1212.

John's crown forfeited, and intrusted the carrying out of the sentence to Philip. In 1213 armies were collected on both sides, Philip was already on the Channel, and John had assembled a large army on Barhamdown, not far from Canterbury. But Innocent probably never intended to proceed to extremities. To embroil two Christian nations would have been to thwart one of his greatest objects, which was a new crusade. But he knew his man; he knew the weakness which was hidden under the violence and ostentatious passion of John, and he also well knew from his emissaries in England the widespread disaffection there. While the army was still lying in its camp, there appeared at Dover Pandulf, as the Pope's Legate. He demanded and obtained an audience with the King, and there explained to him the gravity of his position. He found means to bring home to his mind the perfect insecurity of his position at home, while John, from his own experience, knew both the power and the skill of Philip. The consciousness of his danger destroyed his boastful obstinacy, and he made an unconditional submission. The paper which he signed was drawn up almost in the very words of the demands of Pandulf. He offered to plead before the Papal Court; he promised peace and a good reception to Langton, the other bishops, and banished laity; he was to restore all Church property, and to make restitution for all loss since the interdict. Having accepted these conditions, the King went further. On the 15th of May, at Dover, he formally resigned the crowns of England and Ireland into the hands of Pandulf, and received them again as the Pope's feudatory.

It was not without ulterior objects that John took this disgraceful step. He believed that he saw in it a way out of all his difficulties, and the means of revenging himself upon his enemies. He had no intention of allowing his new position to interfere with his continental alliances, and it was to their success that he looked to re-establish his power. When Philip of France was no longer the agent of Papal authority, he believed that it would be possible for him to resist the storm that was gathering round him. He expected that one great victory would go far to give him back his lost French dominions, when the prestige of success, the friendship of the Church, and the increase of power derived from his regained dominions, would make him master of the situation in England. At first all seemed to work as he wished. Pandulf immediately hurried to France, and forbade Philip to attack the Pope's new vassal. The opportune attacks of Ferrand of Flanders

Surrender of the crown to the Pope.

John's improved position.

diverted the French army towards the dominions of that prince; the English fleet which was sent to assist the Flemings destroyed the whole French shipping in the port of Damme; the Archbishop Langton was received with honour, John threw himself at his feet, reconciled himself with the Church, issued writs to all the churches to inquire into the amount of damages to be restored, and ordered a great council to meet at St. Albans to settle finally the restitution of the Church property. He then summoned his barons to meet him, and join him in an attack upon Poitou. But he was mistaken, both in the character of the Churchman, in whom he hoped to find an obedient servant of the Papal See, and in the amount of dissatisfaction among his nobles. The barons of the North refused to follow him, and the meeting at St. Albans resulted, not in a settlement of Church difficulties, but in the open declaration of the complaints of all classes. A few weeks after, Langton, who had seen through the character of John, and was full of hatred of his tyranny, met an assembly of malcontents at St. Paul's in London, and there declaring that he had found documentary proof of their rights, produced the coronation charter of Henry I., which was at once accepted by the barons as the declaration of the views and demands of their party.

*Renewed difficulties with Stephen
Langton.*

In the meantime, two events had happened disastrous to the royal cause. Nicholas of Tusculum had arrived as Papal Legate, and the justiciary Godfrey Fitz-Peter had died. The Legate, ignorant of the feelings of the English, and eager to support and make real the Papal authority, had thoroughly adopted the King's cause. He threatened the clergy unless they at once accepted the arrangements which the King offered; and although it was the very thing which had before excited the anger of the Pope, he proceeded to fill vacant benefices with the devoted adherents of the royal party. In the place of the experienced Fitz-Peter, who, however far he might have strained the administrative power of the crown, had yet exercised a wholesome restraint on the King, Peter des Roches was raised to the office of justiciary, and appointed to be the representative of the crown during John's absence in France. The people saw themselves, as they thought, both in spiritual and temporal matters in the hands of the tyrant. A great success abroad might yet have checked the growing disaffection. The King led an army to Rochelle. At first he was successful everywhere. He overran Poitou, and crossing the Loire captured Anger, but the Poitevin barons had been too deeply injured by him to be faithful

*John hopes to remove them by victory in France.
1214.*

friends; their disaffection soon compelled him to retire. But the great confederation was at work upon all sides. The Count of Flanders was pressing in upon the North, Otho was advancing from Germany. In July a junction was made at Valenciennes. Thither Philip now betook himself; he was followed faithfully by most of his great nobles, and by the militia of the chartered cities. The whole success of his policy was at stake. A defeat would ruin the object of his life—the establishment of the royal power in France. For Otho too the stake was high; the triumph of the Guelphic house in its long war against the Hohenstaufen would be the fruit of victory. For such prizes the battle of Bouvines was fought, at a small place upon the little river Marque. The fortune of the day was with the French; in all directions they were victorious. Both for Otho and John the defeat may be said to have been final; the Emperor withdrew to his hereditary dominions in Brunswick, where, after some not very important fighting, he died in 1218. John returned, having lost his last hope of re-establishing his power at home by foreign conquests.

Battle of Bouvines.
1214.

He returned to England to find himself in a worse position than ever; for Innocent had found out the errors his legate had committed, and recalled him; and John had lost another of his most trusty counsellors by the death of the Bishop of Norwich. Thus left to his own resources, with his usual folly he took the opportunity of demanding a heavy scutage from those barons who had not followed him abroad. The nobles of the North rose. A meeting was held in November at Bury St. Edmunds, and it was there determined that they would make their formal demands upon the King in arms at Christmas time. John was keeping his Christmas at Worcester; but having no doubt heard of the action of the barons, hurried to London, where they appeared before him in arms. He demanded till Easter for consideration. The time was given him. He used it in an attempt to sow dissension among his enemies. He granted to the Church the free right of election, hoping thereby to draw Langton from the confederation. He took the oaths of the crusader to put himself more immediately under the guardianship of the Church, and hastily summoned troops of mercenaries from Poitou.

The barons at once reassembled at Brackley. At their head was Fitz-Walter, an old enemy of the King, and William Marshall, son of the Earl of Pembroke. Their strength consisted of the nobles of the North—and they were spoken of as the

Meeting at Brackley.

Northerners,—but many barons from other parts of England joined them, and in spite of various compromises offered by the King, they laid siege to the castle of Northampton. They there received messages of adherence from the mayor and citizens of London, into which city they were received in May; and thus masters of the greater part of England, and of the capital, they compelled John to receive them and hear their demands at Runnymede, a meadow by the Thames' side not far from Staines. There was signed, on the 15th of June, the paper of forty-nine articles, which they presented, and which were afterwards drawn up into the shape of the sixty-three articles of the Great Charter.

Capture of London.

Runnymede.

That Great Charter was the joint work of the insurgent lords, and of those who still in name remained faithful to the crown. In many points this rising of the barons bears the appearance of an ordinary feudal insurrection. Closer examination proves that it was of a different character. The very success of Henry II. in his great plan of national regeneration had tended to change the character of English politics. Till his time, the bulk of the people had regarded the crown on the whole as a defence against their feudal tyrants. In the pursuit of good government he had crushed the feudal nobles, and had welded Norman and English into one nation. In so doing, he had greatly increased the royal power; for in those early times good government invariably implied a strong monarchy. In patriotic hands his work might have continued. But when the increased royal power passed to reckless rulers, such as Richard and John, it enabled them to play the part of veritable tyrants. They had used this power in ruthlessly pillaging the people. The great justiciaries, Hubert and Fitz-Peter, content with keeping order and retaining constitutional forms, had almost of necessity lent themselves to this course, while lesser officials had undoubtedly acted with arbitrary violence. The interests of the King and his ministers had thus become separated from those of the nation. To oppose this tyranny, nobles and people could now act in concert. The struggle was no longer between King and people on one side against the nobles on the other, but nobles and people had joined against the King. Besides this political change, a great revolution had taken place in the character of the nobility itself. The feudal nobles, the friends of the Conqueror, had for the most part given place to a new nobility, the sons of the counsellors and ministers of Henry II. In the centre of England alone did remnants of the old feudal families remain.

Political position of England.

The insurrection then, coming from the North, was the work not of feudal barons but of the new ministerial baronage. Again, the claims raised, although, inasmuch as the monarchy was still in form a feudal monarchy, they bear a resemblance to feudal claims, were such as might have been expected from men trained in the habits of administration. They were claims for the redress of abuses of constitutional power, and were based upon a written document. In addition to this, they were supported by the clergy, who were never and could never be feudal in their views, and by the towns, whose interests were always opposed to those of the feudal nobility. There is another thing to be recollected; the Charter, as ultimately granted, was not the same as the demands of the barons. A considerable number of the older barons, of the bishops, and even the Archbishop himself, remained ostensibly true to the King, and were present at Runnymede as his followers. We are told that it was the younger nobles who formed the strength of the reforming party. Nevertheless, with the exception of the King's actual ministers, and of those foreigners, the introduction of whom was one of his gravest errors, the whole of John's own following acknowledged the justice of the baronial claims, sympathized with the demands raised, and joined in putting them into the best shape. The movement was in fact, even where not in form, national.

The terms of the Charter were in accordance with this state of affairs. To the Church were secured its rights and the freedom of election (1). To the feudal tenants just arrangements in the matters of wardship, of heirship, widowhood, and marriage (2-8). Scutage and aids, which John had from the beginning of his reign taken as a matter of course, were henceforward to be granted by the great council of the kingdom, except in three cases, the deliverance of the king from prison, the knighting of his eldest son, and the marriage of his eldest daughter (12). The same right was secured by the immediate tenants to their sub-tenants. The great council was to consist of archbishops, bishops and abbots, counts and greater barons, summoned severally by writ, and of the rest of the tenants in chief, summoned by general writ to the sheriff (14). The lands of sub-tenants, seized by the king for treason or felony, were to be held by him for a year only, and then to be handed over to the tenant's immediate lord (32). Similarly the crown was no longer to claim wardship in the case of sub-tenants, nor to change the custom of escheated baronies, nor to fill up vacancies in private abbeys (43, 46). These are all distinct regulations of feudal relations. The more general acts of tyranny of the crown were guarded against, by fixing the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster (17); by the settlement of land processes by itinerant justices in the counties where the disputes arose (18); by the limitations of punishments within reasonable limits (20-22); by the restriction of the powers of constables, sheriffs, and other royal officers, both in the matter of royal lawsuits and of purveyance (28-31); by an article (36), which is held to foreshadow the Habeas Corpus Act, stipulating the immediate trial of prisoners; and by other articles (38-40), which are held to foreshadow trial by jury, and which forbid the passing of sentence except on the verdict of a man's equals, and witness upon oath. Other points secured their liberties to the free towns and to merchants. This Charter was to be guaranteed by the appointment of a committee of twenty-five nobles, any four of whom might claim redress for infractions of it, and upon refusal proceed to make war upon the king.

Magna Charta.

This Charter, which with its final clause implied absolute submission, John never intended to keep. No sooner were his first ebullitions of anger over, than he proceeded to take steps for destroying it. Messengers were at once sent to Rome to get it annulled, and to Poitou to collect mercenaries. Troops came over in crowds, and the barons in alarm ordered William D'Albini to attack the castle of Rochester. He seized it, but was there besieged, and compelled to surrender to John's mercenaries. All the common men of the garrison were hanged. John's other message was equally successful. A letter from Innocent announced that he totally disallowed the Charter, and ordered Langton to excommunicate the King's enemies. This he refused to do, and other excommunications and interdicts were also futile. John's temporal weapons were more successful. He overran England with his mercenaries, burning, slaying and harrying with vindictive fury, and so superior was he in the field, that the barons found themselves obliged to summon Louis of France to their assistance. Louis' wife was John's niece, and they probably intended to use this slender connection to change the dynasty.

His success was not very rapid, though at first he seemed to have the game in his hands. He wasted his time and lost his opportunity before the castles of Dover and Windsor. His conduct also in bestowing fiefs upon his French followers began to excite the jealousy of the English; and John's cause was again wearing a more hopeful appearance, when, marching from Lincoln, which he had lately conquered, he crossed the Wash, with all his supplies which he had lately drawn from Lynn. The rise of the tide destroyed the whole of his train, and broken by his loss, or perhaps poisoned, or perhaps a victim to his greediness, he died on the 19th of October at Newark. In July of the same year he had lost his great protector Innocent III.

John's attempts to break loose from it.

Louis is summoned 1216.

John's death.

HENRY III.

1216—1272.

Born 1207=Eleanor of Provence.

Edward I. Edmund, Earl of Lancaster. Margaret=Alexander III.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Alexander II., 1214.	Philip Augustus, 1180	Philip, 1197.	Henry I., 1214.
Alexander III., 1249.	Louis VIII., 1223.	Otho IV., 1208.	Ferdinand III., 1217.
	Louis IX., 1226.	Frederick II., 1218.	Alphonso X., 1252.
	Philip III., 1270.	Interregnum, 1250.

POPES.—Honorius III., 1216. Gregory IX., 1227. Celestine IV., 1241 (vacancy 1241). Innocent IV., 1243. Alexander IV., 1254. Urban IV., 1261. Clement IV., 1265 (vacancy 1268). Gregory X., 1271.

Archbishops.	Chief-Justices.	Chancellors.
Stephen Langton, 1207—1228.	Hubert de Burgh, 1215—1232.	Richard de Marisco, 1214—1226.
Richard le Grand, 1229—1231.	Stephen Segrave, 1232—1234.	Ralph Neville, 1226—1244.
Edmund Rich, 1234—1240.	Hugh Bigot, 1258—1260.	Walter de Merton, 1261.
Boniface of Savoy, 1245—1270.	Hugh le Despencer, 1260.	Nicholas de Ely, 1263.
	Philip Basset, 1261.	Thomas Cantilupe, 1265.
		Walter Giffard, 1265.
		Godfrey Giffard, 1267.
		Richard Middleton, 1269—1272.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of John, William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, and Gualo, the Papal Legate, the leaders of John's faithful followers, declared Prince Henry king. It was a moment of extreme danger. The Scotch had advanced as far as Carlisle, the Welsh were harassing the Marches, the East and South of England were in the hands of Louis and the revolted barons, the court could with difficulty uphold its influence in the West. But Marshall was a man of tried experience, of trustworthy character, and, though a firm adherent of the crown, no friend to tyranny. The presence of the French prince in England shocked all national prejudices. Pembroke set on foot a policy of conciliation, and attempted to unite all parties against the foreigner. He at once separated the cause of the young Henry from that of his father by accepting the Charter. He wrote friendly letters to the leaders of the revolted barons, and found assistance in the ecclesiastical weapons wielded by Gualo. One by one the insurgents, feeling themselves sure of constitutional treatment at the hands of Pembroke, joined the royal party. Pembroke found himself strong enough to risk a battle. Louis had received reinforcements, and with the insurgent nobles who still upheld his cause marched to Lincoln, where, though the town was in his possession, the castle still held out for the English king. Thither

Difficulties at Henry's accession.

Fair of Lincoln.

Pembroke betook himself, determined to bring on a decisive engagement. Gaining access to the town through the castle, his troops fell upon the French in the streets, and completely routed them, capturing nearly all the English leaders. London and its neighbourhood alone remained to Louis, and when a great French fleet, under Eustace the Monk, which was bringing him assistance, was completely defeated by Hubert de Burgh and D'Albini, Louis felt that his cause was lost, and consented to treat. The English, who only wanted to get rid of him, granted easy terms, including the freedom of most of their prisoners. They even advanced 10,000 marks towards defraying the heavy fine which Gualo on the part of the Church demanded as an expiation for disobedience to the Roman See, and Louis was escorted with all honour to the sea coast, and retired.

With Louis the great obstacle to the settlement of the country was gone. Pembroke continued to act in a conciliatory spirit. A pardon was issued, including all political offenders; peace with Scotland was secured; and the Charter, together with the charter of the forests, was again signed. It underwent, however, some changes. The King was no longer acting under coercion; restrictions which Pembroke considered inexpedient were therefore removed. His object appears to have been to reproduce as far as possible the state of things existing in the reign of Henry II. The destruction of castles erected during the late reign was therefore ordered, and the clause of the Charter forbidding the levy of scutage without the consent of the barons omitted. The reconciliation thus effected was in fact the triumph of the crown; the offices were filled with adherents of John. But in the hands of Pembroke the regained power of the crown would have been constitutionally employed.

Pembroke's conciliatory measures.

Louis leaves England.

His death, in 1219, opened the door to a strange attempt on the part of the Pope. The influence of Gualo, the Papal Legate, had been great. It had been so because John's resignation of his crown was regarded at Rome as no vain formality, but as a real cession. But Gualo, a man of somewhat weak character, was no match for Pembroke, and was unfitted to make good the authority which Rome was inclined to claim. He was recalled, and a much more energetic legate appointed in the person of Pandulf, now Bishop elect of Norwich. His appointment represents an effort on the part of Rome to govern England as a conquered province by means of its legates. The natural governor of England during the minority of the sovereign was the great justiciary Hubert de Burgh. But Pandulf assumed authority over him, and his letters amply prove how overbearing he used it. His government was at first successful. The dangers of a French invasion were averted by a renewal for four years of the Peace of Chinon. The friendship of Scotland was secured by the marriage of Henry's sister Jane with the Scotch king. A splendid coronation, and an ostentatious ceremonial at the removal of Becket's bones to the Cathedral of Canterbury, seemed to show the restored grandeur both of King and Church; while a Bull from Pope Honorius commanded the restoration of the royal castles, which the poverty of the King had, in many instances, obliged him to pledge to their governors. But Pandulf's conduct was too overbearing to be endured. Langton, as the head of the English Church, and therefore no friend to the immediate government of Rome, tried to curb him by demanding his obedience as one of his suffragan bishops. The Pope declared him free from this obedience so long as his consecration to the see of Norwich was uncompleted. Langton finally betook himself to Rome, and there, by what means we know not, succeeded in obtaining an order for his recall, accompanied by a promise that no resident legate should be appointed in England during his own lifetime.

Hubert de Burgh at once took his proper position as regent, supported by the national Church; and the attempt at immediate rule from Rome may be said to have failed, though throughout the reign England was regarded as in a special manner a fief of the Papal See, and, as Pope Innocent IV. said afterwards, "a well of wealth from which Rome might draw unlimitedly." For eight years Hubert ruled England well. He was

Papal attempt to govern by legates.

Pandulf's government.

His fall.

Triumph of national party under Hubert de Burgh.

unduly grasping of money, he was occasionally arbitrary, but on the whole his government was directed to the honest support of the Great Charter, and the destruction of that foreign influence under which England was suffering.

The centre of this influence was Peter des Roches, who had the care of the King's person. These two ministers, Hubert and Peter, were the representatives of the different sides of that quarrel which gives its tone to the whole reign. The characteristic feature of the period is the growth of national feeling. This feeling had been outraged by John by the introduction of foreign favourites. The claims of the Pope on England, the tyranny which he exercised on the national Church, and the constant bestowal of English livings upon foreigners, had a similar effect in shocking the feelings of the clergy. Thus while the Pope and King appear throughout the reign as the favourers of foreigners, the national party both in State and Church were closely connected. As yet, indeed, the King was too young for such a part; the representative of the foreign party was Des Roches. Round him gathered themselves all classes of malcontents, consisting chiefly of those foreign mercenaries whom John had raised to power, and who were occupying the royal castles, of Llewellyn of Wales in close connection with them, and of the nobles of Ireland. Des Roches' influence at Rome secured for this party on most points the support of the Pope. For two years they were constantly thwarting the government of De Burgh. The necessities of the government had obliged him to be severe in the collection of money; but there was some slight colouring for the charge of undue severity which was laid against him. An uproar in London, headed by Constantine Fitz-Alulf, an old partisan of the French invaders, had been followed by the summary execution of that demagogue. Attacks both in Wales and in Ireland upon the property of William Marshall, who was thoroughly English in his views, were the first signs of the coming storm. A Bull which De Burgh obtained from Honorius declaring the King of age, and demanding the restitution of the castles, brought matters to a crisis. Under this provocation the barons and Peter des Roches proceeded to action. An attack on London was planned, but failed. But the discontented nobles openly appeared before the King; and Peter des Roches formally charged Hubert with treason, and demanded his dismissal. Led by the Earl of Chester, they retired, and kept Christmas with great pomp at Leicester. The Justiciary and the King determined to hold a rival meeting at Northampton. The royal

Parties in England.

Opposition barons at Leicester.
1223.

appeal for help was warmly answered. The force collected at Northampton was too strong for the malcontents. Excommunication issued against them by Stephen Langton completed their discomfiture. They separated and obtained peace as a price of the surrender of the castles. There was one exception, Faukes de Breauté, who contrived to retain his strongholds. This man, a mercenary of John, had risen to be the sheriff of six counties, the governor of several castles, and a Baron of the Exchequer. Hubert determined to complete his victory by destroying him. His opportunity occurred, when Faukes' brother William laid hands on the travelling justice Henry Braibroc and imprisoned him at Bedford. With extreme rapidity De Burgh marched against him and captured Bedford. Faukes fled to join his former comrades; but it was in vain that both Chester and Peter des Roches, now at one with the Justiciary, petitioned in his favour, De Burgh remained unmoved, and De Breauté was stripped of all his offices, and condemned to perpetual exile. He betook himself to Rome, where he managed to obtain the ear of the Court, and still further increased the difficulties of the English government.

Although he had thus worsted his domestic enemies the Justiciary was surrounded with difficulties. Philip Augustus had died in 1223, and had been succeeded by his son Louis VIII., the old enemy of England. He had begun his reign with a threat of renewed war, to which the disturbed state of Poitou and Guienne afforded a constant opportunity. In those countries there was a succession of unceasing disputes between town and town and noble and noble; the country roughly forming itself into two parties, the towns and the nobles. In 1224, war had in fact broken out. Henry had sought the friendship of the German Emperor Frederick against France, and connected himself with Peter Duke of Brittany, and when Louis appeared at the head of a great army, nominally for a war against the Albigenes, it seemed probable that its real aim was the English provinces. Louis' unexpected death changed the state of affairs. The new king was a child in the hands of his mother Blanche, and the French nobles took the opportunity to loosen the connection between themselves and the crown which Philip II. had established, and thus destroyed for the present the possibility of united national action. But although, on the first slackening of authority, all Poitou passed into the English hands, the chance of forming a united opposition among the discontented French nobles was allowed to pass unused.

Resumption of
royal castles.

Destruction of Faukes de Breauté.
1224.

Danger from France. Death of Philip.

English neglect
the opportunity.

One by one even the old allies of the English returned to their allegiance to France. At length, Richard, the King's brother, who had the title of Count of Poitou, and had commanded his army, joined in the general pacification.

It was the financial difficulties of the government which had chiefly prevented the success of this war. The opposition to Hubert de Burgh was constant, and it had only been upon condition of again signing the Charter that the King had been able to raise a fifteenth for the French war. This tax was probably the first raised in strict accordance with the terms of the Charter. De Burgh was honestly desirous, in opposition to the arbitrary views of his rival Des Roches, that the King should rule constitutionally, and both by proclamation and by official letters he took care to spread a knowledge of the Charter in the country. Although Henry was declared of age in 1227, when he was twenty, the government of De Burgh practically continued. He was made Earl of Kent, and declared Justiciary for life; and his victory was completed by the absence of Peter des Roches, who thought it better to withdraw for a time to the Crusades. His rule was not very popular among the nobles: not only was he naturally disliked by the chiefs of the adverse party, he even quarrelled with Richard, the King's brother, and with William Marshall. Such an act indeed as the following could scarcely have failed to make him enemies. An inquisition was issued to examine into the title deeds¹ of all tenants in chief, who were obliged to make good their titles by large payments. The sum derived from this inquiry amounted to £100,000.

The support which the Justiciary invariably received from Langton bears witness to the national character of his government. The Archbishop's efforts to free the Church from its foreign slavery were perhaps even more laborious than those of the Justiciary. Already the system which reached such excesses afterwards had been established. Gualo and Pandulf had been but single instances of a number of Roman officials who had grown rich on gifts of English benefices; and now the Roman Court determined, under the pretext of raising money for the Crusade, to demand both in France and England two benefices in each diocese and each abbey for the exclusive use of Rome. In neither country was the demand allowed. Otho, a Papal legate, held a council in 1226 at Westminster, and brought forward the demand. The clergy would probably have had to yield, had not the Archbishop, by private negotiations with the Pope, succeeded in getting the Legate's commission withdrawn. The clergy then expressly declared that by the laws of England they were free from such exactions. That England was allowed thus to escape, and that the exactions were comparatively so light in these first years of the reign, is due to the character of Honorius and to the interest which he always took in the young King, whom he regarded as his special vassal and ward. The case was different when he was succeeded by Gregory IX., the nephew of Innocent III., and the heir to his imperious temper. It was fortunate that his constant war with the German Emperor prevented him from meddling much with English politics.

¹ By writ of quo warranto.

But this period, during which England was governed by such patriotic leaders as De Burgh and Langton, working in harmony with one another, was coming to a close. In 1228, the Archbishop died, and was succeeded, after a disputed election, by Richard Chancellor of Lincoln, who was authoritatively nominated by the Pope. The new Archbishop did not live long, and was in his turn succeeded, also on the nomination of the Pope, by Edmund Rich, a man of great sanctity and singleness of purpose. In the following year, a quarrel occurred between the King and the Justiciary, which was probably the beginning of that nobleman's fall.

Henry, now that he was of age, had become anxious to distinguish himself by regaining some of his continental dominions. To this he was pressed by the discontented French nobles, more especially by the Count of Toulouse, who was suffering from the Albigensian crusades, by the Counts of Brittany and of the provinces in the north-east of France. In other words, he was thinking of throwing England back into that position of entanglement and dependence which had hitherto prevented the formation of the national spirit. This was exactly opposed to the Justiciary's views. He was unable to change the King's mind; but when Henry arrived at Portsmouth, where his army was assembled, he found the ships insufficient for its transport. Full of rage, he turned upon Hubert, abusing him as a grey-haired traitor, and affirming that he was bribed by France. The expedition had to be postponed, which was fortunate, as the scutage which had been demanded from the Barons and the Church had indeed been granted, but not yet collected. It was not till the end of April 1230 that the armies sailed. Although the expedition was unwise in itself, it was well timed. With the Poitou remains French.

Hubert's continued power.

Change of Popes: increased exactions.

Death of Langton. 1228.

Quarrel of Henry and De Burgh.

Henry's false foreign policy.

exception of the Count of Champagne, nearly all the French Barons were in arms, or ready to rise, against the Queen Regent Blanche; but Henry was incapable of seizing the opportunity. He tried diplomacy instead of war, but it was in vain that he persuaded many of the Barons of Poitou to join him; Blanche found means to break up the confederation against her. This change in the aspect of affairs compelled Henry to make a truce, and before the end of the year he returned home, leaving a small army behind him.

Under pretext of continuing the war, a new scutage was demanded and granted, not without opposition from the clergy; but finally a peace for three years was concluded in July 1231, which was again renewed for five years in 1235. We may suppose, although Henry declared that he was on perfectly good terms with the Justiciary, that their great difference on foreign policy made his suspicious mind inclined to listen willingly to the insinuations of Des Roches, his evil genius, who in this year returned from the Crusade. Every difficulty of the Justiciary was artfully taken advantage of. Among other things laid to his charge was the insecure state of the Welsh borders. He was even represented as fostering a strange lawless opposition to the encroachment of Rome, which had been showing itself in the kingdom. A secret society, part lay, part clerical, had been formed to check the habit of granting English livings to foreign priests, thus not only destroying the funds of the English clergy, but overriding the rights of private patronage. The society wrote letters to all ecclesiastical bodies, threatening them with vengeance if they paid the incomes of the foreign interlopers.

The associates did not confine themselves to threats; several foreign priests were robbed and outraged. The head of the conspiracy, Sir Robert Twenge, boldly justified his conduct to the King, and was allowed to depart unharmed, and carry his complaints direct to Rome. The rioters were said to have shown in their justification letters from the Justiciary.

It is scarcely possible that this could have been true; but, together with the disturbances on the Welsh Marches, it formed the chief among a series of very trivial charges which were brought against Hubert, and produced his fall. On the 29th of July 1232, he was suddenly suspended from all his offices. His place was taken by Stephen de Segrave, a close ally of Des Roches. Peter de Rivaux, probably the Bishop's son, was made treasurer, and other favourites of the Bishop were raised to office. Hubert, aware of the strength of his enemies, took refuge in the Priory of Merton in Surrey.

Fall of De Burgh.

He was granted a few weeks to prepare his defence, and to get ready accounts which were demanded of all the money that had ever passed through his hands. Supposing that he was thus at liberty for the present, he went to Bury St. Edmunds to join his wife, but on his journey thither, at Brentwood, he was, by order of the Court, assaulted, and fled for refuge to the sanctuary of a neighbouring chapel. He was torn from his refuge, and hurried to London. The favour he had gained in the eyes of the people and his whole political aim are well shown in the words that are reported to have been used by a smith when ordered to put irons on him: "Is not this that true and noble Hubert who has so often snatched England from the devastating hand of the foreigners, and made England, England?" The Church obliged Henry to restore him to his sanctuary, and the love with which he was regarded was shown by the touching offer of his own chaplain, Luke, Bishop of Dublin, to give himself up in his place. The effect of taking sanctuary was, that the fugitive was bound to swear before the coroner that he would leave England for ever. This exile he was bound to seek within forty days, leaving the coast within a tide after his arrival there, or, if the wind made that impossible, walking daily into the sea to show his willingness to do so. Hubert could not bring himself to abjure England; he would not therefore leave his sanctuary, and being surrounded by his enemies, was starved into submission. He was treated mercifully; his Crown fiefs were taken from him, his own property he retained, but he was kept in confinement in the Castle of Devizes.

Once in command of the government, Peter des Roches pushed headlong to the attainment of his objects. The friends of De Burgh were swept from the Court. The offices were filled with foreigners. Henry was persuaded to bring over 2000 troops from France. But Hubert was not the only Englishman among the nobility. Richard Marshall of Pembroke, the second son of the great Regent, and now his representative, raised the voice of patriotism, and declared to the King that as long as foreigners were ruling none of his English counsellors would appear at Court. Des Roches answered insolently that the King and his foreigners would soon bring rebels to reason. At assemblies at Oxford and at Westminster the same sort of language was used. By Peter's advice, the King began to proceed against his discontented subjects. He deprived Gilbert Basset of his property, and ordered the apprehension of his brother-in-law Siward; they sanctuary.

Effects of taking

Revolution
under Des Roches.
1233.

Earl of Pembroke upholds Hubert.

fled to the Earl Marshall, their property fell to Rivaux. In August, a day was appointed for the delivery of hostages by the suspected nobles. Pembroke, the Marshall, hearing that there was a plot against his life, retired to his Welsh possessions. The King summoned troops to meet him at Gloucester. The Marshall and his friends were outlawed without trial; fresh foreign troops came thronging over, and civil war began. The King's army did not fare well, and the clergy began to take up the cause of the Marshall. They protested against the confiscation of a peer's property without trial. "There are no peers in England," said des Roches, "as in France; the King may sentence whom he will, and drive them from the country." The clergy could not hear such absolute principles unmoved. They threatened Des Roches and his favourites with excommunication; and when the King demanded their censure upon the Marshall for an attack upon Gloucester, they said the city was his, and they found no grounds for censure.

Meanwhile, afraid for his life, De Burgh had escaped from Devizes and again taken sanctuary. Again he was illegally torn from it, again the Church remonstrated, and he was again restored. A sudden inroad into Wiltshire under the Marshall's friend Siward set him at liberty, and he immediately joined the Marshall at Strigul. Again and again the royal troops were worsted; and at length, in 1234, at a meeting of the clergy at Westminster, Archbishop Edmund took the matter up, explained to the King the wretched effects of trusting to his foreign counsellors, warned him that excommunication would most likely fall upon him too, and induced him at length to order the Bishop of Winchester to retire and attend to his spiritual work in his diocese. For a month longer the war went on, or rather attacks continued to be made upon the followers of Peter. But in May, news arrived that Richard Marshall had been treacherously killed in Ireland at the instigation of Des Roches. This was more than the King himself could bear, and the Archbishop received orders to restore to favour all those whom Des Roches had outlawed. Gilbert Marshall received the property and office of his late brother, and Hubert was allowed to retain the earldom of Kent and his own property. This change was followed by the removal of Peter's creatures. After some years of absence, he himself returned to England, was received into favour, and died in his diocese in 1239.

The fall of Des Roches was not productive of such advantageous changes in the government as might have been expected. Segrave

Edmund of Canterbury causes Des Roches' fall.
1234.

held for a few years the office of Justiciary. On his death the office was not renewed till after the Parliament at Oxford. Ralph Neville continued in more or less favour as Chancellor till 1244, when that office also fell into abeyance. The King practically became his own minister, and unfortunately his views of government had more in common with those of Des Roches than with those of De Burgh. It is true that the growing power of the Great Council, which was gradually gaining the name of Parliament, prevented any great infractions of the Charter, and compelled the King again and again to renew that document, though always in exchange for an aid. The frequency of renewal, however, seems to show repeated efforts on the part of the King to free himself from it; nor was the state of his treasury such as to enable him to do without legitimate sources of revenue. The real faults of his reign were not illegal extensions of the royal power, but the readiness with which he allowed and even joined in the exactions of the Papal See, and the total absence of national objects which distinguish his rule, which may be traced to his culpable partiality to foreigners. From the year 1236 till the Parliament of Oxford, these errors were continually on the increase.

The first great influx of foreigners was caused by his marriage. In 1236, he married Eleanor, the second daughter of Count Raymond Berenger of Provence, and sister of the Queen of France. From that moment, the Court was in the hands of the Queen's relatives. It was especially the Queen's uncles into whose hands patronage fell. William, Bishop of Valence, was the first. To him was given the vast property of Richmond in Yorkshire, which had previously belonged to the Counts of Brittany, and the King had almost succeeded in securing for him the Bishopric of Winchester when news of his death was brought. He was succeeded by another uncle, Peter of Savoy. Richmond was handed on to him; Pevensey and Hastings were intrusted to him, and the wardship of the Earl of Warrenne, which completed his power in the south-east corner of England. To increase his influence, he brought over numbers of young foreign ladies, and married them to some of the great Earls of England. The death of Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1240, allowed the King to secure that See, after an interval of five years, for another of the uncles, Boniface, whose violence and warlike bearing, as well as his youth, made him a strange contrast to his predecessor. Peter de Aigue Blanch, another Savoyard, was made Bishop of Hereford, and afterwards

Henry becomes his own minister.

Henry's
marriage.

Influence of the Queen's uncles.

became Henry's disreputable agent in the business of the Sicilian monarchy. This lavish support of foreigners naturally caused great discontent in England, and was repeatedly the subject of complaints in the Great Council. Thus, in 1236 and 1237, there were three stormy councils, nor was the money the King required granted till the sanctions of the Magna Charta were again renewed. The arrival of the Cardinal Otho as Papal Legate did not mend matters; his efforts at reconciliation were useless, and he soon turned his attention to collecting money for the Church. At this time, for a very short period, it seemed as if Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's brother, might have assumed the post of leader of the English party; but his patriotic efforts were short-lived. A few years after he married the Queen's sister, and threw his influence upon the side of the foreigners.

A far greater man took the post he thus resigned. Simon de Montfort, destined to be the real national leader of England, was rising into importance. The sister and heiress of Count Robert of Leicester had married the Count of Montfort, and died in 1204. In 1215, the whole English property had been given to Ralph Earl of Chester. Simon de Montfort, the Conqueror of the Albigenses, never possessed it, but his eldest son Almaric, after the death of the Earl of Chester, in 1232, demanded the property and honours of Leicester for his younger brother Simon, who was thus acknowledged as the owner of the property. He held the bason of water as High-Steward at the Queen's coronation, shortly after married the King's sister, the widow of William, second Earl of Pembroke, and succeeded in getting that marriage acknowledged by Gregory IX. in 1238. Like all those who had to do with Henry, he was obliged to bear extraordinary changes of fortune from the fickle character of the King. An angry quarrel drove him abroad, and, in 1240, in company with Richard of Cornwall, he set out for the Holy Land.

During their absence the government of England grew continually worse. Men began to weary of the personal government of the King. For several years the great offices of judiciary and chancellor had been left unfilled, and their duties performed by subordinate officials, upon whom the King lavished his favours. One of the chief of these was Mansell, who is said to have held no less than 700 livings, and to have been in the yearly receipt of 8000 marks. The Church was gradually driven to make common cause with the lay opposition. It was a time of spiritual revival. The great monastic orders had lapsed into the position of wealthy

Formation of a national party under Simon de Montfort.

Revival in the Church.

landowners. The work which in the early times they had so well performed, the civilization of the country districts, was over. They had become lazy and luxurious. The prelates had for the most part deserted their spiritual calling and become statesmen. The Church as a whole, as represented by the Pope, had misused its influence. Crusades had become the instruments of temporal aggrandizement, or of revenge upon the personal enemies of the Pope. A spiritual revival had been set on foot almost at the same time by St. Dominic and St. Francis d'Assisi, who had founded the two great orders of Dominicans and Franciscans, the Black and Grey Friars. The vow of poverty, evaded by the older orders, had become a reality. The establishments of the Friars had met with great success; thousands thronged to be enrolled in their orders. They had rapidly spread over Europe, and had lately arrived in England, and there begun their work of regeneration. They had laboured chiefly in the towns and among the most wretched outcasts of society, and had there called into life new religious energy, mingled with hatred towards their wealthy predecessors the old monks, and with a consciousness of personal equality in the sight of God, which tended much to strengthen the democratic feeling which supplied Simon de Montfort with his strongest support. Their teaching had not affected the lower classes alone; numbering among them many learned men, they speedily got possession of the education at Oxford, and found a friend in Grosstête, the learned Bishop of Lincoln. The reforms which the Church demanded were carried out by him as far as possible in his diocese; and under his guidance, and that of Edmund Rich, the Church of England was becoming at once spiritual and national. The folly of the King, who filled the high ecclesiastical offices with foreign favourites, the exactions of the Pope, who, acting hand in hand with him, placed hundreds of benefices in the hands of Italian priests, compelled all that was best in the Church to throw itself absolutely on the side of the reformers.

Grosstête.

Ecclesiastical and secular misgovernment went on side by side. Disastrous expeditions to France, and consequent exactions from the people, were intermingled with the visits of Papal emissaries, to wring from the wretched clergy contributions for the Papal war against the Hohenstaufen. In 1242, the King undertook to regain Poitou. Richard of Cornwall had been nominal Count of that province, when, in 1241, Louis gave his brother Alphonse the same title. The most important nobleman in the country was the Count de la Marche, who had married Henry's mother. He at first did homage to the new Count, but afterwards, urged it is supposed by his ambitious wife, renounced his fealty, and demanded assistance from Henry. The King therefore landed in the following year in Gascony. De la Marche soon began to repent of what he had done, and Henry, never a very active warrior, was disheartened by his treachery. The armies at length met near Taillebourg, on the Charente. Afraid of being surrounded, Henry employed his brother Richard, who had gained general favour with the French by liberally ransoming prisoners in the Crusade, to secure an armistice. He took the opportunity of falling back to Saintes, where he was almost surprised by the pursuing enemy. After this he was gradually driven backwards to the Garonne, while Marche and his revolted barons again accepted their French lord. The year was wasted in fruitless negotiations with the discontented Count of Toulouse, and in collecting money and troops from England. Henry quarrelled with his own nobles, who gradually left his army; and early in 1243 returned to England, having accepted a peace, which deprived him of the whole of Poitou and of the Isle of Rhé. Gascony was now the only part of France remaining to the English. It was during this campaign that Richard of Cornwall met and married Sancha, the Queen's sister, throwing up from this time all chance of leading the national party, and attaching himself to the foreigners.

Affairs of
Poitou.

Loss of Poitou.
1243.

Prince Richard joins the foreign party.

Exactions in Church and State.
1244.

Council at Lyons.

Such a war did not tend to the popularity of the King. The exchequer had been empty, money was stringently and often illegally exacted. A new Pope, Innocent IV., was elected, and the exactions from the English clergy resumed more vigorously than ever: for the Pope was carrying on the contest he had inherited against Frederick II., and was now summoning at Lyons the council his predecessor had failed to collect, in hopes of destroying for ever the power of the Hohenstaufen. His agent, Master Martin, travelled through England, pillaging the clergy till the English could bear it no longer, and the barons joined with the Church in demanding his dismissal. The foreign element in the Church too continued its baneful activity. Boniface, the Archbishop, laid waste his rich see, cutting down the timber and sending the profits abroad, while the King attempted, though in vain, to secure the Bishopric of Chichester for Robert de Passelewe. The nation determined to demand its rights at the Council of Lyons. The English ambassadors there took an opportunity of charging the Pope with not being contented with his Peter's Pence and the yearly 1000 marks which John had promised, with sending his messengers to make further exactions, and with filling English benefices against the will of their patrons with Italian priests. 60,000 marks a year thus passed into the hands of foreigners, ignorant of the language, and mostly living abroad. The Pope vouchsafed no answer, but shortly afterwards issued a Bull forbidding pluralities, and promising to respect the rights of patrons. The Bull remained a dead letter; and the very next year 6000 marks were exacted, and foreign priests were as plentiful as ever, admitted to their benefices under what was spoken of as "non obstante" clauses, which set aside all previous Bulls. The feeling in England against the Pope, who exacted, and the King, who allowed the exactions, grew more and more determined.

Futile attempts to check exactions.
1246.

In 1247 matters grew still worse. A fresh swarm of foreigners arrived in England; De la Marche was dead, and the King's half-brothers came over and were at once received with favour and honoured with profuse gifts. Chief among them was William of Valence, and his brother Aymer, who, in the year 1250, was made Bishop of Winchester, though he was never consecrated. The foreign policy of England was by these men managed for their own interests. Thus on the death of Raymond Berenger, Provence was allowed to pass into the hands of Charles of Anjou, who had married the Queen's youngest sister; and thus Henry made use of a crusade, on which he said that he was going, to demand large sums of money from the people. In 1248 the crisis seemed approaching. At a meeting of Parliament many charges were raised against the favourites; and the feeling against the King's personal government, which had long been growing, found vent. In blind security, Henry continued his course. The King's revenue, squandered in empty magnificence or lavish grants to his foreign friends, became more and more dilapidated. Money had to be borrowed. All men with an income of £20 were compelled to take up their knighthood; and afraid to have recourse to illegal aids from the nobility, the King turned upon the cities, more especially London, and demanded and obtained great tallages from them. The crusade constantly supplied him with an excuse for these exactions; yet even when the King of France was taken prisoner in Egypt, Henry and his crusaders made no movement. He contented himself with appointing

Inroad of Poitevin favourites.
1247.

Discontent of Barons.

Continued
misgovernment.

Tallages on the cities.

a day for his expedition; the expedition itself did not take place. Innocent indeed had other ends in view; he was bent far more on the destruction of the Hohenstaufen than on the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. Frederick II. had died in December 1250, and the Pope's energies were now directed to driving those who remained of this family from their kingdom of the two Sicilies.

Far indeed from assisting Louis, Henry had regarded his absence as an opportunity for regaining his power in the south of France. Gascony was in a state of complete confusion, chiefly through the insurrections of Gaston of Bearn and assaults from the King of Navarre. To bring it into order, Henry had, in 1248, appointed Simon de Montfort his governor there. His government had been completely successful, and at length, in 1250, Gaston was sent a prisoner to England. In his foolish soft-heartedness, Henry at once pardoned and released him. But the vigorous government of Simon had excited the displeasure both of the nobles and of the towns. They sent an embassy under the Archbishop of Bordeaux to lay charges against him before Henry. The King, fickle and jealous, listened to them; and Leicester was summoned home. He had almost ruined himself in his efforts to carry on his government well, and an angry scene of personal recrimination occurred, the King charging him with treason, while Simon demanded repayment for the money he had expended. It shows the state of personal contempt into which the King had fallen, that Leicester could venture to give him the lie direct. But the King could not do without him; by the influence of the Earl of Cornwall the quarrel was adjusted, and De Montfort returned as he believed to his government. His back was scarcely turned when the King appointed in his place his young son Edward, and ordered the Gascons not to obey De Montfort. Feeling himself thus freed from his charge, De Montfort went to Paris. The opinion of his abilities was so high, that he was offered the regency of France; but slighted though he had been at home, he was still true to his adopted country, and declined the flattering offer.

Left to himself, Henry found the Gascons more than he could manage. He collected indeed much money for the expedition; the Charter being renewed as usual at the price of a grant. The Jews had to advance money, the towns were tallaged. But, after all, things would have gone badly had not Leicester again patriotically offered his services, and taken command the crusade.

Diversion of
1250.

Montfort's
government of Gascony.

His quarrel with the King.

By Leicester's aid Gascony is saved.

of the disturbed province. With his assistance, and with money obtained from England, by dint of lying letters, narrating the extreme danger of the King from the approach of a vast army of Christians and Saracens under the King of Castile, peace was made with Alphonso X., at that time the King of Castile, and a marriage arranged between Edward and his daughter the Princess Eleanor. This expedition therefore had on the whole been successful; but it plunged the King still deeper into money difficulties, while his constant demands for money, and the dishonest means he had taken to secure it, had lowered him still further in the eyes of the people. His foolish ambition and his adherence to the Papal See completed what his long reign of misgovernment had begun.

It has been said that the Pope's chief object was to remove the Hohenstaufen from their Italian dominions. As early as 1252, seeking some prince whom he might set in their place, and being assured of the fidelity of the English King, he offered the throne of Sicily to Richard of Cornwall. That Prince, remembering that Henry, Frederick's son, was his own nephew, and too prudent to trust himself blindly to the Pope, declined the offer. But when young Henry died in 1253, and Sicily fell into the hands of Conrad and of his half brother Manfred, the Pope repeated his offer to King Henry's son Edmund. By him it was foolishly accepted; Conrad also died, and a great opportunity was opened for the Pope's intrigues. There were three parties in Sicily: the German party, who upheld a son of Conrad, the Italian Gibellines, who obeyed Manfred, and the Sicilians, who followed Peter Rufus, the Emperor's lieutenant. The Pope succeeded in bribing the leader of the German party, and his views seemed on the point of realization, when he died. He was succeeded by Alexander IV., who was reputed a moderate man, but who accepted all the arrangements of his predecessor. Henry had returned from Gascony, after a costly visit to Paris, deeply in debt. The Charter of London was again set aside, and a heavy tallage inflicted; the Jews were again compelled to pay large sums of money; and the Barons in Parliament were loudly complaining of grievances, and demanding the appointment of a Parliamentary Justiciary and Chancellor. In the midst of all these difficulties, the King was foolish enough to accept the Sicilies on ruinous terms. Two hundred ounces of gold yearly, and the support of 300 knights, were to be promised, the expenses of the war to be paid, and an army at once sent to claim the kingdom. The Pope kept the difficulties.

Henry's money

The Pope offers Edmund the kingdom of Sicily.
1254.

Henry accepts Sicily on ruinous terms.

management of this war in his own hands, but the Bishop of Hereford, Henry's envoy, was allowed to make the King responsible for the outlay. The Pope began immediately to send his creditors direct to Henry, and twice before the end of the year 1256, a Papal Legate of the name of Rustand had appeared in England, raised money of unknown value from the English Church, and freed the King from his Crusader's oath, that he might employ his forces against Sicily.

The English Church was indeed at his mercy. Boniface of Canterbury lived abroad, and was completely in the Papal interest, the Archbishopric of York was vacant, the Bishops of Winchester and Hereford were creatures of the King. Henry himself was acting in complete harmony with the Pope, who had several times granted him a tenth from the clergy, and had given him the incomes of all vacant benefices, and of intestates. The Church was driven into close union with the rapidly rising baronial opposition, and was obliged to regard its temporalities as ordinary baronies. Scotland and Wales were again becoming troublesome, and the lukewarmness of the English Barons prevented successful

Consequent
exactions.
Terrible famine.
1257.

resistance to their inroads. To add to the difficulties of England, 1257 was a year of fearful want. The weather was so bad that the harvest stood rotting in the fields even in November. Wheat rose from two shillings to fifteen or twenty the quarter. The harvest of 1258 promised to be as bad. Thousands were dying of hunger.¹ And when, in the midst of this misery, the Pope's Legate (who in 1257 had stated the amount of debt to the Pope to be 136,000 marks, and had succeeded in wringing 52,000 marks from the clergy) repeated his demand the following year, and threatened an interdict unless the debt was at once paid, Englishmen of all classes felt that the time for action had arrived, and, taking advantage of the absence of the Earl of Cornwall, who was abroad attempting to make good his election to the German Empire, the Barons assembled at a Parliament held at Westminster determined upon reform.

Parliament at length roused to resistance.

It was a stormy scene. William de Valence and Simon de Montfort almost came to blows. William spoke of Montfort as "an old traitor, and the son of a traitor." "No, no," said Simon, "I am no traitor, nor traitor's son; my father was very different from yours," referring to the constant treasons of the old Count de la Marche. He then poured out his grievances, the squandering of the royal property on favourites, the folly, in the face of such financial difficulties, of accepting the Sicilian throne, and the admission of Papal legates to rob the clergy. At length a sort of compromise was arrived at, and aid was promised if the Pope would lower his demands, and the King on his side promised reform, a promise to which several of his chief favourites had to put their signatures. The King also pledged himself to give full consideration to the Barons' demands at a Parliament to be assembled at Oxford at Whitsuntide, and to leave the question at issue to be decided by a commission of twelve from either side, whose verdict should be final.

¹ 20,000 are said to have died in London alone.

On June 11th, this Parliament met. It is known by the name of "The Mad Parliament." The Barons, of whom there were about a hundred,¹ appeared in arms, under the pretext of the war with Wales, in reality to overawe the King's violent step-brothers. Mad Parliament 1258.

At that Parliament the promised commission of twenty-four was chosen. The King's Commissioners, with the single exception of John of Plesseys, Earl of Warwick, were men pledged to the old evil courses, either by their relationship with the King or by the favours they had obtained from him. At the head of the Barons appeared Richard de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, the natural head of the English party, and De Montfort, himself indeed a foreigner, but of such high ability and character that he was indispensable to his party. To these twenty-four was intrusted the duty of securing reform. They were not like the twenty-five guardians of the Charter, pledges for the carrying out of the treaty, but a committee representing for the time the executive authority of the Crown. These Barons chose a council of four, John Mansell, the King's secretary, the Earl of Warwick, and two Bigods (the Earl of Norfolk and his brother). These in their turn were to nominate a council of state or executive ministry of fifteen. The predominance of the baronial party is shown by the fact that of those fifteen two-thirds were on the Barons' side.² This Council of fifteen produced the Provisions of Oxford, and appointed new officers. Hugh Bigod was chief justice, John of Peterborough, treasurer, Nicholas of Ely, chancellor. The royal castles were ordered to be placed in the hands of Englishmen; and three times a year a Parliament was to be held, consisting of the fifteen, and twelve members of the old twenty-four represen-

Provisions of Oxford.

¹ There were about 150 Baronies at this time, but several Barons had more than one.

² They were the Bishop of Worcester, the Earls of Leicester, Gloucester, Norfolk, Hereford, John Fitz-Geoffrey, Peter de Montfort, Richard de Grey, Roger Mortimer, and Albemarle. Of the King's party, Boniface of Canterbury, Peter of Savoy, the Earl of Warwick, John Mansell, and James d'Audley; (in the English copy he signed his name as James of Aldithel, Fitz-Geoffrey as Geoffreyson.)

tative Barons. These are said to be representatives of the commonalty of England, but it does not as yet appear that the commonalty meant anything but the baronage. These Provisions were accepted and sworn to by the King, Prince Edward, and the Barons, and subsequently, on his return to England, by Richard, King of the Romans.

The article which demanded the surrender of castles by foreigners met with much opposition.¹ The King's step-brothers refused to surrender theirs. Simon de Montfort, as a foreigner, on the other hand, showed a good example by surrendering two of those he had in charge.² When William de Valence refused this order, "I will have the castles," said De Montfort, "or your head." The threat was too serious to be disregarded; the foreigners crept off in the night, and went to Winchester, where they hoped that Aymer de Valence would afford them protection. The Barons at once pursued them. They were obliged to yield, and were exiled. The Barons then proceeded to check the bad government of the sheriffs. Four knights from each shire (a step towards the coming admission of the lower gentry to Parliament) were appointed to inquire into the question; and it was arranged that the sheriffs should be elected yearly. The Londoners readily accepted the new order of things; and finally, in October, the Provisions were solemnly proclaimed, together with the Magna Charta, in Latin, French and English. In this the King declared his full adhesion to the Oxford Ordinances. It was countersigned by thirteen of the fifteen counsellors. This is the first public document issued in the English language, and may be regarded as a sign of the real question at issue during the reign: Was England to be, in fact, England, and the English to be a nation?

Exile of aliens.

Proclamation of the Provisions.

The fifteen counsellors were intrusted with the duty of producing other reforms before the following Christmas. This they neglected to do, and it was only in October 1259 that they produced another series of Provisions. These by no means answered the expectations of the Barons, and were so moderate that, after the cessation of the war, they were incorporated in the Statute of Marlborough, 1267. They were chiefly directed to prevent encroachments on feudal rights. Prince Edward had earnestly pressed for the production of these Provisions. He was at this time a strong reformer, and it was perhaps on account of the inefficient character of the reforms now produced, that a quarrel arose between Leicester and Gloucester, in which, we are told, that Leicester was supported by Edward, Gloucester by the King. The government was meanwhile practically in the hands of the fifteen. They felt that their chief work was in England, and therefore freed themselves as much as possible from foreign complications. They made peace with Wales, entirely renounced all claims upon Sicily, and made a definitive treaty with France. By this treaty Bordeaux, Bayonne and Gascony, with the addition of the Bishoprics of Limoges, Cahors and Perigord, which the honesty of the French King restored, were to be held by England as fiefs of France; all claim on Normandy, Anjou, Touraine and Poitou was to be given up; and the King of France promised to give a sum of money for the maintenance of five hundred knights for two years, to be used only for the good of England or the Church. This last article proved afterwards a source of danger to the baronial cause.

¹ Fifteen at least of the royal castles were in the hands of foreigners.

² Kenilworth and Odiham.

Final treaty with France 1259.

Their whole government seems to have given satisfaction; but it was not likely that Henry should calmly submit to their domination. With the peculiar faculty of making his religion compatible with bad government and dishonesty, which was the characteristic of this King, he applied, almost immediately after the Parliament of Oxford, to the Pope for an absolution from his promises. A visit twice repeated to the King of France gave rise to the suspicion that he was concerting measures with that monarch; and, in 1261, he was certainly fortifying the Tower. In April of that year an answer of Alexander IV., entirely absolving him from his vows, reached him.

Henry thinks of breaking the Provisions.

Pope's absolution arrives.

He ordered it to be publicly read, proceeded to give some castles into the hands of foreigners, and proclaimed that he would no longer consent to the restraint imposed upon him. The Barons met at Kingston; and, unwilling to proceed to extremities, agreed to refer their differences to the King of France, whose character for honour stood high, though in this instance rumours were afloat that he was already pledged to the King's interest.¹ The King would probably not have ventured on this course had not a quarrel arisen in the baronial party, which deprived them of their ablest leader. It is not certain what the cause of quarrel was, but as early as 1259, De Clare and Montfort had exchanged hot words, and from that time De Montfort had been very much abroad.

Quarrel between De Clare and De Montfort.

¹ Formal reference does not seem to have been made till 1263.

and the leadership of the baronial party entirely in the hands of De Clare. In 1262, a second absolution reached the King, and was by his orders publicly promulgated by Mansell, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by the Bishop of Norwich.

But meanwhile a stronger leader than Richard Earl of Gloucester had appeared in England, and the King's attempts at recovering his authority were peremptorily checked. The Earl of Leicester, hearing of the death of Gloucester, had returned from abroad, and found himself the unquestioned chief of the party. With himself he associated the late Earl's son, young Gilbert de Clare, and matters soon seemed to be coming to extremities. Llewellyn of Wales, apparently in the baronial interest, attacked the lands of Roger de Mortimer and of that foreign Bishop of Hereford who had been the King's agent at Rome. A general persecution of all those who could not speak English followed in the border counties. The Bishop of Hereford's treasures were seized, and he himself had to fly abroad. At the same time the Bishop of Norwich, who was disliked for having published the absolution, was attacked. John Mansell was driven into France; while, on the other hand, Prince Edward, who had hitherto remained true to the Statutes of Oxford, was reconciled to his father, and appeared in arms against the barons. The people of London joined in the general disturbance. The Queen had to leave London and retire to Windsor. On her way thither, as she was passing up the river, she was assaulted and maltreated by the Londoners, an event which Prince Edward is said not to have forgotten.

While the parties were thus already beginning to appeal to arms, in January 1264, the King of France published his verdict at Amiens. It was entirely in favour of the Crown, and annulled the Provisions of Oxford, especially declaring that the King had right to employ aliens as the governors of his castles. The verdict was clear enough, and Henry believed that it put him entirely in the right. On the other hand a clause was added of which the Barons took hold to support their cause. By this it was asserted that the verdict was not intended to derogate in anything from the royal privileges, charters, liberties and laudable customs of the kingdom. With this loophole for variety of opinion, the award left the main question unsettled, although it enabled a certain number of those who were pledged to the Provisions, but disliked the Barons' rule, to join the King. Among others, his brother Richard, the King of the Romans, took advantage of this opportunity. Still unwilling to press their claims to the uttermost, the Barons offered to accept the award, excepting only the one clause, which was in fact the point for which they were fighting, that, namely, which permitted the employment of aliens. The Londoners would not even go so far as this.

Return of De Montfort.
Outbreak of hostilities.
Award of Amiens 1264.

The King refused their offer, and war became inevitable. It began by the capture of Northampton by Prince Edward, and gradually drifted southward, till the two armies met at Lewes. The King occupied the town, with the castle and priory; the Barons, the down to the west. The battle ended in a decisive victory for the Barons. Prince Edward, carried away by his anger against the Londoners, whom he despised and hated, was induced to pursue an advantage he had won over them too far. Richard, the King of the Romans, was misled into an attack upon a cage-shaped litter, which he believed to contain De Montfort, who had been wounded by a fall from his horse. De Montfort had purposely left it in his rear, together with his standards and baggage; it really contained only four refractory Londoners of the King's party. These two errors on the part of the enemy secured the victory to De Montfort; and when Prince Edward returned from his pursuit, he found the battle lost, and the struggle only prolonged by the fighting round the castle at Lewes. De Montfort, evidently the victor, offered to put an end to the bloodshed by an immediate truce; and an agreement known as the Mise of Lewes was made, by which the questions at issue were to be settled by a court of arbitration consisting of two Frenchmen and one Englishman. The two Princes, Edward and Henry d'Almeine, were to remain in captivity meanwhile, in exchange for their fathers, the King and his brother Richard, who had been taken prisoners; and the prisoners on both sides were to be released.

De Montfort was for the time completely master of the country. He at once proceeded to act with vigour to bring the country into order. The King's peace was proclaimed everywhere. The prisoners were exchanged, and till the open question with regard to the election of sheriffs should be settled, guardians of the peace were appointed for each county. In the offices thus created, as well as in those of the King's Council, the friends and followers of Simon were put. A Parliament was then called, which assembled in June, at which it is probable that knights of the shire were present. At this Parliament a committee of three was appointed, who nominated nine others, in whose hands the government was to be placed. If the nine could not come to agreement, the final de-

It fails.

War, and battle of Lewes. May 14.

The Mise of Lewes.

Appointment of revolutionary government.

cision remained with the three, who were the Bishop of Chichester, Simon de Montfort, and Gilbert de Clare. At the same time the affairs of the Church were put in order, its grievances being left to the settlement of three bishops appointed by statute.

De Montfort thus seemed in a fair way to make his position durable; but unfortunately three important men had made their escape from Lewes:—these were the Earl of Warrenne, Hugh Bigod and William

Exiles assemble
at Damme.

de Valence. These three fugitives betook themselves to Damme, in Flanders, where the Queen, in company with the exiled foreigners, Archbishop Boniface, Bishop of Hereford, Peter of Savoy, and John Mansell, had assembled an army of hired troops. Great preparations were made to meet the expected invasion, but the winds were so contrary that the ill-provided army, weary of waiting, separated. The closeness of the danger, however, induced Simon to send ambassadors to France, to urge on the completion of the settlement according to the Mise of Lewes. The embassy was at

Montfort desires final settlement.

the same time to try and make terms with the Papal Legate, who had been quickly despatched to uphold the cause of so good a vassal of Rome as Henry. They were unsuccessful in both their objects. The Queen had been beforehand with Louis, and the Legate, who shortly afterwards ascended the Papal throne as Clement IV., replied only by excommunication. The Bull, however, was taken by the mariners of the Cinque Ports before reaching England, and thrown into the sea; and the excommunication did not take effect.

Meanwhile, the royalist barons on the Marches of Wales, especially Mortimer, Clifford and Leybourne, began to bestir themselves. Some of them even pushed as far as Wallingford, where Prince Edward was a prisoner, and attempted, though in vain, to liberate him. The liberation of this Prince was now the chief object of the royalists, and the pressure put upon Leicester was so great, that he had, though unwillingly, to consent to measures which should bring it about. There was indeed every reason to desire that he should be freed. The part he had played in the late disputes had been highly honourable; he had remained true to the Provisions of Oxford, till the breaking out of the war seemed to render it his imperative duty to assist his father; and from his subsequent conduct it is plain that, although he must have disliked the present restrictions upon the royal power, there was much in the national policy of the Barons with which he sympathized. All those who resented the assumption of power by Mont-

Royalist movements on the Welsh Marches

fort, while desiring a reform in government, would have found in him a welcome leader.

It was principally for this object that the famous Parliament of 1265 was called. To it were summoned only twenty-^{Parliament of 1265.} three peers, friends of De Montfort, though the great Northern and Scotch barons, who had strongly supported the King at Lewes, also received safe conducts. Of the higher clergy there were no less than one hundred and eighteen, a number by no means unprecedented, but which seems to show how completely the Church sympathized with the Barons. There were also knights of the shires—two from each county. Even from the time of the commission for forming the Domesday Book, elected knights had been occasionally consulted upon the affairs of their county; since Henry II.'s reign, although they had never been properly summoned to Parliament, this practice had been more frequent. But the addition of two burghers from the chief cities was wholly new, and although the practice was not continued without a break, this, says Hallam, is the epoch at which the representation of the Commons becomes distinctly manifest. To De Montfort it was of the greatest importance that the general acquiescence of all important classes of the country in his government should be shown.

The assembly thus formed had first of all to consider what was to be done with the present insurgents and with the exiles, and, secondly, on what conditions Prince Edward might be with safety liberated. On the first point it was decreed that the barons of the Welsh Marches should be exiled to Ireland for three years, and the fugitives from Lewes were summoned to stand their trial before their peers, a summons to which, of course, they paid no attention. The other question was more important, but the conditions were finally arrived at on which the Prince might be set at liberty. There was to be complete amnesty for all that was past; the King and Prince were never to receive their former favourites; the royal castles were to be placed in trustworthy hands; the great charters of liberty were to be again established; the Prince was not to leave the country for three years, and must choose his council by the advice of government; and the county of Chester, with its castle, together with the castles of the Peak and Newcastle, were to be given up to De Montfort. For this, however, an equivalent was to be given from De Montfort's county of Leicester. All these arrangements were made under the most solemn sanctions. On the last article much of the abuse of Leicester for avarice and self-seeking

Conditions of the Prince's liberation.

has been rested. But, in fact, the position of the lands commanding the Scotch and Welsh borders afforded a sufficient political reason for requiring their cession. A copy of this arrangement was sent to each sheriff, and the great charters of liberty publicly read, with a solemn threat of excommunication against all who should break them.

These arrangements tended to the establishment of a peaceful government and to the healing of faction; but unfortunately there was constant jealousy of De Montfort among his colleagues, arising probably in part from his foreign birth and royal connections, in part from the truly popular nature of his views, with which the Barons had but little sympathy. Again, as on a previous occasion, De Clare, the leader of the English Barons, deserted him, and began to intrigue with his enemies. At the same time, William de Valence landed in his lordship of Pembroke. By the instrumentality of Mortimer, Edward made his escape from Ludlow Castle; and the invaders, the Prince, the Lord Marchers, and Gloucester opened communications one with the other. The trick by which Edward effected his escape is well known. On pretence of racing, he wearied the horses of his guardians, and then galloped from them on a particularly swift horse that had just been sent him, which he had kept fresh. The danger had become so pressing that Leicester advanced against the invaders in the South of Wales: but while in that distant corner of the country, the Prince, with the men of Chester, who willingly joined their old governor, marched down the Severn and took Gloucester, thus cutting Leicester off from the rest of his supporters.

De Montfort at once recognized that Edward was his chief enemy, and turned back to meet him, at the same time summoning to his aid his son the younger Simon, who was with an army at Dover. Had he executed this duty intrusted to him satisfactorily, Edward would either have been enclosed between the two armies, or De Montfort largely reinforced. As it was, he wasted some time at Kenilworth, his father's chief stronghold, and foolishly suffered his troops to encamp outside the walls of the castle. A female spy brought Edward news of his enemy's mistake, and a sudden onslaught scattered De Montfort's reinforcement in disgraceful flight. Edward tried to check De Montfort's return by breaking down all the bridges over the Severn, but a way was at length found to cross the river about four miles below

Defection of
De Clare.
He joins the Marchers.

Escape of Edward.

Leicester opposes Edward in Wales.

Defeat at Kenilworth.

Worcester, and the baronial army reached Evesham in the full expectation of speedily meeting their friends.

As they marched out in the early morning on the 4th of August, they saw a well-ordered army approaching, and Leicester's barber, who happened to be the longest-sighted man amongst them, at first recognized all the standards as belonging to young De Montfort; only after he had ascended a church-tower did he perceive the emblems of De Clare and Edward mingled with them. De Montfort was thus greatly outnumbered and surprised. As the enemy approached in three well-arrayed divisions, "Ah," said he, "that arrangement is not your own, I have taught you how to fight." Then, as it became evident that he had neither time nor men to secure the victory, he added, "God have mercy on our souls, for our bodies are the Prince's." The stories of the fidelity of his party are touching. He begged his partisans to fly while there was time. They refused to leave him, while his son Henry begged him to make good his retreat, and leave him alone to fight the battle. He was not a man to listen to such advice. At length the assault came. He saw the best of his followers and his son killed or disabled around him. But still, though his horse was killed under him, "like a giant," says one, "like an impregnable tower for the liberties of England," says another of the Chroniclers, he fought on, wielding his sword with both hands, till he fell overpowered by the assault of numbers. Three hours completed the battle, which was little else than a massacre. "Thus lamentably fell the flower of all knighthood, leaving an example of steadfastness to others. But since there is no curse more baleful than a domestic enemy, who can wonder at his fall? those who had eaten his bread lifted their heels against him, they who loved him by word of mouth lied in their throat."¹

The victory produced a complete reaction in England. Castle after castle opened its gates to the royalists. At Kenilworth alone, which Simon had defended with extraordinary machines which his skill as an engineer had invented, and in the inaccessible marshes in the East of England, the baronial party still held out. The conqueror proceeded at once to act with reckless severity. The whole of Leicester's property was confiscated and given to Prince Edward, all his followers were deprived of civil rights and property, and all acts of the government since the battle of Lewes were declared null. This was the work of a Parliament summoned at Winchester, where of course there

Battle of Evesham.
Aug. 4.

¹ Rishanger de Bell. Lew.

is no sign either of county or of borough representation. After London, which made some opposition, was conquered, and for the time disfranchised, all efforts were directed against Kenilworth. This stronghold had become a centre from which, as from the Eastern Fens, disorderly bodies pushed out to wreak their vengeance on the King's followers. The defence was heroic. It seemed plain that the reaction had been carried much too far. One party at all events of the royalists, with Prince Henry d'Almeine and perhaps Prince Edward at its head, desired a more conciliatory policy, and at length, at the end of the year, a Commission of twelve was established to attempt to produce peace. Under their management, a Parliament and Convocation was held, the Magna Charta again acknowledged, even by the Papal Legate, and those who had been disinherited were allowed to regain their lands by paying a certain number of years' income to the new possessors. The sons of Lord Derby and Leicester were alone excepted. In accordance with this arrangement, called the Dictum of Kenilworth, the castle was surrendered.

The insurgents in the Fens afterwards submitted on the same terms, but not before Gilbert de Clare had again changed sides, making it plain to the government that, however much jealousy of De Montfort might have broken the baronial party, the feelings which had dictated the Provisions of Oxford were still unconquered. Under these circumstances it was found necessary to take further measures to insure moderation of government. In May 1267, Magna Charta was again enacted, and from this time forward kept. The offices were given into the hands of Englishmen, and Englishmen only. The Sicilian project had become impossible, indeed the crown had been given to Charles of Anjou; and, finally, Prince Edward, whose influence might have been dangerous, had withdrawn from England on a crusade, and taken many English nobles with him. The Barons' war had thus, although in its outward form a failure, secured its main object—tolerable constitutional government, and the establishment of a national rule. In 1272 the King died.

It is always difficult to know how far the popular feeling is engaged in political revolutions. The great bulk of the nation is never the originator of such changes. The fate of a country is settled by the conduct and thought of its educated men, though the mass of the people plays a very

Kenilworth
and the Fens hold out.
1266.

Dictum of Kenilworth.

De Clare
compels more moderate
government.

Constitutional end of the reign.

Views of the people on the revolution.

prominent part as an instrument in the hands of its leaders. There is much to make us believe, however, that the movement of the Barons was in reality a national one. More particularly is this true in the case of Simon de Montfort. He is constantly spoken of by contemporary writers with admiration. "Il aime droit, et hait letort," (He loves right and hates the wrong), says one poet. "It should, however, be declared," says the Chronicler of Melrose, "that no one in his senses would call Simon a traitor, for he was no traitor, but the most devout and faithful worshipper of the Church in England, the shield and defender of the kingdom, the enemy and expeller of aliens, although by birth he was one of them." The Londoners were his devoted adherents, while the character of the Parliament which he summoned after the battle of Lewes was certainly popular. It seems fair to believe that he was the unselfish supporter of the national policy.

Again, all the writers of the time, with very few exceptions,¹ whether chroniclers or poets, were in favour of the baronial party. When some of the leaders seem flagging in their energy, they were cheered by such words as these,—

"O Comes Gloverniæ, comple quod cepisti, Nisi claudas congruè, multos decepisti."

"O tu Comes le Bygot, pactum serva sanum
Cum sis miles strenuus, nunc exerce manum.
O vos magni proceres, qui vos obligatis.
Observate firmiter illud quod juratis."

Again, in one political poem of the day we have the question at issue argued out in a manner which shows the advance of political knowledge, and in a constitutional tone which would become a modern Whig. "All restraint does not deprive of liberty. He who is kept from falling so that he lives free from danger, reaps advantage from such keeping, nor is such a support slavery, but the safeguard of virtue. Therefore that it is permitted to a king all that is good, but that he dare not do evil—this is God's gift. . . . If a prince love his subjects, he will be repaid with love; if he reign justly, he will be honoured; if he err, he ought to be recalled by them whom his unjust denial may have grieved, unless he be willing to be corrected; if he is willing to make amends, he ought to be raised up and aided by those same persons. . . . If a king be less wise than he ought to be, what advantage will the kingdom gain by his reign? Is he to seek by his own opinion on whom he should depend to have his failing supplied? If he alone choose, he will be easily deceived. Therefore let the community of the kingdom advise, and let it be known what the generality thinks, to whom their own laws are best known. Since it is their own affairs that are at stake, they will take more care and will act with an eye to their own peace. . . . We give the first place to the community; we say also that the law rules over the king's dignity, for the law is the light without which he who rules will wander from the right path."

¹ Wykes is the most important.

That proclamations should be published in English is also a significant fact, and it may on the whole be considered that this war was practically the conclusion of foreign domination in England. It is the great honour of Edward I. to have perceived this so clearly, that he willingly accepted the new national line of policy which the Barons had marked out, and he may be regarded as our first purely national monarch.

EDWARD I.

1272-1307.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Alexander III., 1249. Margaret, 1286. Interregnum, 1290. Balliol, 1292. Interregnum, 1296. Robert I., 1306.	Philip III., 1270. Philip IV., 1285.	Rodolph, 1272. Adolphus, 1291. Albert, 1298.	Alphonso X., 1252. Sancho IV., 1284. Ferdinand IV., 1295.

POPES.—Gregory X., 1271. Innocent V., 1276. Adrian V., 1276. John XX., 1276. Nicholas III., 1277. Martin IV., 1281. Honorius IV., 1285. Nicholas IV., 1288. Vacancy, two years. Celestine V., 1292. Boniface VIII., 1294. Benedict X., 1303. Vacancy, one year. Clement V., 1305.

Archbishops.	Chancellors.	Chief-Justices.
Robert Kilwardby, 1273—1278. John Peckham, 1279—1292. Robert Winchelsey, 1294—1313.	Walter de Merton, 1272. Robert Burnell, 1273—1292. John Langton, 1292. William Greenfield, 1302. William de Hamilton, 1304. Ralph de Baldock, 1307.	Ralph de Hengham, 1273—1289. Gilbert de Thornton, 1289—1295. Roger Brabazon, 1296.

EDWARD was still abroad when the news of his father's death was brought to him. His accession had been so long looked forward to as a happy termination to the difficulties of the last reign, that what might have been a dangerous crisis passed over peacefully. An assembly was summoned at Westminster, not only of the nobles, but also of the representatives of the lower estates, and there an oath of fidelity was taken to the absent King. Three prominent nobles seem to have assumed the position of governors; the Archbishop of York, as head of the clergy, Edmund of Cornwall, the King's brother, as representative of the royalty, and Gilbert of Gloucester, as chief of the baronage. Under them the government pursued its old course. Hearing that things were going well in England, Edward did not hurry home. He returned by Sicily and Rome, where he induced the Pope to visit upon the young De Montforts the murder of Henry D'Almeine, whom they had killed at Viterbo. Thence he passed into France, joined in a great tournament at Châlons, where jest was changed to earnest, and a rough skirmish ensued, known as the little battle of Châlons. True to his legal obligations, he did homage at Paris for his French dominions, demanding what as yet had not been fulfilled, the completion of the late definitive treaty in France: and after settling, not without application to the French King as feudal superior, his quarrels with Gaston de Bearn in Gascony, and establishing friendly relations with Flanders, he returned in 1274 to England, and there, on the 18th of August, was crowned and received the homage of his Barons, and that, among others, of Alexander III. of Scotland. Shortly after, he appointed as his chancellor Robert Burnell, who served him throughout his life as chief minister, while Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham, was his chief agent in all diplomatic matters.

Edward's peaceful accession.
1272.

His journey home.
1274.

From the reign of Edward began what may be properly spoken of as the English monarchy. The last reign had brought prominently forward the two great points which constituted the nationality of the country. Primarily the object of the baronial party had been to separate England from the overwhelming importance of its foreign connections, and to prevent it from becoming a mere source of wealth to foreign adventurers. In this the baronial party had succeeded. While declaring themselves national, they had been obliged to have recourse for support to other elements of the nation than those from which the ruling class had hitherto been formed. The advance of these new classes had, as has been seen, been gradual. Already, in earlier reigns, the principle both of election and representation had been, on more than one occasion, accepted. But it was the formal admission both of knights of the shire and of burghers to parliamentary privileges, even though the practice had not been continued, which rendered it impossible long to ignore the growing feeling that all classes should in some way be consulted about what interested all.

Edward was well fitted, both by position and character, to play the part of the first English king. He had given distinct proofs in the earlier part of the late baronial quarrels that a good and national government was what he desired. But it would be wrong to suppose that he was at all inclined to what we should now call liberal policy. In the latter part of his father's reign he had made it clear that to his mind a strong monarchy was a necessary condition of good government. It was only gradually, and in accordance with a love of symmetrical government which strongly characterized him, that he recognized the advantage of the complete admission of the hitherto unprivileged classes to the rights of representation. He set before him as his object the establishment of a good and orderly government in the national interests, but carried out by a strong, nay despotic monarch, subjected only to the restrictions of the law. This is indeed another prominent characteristic of the King, in which he went along with the tendencies of the age. His mind was essentially legal, and just at this time the Roman and civil law were forcing their way into prominence throughout Europe. In Edward and his great rival Philip IV. of France, we have, allowing for their differences in personal character, instances of the same course of action. They both intended to make use of feudal law, interpreted more or less by the Roman law, and pressed to its legal and logical conclusions, to strengthen the monarchy. It is thus that we find Edward constantly enacting statutes and constitutions, making use of feudal claims to compel the submission of his neighbours, and exerting to the full, sometimes even beyond the limits of honesty, the rights the constitution gave him, but never wilfully transgressing what he regarded as the law. He was successful in carrying out the two first branches of his threefold policy; in the third he failed. Good government he established by a series of admirable administrative enactments, and by that power of definition which a living historian¹ has attributed to him, in spite of the difficulties presented by the independent position of the Church, and by the disorders still remaining from the late troubled times. Nationality he was able to foster both by foreign wars and by his great plan of connecting all the kingdoms of Great Britain. But in his efforts to establish an absolute monarchy, he was met by the financial difficulties into which the late reign had plunged the Crown, and by that entanglement in foreign politics which the English

Edward the first English king.

His political views.

His legal mind.

His success

¹ Stubbs.

possessions in France, of which he was not yet quite free, continually caused. Urged by his wide schemes to have recourse to arbitrary means for replenishing his treasury, he excited again an opposition similar to that of his father's reign, and found himself obliged to make concessions which effectually prevented any of his successors from attempting to render the Crown independent.

The first years of the King's reign were employed in restoring order to the government and the finances. His first Parliament met at Westminster in 1275, where was passed a great restorative measure known by the name of the First Statute of Westminster. It was so wide and far-reaching that it might be called a code rather than an Act. Its object is said by a contemporary writer to have been to "awake those languid laws which had long been lulled asleep" by the abuses of the time. It secured the rights of the Church, improved the tardy processes of law, and re-established the charters, further limiting the sums which could be demanded for the three legal aids. At the same time Parliament, an export duty on wool and leather, the origin of the customs, was granted to the King, the more readily, perhaps, as his firmness had lately re-established the wool-trade with Flanders. During the next three or four years other less popular measures were taken with a view to replenish the King's treasury. Commissions were issued to inquire into the exact limits of the grants of the late King to the clergy, and to inquire into the tenure of property throughout England, with the twofold view of establishing the rights of property disturbed by the late war, and of clearly defining the revenue due to the Crown.

It was not till the year 1278 that the effect of this commission was seen. Orders were then issued to the itinerant justices to make use of the evidence which had been obtained, and to issue writs of "quo warranto," to oblige owners to make good their titles. This was the occasion of the well-known answer of Warrenne, Earl of Surrey, who presented his sword to the judge, saying, "This is my title-deed, with this my ancestors won my land, with this will I keep it." The temper thus shown by one of his most faithful followers prevented Edward from pushing matters to extremity. During these years was set on foot also the practice of demanding that those who were wealthy enough should receive knighthood. The practice was kept up during the reign, but the property counted sufficient for the holder of that dignity varied from £20 to £100 a year. The King's activity reached

His enforced concessions.

First Parliament Statute of Westminster. 1275.

Establishment of customs.

His restorative measures. 1278.

in all directions. Another commission was issued to inquire into the conduct of sheriffs. The coinage, much clipped and debased, was renewed; it was ordered that its shape should always be round, as the prevalent method of clipping had been to cut the pieces into four, so that the exact edge could not be known. At length, in 1279, Edward proceeded to regulate one of the great abuses of the Church. Not only had that body become exorbitantly rich, but the privileges which it claimed had begun to be detrimental to the Crown; and when, in the earlier part of the year, Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, produced and authorized, at a meeting at Reading, some canons tending to the independence of the Church, the King was determined to strike a blow in return. As corporations could not die, land which had passed into their possession was free from the fines and payments due from an incoming heir, which were thus lost to the feudal superior. Moreover, and this touched the Crown more nearly, it had become a habit to give property to the Church, and fraudulently to receive it back again as a Church fief, and thus free from feudal services. By the Statute of Mortmain, which was now passed, it was forbidden, without the King's consent, to transfer property to the Church.

Meanwhile, while Edward had been thus busied at home, affairs in Wales had begun to attract his attention. Llewellyn had always been in close alliance with the Leicester party, and had shown his dissatisfaction at the accession of Edward by refusing to come to the assembly which swore fealty to the new King. Edward, who wished honestly to heal the late differences, had summoned him to his coronation, and had again been refused. Had he not desired a peaceful solution of the difficulty, he would certainly now have proceeded to extremities. But no less than six opportunities were given to the Prince of appearing in England, to set himself right; on every occasion he had refused to do so. The suspicions which his conduct excited received a strong confirmation when it was known that he was contemplating a marriage with the daughter of De Montfort. It is probable that this marriage was to be carried out in pursuance of some scheme for continuing the disturbances of the last reign. Fortunately the lady was captured, with her brother Almeric who was escorting her, on her way to Wales. This brought matters to a crisis. In 1276, Llewellyn, who had refused all approaches to friendship, demanded, in the language of an independent prince, a treaty,

New coinage.

Statute of Mortmain. 1279.

Wales. 1275.

Llewellyn's suspicious conduct.

and the restoration of his wife. In November of that year Edward, acting in concert with his Parliament, ordered his army to meet him at Worcester, and the war began. Even the strength of his country did not enable Llewellyn to hold out against the superior power and ability of the English King. A fleet of ships from the Cinque Ports cut him off from Anglesea, and mastered that island, while the English army forced him back towards the mountains of Snowdon. He was induced to treat. The terms given him were stringent. The Cantreds or Hundreds between Chester and Conway were given up to the English. Anglesea alone he was allowed to keep in full, on the payment of 1000 marks, while a few baronies around Snowdon were left in his hands, to prevent his title of Prince of Wales being a mere empty honour. Besides this, he had to pay 50,000 marks for the expenses of the war, and a tribute of 1000 marks. Once conquered, however, and brought to complete submission, his treatment was generous. The money payments were at once remitted. His brother David, his enemy, and a probable source of discomfort to him, was kept in England and pensioned; and finally, he came to England, and received his wife, their marriage being nobly celebrated by the King.

In less than three years the whole arrangement was again destroyed. David, though he had fought for Edward and been well rewarded, suddenly deserted to his fellow countrymen. He attacked the Castle of Hawardyn, and, in company with his brother Llewellyn, besieged Rhuddlan and Flint. Edward at once advanced against them. Hard pressed, the brothers divided their forces. David continued to fight in the North, while his brother betook himself to South Wales. He was there surprised, defeated, and killed, on the River Wye, and his head sent to Edward, and displayed in London, in scorn adorned with an ivy crown, in allusion to some prophecy that he should be crowned in London. David was shortly afterwards compelled to surrender. A Parliament had been summoned to grant supplies; some difficulty had arisen, and before an answer could be given, a fresh one was called at Shrewsbury, (moved afterwards to Acton Burnell, the seat of the Chancellor,) by which the unfortunate Prince was tried, and condemned to death. This Parliament afterwards proceeded to the settlement of the conquered country, by what is known as the Statute of Wales. By this a considerable part of English law and English institutions, with 1277.

War breaks out

Llewellyn submits.

His merciful treatment.

Second rising
in Wales.
1282.

Death of Llewellyn.

Execution of David.
1283.

some modifications to suit the prejudices of the Welsh, were introduced. The conquest was completed by the famous presentation to the people of the King's new-born heir, under the title of the Prince of Wales. There was henceforth no longer any pretence of feudal supremacy; Wales was annexed to the English Crown. The following year the Parliament at Winchester produced the Statute known by the name of that city, which arranged the defence of the country upon a national basis. Of that piece of legislation, as well as of others before and after it, more will be said by and by. In the year after this, Edward left England, placing the government in the hands of his brother Edmund.

It will be necessary to turn for a moment to Edward's foreign relations to explain the necessity of his journey abroad. He had the misfortune, like his predecessors, to be master of Aquitaine, and as Duke of that province a vassal and peer of France. He was, moreover, cousin of the King of France, and brother-in-law of the King of Castile. Although a definitive treaty had been made between Henry III. and the French King, it had never been properly carried out; Edward had, as in duty bound, done homage for his French possessions, and had from time to time renewed his claims. He had even been allowed in 1279, in right of his wife, to take possession of Ponthieu. There was, nevertheless a constant feeling of distrust between the French King and his too powerful vassal. Edward had therefore done his best to cement his friendship on the side of Spain. But, in 1282, an event happened which enabled him to secure a settlement of his French claims, and to assume the important position of mediator in a great foreign quarrel. A war seemed imminent between Castile and France, when Peter III. of Aragon, for whose favour both parties had been intriguing, suddenly raised a large army, the destination of which was said to be Africa, but which shortly after proved to be intended for the conquest of Sicily from the French. This put an end to the quarrel with Castile, and brought Aragon forward as the Spanish power against which the French energies were directed. Charles of Anjou had received from the Pope the grant of the Two Sicilies when the Barons of England had obliged Edmund to renounce it. He had made good his position with extreme cruelty; and now the Sicilian people entered into that famous conspiracy known by the name of Sicilian Vespers, and massacred the French throughout the island. They then proceeded to give themselves to Peter III. of Ara-

Statute of Wales.
Annexation of Wales.
1284.

Statute of Winchester.
1285.

Foreign affairs
call Edward abroad.

Sicilian Vespers.

gon, in concert with whom they had certainly been acting. He was successful in his enterprise. His admiral, Loria, had everywhere defeated the fleets of Anjou, and in 1284 had taken prisoner Charles, Prince of Salerno, the Duke of Anjou's heir. For a short time there seemed some possibility of the quarrel being ended by a single combat between Peter and Charles; formal preparations were made, and Edward was entreated to preside as umpire. But chivalrous though he was, he was too much of a statesman to give his consent to so trivial a form of settlement; and, in 1285, Charles died.

His quarrel was taken up by the French King, and matters had reached this point when Edward thought it necessary to go abroad (especially as a new King, Philip IV., had just come to the throne), to arrange if possible a question which, involving not only his own interests, but also the authority of the Pope, was one of European interest. He succeeded in inducing Philip IV. to allow the justice of his claims with regard to the provinces to be united to Gascony, and proceeded the following year to act the part of mediator between the Courts of France and Aragon. He was trusted absolutely in this negotiation, and after some difficulty hoped that he had arrived at some conclusion, when he had succeeded in obtaining the freedom of Prince Charles of Salerno, although the terms of liberation were very hard. Large sums of money were to be paid, and Sicily was to be given up to the Spanish Prince, James. But no sooner was Charles at liberty than he repudiated these conditions; and Edward, disgusted with his want of faith, and thinking probably that it was wiser not to plunge too deep into European politics, determined to return home, neglecting the offered opportunity of forming an alliance with Aragon, which might have formed some counterpoise in Southern Europe to the power of France and of Rome.

His presence at home indeed was much wanted. The moment the back of the great ruler was turned, and the weight of his hand removed, it became evident that much time would be necessary before his arrangements could restore more than external order to the deeply disturbed society of England. Fresh disturbances had arisen in Wales, where Rhys ap Meredith had been roused to rebellion by the strictness with which the English law was carried out. Nor had the Regent's army, under Gilbert de Clare, succeeded in capturing him. It seems indeed that several of the greater nobles had begun to show discontent, and in 1288, Surrey, Warwick, Gloucester, and Norfolk had all appeared in a disorderly fashion in arms. There were other disturbances too in the lower strata of society. The Statute of Winchester was not yet fairly in operation, bands of outlaws appeared in the forest districts, and among others, one Chamberlain had fallen upon a fair held at Boston in Lincolnshire, and had burnt the town. The presence of the King restored order, but the fundamental cause of the misgovernment was laid open to him by his faithful Chancellor, Burnell. Like Henry II., he had employed as his judges professional lawyers, and they had not been proof against the great temptations of their office. The judges were corrupt, and justice was bought and sold. Very serious charges were brought against them in October; all except two, who deserve to be mentioned, John of Methingham and Elias de Bockingham, were convicted. The chief baron, Stratton, was fined 34,000 marks, the chief justice of the King's Bench, 7000, the master of the rolls, 1000; while Weyland, chief justice of the common pleas, fled to sanctuary, was there blockaded, and after his forty days of safety had to abjure the realm. His property, which was confiscated, is said to have amounted to 100,000 marks.

Edward mediator between France and Aragon. 1286.

His award is repudiated.

Disturbances in England during his absence. 1289.

At the same time the King banished all the Jews from the kingdom. Upwards of 16,000 are said to have left England, nor did they reappear till Cromwell connived at their return in 1654. It is not quite clear why the King determined on this act of severity, especially as the Jews were royal property, and a very convenient source of income. It is probable, however, that their way of doing business was very repugnant to his ideas of justice, while they were certainly great falsifiers of the coinage, which he was very anxious to keep pure and true. Earlier in the reign he had hanged between 200 and 300 of them for that crime, and they are said to have demanded 60 per cent. for their loans, taking advantage of the monopoly as money-lenders which the ecclesiastical prohibition of usury had given them. Moreover, about this time, the great banking-houses of Italy were becoming prominent. With them Edward had already had much business, and their system of advances upon fairer terms was much more pleasing to him. From this time onwards the money business of England was in their hands.¹

We have now reached what may be considered as the close of the first period of Edward's reign, which had been occupied by legislation and by the conquest of Wales. From this time onwards, it is the conquest of Scotland, and

¹ It is thus that the bankers' street in London is called Lombard Street.

Edward returns.

Punishes corrupt judges.

Banishes the Jews. 1290.

End of First Period of the reign.

the great constitutional effort of the reign, intermingled with foreign affairs, which we shall have to observe.

It is uncertain when Edward's thoughts were first directed to the Northern kingdom, but events had been rapidly occurring, which threw Scotland almost entirely into his hands. Quite early in the reign he seems to have wished, as was natural for one of his legal mind, to have the disputed question of homage cleared up. Again and again homage had been paid to his predecessors; but, except in the case of William the Lion's homage to Henry II., it had been always open to the Scotch King to assert that it was for fiefs in England, and not for Scotland, that his homage was rendered. Even that clear instance had been annihilated by the subsequent sale of the submission then made by Richard I. It would seem in fact that the claim to overlordship was really based upon much earlier transactions. Scotland consisted of three incorporated kingdoms—the Highlands, or kingdoms of the Scots, Galloway, which was part of the British kingdom of Strathclyde, and the Lothians, which had undoubtedly been a part of the Anglian kingdom of Northumbria. In the time of the English Empire the King of Scots and all the people had chosen Eadward the Elder as father and lord; that is to say, they had what is technically called commended themselves to the English King. Strathclyde had been conquered by Eadmund, and by him had been granted to Malcolm as a fief, on condition of military tenure; while afterwards the Lothians had been granted by Eadgar to the Scotch kings as an English earldom. Thus, on various grounds, all parts of the Kingdom of Scotland acknowledged the English King as their overlord. When England fell into the hands of the Normans, William, professedly assuming the position which his predecessor had held, would naturally expect the same homage to be paid to him. It is equally certain that the Scotch kings would object to pay it. It had therefore been a constantly open and disputed question till the time of Edward. Meanwhile the feudal law, which had not existed at the time of the original commendation, had grown up and been formulated. Edward, as we have seen, intended to use it to the full. He therefore desired the uncertain acknowledgment of the old supremacy to be brought, as it had never hitherto been, within the precise and clearly-defined limits of feudal overlordship. The character of Alexander III. was such as to strengthen such ideas. In 1275, his wife, Edward's sister Margaret, had died. The tie of relationship thus broken, Edward had demanded and received, in 1278, a homage, which he declared to his chancellor was complete and without reservation;¹ and since that time, more than once, Alexander had seemed to acknowledge the supremacy.

Relations with
Scotland.

But it was the rapid extinction of that monarch's family which brought matters to a crisis. Margaret had had two sons and one daughter, Margaret. Both the sons had died young, and the daughter had married Eric, King of Norway, with the promise that she was to retain her rights to the Scotch succession. In accordance with this, when she died in her first confinement, her little child of the same name, spoken of as the Maid of Norway, was, in 1284, declared heiress of the throne. In 1286 King Alexander died. He had married again, but had no children; the crown would therefore have naturally come to the Maid of Norway. During her absence, a regency, consisting of the Bishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, the Lords Fife, Buchan, and Comyn, and others, was appointed. But already other claimants had come forward, and their respective parties had begun a civil war. To Edward it seemed the opportunity had arrived of establishing his rights without violence. A marriage between his son and the Maid of Norway at once occurred to him. For this he had secretly cleared the way by obtaining from the Pope a dispensation to enable these cousins to marry. Armed with this, but acting ostensibly in the Norwegian interest, he contrived to bring about a meeting at Salisbury between commissioners on the part of Eric, of the Scotch government, and of himself, at which it was agreed that the young Queen should be received in Scotland free of matrimonial engagements, but pledged not to marry except by the advice of Edward and with the consent of her father. Almost immediately after this, the plan of the marriage was made public, and was at once willingly accepted by the Scotch, who were anxious to be saved from a civil war, but who, while accepting it, took care, at a parliament held at Brigham in 1290, to guard with scrupulous care the independence of the kingdom.

Extinction of the Scotch royal family.

Proposed marriage of the Maid and Prince Edward.

Accepted with restrictions 1290.

It was not exactly thus that Edward understood the treaty. He at once despatched Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham, to act in unison with the guardians of Scotland, as Lieutenant of Queen Margaret and her husband, at the same time demanding possession of the royal castles, ostensibly for the purpose of preserving the peace of the kingdom. The governors of the castles declined to give them up, but seven great Earls wrote to Edward, as though to a superior, begging him to curb the power of the regency, while, on the other hand, a member of the regency, the Bishop of St. Andrews, also wrote, begging Edward to approach the border to assist in keeping order, and to appoint a king if the rumour which had been spread of the death of the Maid of Norway should prove true. The report was true, Margaret had died on her journey from Norway in the Orkney islands; and acting on these two letters, which he construed as an invitation, Edward summoned a meeting at Norham, to be held after Easter 1291. The delay was probably occasioned by a heavy blow which had fallen on Edward. In November he had lost his much loved wife Eleanor. It is one of his titles to our respect, that in a licentious age he was remarkably pure, and that no word was ever breathed against his perfect fidelity as a husband. After a period of bitter sorrow, and a pompous funeral, each stage of the journey being subsequently marked by a beautiful cross, he returned again in the following year to his Scotch plans. At that meeting he put forward his claim as superior and overlord of the kingdom, saying that it lay with him in that capacity to put an end to discord. He ended by asking that his title should be acknowledged, in order that he might act freely. A delay of three weeks was demanded, at which time the assembly met again on Scotch ground opposite the Castle of Norham. An answer seems to have been meanwhile sent, but the King had regarded it as not to the point; and at the assembly itself no objections were raised to his claim. All the competitors acknowledged his authority in set words, and the case was put into Edward's hands.

¹ "Homagium suum nobis debitum nobis absque conditione aliqua obtulit et tendit."—RYMER.

There were a great number of claimants; but three only established a case worth consideration. These were Bruce, Balliol, and Hastings. The claims of all these went back to David I. This king had three grandsons; Malcolm IV., who was childless, William the Lion, whose direct descendants had just come to an end, and David, Earl of Huntingdon, from whom all three claimants were descended. He had had three daughters; Margaret, the eldest, whose grandson was Balliol, Isabella, the second, whose son was Bruce, Ada, the third, whose grandson was Hastings. Besides these three, Comyn was also a grandson of Margaret, but being a son of a second daughter, his claims were obviously inferior to Invitation to Edward to settle the succession.

Death of the Maid.

Death of the Queen.

Meeting at Norham.
1291.

Edward's supremacy allowed.

The claimants.

those of Balliol.¹ To decide these claims, Edward, as lord superior, established a great court; forty of Bruce's friends, forty of Balliol's, and twenty-four members on the part of Edward, were to constitute it. Edward seems to have proceeded with the full intention of giving a just and legal judgment, and after several meetings, in November 1292, a decision was arrived at in favour of John Balliol. Meanwhile, during the settlement of the question, Edward had taken possession of the Scotch castles, had appointed the great officers of the kingdom, and had caused the regents to exact an oath of fealty to him as superior lord. The new King accepted the throne distinctly as a vassal of England, and finally, to make his dependence perfectly clear, did homage after his coronation. He did not find his new position free from difficulty. He found that the letter of the feudal law to which he owed his elevation could be turned against himself. It was indeed unnatural to expect the Scotch to submit to the inconveniences without claiming the advantages of that law. Balliol had not been long on the throne before they asserted that, if he was a vassal, appeals would lie from his judgments to the English courts. In the following year two or three such appeals were made, one from a goldsmith, and one from Macduff, Earl of Fife. When summoned to appear before the English courts, Balliol refused to come. He made his appearance however at the Parliament held in the autumn of 1293, and there declared that, as King of Scotland, he could not act without the advice of his people. A delay was given

Edward gives a just verdict.
1292.

Balliol accepts the throne as a vassal.

Scotland appeals to the English Courts.
1293.

him for the purpose of consulting his parliament; he did not take advantage of it. The case of Macduff was therefore given against him by the English baronage in his presence. He was fined to Macduff 700 marks, to Edward 10,000. On the protest of Balliol, a fresh delay was allowed, nor does Edward seem to have been in any way disposed to do more than make good his legal position. It is plain, however that the position of vassal king, with its awkward and probably unexpected incidents, disgusted Balliol; and political events soon enabled him to make his displeasure felt.

The appeals not pressed to extremities.

Philip IV., the new King of France, was as legal in his mind as Edward, but more dishonest. It was as plain to him that it was desirable to unite France by annexing Guienne, as it was to Edward that it was advantageous to England to annex Scotland. They set about their designs in somewhat the same way. The sea was at this time regarded as a sort of no man's land, where incessant fighting little short of piracy was allowable. There were plenty of instances of battles between English and French merchant-ships. The Normans are said to have infested the whole coast of France from Holland to Spain. The Cinque Ports mariners were probably not much behind them. At last a formal meeting was arranged in 1293, where the matter was to be fought out. An empty ship marked the point of contest, and there the fleets of France and England fought a great battle, which terminated in the defeat of the French. Edward, who knew Philip's character and the resources of the feudal law, was anxious to do what he could to clear himself of complicity in the quarrel; but no representations of his were attended to by the French King, and Philip summoned him to appear before the French Parliament. As the English offenders were not given up, and as Edward declined to appear, the Constable of France took possession in the King's name of Edward's French provinces. With much more important matters in hand, and with the knowledge probably of what Balliol's conduct was going to be, Edward tried all he could to settle the matter peacefully. He sent over to France his brother Edmund, whose wife¹ was the mother of the French Queen. Through the instrumentality of these Queens a treaty was arranged, by which the summons to Paris was annulled, and a personal meeting at Amiens arranged, pending which the strongholds of Gascony were to be put in Philip's hands. Edmund withdrew the English army, and dismissed the commander, St. John, and at the same time demanded a safe conduct for his brother at the proposed meeting. But Philip refused the safe conduct, declared himself dissatisfied with the surrender of the towns, and refused to leave the country which he had occupied. Fresh insulting messages were sent to Edward, and, in 1294, Edmund returned to England, and war became necessary. Great preparations were made; alliances were formed on the north-east of France; money was granted by Parliament. This proving insufficient, no less than half their property was demanded from the clergy. An insurrection in Wales, and the news that an alliance had been formed between Philip and the Scotch, rendered the preparations useless.

Edward unwittingly. Gascony occupied. 1294.

¹ She was the widow of the King of Navarre.

It was plain to Edward that it was worth risking his foreign dominions to consolidate his power as King of Great Britain. For the present, therefore, he left Gascony alone, and turned his arms against Scotland. Engaged at once in a war with France, with Scotland, and with Wales, he found it necessary to raise supplies from all branches of his subjects. A genuine Parliament was therefore called in October, in which all estates were represented, and which has been considered the true origin of our Parliament as it now exists. The three Estates granted the supply as different orders; and it was not without difficulty that the clergy, suffering from the late enormous exaction, were induced to grant him a tenth. The other estates seem to have come readily to his assistance at this great crisis.

In March a large army was assembled at Newcastle, and while the Scotch crossed the borders and ravaged Cumberland with savage ferocity,¹ Edward pushed forward into Scotland. In three days Berwick was captured. While still before that place, he received from Balliol, who seems to have been under some constraint, renunciation of his allegiance; and before the end of April brought his army, under the Earl of Surrey and Warrenne, to Dunbar. The Scotch advanced to meet him, occupying the higher ground; but foolishly mistaking the movements of the English army in the valley for a flight, they left their strong position, and were hopelessly routed, with a loss of 10,000 men. This battle decided the fate of Scotland. Several of the great Earls and many knights were taken prisoners. The King met no further opposition in his march through Edinburgh to Perth. On the 10th of July, Balliol made his submission, was allowed to live under supervision in the Tower of London, whence he afterwards proceeded to Normandy; and Edward henceforth acted no longer as feudal superior, but as King. At a Parliament held at Berwick, he received the fealty of the clergy, gentry, and barons of Scotland, whose names, filling thirty-five skins of parchment, are still preserved among the English archives. Scotland was left as much as possible in its old condition, but the Earl of Warenne and Surrey was made Guardian; Hugh de Cressingham, Treasurer; William of Ormsby, Justiciary; and an Exchequer was established in the English fashion. At the same time the coronation stone of Scone was removed to Westminster, where it still is. Edward had thus completed his first conquest of Scotland. Both legally and politically, his conduct is justifiable. The consolidation of Great Britain was a most desirable object. The French alliance, the invasion of England, and the renunciation of vassalage, constituted by feudal law a sufficient cause for confiscating the possessions of a vassal prince. But this leaves untouched the question, how far it is right to annex a free people against their will? It must be remembered that the submission of Scotland had been made by the nobility only, who were in fact Normans, and many of them English Barons.

Edward marches into Scotland. 1296.

Defeat of Scotch at Dunbar.

¹ They are said even to have thrown little children into the air and caught them on their lances.

Freed from danger on the side of Scotland, Edward was now at liberty to turn his attention towards France. But his late exertions had caused great expenditure, to which had been added the subsidies by which he had been compelled to purchase the alliance of the Princes on the north-east of France. To meet this necessity, a Parliament was summoned at Bury St. Edmunds, at which the Barons and Commons gave fresh grants. But the clergy, driven to extremity by the King's late demands upon them, found themselves in a position to refuse. Benedict of Gaita had lately been elected Pope, under the title of Boniface VIII., and had at once entered upon a policy resembling that of the great Popes of the twelfth century. He had issued a Bull known by the name of "Clericis Laicos," in which he had forbidden the clergy to pay taxes to their temporal sovereign. Backed by this authority, Archbishop Winchelsea refused in the name of the clergy to make any grant to Edward. The clergy, it was said, owed allegiance to two sovereigns—the one temporal, the other spiritual. Their obedience was due first to their spiritual chief. An exemption from taxation of the Church, which had rapidly been growing enormously wealthy, would have crippled Edward's resources. He had already accepted

Submission of Balliol and
Scotland.

Refusal of the clergy to grant subsidies.

Nov. 3. 1296.

the principle, that all should be consulted and all pay in matters touching the advantage of all. He proceeded at once, therefore, to meet the claim in his usual legal fashion. If the clergy would not help him, he would not protect the clergy. The Chief Justice was ordered to announce publicly from the bench in Westminster Hall, that no justice would be done the clergy in the King's Court, but would nevertheless be done to all manner of persons who had any complaint against them. Nor was this sentence of outlawry a vain one; the tenants began at once to refuse to pay their rents, the Church property was seized, and the owners could get no redress. This severe treatment induced many of the clergy to make their submission, but the Archbishop still held out.

Matters thus remained till another Parliament met at Salisbury in February 1297, when, the Barons only being summoned, the King explained his plan for the war with France. He was under pledge to pay subsidies, and to bring an army to his allies in Flanders. This army he would personally command. He wished his Constable and Marshall, the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, to take charge of a second army destined for Guienne. These two noblemen positively refused. They had learnt law from their King, and alleged as their excuse, which was evidently only a technical one, that they were only bound to follow the King in person. They then withdrew from the Assembly, which broke up, with nothing done. The King, in want of money, gave free vent to his arbitrary temper, seized the wool of his merchants, and ordered large requisitions of provisions to be made in the counties, for which, however, he promised future payment. In the following March, Winchelsea had a personal interview with the King, in which he appears to have arranged some sort of temporary compromise; for immediately afterwards a meeting of the clergy was held, in which he recommended them to act each for himself as best he could. Determined to proceed in spite of all opposition, the King summoned the whole military force of the kingdom to meet him at London on the 7th of July. There the Earls still refused to do their duty, and fresh officers were appointed in their place. The King reconciled himself with the clergy, and appointed the Archbishop one of the counsellors who were to act as advisers to his young son Edward, in whose hands he left the government. He also induced those nobles and Commons who were with him, though in no sense a Parliament, to make him a money grant. They gave him an eighth of the moveables of the barons and knights, a fifth of the lawed.

Clergy out-

Barons too refuse to help
Edward.

Compromise
with the clergy.

Edward secure an illegal grant.

cities and boroughs. This grant was given expressly for a promised confirmation of the charters. This seems to show what the real point at issue was. The King's excessive arbitrary taxation had aroused the old feeling which had produced the baronial wars of the preceding reign. The clergy were also asked for a grant in a convocation held upon the 10th of August. It was there decided that there was good hope that leave would be given them to make a grant. On this the King acted, and ordered a levy of what amounted to a fifth on all their revenue, both temporal and spiritual.

Shortly after this, he received the demands of the refractory Earls, complaining of the non-observance of the charters, of the tallages, aids and requisitions, and of the tax on wool. Declining to give an answer at present, on the 22nd of August he set sail for Flanders. On the very next day the Earls appeared in the Exchequer Chamber, and peremptorily forbade the collection of the irregularly granted eighth, until the charters had been signed which had been the express condition of the grant. The necessity for concession had become obvious, and in a Parliament summoned on the 6th of October, the promised confirmation was given by the Prince. The Earls, who appeared in arms, with troops, insisted upon the addition of some supplementary clauses, which have since been known as the statute "De tallagio non concedendo." They further demanded that the late grant should be considered illegal; it was therefore cancelled, and a new constitutional grant of a ninth was made in its place. Prince Edward's confirmation was renewed by the King in person at Ghent. It was again renewed, in 1299, with an unsatisfactory clause "saving the rights of the Crown," which the King was obliged subsequently to remove, and finally, in 1301, at the Parliament of Lincoln. The charters thus confirmed were the amended charter of Henry III., the additions to it were contained in the supplementary articles of the two Earls, which forbid what had hitherto been undoubtedly constitutional, the arbitrary tallaging of towns and taxing of wool. They contained however a clause "saving the old rights of the King," and Edward took advantage of this afterwards, in 1304, to continue the old wool-tax and to tallage the towns in his own domain.¹

The Earls demand the confirmation of the charters.

It is granted with reservations.

¹ There was probably no separate statute "De tallagio non concedendo," though quoted as a statute in Charles I.'s reign. The articles given by Walter of Hemingburgh, which were regarded as that statute, omit the saving clause, but are now not considered authoritative.

It was the dangerous condition of his affairs which induced the King to yield to the pressure of the Barons; for in the spring of 1297, Wallace had made his appearance in Scotland. The younger son of a small proprietor in Elderslie, and without means of his own, he had established his fame as a guerilla leader. In the woods and mountains he collected a band of outlaws, with whom he attacked isolated parties of English, all of whom were at once put to death. His cruelties especially against the nuns and priests are described as most revolting. ^{Appearance of Wallace.} Cressingham, Treasurer of Scotland, foolishly despised him, and thus allowed the insurrection to gain head. He was joined by Sir William Douglas; but on the whole was both disliked and despised by the Scotch nobility. At length, as his followers had increased to an army, and threatened the fortress of Stirling, it became necessary to take measures against him. Warrenne, Earl of Surrey, and Cressingham, raised an army, and advanced to the Forth. The armies met early in September at Cambuskenneth, near Stirling. The river is there spanned by a narrow bridge, at the north end of which the Scotch were strongly posted. With overweening folly, Cressingham insisted on an immediate advance across the bridge. The natural consequence followed; when a small portion of the English had crossed, and were thus cut off from support, the Scotch fell on them and completely routed them. Warrenne, an old and feeble man, took to hasty flight, and the army was in fact destroyed. This victory was followed up by a fierce invasion of the north of England. Wallace seems to have collected troops by violent means; he then led them across the English border, and sweeping it lengthwise from Newcastle to Carlisle, "he left nothing behind him but blood and ashes."¹ His cruelties were indeed beyond description, and could not but have filled the English with horror, something akin to that which the English in India must have felt at the outbreak of the mutiny.

Edward's expedition to Flanders had been a failure. The people in the cities, angry with his interference in the wool trade, were opposed to him; his allies had been tampered with by Philip, who had also won a victory over them at Furnes; the Pope was urging peace; and Edward, who always regarded his French affairs as secondary, made a truce before the end of the year 1297, which two years afterwards ripened under the arbitration of Boniface to the Treaty of Chartres. By that treaty, Guienne was restored to the English King, who withdrew his support from his Flemish allies; while Philip in return gave up the cause of the Scotch. The treaty was cemented by a double marriage. Edward himself married Margaret, the French King's sister; while his son Edward was betrothed to Isabella, Philip's daughter.

Treaty with France. 1299.

¹ Sir Walter Scott.

Shortly after his return, Edward advanced to revenge the insults of Wallace, who had meantime unwisely taken the title of the

Edward returns
and invades
Scotland.

Guardian of the Kingdom, thus still further exciting the jealousy of the nobles. He retired before the English army, laying waste the country behind him, and Edward had almost been starved into a retreat, when two Scotch Earls told him that Wallace was in the woods in his immediate neighbourhood. Edward at once advanced to meet him. Wallace, with his infantry formed into solid squares, awaited his attack. Such horse as he had fled without striking a blow. The arrows of the English archers broke the squares, and the 7000 heavy armed English cavalry had no

Defeats Wallace
at Falkirk.

difficulty in completing the victory. Wallace fled, and resumed his outlaw's life, nor does he again play a prominent part in history. In 1305, he was betrayed by one of his own followers named Jack Short to Sir John Monteith, by whom he was given up to the English King, and suffered death, with all the extreme penalties of the law.¹ The bitter feeling his outrages had caused in England made any other fate impossible. But though regency.

Comyn's

Wallace sinks into obscurity, his work had not been without effect. The southern counties were so ravaged that the King could not maintain an army there, and had to retire from the country, which passed into the hands of a temporary regency, at the head of which was Comyn.

For several years the steps taken for the reduction of Scotland were marked by great weakness. Edward's energy was paralyzed, partly by the affairs in France, partly by questions arising with regard to the charters in England. Frequent complaints had been raised with regard to infringements of the Charter of Forests. It was to settle these complaints, and to discuss an extraordinary claim raised by Pope Boniface, that a Parliament was assembled at Lincoln in 1301. With regard to the charter the King yielded, and a considerable disafforesting of districts illegally

¹ His sentence was: "That for the robberies and felony of which he had been guilty, he should be hanged by the neck; that as an outlaw, and not having come to the King's peace, he should be cut down and beheaded as a traitor; that for sacrileges committed by him, he should be disembowelled, and his entrails burnt as a warning to others; that his head should be fixed to London Bridge, and his quarters to the towns of Berwick, Newcastle, Stirling, and Perth."

included within the limits of the forests took place. Pleased with the King's constitutional conduct, the baronage joined heartily in the rejection of the Papal claim. Boniface had issued a mandate desiring the King to abstain from all further attacks on Scotland, "which did and doth still belong in full right to the Church of Rome." This mandate was delivered while Edward was in Scotland, and Boniface's position as arbiter between Edward and the King of France prevented him from at once rejecting it. It is probable that Boniface was only asserting his position as guardian of international law, but the English treated the claim as serious. When it was brought before Parliament, the baronage replied that the kingdom of Scotland never had belonged to the See of Rome, and that they, the Barons of England, would not allow Edward, even if he wished it, to surrender the rights of the Crown. It was not till 1303 that Edward was able to resume his conquest of that kingdom. Early in that year he ordered his Barons to assist John Segrave, Governor of Scotland, in marching from Berwick to Edinburgh. But that General mismanaged his march, and as he approached Roslin on the way to Edinburgh, in three divisions, he was fallen upon by Comyn, and his army defeated in detail.

The King had thus much to revenge when, in June, he began his march. On this occasion he was accompanied by a fleet which the desolate state of the country had hitherto presented. He pushed onward into the far North. On returning he took up his abode for a time in Dunfermline. Most of the Scotch Barons there sought and obtained pardon, and at length Comyn, who had been the leader of the rebellion, made a treaty in Fife, by which the Lords agreed to suffer any pecuniary fine Edward thought fit, and the castles and government were to be in Edward's hands. One stronghold only refused to obey this treaty. Sir William Oliphant held the fortress of Stirling, and it required three months to reduce its gallant defenders to submission. This was the last opposition Edward had to fear; he at once admitted the Scotch to pardon, and settled the country, placing his chief confidence apparently in Wishart, Bishop of St. Andrews, John de Mowbray and Robert Bruce. It was soon seen how little reliance could be put on the first and last of these Commissioners.

Fresh invasion of Scotland.

Second conquest
of Scotland.

Robert Bruce was the grandson of the claimant of the Scotch throne; his grandfather had been an English judge, his father a constant friend of Edward. It was only by marriage that the family had acquired the estates of Carrick and Annandale. He was therefore to all intents and purposes an Englishman, or rather a Norman Baron, possessed of that peculiar characteristic of the race which rendered it in fact a race of adventurers, with the constant hope of winning great things before their minds. The instances of Norman Barons who had won earldoms, kingdoms and empires, were too numerous not to have had effect upon aspiring members of the race. Bruce had up to this time played a somewhat vacillating game, but on the whole, perhaps because of his feud with Balliol, he had remained faithful to Edward. He seems now to have thought his opportunity had arrived. It may perhaps have been the King's growing infirmities that encouraged him. At all events,

Bruce murders Comyn, and rebels.

early in February 1306, he murdered in the church of Dumfries Comyn, who, in accordance with the interpretation of the law which Edward had recognized, stood next to the Balliols in succession to the Scotch throne, and who, since he had last submitted to Edward, had been true to him. Bruce then, joined by a few nobles, raised the standard of revolt. He proceeded at once to Scone, and there, in March, was crowned by Wishart and other of Edward's Commissioners. This unexpected insurrection from those whom he had trusted roused Edward to extreme anger. With great pomp, at a meeting at Westminster, he knighted his son, and took a solemn oath to avenge John Comyn's death. Carlisle was the point of rendezvous, but already Bruce had been defeated at Methven near Perth by Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and was wandering barefoot and in misery among the hills and woods of the country. He was reduced to demand the pity of the King, but was refused; and a severe ordinance was issued that all abettors of the murder of Comyn should be hanged, and that all those who assisted Bruce should be imprisoned. The ordinance was carried out with severity. Nigel Bruce, two Seaton's, the Earl of Athole and Simon Fraser, were all executed, and the Countess of Buchan, who had crowned Bruce, was imprisoned, with ironical cruelty, in a crown-shaped cage. But Bruce himself was not taken, and issuing from his fastnesses, he inflicted many losses by surprise upon the English. He even in his turn defeated the Earl of Pembroke, and shortly after the Earl of Gloucester; and Edward's death near Carlisle.

Edward was rousing himself to attack him, though scarcely able to mount his horse, when he died upon the march.

The mere narration of the political facts of the reign, although it brings out prominently much of Edward's greatness, gives no idea of the real constitutional importance of his work. Not only was he the first truly English King, both by his circumstances and political views, but he became, in virtue of his love of order and legal arrangement, the completer of the English Constitution. In the first place, it is to him that we owe the perfection of the Parliamentary system, of the complete representation in Parliament of the three Estates of the realm, the Lords, Commons, and Clergy. For it is plain that it was his intention to combine the three, although the clergy refused to accede to his wish, and preferred to tax themselves separately in Convocation; a body which however, as will be afterwards seen, also owes its representative arrangements to him. The gradual introduction of the representative system of the counties has been mentioned. Again and again, on special occasions, knights, to represent the shire and to give information with regard to their counties, had been summoned. Simon de Montfort had even introduced representation of the boroughs; but this was regarded as wholly exceptional. Nevertheless, Edward was not long in seeing both the justice and advantage of the system. In the first Parliament of his reign, when enacting the first great Statute of Westminster, a healing and restorative measure applicable to the whole country, he said that he made it with the consent of the commonalty; there were possibly representatives of the counties present; more probably their consent was arrived at in some other way. At the same time, the high view which he took of his own constitutional position is marked by a change in the ordinary form of enactment. Statutes had hitherto been enacted "by the counsel and consent of Parliament." The alteration of a few letters changed the meaning of this phrase. The present statute was said to be enacted "by the King by the advice of his Council and the assent of Parliament." The legislative power was thus made to reside in the King and his Council. It is the power thus claimed which gave rise to the legislative, or rather the ordaining power claimed by the King in Council, which was afterwards frequently complained of by the Parliament. But Edward, in spite of these pretensions, accepted the view that all should be consulted where the interests of all were at stake. This was of course chiefly in the matter of taxation, and the convenience as well as the justice of the method which Simon de Montfort had set on foot soon became evident to his mind. From the beginning of this reign, the method of taxation had been changed. Instead of an aid, raised from the land, it had become a subsidy raised by an assessment on the moveables of the people. Most frequently the proportion granted was a tenth or fifteenth, but in these early times every variety of proportion was granted. As yet,

Constitutional importance of the reign.

however, these taxes had been collected locally in accordance with arrangements made by Exchequer officers, sheriffs, or the county court. In 1282, the King, being in want of money for his Welsh wars, proceeded by his ordinary method. The sums raised locally were insufficient; while his Barons were with him at the wars it was inconvenient to hold a Parliament; writs were issued therefore to the sheriffs and archbishops to collect their two Estates, the Commons and the clergy, at two centres, York and Northampton. At these meetings were present four representative knights from each county, and all freeholders of more than one knight's fee. The Commons made their grant of a thirtieth. The assemblies of the clergy declined, until the parochial clergy were represented. For this purpose the election of Proctors was then ordered, and they have since formed a regular part of the Convocation. These negotiations were not completed when what is called the Parliament of Acton Burnell was summoned to settle the affairs of Wales. At that meeting there were present no clergy, and representatives of twenty towns only, summoned separately. In 1290, a further proof is given that for taxation by subsidy the representation of the Commons was beginning to be considered necessary. In that year an old-fashioned feudal aid was granted for the marriage of the King's daughter. It was granted by the baronage for the whole commonalty, and was in the old form of land-tax, but the Commons being subsequently present, it was changed at their request to a fifteenth. It was possible for the baronage to grant the aid upon military tenants, but the rest of the people could not be reached. Two principles had by this time been established,—that the clergy should be fully represented, and that for subsidies upon the whole kingdom it was both convenient and just that the Commons should in some way be represented; but it was not yet held necessary for feudal matters, or for questions touching the baronage only, that the Commons should be present. Indeed, at this very Parliament, the statute "Quia Emptores" was passed by the Barons before the Commons assembled. All these preparatory steps found their completion in the Parliament of 1295, when writs were issued to the Archbishops to appear themselves, and to send Proctors to Westminster; to the Prelates and Barons, as Peers, and to the sheriffs, summoning the knights of the counties, and two burghers from each town.¹ There was thus a Parliament complete in all its parts, such as it has since remained. We must not suppose, however, that the Estates acted in common, or that the Commons had much voice in the deliberation. At this very Parliament of 1295, the grant of each order was different, nor was it till 1318, in Edward II.'s reign, that the Commons can be considered as perfectly incorporated in the Legislative Assembly. The constitutional view at present was, that the King, with the assent of his Barons, granted the petitions of the Commons and the Clergy.

¹ There were present at this Parliament seven Earls and forty-one Barons.

The great statutes which were passed in these various Parliaments must now be mentioned. Those which were of most general national interest were the First Statute of Westminster, which, as has been before said, revived and re-established the old constitutions of the country, and limited the employment of feudal aids; and the Statute of Winchester, passed in 1285, which was a re-enactment and completion of the Assize of Arms established by Henry II., and aimed at once at the defence and police of the country. It laid upon the counties, under heavy penalties, the duty of indicting felons and robbers, ordered the police arrangements of walled towns, the enlargement and clearing of the edges of public roads, and further defined the arms which each class of the population was bound to procure for the preservation of the land. Constables and justices were to be appointed to see to the proper observance of this statute, from whom subsequently grew the justices of the peace. Some such statute was indeed very necessary, and even its stringent provisions were not sufficient to establish order. In 1305, England was full of riotous outlaws, who were willing to hire themselves out for purposes of private outrage when they were not plying their own trade of robbery; these were known by the name of "trail-bâtons." To suppress them it was found necessary to issue commissions to travelling justices, empowering them to act summarily towards such breakers of the peace. Their strictness is mentioned in the political songs of the day. It was impossible, it was said, any longer to beat your children, you were at once punished as a trail-bâton.¹ Even the stringency of these measures of suppression mark Edward's love of order. Lastly, must be mentioned the great Acts for the confirmation of the charters, which are sometimes regarded as the statute "De tallagio non concedendo." From this time forward arbitrary tallages, though occasionally used, began to be regarded as illegal.

¹ "Sire, si je voderai mon garsoun chastier
De une buffe ou de deus, pur ly amender,
Sur moi betera bille, e me frad atachier,
E avant que isse de prisone raunsoun grant doner."

The Outlaw's song of Traille-bâton. Political Songs, p. 231.

There were also two great statutes bearing almost entirely upon the feudal relations of landed proprietors. The first was the statute of "Quia Emptores" (1290), which forbade subinfeudation and the formation of new manors. Its original object was to prevent feudal lords from being defrauded of their dues. Henceforward, property alienated ceased to belong in any sense to the subordinate grantor, and returned to the property of the lord superior of the whole estate. The effect, unforeseen by the enactors, was to increase the number of independent gentry holding immediately from the crown or from the great lords. The second statute is known by the name of the Second Statute of Westminster, or "De donis conditionalibus." When an estate had been given to a man and to his children, it had hitherto been held sufficient that the child should be born. The estate had then become the absolute property of the man to whom it had been granted, and he could alienate it at his will. It was now enacted that he had but a life interest in it, that if his children were not living at his death, it reverted to the original grantor. Thus was established the power of entail. There remains one great statute to be mentioned, the Statute of Mortmain. This was aimed against the increasing power and wealth of the Church, and against a legal trick by which laymen had freed themselves from feudal liabilities. It had become a custom to give property to the Church and to receive it back as tenant of the Church, thus freed from obligation to lay superiors. At the same time, even though this device was not used, the accumulation of property in the hands of the Church withdrew it from many feudal duties. It passed, it was said, "in mortuam manum"—into a dead hand. All transactions by which lands or tenements could in any way pass into mortmain were now forbidden. The same spirit which produced these laws had been felt in the administration of justice, where the three courts of Exchequer, King's Bench and Common Pleas were finally separated, and each provided with a full staff of officials. Even from this short sketch of the work of Edward I. may be gathered the great constitutional importance of the reign.

EDWARD II.

1307—1327.

Born 1284 = Isabella of France

Edward III. John, Earl of Cornwall. Joan=David II. Eleanor=Duke of Gueldres.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Robert I., 1306.	Philip IV., 1285. Louis X., 1314. Philip V., 1316. Charles IV., 1322.	Albert, 1298. Henry VII., 1308. Louis IV., 1313.	Ferdinand IV., 1295. Alphonso XI., 1312.

POPES.—Clement V., 1305. Vacancy for two years. John XXII., 1316.

Archbishops.

Robert of Winchelsea, 1308—1313.
Walter Reynolds, 1313—1327.

Chancellors.

John Langton, 1307.
Walter Reynolds, 1310.
John de Sandale, 1314.
John de Hotham, 1318.
John de Salmon, 1320.
Robert de Baldock, 1323.
Adam de Orleton, 1327.

THE reign of Edward II. affords the best apology for any excessive exertions of power which can be laid to the charge of Edward I. It is plain that there existed a readiness on the part of the nobles to take advantage of any weakness in the government of their ruler; on the part of the clergy to reclaim the liberties of their order; and of the lower classes to find a popular hero in every opponent of the government. It would seem indeed that there was no alternative between a strong and practically despotic government and anarchy. It was not till the feudal barons of England had had their fill of anarchy in the Wars of the Roses, and had destroyed themselves, that constitutional government, in our sense of the word, had a chance of existence, and our sympathies are constantly divided between the Church and barons, whose efforts alone promised freedom, and the power of the encroaching ruler, who alone ensured order. For the weakling who could secure neither one nor the other we can feel no sympathy. In the reign of Edward II. we feel as if we had fallen back again to the time of his grandfather. The great question at issue throughout is the same—Shall foreigners, or indeed any other king-chosen favourites, supersede the national oligarchy of great barons? The constant prominence of this question (which in the present reign was further embittered by the personal character of one at least of the favourites) renders it very difficult to distinguish the part played by real patriotic demands for good government and for constitutional limits to the royal power. It is pretty clear that the favourites were the chief cause of the disturbances of the reign; but, on the other hand, the evident advantages offered by some of the baronial claims, and the love of the populace, who ranked even Lancaster with its saints, compel us to believe that these turbulent disturbers of the peace were worthy of some sympathy.

Note.—The names of the Justiciaries, who now became legal rather than political officers, are no longer given. Throughout, the names under the head of Spain are those of the Kings of Castile.

When the late King died in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, he believed that the war with Scotland would have been carried on by his son, of whom he was very fond; while he thought he had secured him from that danger which he had already foreseen would beset his reign, by insisting on the dismissal of his favourite, Piers Gaveston.

Edward's
friendship for
Gaveston. Gaveston was a young man of Gascon or Basque origin, of greater refinement apparently than the rough barons of England, their equal, if not their superior, in martial exercises, and possessing those courtly tastes for music and the arts which marked the young King. But Edward disappointed his father's hopes. He had already (before his father had insisted on the dismissal of Gaveston) gone so far as to beg for him, though in vain, the royal county of Ponthieu. On his father's death he immediately recalled him. A hasty and ineffectual march into Scotland, where Aymer de Valence was left as lieutenant, was all that came of the great preparations at Carlisle, and the King's mind seemed to be occupied in lavishing favours on his friend. He gave him the Earldom of Cornwall, hitherto an appanage of some royal prince. He seized the property of Walter, Bishop of Lichfield, who in the late reign had opposed him in his office as treasurer, and bestowed it on Gaveston; and after that young man had, by his ostentation, by his success in the lists, and by a reckless use of his happy gift of applying nicknames, excited the anger of the great nobles, Edward was foolish enough, on leaving England to do homage for his French dominions, to leave him as Governor of the country. Consequently, no sooner

Barons demand his dismissal,
March 3, 1306. was he crowned than the Barons demanded in Parliament the dismissal of the favourite. The demand could not be refused, and Edward promised to accede to it, but proved at the same time how determined he was to evade his promise, by not only bestowing fresh grants on Gaveston, but by appointing him Lord Deputy of Ireland. There for a year he reigned with almost royal power.

The quarrel thus begun became the chief question of the reign. All other matters, even the conquest of Scotland, were subordinated to it; and while it was continuing, Bruce was quietly subduing fortress after fortress, and subjugating the whole south of Scotland. In the following year, the King still further showed his untrustworthiness by receiving Gaveston back in England. He met him with great marks of affection at Chester, hav- ^{Gaveston's return.} ing probably had recourse already to that dangerous expedient, a Papal dispensation from his promises. In fact, again like his grandfather, Edward found it expedient throughout his reign to keep on very friendly terms with the Pope, and to back his authority by the undefined power which the Head of the Church still wielded. It has been seen how even his great father was unable to resist this temptation. Clement V., an obsequious servant of the French King, and reigning at Avignon, was very different from the formidable Boniface VIII. There was no difficulty in persuading him to renew the old alliance with the sovereign which placed the Church at his mercy. Moreover, at this time he was anxious, in the interests of his master, to procure Edward's co-operation in the unprincipled destruction of the order of the Temple. Philip IV. of France, urged by an avaricious desire to confiscate the vast property of this order, had set on foot the most extraordinary reports of their licentiousness and blasphemy. In October 1307, all their establishments were laid hands on, the inmates imprisoned, their wealth confiscated. He then, in union with the Pope, begged all his neighbours to adopt a similar course. Edward II. consented, and in January 1308, all the Templars in England were imprisoned. They were tried by the Church on the accusation of the Pope. In France, torture, and the skill of Philip's lawyers, had produced certain confessions, on which the King acted, and the Order was there destroyed, its Grand Master, James de Molé, being burnt as a heretic. In England, not even torture, which was now first used,¹ could produce any important revelations. The inquiries lasted till 1311. Eventually, certain supposed proofs of heterodoxy having been produced, some of the Knights were confined in monasteries, the Order suppressed, and their property given to the Hospitallers.

¹ A curious question was raised, whether a torturer could be fetched from the Continent, there being none in England.—Hemingburgh, 2287.

The effect of Gaveston's return, and the renewal of Papal influence, was of course to increase the discontent, till, on the 27th of July, at a Parliament held at Stamford, the King was compelled to give his consent to a statute of reform.

By this the first Statute of Westminster was renewed, the undue power exercised by the constables of the royal castles, and the extortions of the officers of the royal household, were checked; all old taxes upon wool and hides beyond the legal customs were removed; while, at the same time, a general letter was directed to the Pope, begging him to abstain from his exactions. The storm continued to rise. Very shortly after this, the great Earls of Lancaster, Lincoln, Warwick, and others, refused to appear at a meeting at York, if Gaveston were present. A meeting summoned in London at the beginning of the following year met with no better success. The Barons threatened to appear in arms if they appeared at all. The King, in fear, concealed Gaveston for a time; the Barons then indeed came, but came only to demand a complete reformation in the government, to which the King was compelled to give his consent. The precedent in his grandfather's reign was then followed. From

Appointment of the Lords Ordainers.

the present March to Michaelmas of the following year the government was placed in the hands of a commission of twenty-one members, who were to produce ordinances of general reform. Pending the production of these ordinances, some preliminary articles were at once established. For the payment of the King's debts grants were to be recalled, and his expensive housekeeping was to be limited. To satisfy the national feeling, and in the hope of lightening the taxes, the Italian house of the Frescobaldi, who had hitherto farmed them, was to be deprived of that advantage, and Englishmen alone were to be employed in their collection; and before all things, the charters of liberty were to be observed.

Hoping, probably, to gain popularity for himself and his favourite, and to be thus able to get rid of the Barons' interference, Edward

Useless assault on Scotland.
1311.

determined on an expedition to Scotland; but the great Barons, on the plea that they were busied with their ordinances, refused to accompany him. Some of his immediate adherents, such as Gloucester, Warrene, his half-brother, Thomas, Earl of Norfolk,¹ and Gaveston, alone went with him. His hopes of gaining popularity by victory were disappointed. The Scotch retired before him. Though Gaveston crossed the Forth, ¹ He had lately received the Earldom of Norfolk, and the rank of Earl Marshall, by the death of Bigod without heirs.

he could not bring on an engagement; and when the English retreated, the Scotch hung upon their rear, and pursued their advantages into the county of Durham. In his necessity, the King was driven to illegal actions. He appropriated the property of the Earl of Lincoln and of the Bishop of Durham, and taxed the province of Canterbury. The Parliament, therefore, was in no improved temper when Edward, leaving Gaveston in the protection of Lady de Vescy, went to meet it in London in October. The Ordinances were there produced. In addition to the articles already granted, there were others which seem to explain the policy of the opposition, and to show the chief forms of misgovernment at that time prevalent. No war was to be carried on without consent of Parliament;—taken in connection with the conduct of Bohun and Bigod in the last reign, with the abstention of the Barons from the war with Scotland, and with the treaty between Bruce and Lancaster, which will be afterwards mentioned, this seems to show that the Barons desired a complete settlement of England before engaging in foreign wars. All taxes upon wool and other exports since the coronation of Edward I. were to be removed:—the Barons seem to have seen that export duties are a tax on production, and are advantageous in the long run to foreign manufactures only. The great officers of state were to be nominated with consent of Parliament; while, to complete the system, the sheriffs, whom Edward I. had made elective, were to be nominated by these great officers; in other words, the royal power was to be restricted by a baronial oligarchy. Parliament was to be held at least once a year, which, considering that his father had held at least three Parliaments a year, seems to show a tendency on the part of the King to arbitrary government. Bad companions were to be removed from the King, and his household reformed. Many of these companions are mentioned by name, and appear to have been foreigners. The King's tastes had collected around him foreigners connected with display of the arts, and on them he had lavished favours, which excited the national feeling. But the chief attack after all was upon Gaveston, his countryman De Beaumont, and his sister, Lady de Vescy. It was ordered that Gaveston should leave the kingdom by the port of Dover on the 1st of November, and never again enter any territory belonging to the English Crown.¹

In pursuance of these Ordinances, Gaveston left England, and took refuge in Flanders. But before the year was over he again appeared in England, and joined Edward as he hurried to the North, to be, as he believed, less within the reach of his enemies. At Knaresborough,

¹ These are only the principal articles; there were many others, the arrangement of the law courts, the royal prerogative of justice, etc.

His reappearance with the King.
1312.

Edward thought himself strong enough to put forward a proclamation declaring the banishment of Gaveston contrary to the Constitution. He readmitted him to favour, and restored him his property. It was even reported that he was intriguing to secure him a retreat in Scotland. This flagrant violation of his word set all England against the King. The old Archbishop Winchelsea of Canterbury, as in the last reign, became a centre of revolution; he excommunicated Gaveston, while the

The baronial chiefs.

Barons, at the head of whom were now the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford, proceeded to take active measures. This Lancaster was the eldest son of Edmund, brother of Edward I. His power in England was enormous; he was Earl of five counties. From his father he had received Lancaster and the confiscated estates of De Montfort and Ferrers, the Earldoms namely of Leicester and Derby; he had married the heiress of the De Lacys, and upon the death of the Earl of Lincoln had succeeded to the Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury. He began that opposition, which will be frequently mentioned afterwards, of the younger branch of the Plantagenets to the reigning house. Hereford, the son of the great Humphrey Bohun, was the hereditary chief of the baronial party. He had married Elizabeth, the King's sister. The leaders of the baronial party agreed to repair to those parts of England where they had most influence. Lancaster proceeded northwards so rapidly, that the King had to fly before him, and was nearly captured at Newcastle, where Gaveston's jewels and horses fell into Lancaster's hands, and thence he took ship for Scarborough. Lancaster took up his position in the middle of England, while the rest of the baronial party besieged Gaveston in that fortress, where he was soon obliged to surrender. This he did to the Earl of Pembroke, who was no enemy to the King, upon a promise that if he could not come to terms with the Barons he should be restored to Scarborough. Pembroke persuaded him to go with him to his castle at Wallingford, but on the way, during a temporary absence of Pembroke, he was surprised by Warwick, who hated him for having nicknamed him

Gaveston beheaded at Warwick.

"The Black Dog," brought to his castle of Warwick, and there beheaded on Blacklow Hill. The King was naturally full of anger, nor did he, in fact, ever forgive Lancaster, but he yielded to necessity, being perhaps in a particularly good humour at the birth of a son and heir; and the Barons, who appeared in arms at Ware, all received pardon in exchange for some slight concessions, among others for the restoration of Gaveston's jewels. It was not, however, till the close of the following year that the pardons were completed, Edward having in the meantime been to France.

This closes the first period of the reign, but it is plain that the Barons were not yet satisfied. Their chief enemy was removed, but their policy was not accepted. Thus, when in 1314 the King collected a large army, many of them still held aloof, though they sent their forces. If Scotland was to be saved it was time for energetic action. One by one the fortresses had been taken. Stirling still held out, but the Governor promised to capitulate unless relieved before St. John's Day. By a rapid march Edward reached the place before the fatal day. But Bruce was ready to receive him. He had arranged his troops a little to the south and east of the castle, with his right resting on the little brook Bannockburn. His position was carefully prepared. His front was partly covered by a marsh, and where this ceased and waste land began he had dug shallow pitfalls, with a pointed stake in each, to check the advance of the heavy cavalry, of which the English army then consisted. His left was defended by the cliffs of the castle. Edward Bruce commanded the right, Thomas Randolph the left, Walter Stewart and James Douglas the centre, a small rearguard was commanded by Bruce himself. On the eve of St. John's the English attempted to secure Stirling, but were beaten back by Randolph. On the morning of the 24th of June, the Abbot of Inchaffray said mass in the Scotch army. As they knelt, Edward exclaimed, "See, they beg pardon." But Ingram of Umfraville, a Scotch nobleman, by his side, replied, "Yes, sire, but of Heaven, not of you." Immediately after this the battle began, and already the weight of the English men-at-arms and the flights of arrows were thinning the Scotch ranks, when Bruce fell upon the flank of the archers with his reserve. The fortune of the day was still doubtful, when troops were seen advancing with flying standards behind the Scotch. They were the camp followers of Bruce's army, who were eagerly pushing forward to watch the fight, but the English believed it was the arrival of reinforcements. They had already found enough to do, and did not wait the new arrivals. The flight soon became a disorderly rout. The horses stumbled and fell in the pitfalls or stuck fast in the morass, and the Scotch pursued ruthlessly.

Renewal of war with Scotland.
1314.

Battle of Bannockburn.

With difficulty the King, under the guidance of the Earl of Pembroke, escaped from the field, and sought safety with a few hundred men in Dunbar, whence he took ship to Berwick. The Earl of Gloucester, with great numbers of Barons and Knights, were left dead upon the field, and during the retreat the Earl of Hereford was captured at Bothwell. He was subsequently exchanged for the Bishop of Glasgow and Bruce's wife and daughter, who had long been in honourable custody in England.

Edward thought for a moment of renewing the war, and again summoned a fresh army; but the condition of England rendered further action impossible. The discontented Earls attributed the disaster to the refusal of the King to accept the Ordinances, and to the influence of his new favourites Beaumont and Despenser. Money, too, was wanting; and the King's renewed efforts to obtain it from the clergy by means of the new Archbishop Walter were met with firm opposition. But though war was useless, he would not listen to Bruce's overtures for peace, obstinately refusing to regard that Prince in any other light than that of a rebel. The North of England was thus left open to the fierce inroads of the Scotch.

The loss of the English prestige was more disastrous than the immediate loss of the battle. The Welsh and Irish thought their opportunity had arrived for obtaining their independence. The Welsh insurrection was indeed subdued after a year of fighting; but it required three years before Ireland was again secured to the English Crown. In that country Edward I. had done but little. It was in its usual state of disorder. The feuds among the Norman adventurers, to whom the conquest had been left, were scarcely less constant or bitter than the wars among the native tribes who surrounded them. Against these tribes, however, they exercised the greatest cruelties. To be an Irishman was to be excluded from all justice, to be classed at once as a robber and murderer. The news of the Battle of Bannockburn induced the Irish to beg the assistance of Bruce, and to offer him their crown. He declined it for himself, but his brother Edward, as ambitious as the Scotch King, accepted the offer. In May 1315 he landed, supported by the great tribe of the O'Niells, and probably also by the Norman Lacys, and was victorious over the combined forces of the Butlers and De Burghs. In vain did Edward send John of Hotham, a clergyman, to attempt some combination among the English and the Irish tribes. The English dislike to the royal Edward refuses to treat. Consequent disasters.

Wars in Wales and Ireland.

Edward Bruce's invasion of Ireland.

lieutenant Butler prevented union, and in May 1316, O'Niell of Tyrone gave up his claim to the Irish throne to Edward Bruce, who was crowned King. But a series of separate attacks upon the natives was more successful. At Athenry the O'Connors were almost exterminated. The arrival of King Robert in Ulster, and a march in winter to Limerick and Dublin, produced no permanent effect, and at length, in 1317, Roger Mortimer, landing with a considerable army, succeeded in establishing some order. The Lacys were executed for treason; the tribes began quarrelling among themselves; and finally, in 1318, Edward Bruce fell in a battle, in which he was defeated by John of Birmingham, in the neighbourhood of Dundalk. The English government was re-established in all its oppression.

Meanwhile, England itself had been in a miserable plight. 1315 and 1316 were years of fearful famine. Prices rose to an unprecedented height. Wheat was sold for 40 marks a quarter; and Parliament still further aggravated the evil by fixing a maximum price, which for a time closed the markets altogether. Terrible diseases followed in the wake of the famine. Again and again the northern counties were mercilessly ravaged; whole districts and dioceses were glad to compound with the Scotch for safety. An attempt was made by a Parliament in this year to re-establish the national prosperity, by obliging the King to accept Lancaster as his chief minister. Lancaster accepted this position, upon the condition that he should be allowed to resign if the King refused to follow his advice, or if men objectionable to Parliament were admitted to the King's Council. For a moment there was peace. The Ordinances were accepted, and ordered to be published throughout the country. But it was not in the King to act honourably when the fortunes of his favourites were at stake; and Lancaster soon found himself thwarted by the ever-increasing power of the Despensers. It was in vain that Pope John XXII. was called in as a mediator. His legates were equally unsuccessful in their attempts to heal the domestic quarrels of the country and to establish a truce with Scotland. Bruce refused to treat unless he was acknowledged as King. He continued his enterprises, and captured the town of Berwick. The legates could do nothing but put him under the ban of the Church.

At last, in 1318, a crisis was reached. The necessity of union against Scotland began to be obvious. The Despensers were for a

He is crowned King. 1316.

Is killed at Dundalk.

Distress in England.

Lancaster temporary minister. 1316.

Power of the Despensers.

time removed from England, and a committee in the interest of Lancaster was appointed to watch the royal action in the intervals of Parliament. This temporary adjustment of affairs in England was followed before long by a truce with Scotland. Edward tried and failed in an attempt to regain Berwick. Another furious invasion had ravaged the North of England, in which no less than eighty-four towns and villages were burned. It was plain that the Scotch were too strong for him. At the same time Bruce was anxious to be rid of the ex-communication, and agreed to waive his claim to the obnoxious title. Under these circumstances there was no difficulty in treating.

It soon became evident that the late attempts at compromise between the two parties in England were hollow. The question had to be tried by an appeal to arms. Nothing could induce the King to get rid of his favourites, nor the opposition to act in common with them. It was a little private quarrel, and no great question, which at length blew the smouldering discontent to a flame. The marriage of young Hugh Despenser with the daughter of the Earl of Gloucester, who had died at Bannockburn, had introduced a new and objectionable power into the midst of the Welsh Marches. A quarrel arose about a vacant fief, and the Marchers made common cause against the favourite. The King ordered the question to be settled before his own court, and subsequently before Parliament; but Hereford refused to appear unless the Despensers were removed.

As the King vindicated his favourites, and refused to remove them, Hereford marched northward, joined Lancaster, and made a formal agreement with him that there should be no peace till the Despensers were gone. The confederates came in arms to the Parliament held at Westminster, found themselves completely master of the King, presented him with eleven articles of reformation, and procured from him, irregularly, and in spite of the protestations of the clergy, the condemnation and banishment of the Despensers. This condemnation was afterwards formed into a statute, and a pardon given to all those who had compelled the King to grant it.

But though Edward had temporarily yielded, parties were so evenly balanced that very little turned the scale. Young Despenser was serving as admiral on the coast of Kent. He was therefore safe from such personal attacks as Gaveston had been exposed to, and the Temporary reconciliation in England

Truce with
Scotland.
1320.

The Welsh
Marches quarrel with the Despensers.

Edward quarrels
with the Marchers.

Hereford and Lancaster
combine.
1321.

Despensers
banished.

King was able to repair to the coast and concert measures with him. As the Queen was travelling from London to Canterbury to meet him, she was refused admittance to the royal castle of Leeds by the Governor, Badlesmere. Angry at this insult, the King attacked the castle and hanged the garrison. It seems to have been felt that, in insulting the Queen, the opposition party had gone much too far. The King was able to recall the Despensers, several of the nobles declared that the late sentence of banishment had been procured by overwhelming force; and as he marched towards the West against the Welsh Marches, his brothers, the Earls of Norfolk and Kent, and several others of the greater nobility, followed his standard. By occupying the valley of the Severn, he separated the Marchers from Lancaster, who was collecting troops at Doncaster. Mortimer and most of the Marchers came to terms, and surrendered. Hereford with several others, broke through the royal army, and joined Lancaster. The King's enemies were now collected into one body, and he rapidly turned against them. To secure support, and probably in pursuance of their usual policy, the rebel lords had entered into a treaty with the Scotch. Bruce was to come to their assistance, but no conquests that he should make were to be permanent. The price of his help was to be peace, and the acknowledgment of his royal title.

On the approach of the King, the rebels fell back, and were intercepted at Boroughbridge by Sir Andrew Harklay, Governor of Carlisle. On attempting to cross the bridge, Hereford was killed from below; while the fords were so strongly guarded that the passage of the river seemed impossible.

Lancaster, with some hundred barons and knights, surrendered. He was taken to Pontefract. The accusations against him, including his treasonable compact with Bruce, were stated before a committee of the King's Barons, and condemnation passed against him unheard. He was beheaded, with all circumstances of indignity. A considerable number of barons suffered either with him or immediately after. Thomas of Lancaster appears to have been an ordinary feudal party leader, with a policy which was directed chiefly to domestic reforms and to the curtailment of the royal power. At the same time, the commonalty of England must have understood that, however selfish that policy might have been, it yet led, in the existing state of society, to improvement in the condition of the lower orders. Not otherwise can we explain the fact

Insult to the Queen rouses
Edward to energy.

He recalls the Despensers.
Pacifies the Marches.

Defeats
Lancaster at Boroughbridge.

Lancaster
worshipped as a saint.

that miracles before long were worked at the tomb of Lancaster, and his memory so worshipped and honoured by the people, that the King found it necessary to surround the place of his execution with armed men.

The triumph of the Despensers seemed complete. The elder of them was made Earl of Winchester. Their policy too was at once adopted. The Ordinances were revised, all that could touch the King's prerogative was cut out. It was ordered especially that hereafter no baronial committee should dictate laws to the King, but he "should make all laws concerning the estate of the crown or of the realm in Parliament, with the consent of the prelates, earls, barons, and universality of the realm."

Triumph of the Despensers. The two years' truce being now out, the King marched to Scotland, but, like all others of this reign, the expedition came to nothing. No important battle was fought. Want of food compelled the English to return, followed by their indefatigable enemies. So close were they upon their heels, that at a place called Byland, in Blackmoor Forest, Edward was as nearly as possible surprised. So unexpected was the attack, that treason was at once suspected. To the astonishment of all, Sir Andrew Harklay, who had been made Earl of Carlisle for his services at Boroughbridge, was proved, for some unexplained reason, to have been in correspondence with Bruce. For this treason he was executed. Such constant failures became ridiculous, and at length, Edward, acknowledging Bruce's title as King, made a treaty with him for thirteen years.

Peace for thirteen years. It seemed for the moment that Edward's troubles were over. The baronial party was crushed, their intercourse with the Scotch had damaged their reputation; the assumption on their part of the sole power of legislation had produced some reaction. The truce with Scotland had secured Edward from danger from the North. There seemed no reason why he and his favourites should not rule almost as they wished. In fact, however, the crisis of his reign was approaching; dangers surrounded him on every side. That the baronial party was still alive and active was soon made evident by a plot to liberate all the political prisoners. The plot indeed miscarried, but Mortimer found means to make good his escape from the Tower, and, taking refuge in France, became a centre round which disaffection might gather. Want of money, too, was a constant source of danger; while the meagre grants made by Parliament showed how general was the national feeling against the government of the favourites. Nor was the Church in much better temper than the Barons and the Commons. On more than one occasion the King had quarrelled with the national Church, which found an active, able, and somewhat unscrupulous champion in Adam Orleton, Bishop of Hereford. This man had been deeply implicated in the baronial movements, had been deprived of his temporalities, and thus became a determined enemy of the King. While quarrelling with the national Church, Edward had shown no vigour in opposing Rome. On two occasions he failed in procuring the election to bishoprics of his nominees, and yielded without a struggle to the authority of the Pope. But submission to Rome had now become a sure way of gaining unpopularity both among clergy and laity. On the death of Boniface VIII., the grandeur and independence of the old Papal system had come to an end, but its constant demands upon the national churches were by no means lessened; and such exactions had become more intolerable now that the ill-gotten wealth which they supplied found its way into the hands of a Pope holding his court at Avignon, a mere creature of the French King: to the old dislike of Papal supremacy there was now added the national dislike of France.

Dangers surrounding the King.

To crown Edward's difficulties, he found himself involved in a dispute with France. In 1322, Charles IV., son of Philip the Fair, had ascended the throne. It at once became evident that he intended to pursue his father's policy. He demanded personal homage from King Edward. His ambassadors could procure nothing but the threat that, unless it was paid, Guienne would be seized. In the little town of Saint Sardos, in the Agenois, a quarrel between the people and their English Seneschal brought the matter before the French King. He summoned Edward before his court. It was clear that the old machinery of feudal supremacy was again to be set in motion. War in fact actually began; the French armies captured Ponthieu and the Agenois. It was in vain that King Edward offered justice to the aggrieved inhabitants of Saint Sardos in his own courts, in vain that he sought the mediation of the Pope. He was himself entirely in the hands of the Despensers; and those noblemen, afraid probably to allow the King to get beyond the reach of their personal influence, used all their power to prevent him from going himself to France. It was at last decided that Queen Isabella, the French King's sister, should go to Paris, and try if she could come to some arrangement. She procured leave for her eldest son Edward to represent his father, and do homage for Guienne. But, when the young Prince reached Paris, he was in no haste to return. In fact, the Queen had fallen in love with Mortimer, and had passed entirely under his influence and that of the other baronial exiles; and under the skilful management of Orleton, Mortimer and his friends were engaged in a great conspiracy. It was in vain that the King perpetually wrote to demand her return. She pleaded personal dread of the Despensers, and complained of the King's ill-usage. For a woman living in adultery with her husband's enemy, such charges are perhaps not worth much; but it does seem probable that as a high-spirited woman she had much to bear from the King's partiality for his favourite, many of whom were men of the lower ranks of life.

Difficulties with France. 1324.

The Queen and Prince in France. 1326.

The conspiracy was so widespread, and so judiciously managed, that her cause was soon regarded as a national one. Nobles, clergy, and commonalty seem alike to have been in her interest. At the instigation of the Pope, she was obliged to leave Paris, but she took the opportunity of going to Hainault, and there contracting a marriage between her son Edward and the daughter of the Count, and of engaging that Prince to assist her in her enterprise. On

She lands in England.

the 24th of September she landed with her foreign auxiliaries at the mouth of the Orwell. She was joined by the King's brothers, by his cousin Henry of Lancaster, and by all the nobility of the East. The Archbishop of Canterbury supplied her with money. London rose in her favour. The skilful management of the Bishop of Hereford won her allies on gathers strength.

Her party

all sides, and the King found it necessary to fly before her advance. Leaving the Earl of Winchester in Bristol, he tried with young Despenser to reach Lundy Isle in the Bristol Channel. The wind prevented him, and he was driven to land in Wales. Bristol was taken by the Queen without a siege, and the

The King is taken.
1326.

King finally fell into the hands of his pursuers in Wales. He was put into the charge of Henry of Lancaster, brother of the late Earl, at Kenilworth. William Trussel, whom the Queen had made her judge, superintended the trial of the Despensers and their friends, and they were all put to death. In December the Parliament met at Westminster, and swore fealty to the Queen and Prince. The Bishop of Hereford put the question whether Edward or his son should henceforward rule. The assembly

Prince of Wales
made King.

declared for the Prince, who accepted the situation, binding himself to six articles, which seem to represent the complaints against the King, and which laid to his charge, the rule of favourites, the contempt of good advice, the loss of Scotland, acts of violence against the clergy and the nobles, and the refusal of justice. Isabella pretended to be angry at this act of deposition, but her pretence could deceive nobody. Finally, a deputation waited upon the unfortunate Edward, and procured his resignation. He was hurried from fortress to fortress, and before long met a cruel death in Berkeley Castle.

Murder of the King.

Throughout the baronial efforts of the reign, constitutional views and personal interests had been closely interwoven. The single-minded patriotism of Simon de Montfort

Character of the opposition.

had been entirely absent. It was the personal ambition of a Prince of the blood, of enormous wealth and influence, which had supplied the baronial party with their first leader. The vindictive feelings of personal dislike had produced an unjustifiable murder of the royal favourite. Success had been followed by an unconstitutional appropriation of all the powers of government. To support their supremacy the Barons had not shrunk from an alliance with their national enemies. To secure a second triumph and revenge they had adopted the cause of an adulterous Queen and her worthless favourite. Yet throughout, the pretence of their action had been the maintenance of the old constitution, and the act which closed the reign was a formal declaration on the part of Parliament of a constitutional right of the nation to depose a sovereign who proved himself unfit for his high position.

EDWARD III.

1327-1377.

Born 1312 = Philippa of Hainault.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain (Castile).
Robert I., 1306.	Charles IV., 1322.	Louis IV., 1314.	Alphonso X., 1312.
David II., 1329.	Phillip VI., 1328.	Charles IV., 1347.	Pedro, 1350.
Robert II., 1370.	John, 1350.		Henry II., 1368.
	Charles V., 1364.

POPES.—John XXII., 1316. Benedict XII., 1334. Clement VI., 1342. Innocent VI., 1312. Urban V., 1362. Gregory XI., 1370.

Archbishops.

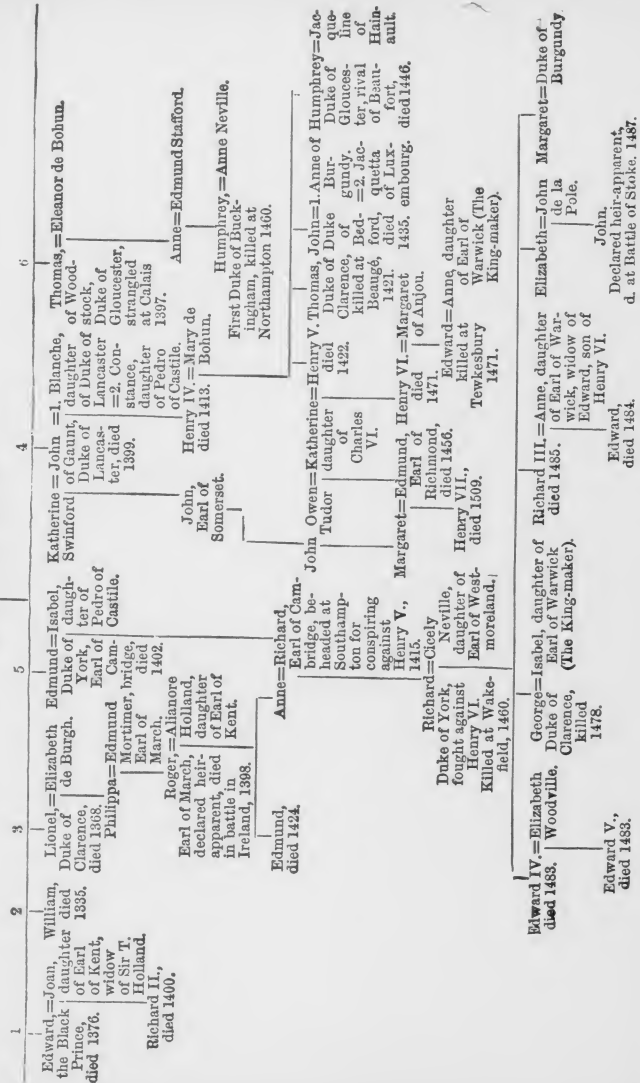

Simon Mepeham, 1328.
John of Stratford, 1333.
Thomas Bradwardine, 1349.
Simon Islip, 1349.
Simon Langham, 1366.
William Whittlesey, 1368.
Simon Sudbury, 1375.

Chancellors.

Henry of Burghersh, 1327.	Robert of Sadnynton, 1343.
John of Stratford, 1330.	John of Offord, 1345.
Richard of Bury, 1334.	John of Thoresby, 1348.
John of Stratford, 1335.	William of Edington, 1356.
Robert of Stratford, 1337.	Simon Langham, 1363.
Richard Bynetworth, 1338.	William of Wykeham, 1367.
John of Stratford, 1340.	Sir Robert Thorpe, 1371.
Robert of Stratford, 1340.	Sir John Knyvet, 1372.
Sir Robert Bourchier, 1340.	Adam Houghton, 1377.
Sir Robert Parnyng, 1341.

AS the conquest of England by Queen Isabella and Mortimer had been ostensibly undertaken for purposes of reform in the government, and freedom from the influence of favourites, the first measures taken were such as might befit a reforming party. The charters of liberty were solemnly renewed, and the removal of the more obvious abuses promised, the judgment against Lancaster and his friends was reversed, and the government nominally placed in the hands of a council of regency, formed of four Bishops, four Earls, and six Barons. Nevertheless, the real power remained in the hands of Mortimer; to him and to the Queen a considerable portion of the royal revenues were diverted, and before long all trace of reform had disappeared, Mortimer's misgovernment. and Mortimer, forgetful of the pretext which had secured him his position, and of the fate of his predecessors, became to all intents and purposes himself a favourite, giving to that word the meaning which best describes it, an irresponsible and all-powerful minister. He even surrounded himself, we are told, with a guard of 180 knights, and altogether adopted an ostentatious bearing which could not but create enemies; at the same time his connection with the Queen excited the displeasure of all respectable men.

EDWARD III., died 1377.

His early government was rudely interrupted by an invasion from Scotland. The truce was not yet expired, but the opportunity was too good to be lost. To the English the renewal of war Fruitless campaign against Scotland. was distasteful, and measures were taken to avoid it.

A meeting was arranged with the Scotch King, but the conclusion was so evidently foregone, that Robert summoned his army to assemble on the very day appointed for the meeting, and while the negotiations were still going on, the Scotch crossed the borders in force. The campaign against them was not successful. More used than the English to rapid movements, capable of living upon much less, and able to supply themselves with that little from an enemy's country, the Scotch constantly avoided a great battle. Twice was Edward deceived by a simple stratagem of the Scotch, who left the watchfires burning, while they secretly decamped, and he was finally obliged to close the campaign without a battle. It became necessary for Mortimer and Edward to treat, and the Queen offered her daughter Jane as the price of peace. In March 1328, that peace was concluded; Robert's son, David, was to marry Jane; the English were to use their best endeavours to have the ecclesiastical

Peace. censures which hung over Bruce removed, and on the payment of £20,000, promised to give up all claims upon the Scotch crown, and to acknowledge Bruce as king.

Though the English nobles had long disliked the Scotch war, and had at all events made use of their pretended dislike as a weapon of opposition to the government, they now, with true party spirit, and moved probably more by dislike to Mortimer than by any patriotic feeling, declared themselves horrified at the disgraceful treaty, and held aloof from the Parliament which ratified it. Dislike to the government was in truth growing to a head. Associations were formed to uphold the ordinances of the last reign. At length, at a Parliament called at Salisbury, to be present at the creation of new peers—when Mortimer was made Earl of March; Prince John, Earl of Cornwall; and James Butler, Earl of Ormond—Prince Henry of Lancaster, the brother and successor of Earl Thomas, and other malcontents, refused to appear. Shortly afterwards it was heard that they were in arms at Winchester. The King's uncles, the Earls of Kent and Norfolk, had hitherto supported Lancaster, but as Mortimer drew near with his army, they suddenly deserted him. This caused the failure of the insurrection, and Lancaster and his friends were obliged to submit to hard terms, purchasing their freedom with half their incomes, and the pledge that they would no longer oppose the government.

It is not to be supposed that this ineffectual insurrection put an end to the discontent. During the whole of the following year, while Edward was absent in France, rumours began to prevail that the old King was still alive, and in the Spring Parliament of 1330, the country was astonished by the sudden apprehension of Edmund, Earl of Kent, the King's uncle. He and many other nobles, among others the Archbishop of York and Bishop of London, had undoubtedly joined in a conspiracy nominally for the restoration of the late King. The examinations made it evident that this insurrection had been fomented by the agents of Mortimer, and that Kent had fallen a victim to their machinations. He confessed his complicity in the scheme, and was beheaded. Mortimer doubtless was glad of the opportunity of thus weakening the party of his enemies. Among the petitions of the Commons in the first Parliament of the reign was one against the exactions of the royal Princes; this renders it probable that they had taken upon themselves to exact purveyance, and Mortimer might rely upon the popular feeling being with him in this act of violence.

But a more important enemy now made his appearance. Edward, who had been married to Philippa of Hainault in 1328, had now a son, afterwards the Black Prince, and therefore could not but feel that he had reached man's estate. He was weary of the domination of Mortimer, and could hardly have looked with favour on the man who had killed his father and his uncle, and was now living in adultery with his mother. He determined to assume the reins of government, and, in alliance with the Barons, suddenly seized Mortimer during the sittings of the Conspiracy and death of Kent. 1330.

Edward overthrows Mortimer.

Parliament at Nottingham, and procured his speedy trial and execution. To the Queen he acted firmly but mercifully; he allowed her £3000 a year; he subsequently even increased this income, and during her lifetime paid her a yearly visit of ceremony, but he refused to allow her any influence in the government, and she passed the remaining twenty-seven years of her life in privacy at Risings Castle.

The young King was satisfied with the vengeance he had taken, and proceeded by acts of leniency to heal party feeling, restoring the forfeited inheritances to the sons of those who had lately suffered, and extending his kindness to the wives even of Mortimer, and Gournay his father's murderer. He made common cause with those nobles who had hitherto been discontented. Henry of Lancaster became a prominent member of his council; the great seal was placed in the hands of John of Stratford, the author of the bill of deposition in the last reign.

Edward's attention was almost immediately drawn to Scotland. Robert Bruce had died in 1329, leaving his son David still a child, so that the government fell into the hands of a succession of regents. Scotland had been so closely connected with England, that many barons held property in both kingdoms. During the war of independence, these properties had naturally been confiscated on both sides. At the peace of 1328 they should have been restored. On the part of Scotland this was not done. The party of Balliol and of Comyn was by no means extinct, and the disinherited lords gathered round Edward Balliol, the son of John, who thus became the head of a formidable body of men, whose interests were strongly opposed to the government of the Bruces. They suddenly determined on an expedition to restore if possible Balliol to the throne. Sailing from Ravenspur in Yorkshire, Balliol and his friends landed at the mouth of the Tay, defeated, with much loss, the Regent at the battle of Duplin, pushed onwards towards Perth, and, while his English ships annihilated the Scottish squadron in the river, was crowned at Scone; thus in seven weeks from the time he left England he had apparently secured the crown. His repulse was almost as rapid as his success. In three months the friends of Bruce had rallied, and Balliol, unable to make head against them, had been driven from the country.

Edward, while ostensibly discountenancing Balliol's movement in England, had, in truth, determined to make use of his success; and a treaty was arranged between them, by which Balliol promised to own the supremacy of England and to give up Berwick, while the two kings were mutually to defend each other against all enemies. He made a show of deferring the question first to Parliament, and upon failing to obtain an answer, to the judgment of the Pope and the French King. But there were seldom wanting excuses for a war with Scotland. Border disturbances speedily arose, and in 1333, acknowledging the treaties he had made, he advanced to the siege of Berwick. Archibald Douglas, the then Regent, came with an army to relieve this important fortress. To oppose him the English had taken up a strong position to the west of their lines upon Halidon Hill. A swampy ground was before them, and as the Scotch knights fell into disorder in the marsh, the English archers "made their arrows flee as thick as motes on the sunne-beme." It was in vain that the nobility bravely attempted to storm the hill. They were defeated with fearful loss, the Regent, four Earls, the prime of their nobility, and 30,000 common soldiers fell upon the field. On the following day Berwick opened its gates. Balliol proceeded to take possession of the kingdom; fortress after fortress fell; the young King David was taken to the Court of Philip VI. of France, and found refuge in Chateau Gaillard in Normandy. As the price of his assistance Edward received the oath of fealty from the Scotch, and the part of Scotland to the east of Dumfries and Linlithgow. As long as Edward was not otherwise employed, Balliol remained upon his throne; but events soon occurred abroad which called the English King away, and Balliol was again driven from his kingdom.

Edward's healing measures.

Balliol invades Scotland.

Edward supports him.

As early as 1329, on the death of Charles the Fair, the third and last of the sons of Philip IV., Edward, the son of the daughter of that King, laid claim to the French throne.¹ His rival was Philip of Valois, the son of Charles of Valois, Philip IV.'s brother, and, granting the existence of the Salic law, the undoubted heir; for all the three Siege of Berwick and battle of Halidon Hill. 1333.

Submission of Scotland. 1334.

last kings had died without male issue. Edward's claims then rested upon three principles; females were excluded from the French throne, or Joan, Queen of Navarre, daughter of Louis X., would have succeeded. The male issue of such females were not excluded; but, thirdly, they must be born during the lifetime of their grandfather, or else the children of the daughters of the three last kings would have a better claim than he had. The question had been properly tried by the Peers of France, and Philip of Valois had been declared King, and in 1331 Edward had himself done homage to him for Guienne. There was however a standing quarrel with regard to certain towns of the Agenois which Charles IV.

Philip helps the Scotch. had conquered. These, Edward understood, were to be restored to him, while Philip VI. declined to surrender them. This quarrel might perhaps have been passed over, but the reception of David on his flight from Scotland, and the assistance which Philip gave to the party opposed to Balliol, by degrees rendered war inevitable; and when once this became obvious, it was clearly good policy on the part of Edward to make his claims as national as possible, and instead of trusting to such secondary causes of hostility as were afforded by Philip's refusal to surrender a few unimportant towns in a distant dependency, or his intrigues for the restoration of the Bruce dynasty, he at once, with the consent of Parliament, asserted his claim to the French throne.

Claims consequently produced. 1337.

There was at present in England a Frenchman whose influence is said to have had much to do with determining Edward to this step. This was Robert of Artois. On the death of his grandfather a dispute had arisen as to the succession of the country. The fief did not follow the ordinary feudal custom, but fell to the nearest of blood. Matilda, the daughter of the late Count, therefore succeeded in preference to her nephew Robert. Philip V. had married her daughter, and during his lifetime and that of his two brothers, Robert had been compelled to be content, but on the accession of Philip of Valois he demanded restitution. During the trial which ensued he produced as evidence charters which were proved to be forgeries, and in 1337 took refuge in England, where Edward adopted his cause, and used him as a sort of set-off to David Bruce, whose cause the French King had taken up. The great war with France was a distinct breach in the policy of Edward I. But the present King was not the great statesman his grandfather had been. A false chivalry had gradually been taking the place of the old feudal sentiment, and Edward was open to be moved both by the impulses of a spurious knight-errantry and by personal motives of ambition and passion. When once engaged in the war, however, he acted both energetically and prudently. His marriage with Philippa of Hainault, and the close commercial interdependence of England and the countries on the North-east of France, gave him an opening which he eagerly employed. He entered into alliances with the Princes of that neighbourhood, with Brabant, Gueldres, Juliers and Cologne. In Flanders, where the great mercantile cities were at enmity with their count, who was on his side supported by the French influence, he allied himself heartily with James Van Artevelt, the Brewer of Ghent, the acknowledged chief of the burgher party. He took advantage also of the fierce dispute at that time raging between the Emperor Louis of Bavaria and the Pope, who was a mere creature of the French crown, to secure not only the Emperor's friendship but the title of Imperial Vicar. This title gave something of a national character to that alliance of German Princes which he had arranged. But all these alliances, though they promised so fair, were both expensive and hollow. In every case they assumed the form of subsidies, the foreigners promising to supply troops in exchange for English money. On the other hand, Philip, although unable to take actual possession, took seisin of Guienne, that is, he sent an officer to each of the great towns, and declared that he had taken possession of it. He had also, as was natural in the disturbed state of Germany, found some friends in that country.

Edward had set himself right in the eyes of his people by a public declaration of the state of affairs; and relying on the good feeling thus established, and on the favour of the mercantile classes, whose interests he had forwarded by his efforts, though often mistaken ones, to improve the growth and manufacture of wool, he proceeded to raise taxes with an unsparing hand. Not content with the subsidies granted him, he laid tallages on the towns, collected forced loans, induced Parliament to grant him half of the last wool crop, even seized large quantities of wool for which he promised to pay in the course of two years, and laid an extra tax of 40s. the sack on the cost of exportation. He thus obtained abundant money for his present need, although he found he had gone rather too far, when, in the following year, Parliament petitioned for the removal of the "Maletolte," or additional wool tax.

In 1338 he landed with a large army in Flanders, where the people who had lately driven away their count, and were anxious to secure

Edward's claims on France.

Edward's alliances on the North-east. 1338.

Is made Imperial Vicar.

Great taxation.

for their cities the monopoly of the English wool trade, received him gladly. But all his efforts came to nothing. He could not bring the French King to an engagement, and shortly became aware of the instability of his foreign allies; in spite of his title as Imperial Vicar they were little inclined to follow him, and speedily found pretexts to desert him. He had to retire to Flanders, but by no means lowered his tone.

He lands in Flanders.
1338.
Deserted by his allies. Returns to England.
1340.

On the contrary, at the instigation of the people there, he now first took on himself the title of King of France. But he had now to return to England to collect fresh supplies. These were granted him freely, the Parliament giving him the ninth lamb, the ninth fleece, and the ninth sheaf. His back was no sooner turned than Philip began to attack Flanders, and with the aid of the Genoese collected a considerable fleet to prevent his return. On the 24th of Returns and wins battle of Sluys.

June, the English fleet, with Edward on board, found the French at Sluys, where a great sea-fight took place, ending in the complete destruction of the French. They had fought in three lines, connected by chains, imitating as far as possible a land army. The English, after a little manœuvring, had fallen upon them thus huddled together, had thrown them into inextricable confusion, and driven many of the crews in their terror to seek refuge by leaping overboard. So great was the disaster, that none but the jester durst inform Philip of it. "What cowards those English are," said he, "they had not the courage all to jump overboard as the French did." In spite of this glorious beginning of the campaign, the year was as unfruitful as the last; simultaneous advances on St. Omer and Tournay both proved failures. Philip, who had been intriguing with the English allies, knew better than to come to a fight, and Edward was not sorry to conclude a truce at the instigation of Jane of Hainault, the sister of Philip. This truce, signed at Esplechin in September, was to last till the following midsummer, and comprehended the allies of both parties.

Fruitless expedition to Tournay.

Edward's position was most irritating; his allies were deserting him; in spite of his stringent exactions, his finances were exhausted; he was so deeply in debt that the Flemings, who regarded his presence as a security against France, kept him as it were in pledge. He could not bring himself to believe in such complete failure of his hopes. He was easily led to listen to evil counsellors, who whispered to him that his ministers at home were defrauding him in the matter of the taxes. Suddenly, he set sail with a few of his most trusted friends, leaving behind him some nobles in pledge to his creditors, and arrived in London in the dead of the night of the 30th of November. He immediately displaced his ministry, his Chancellor, his Treasurer, the Master of the Rolls, and imprisoned several of the judges and officers of the Exchequer. On the bishops he could not lay hands; they claimed the privileges of their order. However, commissions of inquiry were issued to find charges against the late government, new sheriffs were appointed, and, apparently in mistrust of clerical influence, Robert de Bouchier was appointed chancellor.

Sudden visit to England and displacement of ministry.

As had happened so frequently before in English history, the champion of liberty was found in the ranks of the Church. The President of the Council, John of Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, retired to his See, and thence wrote to Edward at length, refusing to answer to the charges brought against him, except before his peers in Parliament. At the same time he warned the King to remember his father's fate, and begged him not to act as he was now doing against the Charter. He wrote also to the new officials, declaring that the late grants had been given under conditions which must not be broken, that they were to be collected only from those represented in Parliament, and not from the clergy who were not represented there, at the same time threatening with excommunication all who should disturb the peace of Church and State. In vain the King threatened; his want of money compelled him to summon a Parliament (April 23). An attempt was still made to exclude the Bishops. Whenever they appeared they were refused admittance to the Parliament, and directed to the Exchequer Chamber. At length the baronage grew thoroughly angry, and the King was compelled to admit the Archbishop, but at the same time left the House in anger, and betook himself to the Commons. The Peers were firm in their demand that no Peer should be tried except by his peers in Parliament. At last the King yielded. All the Estates joined in begging him to admit Stratford to his favour, and promising him Dispute with Stratford.

1341.

Edward yields.

in exchange for this submission assistance in his necessities. Large help was granted, and the rights claimed thrown into the form of a statute, securing the privilege of the peerage, the immunity of the clergy from the exactions of temporal officials, and ordering that at the beginning of each Parliament the great officers should temporarily resign their offices, to give time for an examination of their conduct. In October, the King having secured his grants, thought fit to revoke the statute, and was not ashamed to avow that he had "wilfully dissembled as he ought" to avoid the dangers which threatened him. The statute was cancelled in 1343, but the privileges then granted were not questioned.

As arranged, the truce with France continued till midsummer 1342. During that time Edward found that his German allies had completely left him, and that even Louis of Bavaria had been won over to Philip. This change in the Emperor's policy was caused by a wish to obtain Philip's mediation with his enemy the Pope. He excused it by urging that the treaty of Esplechin had been made without his consent. Thus left without allies, and impoverished by his late subsidies, which indeed, in the absence of money, he had in some instances been obliged to pay in raw wool, Edward might have been content to leave France alone, had he not obtained a new footing in Brittany. The war there was again a war of succession. John III. of Brittany had three brothers, Guy, Peter, and John Earl of Montfort. Guy and Peter died before their brother the Duke. Guy had a daughter, Jane, who as heir of the duchy had married Charles of Blois, the French King's nephew. But upon the death of John, his sole surviving brother, John Earl of Montfort claimed the duchy, and did homage to Edward as King of France. The Peers of France adjudged the duchy to Charles of Blois, and the two kings armed in favour of their respective allies. Charles was at first successful, and took John of Montfort prisoner. The war was, however, carried on with enthusiasm by his wife, Jane of Flanders. She had the good wishes of the people, and held out during the winter in the fortress of Hennebone. She was almost reduced by famine, when the arrival of Sir Walter Manny, who was followed later in the year by Edward himself, raised the siege. But the country now became the battleground between England and France. Edward on the one hand, and the French King's eldest son on the other, entered the duchy, but so little was effected, that at the end of the year a truce for three years and eight months was entered into, the matters at issue being referred to the Pope.

It is somewhat surprising to see how constantly the judgment of the Papal See is appealed to, even more frequently than in earlier times, when its authority was of greater weight. No doubt the spiritual position of the Popes had constantly been used as a means of interference in secular questions, and by mere force of encroachment the Pontiff had come to be regarded

Loss of all his allies.
1342.

New opening in Brittany.

The Pope's position as Arbiter of Europe.

as the natural arbiter of Europe. But behind this there lay a more real ground for the exercise of the Papal authority. The Papal Curia had in fact inherited a certain portion of the powers and duties of the Roman Empire. During the vigour of Imperial institutions difficulties arising between various states included within the limits of the Empire were settled by the Emperor, who thus became the guardian of international law. When the Empire lost its universal character, and the German Kaiser (whatever vague notions of universal power may have hung about his title) became practically the sovereign only of a part of Europe, he lost the power of enforcing his decisions in the case of quarrels between Princes, who were in fact his equals. National quarrels must therefore have been settled by the sword alone, had not the Court of Rome, still claiming universality, still supplying trained lawyers and adequate courts, afforded an opportunity for continuing in some degree the system of international arbitration. The natural inclination of a spiritual power towards peace rendered still more easy this transfer to the Papacy of the guardianship of the international relations of Europe. The thirteenth century had been remarkable for its systematizing character. Powers, acknowledged by common practice and consent but not reduced to system, began to be defined; and as Edward I. in England and Philip IV. in France had brought into fixed and legal shape the lax constitutions of their several kingdoms, so Boniface VIII. had attempted to render Rome a formal court of appeal in all questions of international law. It was thus that we find Wallace and the guardians of Scotland appealing to Rome in their quarrel, and the Pope asserting his supremacy over the Scotch kingdom at the close of the reign of Edward I., and thus that we constantly find the Kings of Europe appealing to the decision of the Papal Curia.

But although the Papal See thus comes constantly forward as mediator in the quarrels of princes, and though cardinals were repeatedly charged with missions of peace in all directions, since the French had caused the overthrow of Boniface VIII. it had no longer its old influence or its old character. Seated at Avignon, the Pope was completely in the hands of the French King; while the rising spirit of freedom, the abuse of crusades which had been frequently employed against Christian princes, and the infinite exactions invented by the papal lawyers, had roused the temper of the people against him. The English Parliament, therefore, was doing a less difficult thing than the Parliament of Lincoln in Edward I.'s reign,

Mediation of the Pope offered.
1343.

Decay of Papal influence.

when it insisted that the mediation specified in the treaty should be regarded only as that of a private man, without special authority or sanctity, and coupled even that modified acceptance of the offer with a strong protest against provisors. Having thus protested against the Pope, not without covert allusion to the King's own connection with him, the people made grants, which were terribly wanted to save the King from his impoverished condition. The great Italian house of the Bardi was ruined by the great advances it made to him; the German merchants of the Steelyard, the only corporation of German merchants in London, had got a grant of much of the taxes; the subsidies, as we have seen, had been paid in raw wool, seized at the rate of £6 the sack, and sold at £20; the main point of Bishop Stratford's defence had been that the enormous interest on the royal loans swallowed up at once all the money that was collected. But for the timely and liberal grants of the people the government must apparently have stopped. Meanwhile, the Pope was preparing his decision; but it was impossible to expect an honest verdict from him, and though, by the treaty, Philip should have restored his prisoners, he still kept De Montfort and others in prison.

Mediation fails.

It was plain that the war would soon be renewed. The Parliament in the year 1344 made their grants on the express understanding that this was the case, and that Scotland was waiting to join in the quarrel. In 1345 the expected event took place. The close connection between England and Artevelt has been mentioned. It was of the last importance to the Flemings that England should help them against their Count, and supply their looms with wool. Artevelt now offered to make the Prince of Wales Count of Flanders; and in all probability the attack upon France would have been in the old direction, had not a quarrel between the weavers and the fullers in the Flemish towns produced the murder of their great leader. It was in Gascony that the war actually broke out. Thither the Earl of Derby,¹ the son of Henry of Lancaster, had been sent, and he had there won a great victory over the French at Auberoche. He was soon, however, hard pressed by Philip's eldest son, the Duke of Normandy, and driven to stand a siege in the fortress of Aiguillon, on the Garonne. Meanwhile, a great fleet and army had been collected, apparently for the purpose of relieving them. But while sailing down the Channel Edward sud-

Mediation accepted conditionally.

The King's commercial difficulties.

War breaks out again.
1346.

Derby hard pressed in Guienne.

¹ Made Duke of Lancaster in 1350.

denly changed his course, it is believed on the advice of Geoffrey of Harcourt, a French refugee, and landed at La Hogue in Normandy. His object was to draw the Duke of Normandy northward, and thus to relieve Derby, while he himself marched through France into Flanders, and joined his Flemish allies, who had already crossed the French frontiers. But in executing this manœuvre, Edward found all the bridges over the Seine broken, and the French King in force upon the other side, evidently desirous of hemming him in between his own army and that of his son advancing from the south. It was in vain that Edward pushed even to the suburbs of Paris, Philip would not be provoked to break his plan of the campaign. It became absolutely necessary for Edward to cross the river. A rapid feint upon Paris left the broken bridge of Poissy open. Edward hurried back, mended the bridge, and the river was passed.

Edward to relieve him lands in Normandy.

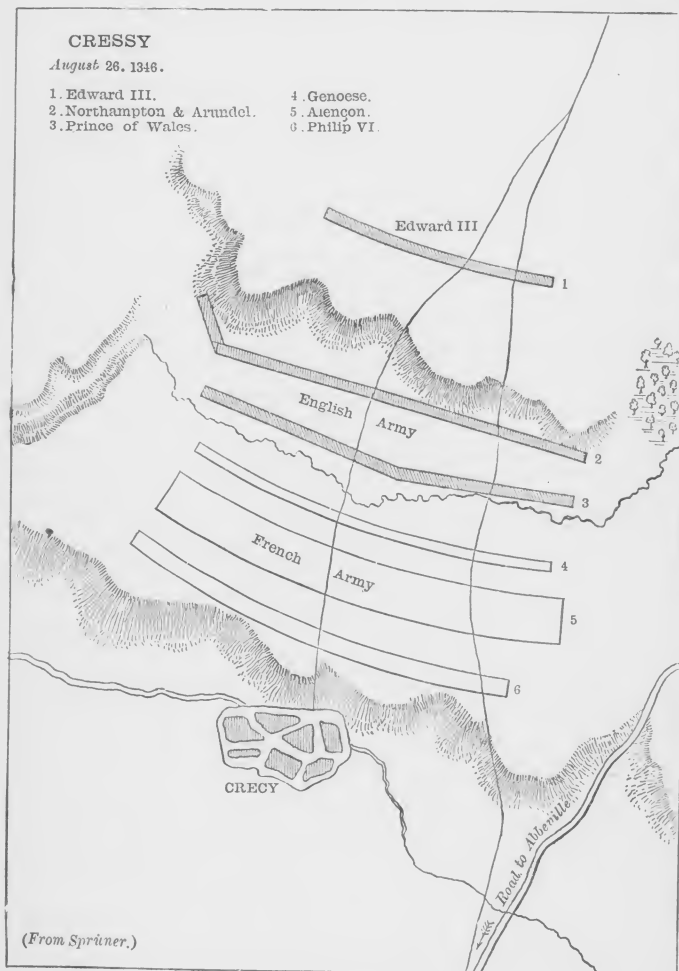

Marches towards Calais.

The tables were now turned. It was the French King who wanted, Edward who avoided, battle. He pushed on, destroying the country as he went, till a fresh obstacle met him at the Somme. With Philip and his vastly superior army immediately in his rear, his position became critical. A peasant was induced to show him the ford of Blanchetaque, near Abbeville, where the river could be crossed. Even that ford was strongly defended, and only won after a sharp skirmish in the midst of the water. The returning tide checked the pursuit of the French, and enabled Edward, who had at length determined to bring matters to a decisive issue, to choose his ground in the neighbourhood of Cressy.¹ There was fought the first of that great series of battles, in which the small armies of the English showed themselves superior to overwhelming numbers of French.

The cause of this superiority lay partly in the skill of the English archers, but still more in the practised discipline of regular volunteer soldiers, when opposed to an army still formed upon the feudal model. The wars with the Scotch had taught the English a lesson they had not been slow to learn. Edward I. had been a soldier of the old school; the strength of his armies had always consisted in the heavy armed cavalry, in which man and horse had been laden with defensive armour to the utmost limits of their capacity; the infantry had been entirely a secondary consideration. But Wallace had proved at Cambuskenneth, and (even though defeated) at Falkirk, the power of resistance which relies in firmly arranged bodies of infantry. Bruce at Bannockburn had shown still more plainly the weakness of heavy cavalry upon ground not exactly suited for their particular form of fighting. Edward III's chief claim to greatness as a soldier rests on the readiness and skill with which he adopted the idea supplied him by Bruce and Wallace. The difficulties of keeping together a feudal array during a lengthened foreign campaign, the comparative cheapness of an equipment of foot-soldiers, the increasing number of free-men not employed upon the soil, were all likewise inducements to change the character of the army. The cavalry employed in the French wars was insignificant in comparison to the infantry. The midland counties supplied the army with archers, Wales with ordinary infantry. This change in the army, itself in part the fruit of social growth, reacted on society. Regular hired troops required trained commanders; and there thus grew up a class of professional soldiers, whose existence dealt a heavy blow to the hitherto unquestioned superiority of the feudal leaders.

Change in the character of the army.

¹ He alleged as his reason that he was now on his own lawful ground, in right of his mother.

The hired army of the English, and the professional soldiers who commanded them, formed a far more efficient body of troops than was supplied by the feudal levies and noble leaders of the French. The English were arranged in three divisions, the foremost of which was nominally commanded by the Prince of Wales. From the summit of the hill, Edward had a general survey of the field. As usual, the archers began the battle; their flights of arrows threw the Genoese crossbow-men, to whom they were opposed, into confusion. The confusion once begun, the very numbers of the French did but add to it. The Duke of Alençon, and the Count of Flanders, with their followers, cut their way through their own troops before they could reach the English men-at-arms. While these successfully held their ground, the remaining masses of the French were decimated by the English arrows, nor could any sufficient support be given to Alençon. At length, as night closed in, Philip left the field, and the further disconnected efforts of individual French commanders were useless. The English could hardly believe their good fortune, and Edward, fearing a return of their enemies, kept them under arms during the night. The loss of the French was enormous; the heralds appointed to examine the field reported the death of eleven princes, 1200 knights, and 30,000 of inferior rank. The English had killed considerably more than their own numbers; but their little army was quite insufficient to advance into France, and Edward, following his original plan, marched on to the siege of Calais.

The battle was on the 26th of August. Already some days before, Lionel of Clarence, who had been left in command of England, had summoned troops for the defence of the Scotch border; and Philip now wrote strongly to David, begging him to make a diversion. David was not sorry to answer to the call. Cumberland was overrun, and the Bishopric of Durham; but the English levies, inspired by the courageous language of the Queen, and under the joint command of the Percies and Nevilles, defeated him completely at Neville's Cross, David himself being taken prisoner. The battle of Cressy had relieved the Earl of Derby, who was again overrunning the south-west of France. The year closed in triumph for the English arms in all directions.

Battle of Neville's Cross.
Oct. 17.

This year of success was shortly crowned by the fall of Calais. Edward had attacked that city by way of blockade, shutting his army round it, and guarding the approaches by the sea with his ships. All the efforts of the French King to relieve it had been useless, and the slow process of famine at length obliged its defenders to surrender. The inhabitants had not been free from the usual crime of seafaring life at that time—they were the rivals in piracy of the Cinque Ports and St. Malo. They had but little mercy to expect from the King. Eustace de St. Pierre, an important citizen, offered to give himself up, with a certain number of friends, to bear the first brunt of the King's anger, hoping thereby to save his fellow-citizens. Barefooted and bareheaded, with ropes round their necks, Eustace, with his devoted friends, appeared before the King. Irritated with the long defence of the town, and their former misdeeds, Edward would hear of no mercy; it was only at the urgent prayer of Queen Philippa that the lives of the deputation were spared. The advantages of the possession of Calais were obvious. It afforded an excellent entrance into France in the immediate neighbourhood of the King's Flemish allies, and supplied him also with a good central mart for the national commerce, which in the existing state of trade was a thing much desired. The inhabitants were therefore given their choice of being French or English; those who refused to become English were expelled, and their places occupied by English colonists, and the whole "staple" trade of England was for a certain number of years confined to this town, which accordingly became prosperous.

It is somewhat strange to observe the smallness of the effect of the late great victories. Edward seemed no nearer his objects than before he had won them. The exhaustion of his own kingdom was almost equal to that of France, and shortly after the fall of Calais, a truce was made for a few months, and afterwards from time to time extended. One cause, no doubt, of the general quietness which prevailed at this time in Europe was the presence of the Black Death, a terrible scourge, which, after passing over Europe, reached England in 1349. Its ravages were fearful. It is calculated that at least a third, if not a half, of the whole population of England was swept away. Such calculations are based partly upon the mortality among the clergy: more than one half of the priests in Yorkshire died, more than two-thirds of the beneficed clergy of Norfolk. In Norwich alone 60,000 people are said to have perished. So fearful a plague unavoidably changed the whole relation between employer and employed, and while famine was threatening the country, while farms could no longer be worked or harvests gathered for want of hands, there was a natural disinclination to continue the war.

¹ See page 257.

Truce.

The Black Death,
1349.

It was not, therefore, till the year 1355 that the war was renewed. Meanwhile, Philip of Valois had died, and been succeeded by his son John, and at the instigation of the Pope, following his usual pacific course, in 1354, a treaty had been set on foot. Edward, regarding his claim to the French throne as hopeless, was willing to accept a peace, if the French King would give him the province of Aquitaine in full sovereignty. English plenipotentiaries appeared at Guisnes ready to conclude the treaty, but the French envoys then declared that they would never surrender a fragment of the French sovereignty.

Renewal of the war.
1355.

Edward had no choice, therefore, but to renew the war. He now possessed two points whence an attack on France was easy; while he pushed out from Calais, the Black Prince was to lead an army from Bordeaux. As so often happened upon the northern frontier, the operations were without fruit; and the King was hastily recalled to England by the news that the Scots had surprised Berwick, and were over the Borders. The Black Prince's expedition was more successful. He marched at the foot of the Pyrenees, and all through Languedoc to Narbonne, and to Carcassonne, plundering and burning in all directions, destroying in seven weeks more than five hundred towns or villages. Such brutal and destructive war had indeed become habitual to the English.

Destructive
march of the Black Prince.
1355.

The King's return checked the advance of the Scots. Purchasing the property and rights of Edward Balliol, he advanced into the country, determined to treat it as a land of rebels. He systematically destroyed every building, and laid waste the country for twenty miles from the coast. But his severity was of no avail; famine again drove him home, and the Scots again hung upon his retreating forces. The following year the Black Prince attempted a repetition of his last exploit. But he now pressed northwards, and had reached the neighbourhood of Poitiers, when the news that a large French army was near forced upon him the danger of his situation, thus wholly separated from his base of operations. The army which threatened him was commanded by King John in person, and all the French princes were with him. So irresistible did it seem, that Edward would have listened to any good terms, but John would hear of nothing but unconditional surrender, and the English, remembering their success at Cressy, determined to fight. Again, what was regarded as their extraordinary good fortune, but which was no doubt their superior organization, secured them complete victory. On a piece of ground difficult of access, except by a narrow road exposed to the fire of the archers, and covered by enclosed country, the hedges of which were lined by the same class of troops, he awaited the assault of the French. The consequences can be easily conceived. The heavy armed Frenchmen in the road formed a target for the arrows; the confined space encumbered with wounded men and horses made the confusion irremediable. The first body of the French being thus disposed of, the Black Prince with his men-at-arms attacked the second, while the third, alarmed by a flank attack of six hundred English horse whom the Prince had detached for that purpose, left the field. Between the Prince and the second body of the French the conflict was a fierce one. It eventually terminated in the complete victory of the English, and the capture of King John.

This victory was followed by a truce for two years, and Edward had time to attend more particularly to the state of his affairs with regard to Scotland. King David had been a prisoner, honourably treated, in England since his capture at the battle of Neville's Cross. More than once the national party in his country had attempted to come to terms for his release. His character, however, was not such as to induce them to be eager on the matter; and he himself seems to have preferred the comfort of England to the position of King among his unruly subjects. He had been so obsequious, that he had twice during these ten years visited Scotland as Edward's agent, for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, the submission of those who were contending for his throne. But the Stewart, who was the head of the national party, refused the recognition of English supremacy, and no terms could be arrived at. In 1354 Edward thought he had gained the success of his plan. David was to be released for 90,000 marks. As we have seen, the intervention of the French, followed by the fearful vengeance of Edward in that expedition which is known as the Burnt Candlemas, put an end to this treaty. Now, when all hope of help from France was gone, they renewed their negotiation, and David was at length released upon the promise of 100,000 marks, in ten yearly payments, a promise confirmed by the delivery of important hostages. Edward knew that he was really releasing a willing subject, and that it was probable that the failure of payment, or the party quarrels of the country, would before long put the kingdom into his hands.

He was, at all events, free to act against France. On the capture of its King, that country had fallen into the wildest disorder. The Free Companies, as the hired bodies of soldiery were called, from which both armies had been recruited, freed from their engagements, pillaged the helpless country. In their misery the lower commonalty broke out in fierce insurrections. The people of Paris, under the Provost of the Merchants, Stephen Marcel, enacted those scenes of revolution with which that city has been too often familiar. Wearing the red cap of liberty, the mob burst into the palace, killed two of the Dauphin's most trusted counsellors before his eyes, and drove that Prince to Compiègne. Charles of Navarre, grandson of Louis X., who was surnamed the Bad, broke from the prison in which he had been confined, made common cause with the Parisian mob, roused his tenants in Normandy, where he had much property, to insurrection, and called in the English King. What with the Jacquerie,¹ the fierce plunderings of the soldiery, the attacks of England, and the riot in Paris, the condition of France was in the last degree terrible. However, the murder of Stephen Marcel in Paris, and the success of the Dauphin in compelling Charles the Bad to enter into treaty with him, somewhat changed the aspect of affairs. Nor would the Dauphin consent to yield any part of France to his English conquerors.

Thus the time of truce wore away in useless negotiations. As it ended, Edward renewed his invasions. Sir Walter Manny poured

¹ The revolted peasantry.

Release of King David.

Peace with
Scotland.

Terrible condition of France.

Reviving power of the Dauphin.
1359.

with an army of German hirelings over Picardy and Artois. Edward, accompanied by all his sons except Thomas, whom he left at home as ruler, pushed into the heart of Champagne, tried in vain to take Rheims, where he hoped to be crowned, and purchased the neutrality of the Duke of Burgundy. But, successful and destructive as these invasions were, they were only vast plundering excursions; there was little systematic action, no gradual conquest of the country, no firm basis of operations. The very destruction which they caused roused the national spirit, and while Edward pushed to Paris, and tried in vain to excite the Dauphin to a general engagement, the Norman fleet was ravaging England in the neighbourhood of Winchelsea. Moreover, the wasted country could not support the invading armies unassisted by a proper commissariat, and as Edward, retiring from before Paris, was met by a fearful tempest, which seems to have forced upon him the difficulties of his position, he expressed himself ready to listen to the terms of peace which the envoys of the Legate and the Dauphin offered him. Thus, on the 8th of May, the great peace of Brétigny was made. The terms were, of course, very favourable to the English. Not only Gascony and Guienne, but all Poitou, with the counties of Xaintonge, Agen, Périgord, Limoges, Cahors, Rovergue, Bigorre, and in the north, Montreuil, Ponthieu, with Calais and Guisnes, were to be the possessions of the English crown, freed from all feudal claims. In return, all claim to the crown of France was given up, together with all claims in Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Brittany, and Flanders. King John was to be liberated on the payment of 3,000,000 pieces of gold.¹ Scotland and Flanders were to be left to themselves.

Edward thus appeared, even though he had not made good his claims to the crown, to have regained and put on a better footing the much disputed provinces of the south-west. But it was one thing to make such a treaty and another to secure its being carried out. The very misery of France produced a reaction. Though King John himself returned to France to collect it, his enormous ransom was not forthcoming. The barons of Poitou declared that they would not be severed from the French crown; while the hatred to the English was kept alive by the great bands of discharged soldiers, who, joining themselves to the great Free Companies, swept across France, put the Pope himself to ransom, and finding no congenial employment else-

Edward again
invades France.

Want of permanent results induces Edward to make the peace of Brétigny.
1360.

¹ Each piece of gold (a mark) was worth 18s. 4d. or two nobles.

where, quartered themselves on the people. At the head of the party who were set against the completion of the treaty was Charles the Dauphin. His accession upon the death of John, who had honourably returned to England when he found himself unable to pay his ransom, marked a change in the national policy of France. Under the new King, it was managed that the renunciations required by the treaty should not be carried out. There were other causes also at work which promised a speedy renewal of the war.

By the treaty it had been expressly stipulated that the quarrel between De Montfort and Charles de Blois might be continued, though it was added, that whichever party conquered was bound to swear fealty to France. Du Guesclin, a soldier of a different class from the ordinary feudal leaders who had risen to eminence during the late wars, was sent to support the claims of Charles. The news of his arrival was at once followed by a similar step on the part of the English. Chandos, an English general, marched from Guienne to support De Montfort. A battle was fought at Auray, in which De Montfort's party were successful, and Charles de Blois killed. The Free Companies too, of which the best known are those of Calveley and Knowles, still ravaged France, and were a constant cause of complaint. The English themselves had to take part against them, but at length the means taken by King Charles to rid his kingdom of this burden again brought the French and English into contact. The provinces of the south-west of France had been erected into the independent duchy of Aquitaine, and given to the Black Prince, who held his court at Bordeaux. Thither, when driven from his country, Pedro the Cruel, of Castile, betook himself.

This king had secured his throne by a series of murders. His natural brother, Henry of Trastamare, had fled and taken refuge with the French King. When Pedro carried his cruelty to the pitch of putting to death his wife, Blanche de Bourbon, a French princess, the court of France had determined to assist Henry to dethrone his brother, and had intrusted Du Guesclin with the duty of enlisting the Free Companies for this purpose. His attempt had been successful; Pedro had taken flight, Henry had ascended the throne. But Pedro, as a fugitive king, found ready support at the hands of the Black Prince, thoroughly imbued with the false chivalry of the day. It was whispered to the Free Companies that their loved commander had an expedition on foot. In numbers they deserted from the

Treaty not carried out.
1364.

War in Brittany continues.

Affairs of Castile.

France and England support the rival claimants.

French army, and gathered round the Black Prince, who was thus enabled to cross the Pyrenees at Roncesvalles at the head of 30,000 men. The rival armies met at Navarette. The French were completely beaten, Du Guesclin taken prisoner.

Battle of Navarette.

But Pedro, again upon the throne, forgot his engagements to his protector, and the Black Prince returned to his duchy, broken in health by the hardships of the campaign, and ruined by its expenses. It became necessary to lay heavy taxes upon his subjects. Those subjects were already discontented; the barons of Poitou objected to the English supremacy, and had applied to Charles as their suzerain. Charles had been fomenting their discontent, and had sent secret envoys to raise a similar feeling among the barons of Ponthieu in the north. To these malcontents were now added the Counts of Armagnac, and other barons of the northern slope of the Pyrenees, who regarded the infliction of the tax as a breach of their privileges; and after keeping the matter in abeyance for a year, till he was ready to strike, King Charles, taking advantage of the non-completion of the renunciations, proceeded to treat the Black Prince as a vassal, and summoned him before his court. The Prince answered he would appear at the head of 60,000 men-at-arms. The threat was idle. Before, in his distressed position, he could make any vigorous preparation, the French troops had begun to conquer the outlying parts of his province, and a declaration of war was at once issued. But several years of peace, during which the exhausted country had begun to recover itself, had disinclined the English to renew the war. The King appears to have grown old before his time, and to have thought only of enjoying in pleasure the fruits of his successful youth. Preparations went on but slowly, while insurrections among the nobles, and the pressure of the French army, continually increased around Guienne. There the Black Prince was so ill that he could not himself take the field. His brother Edmund of Cambridge, Chandos and Knowles, were indeed with him, but could scarcely make head against the insurgents. An attack upon Poitou failed, and Chandos lost his life. None of the English plans met with success. Knowles indeed, placed in command of Calais, marched again successfully to Paris, but the long wars had given birth to a new race of French generals, and Du Guesclin, now Constable, prevented any great success. At length the Black Prince roused himself, and took the field. At his mere name the French armies began to dissolve, and

Taxation in Aquitaine.

Barons appeal to Charles.
1368.

Renewal of war.

Gradual defeat of the English.

he advanced triumphantly to Limoges, a town he had much favoured, and on which he intended to wreak his vengeance. The wall was mined, and the town taken. Men, women, and children, to the number of 3000, were pitilessly murdered. In the midst of this cruel slaughter, the Prince could show his knight-hood by sparing and honouring some French gentlemen who made an unusually gallant resistance. It was his last triumph. Early in 1371 he returned to England, broken and dying. There is no need to trace the progress of the war further. The gradual advance of the French could not be checked. The English armies might march far into the country, as one under Lancaster did in 1373, but the French invariably avoided a general action; and thus, by 1374, England had lost all her possessions in France, with the exception of Calais, Bordeaux and Bayonne, and a few towns upon the Dordogne.

The sequel of the Black Prince's friendship for Pedro of Castile deserves to be noticed. Upon the withdrawal of the English, Henry of Trastamare again conquered Pedro, and the brothers having met in Henry's tent, a quarrel ensued, terminating in a personal struggle and the death of Pedro. Henry thus regained the throne; and subsequently two daughters of Pedro married two of Edward's sons, Lancaster and Cambridge. Upon the Duke of Lancaster's assuming the title of King of Castile, Henry entered actively into the war, and at a great naval battle off Rochelle in June 1372, completely destroyed the English fleet under the Earl of Pembroke. At length a truce was agreed on, which, though it never ripened into a peace, continued from time to time during the rest of the reign.

A strange change of fortune thus clouded the end of what promised to be a glorious reign. Edward, making war in the spirit of a knight-errant, and trusting completely to the courage of his troops on the day of battle, had neglected all the precautions which the conquest of a country requires. He had been successful neither as a strategist nor as a statesman, and his war with France, adorned with splendid victories, and for one moment promising to establish on a firm footing the English power in the South of France, had ended in a more complete overthrow of that power than had been seen since the time of King John. It was natural that the close of such a reign should be marked by some expressions of discontent among the people. Old before his time, in the takes Limoges.

Black Prince

His final return to England.

Loss of Aquitaine.
1374.

Naval victory of the Spaniards.
1372.

Discontent in England.

hands of a woman of the name of Alice Perrers, whose ostentation was constantly shocking the public eye, Edward had fallen under the influence of bad advisers, and had let the reins of government slip into the hands of John of Gaunt, his third son.

To understand the politics of this time, we have to rid ourselves of both the names and ideas of the present day. The lines which divided classes were much more distinctly marked. Political life was confined entirely to the upper ranks. The House of Commons, which we are in the habit of regarding as a popular assembly, and which was, in fact, the most popular assembly of that time, was in part entirely aristocratic, in part representative of the moneyed interests of the country. Below this no class could make its voice heard at all, and this moneyed and aristocratic House of Commons was only beginning by slow degrees to force itself into political power. It had, in fact, consisted at first of two separate orders,—the knights of the shire, who represented the lesser nobility, and the burgesses. The knights had naturally joined without difficulty in the deliberations of a baronage who were socially their equals; the burgesses had busied themselves almost exclusively with financial questions touching their own order. Various causes had gradually tended to draw the two lower orders together, and by the beginning of the reign of Edward III., the division of Parliament into two Houses, of which the lower consisted of knights and burgesses, had been completed. Indeed, the Act of 1321, passed when Edward II. was victorious over the barons, had acknowledged the claims of the burgesses to share in the proceedings of Parliament. The practical government of the country had hitherto been in the hands of the House of Lords. There were thus three distinct classes, the baronage, the upper or represented commonalty, consisting of knights and burgesses, and the lower commonalty. Power was as yet in the hands of the baronage. When, therefore, no common cause was driving the baronage to united action, as among all governing classes, there was certain to be a difference of view, and the baronage would be divided into parties. On the other hand, the upper Commons, just forcing their way upwards, were inclined to be sometimes subservient to the wishes of the Barons, sometimes ready to join that one of the baronial parties which seemed to give them the greatest promise of political assistance. The lower, or unrepresented Commons, unable to make themselves heard, had been of no political account; although a series of events had lately contributed to put them in such a position that their friendship was worth having, and

Politics of the time.

to enable them soon to speak with arms in their hands, in a way which was very terrible. Each of these classes had its own particular interests, and made their combinations with the other classes to suit the advance of those interests. The Barons desired power, the higher Commons good administration, especially of the finances; the lower Commons such improvements in their position as they afterwards claimed under Wat Tyler. Hitherto, in the main, the interest of the baronage had been the restriction within fixed limits of the royal authority; they had hitherto been the guardians of the constitutional growth of the country, and their rebellions and opposition, whatever selfish leaven may have been mixed with them, deserve to be regarded as efforts towards popular liberty. About the period which we have now reached, this guardianship of the Constitution passed into the hands of the upper Commons. The Barons themselves having now acquired a preponderance in the government, it was their encroachments rather than the King's which had to be guarded against. In principle, the safeguards of the Constitution had been established by Edward I., and were therefore no longer the subject of contention. The baronage was no longer interested to secure power, but to enjoy a power already secured. They thus fell into parties whose real object was to appropriate that power. For that purpose, like other political parties, the rival Barons would seek to attach to themselves any of the other sections of society, and would therefore adopt those principles and those party cries which seemed to promise them the most success. It becomes, therefore, impossible to say that this or that baronial insurrection was popular or constitutional. For their own objects, the most disorderly Barons might attach themselves to the Commons, to the lower classes, or to the King. Their divisions had, in fact, become party struggles for power.

Now the chief questions at that time exciting England were the position of the Church, the continuation of the war with France, and the management of the finances. On any of these questions the baronage might form itself into parties, which might seek their own advantage by adopting the interests of other sections of society. It is in this way that must be explained the apparent contradictions in the conduct of the Parliament at the close of Edward's reign. For many years there had been growing a strong dislike to the Church in England. The oppressions of the Popes, the selfish character of their government at Avignon, the loss of spirituality on the part of the higher clergy, from whose ranks the statesmen of the time were largely drawn, and the deterioration of the mendicant orders, together with the idea always prevalent in England of the supremacy of the state, had given birth to a party who desired the pre-eminence in all matters of the laity, — a party which is of course connected with the doctrinal views at this time brought forward by Wicliffe. The existence of this lay party is clearly shown by the proceedings of the year 1340, when for the first time a lay Chancellor, Sir Robert Bouchier, was appointed in the place of Stratford. When the baronage were divided, the natural leaders of the parties were the royal princes. Thus, when circumstances had put the reins of power into the hands of John of Gaunt, he fortified himself by assuming the leadership of the lay party, which found its adherents in all sections of society, but no doubt mainly among the barons, jealous of the great part played in the government by the clergy, the vast wealth which the Church held, and which is calculated at more than a third of the land, and rendered self-confident by their successes in the French war. Already schemes for the confiscation of Church property had been publicly mentioned, and the Commons, with the approbation of John of Gaunt, had in 1371 petitioned for the removal of all the clergy from the higher offices of state. The Bishop of Winchester, William of Wykeham, had surrendered the great seal, which, together with the offices of the exchequer, had been put into the hands of laymen. There are many proofs that the class which was represented in the Commons partook strongly of the dislike to the Church. But any claim to popularity which Lancaster's administration might have advanced on this ground was destroyed by their mismanagement of the finances and the disasters of the foreign war. In fact, there is little doubt that the ecclesiastics he had displaced were far better governors than the partisans he had put in their places. Another party was therefore formed, at the head of which was the Black Prince, a party consisting of those who preferred the old system of government, and which included the higher clergy and the financial reformers. It has been pointed out that the disastrous government of John of Gaunt had found its partisans chiefly among the Barons. On the whole, therefore, the Commons attached themselves to the party of the Black Prince. For the time a restoration of good government and well-managed finance seemed to them of more importance than the overthrow of the Church, especially as their interests as a class seemed to lead in the same direction. The struggle came to an issue in the Good Parliament, which met in April 1376. The Commons presented a remonstrance, which, after enumerating their financial grievances, and asserting the mismanagement of the Government, demanded a change in the council; in other words, a change of ministry. The clergy, and William of Wykeham among them, again came into office. They were not content with this, but impeached—and this is the first instance of parliamentary impeachment—Lord Latimer, the Chamberlain. A considerable number of the other officers were arrested and thrown into prison, and Alice Perrers was forbidden to use her influence under pain of banishment. They were still discussing further reforms, when the death of the Black Prince deprived them of their chief support. Afraid that John of Gaunt had views on the succession, they insisted on the immediate recognition of the Black Prince's son; and a deputation waited on the old King at Eltham to receive an answer to their complaints and petitions. These, as might be expected, were chiefly directed against the encroachments of the Papacy, in hatred to which all parties in England joined. Still the King's reply shows the influence of the newly restored clerical counsellors. Enough, he said, had been done in the way of legislation, he would continue his personal appeals to the Pope. Parliament then separated.

It at once became plain that the Black Prince's death had again

Death of Black Prince. Lancaster regains power.

Lancastrian Parliament. 1377.

Trial of Wicliffe.

thrown the power into the hands of John of Gaunt. The power of the new Privy Council disappeared, Lord Latimer was pardoned, Peter de la Mare, the speaker of the Good Parliament, was thrown into prison, William of Wykeham was again driven from the court. The Parliament which assembled next year was thoroughly in the Lancastrian interest. Sir Thomas Hungerford, the Duke's steward, was elected Speaker, the proceedings against Alice Perrers withdrawn, and a new form of tax—a poll-tax of 4d.—granted. But the clergy did not thus easily yield their ground. They attacked

Uproar in London.

the apostle of the lay party, Wicliffe. He had to appear before Courtenay, Bishop of London, in St. Paul's. He came, supported by Lancaster and by the Marshall, Henry Percy, a close adherent of that party of which Lancaster was the head. An unseemly brawl arose in the church. Lancaster threatened to drag Courtenay out of the church by the hair. The Londoners were already so ill disposed to Lancaster, that measures were in preparation to remove their mayor, and put the government of the town in the hands of a royal commission. The insult to their Bishop roused them to fury. It was only by Courtenay's intervention that Lancaster's house was saved from demolition; and a wretched man was killed under the supposition that he was Henry Percy. Lancaster escaped, and the city had to make some sort of reparation; but the quarrel was scarcely quieted when the King died. Deserted by his mistress, who is said to have torn the rings from his dying hand, and by his servants, the wretched old man died, tended only by a single poor priest.

RICHARD II.

1377-1399.

Born 1367 = 1. Anne of Bohemia, 1362.
= 2. Isabella of France, 1396.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Robert II., 1370. Robert III., 1390.	Charles V., 1364. Charles VI., 1380.	Charles IV., 1347. Wenceslaus, 1378.	Henry II., 1368. John I., 1379. Henry III., 1390.

POPES.—Gregory XI., 1370. Urban VI., 1378. Boniface IX., 1389. [Also Clement VII., 1378. Benedict XII., 1394.]

Archbishops.	Chancellors.
Simon Sudbury, 1375. William Courtenay, 1381. Thomas Arundel, 1397.	Sir Richard le Scrope, 1378. Simon Sudbury, 1379. William Courtenay, 1381. Lord Scrope, 1381. Robert de Braybroke, 1382.
	Michael de la Pole, 1383. Thomas Arundel, 1386. William of Wykeham, 1389. Thomas Arundel, 1391. Edmund Stafford, 1396.

THE young King was but a child, and there was a prospect of a long minority, affording an ample field for the intrigues of party. The position of the kingdom too was such as to promise a time of considerable difficulty. The war with France had been put off by a succession of truces, but was still threatening, and England was in no condition to meet it. An invasion actually took place. French troops landed in the Isle of Wight, and laid waste the country. Moreover, the last reign had closed amidst domestic difficulties. The Lords therefore thought it right to take the settlement of the kingdom into their own hands. At a great council it was determined to form a Council of Regency, drawn from all orders represented in Parliament, to assist the great officers of the crown. The dangers which beset the country induced all parties for a time to rally honestly round the throne. The royal princes, who might become party leaders, were on that account excluded from the Council. The national party again gained the majority in the Commons, and again elected De la Mare as their Speaker. But the Commons had no wish to drive matters to extremity, or to change the existing balance of power. They fell back into their old position, which they had temporarily felt themselves obliged to desert, declined to have anything to do with matters of state; and when told to consider the best means for the defence of the kingdom, they pleaded their inability to answer, named a council of peers whom they thought qualified for the purpose, and made overtures of friendship by placing Lancaster's name at the head of the list. Lancaster, who desired power and had no fixed principles, accepted the position, first making a solemn denial of all the calumnious reports which were afloat about him, and thus again became practically Prime Minister. But the Commons showed that they intended to keep their own great object, economical management of the finances, steadfastly in view, by insisting that the subsidy, which was granted at once upon this reconciliation, should be paid into the hands of two treasurers named by themselves. They also demanded, as a further guarantee of good government, that the great officers of state and the judges should be chosen by the Lords, and publicly named to the Commons. The King was left unrestrained in the choice of those who should be about his person. At the next Parliament, held at Gloucester in 1378, they still pursued the same policy, and refused to grant a new subsidy till the accounts of that last granted had been exhibited to them. It was plain that the constant repetition of subsidies was much disliked.

1377]

WAT TYLER

243

But the continuation of war in Brittany soon made fresh demands for money necessary. This war had closed by a sudden revulsion of feeling on the part of the Bretons, who had been roused to extreme anger by the annexation of the province by the French King. But on his death they became equally hostile to their late friends the English, and drove them from the country. To supply this want of money, new methods of taxation were devised. A poll-tax, graduated from £6, 13s. 4d. on the Duke of Lancaster, to 4d. on the ordinary labourer and his family, was granted, but produced not half the sum required. Further demands were made, and the consent of the Commons purchased by reforms of the household, and by the establishment of a Parliamentary finance committee. Even the new grants thus purchased did not suffice, and at the end of the year 1380 a poll tax graduated from £1 to 1s. per head was imposed on every male and female.

The exaction of this tax, which fell proportionately with much greater weight on the lower, unrepresented orders, produced the great insurrection known as Wat Tyler's insurrection. Many causes had been at work, not in England only, but throughout Europe, to excite discontent among the labouring classes. The severity and rough inquisitorial spirit with which the present impost was collected was beyond what they could bear. In Essex, under Jack Straw, at Dartford, under Wat Tyler, whose daughter had been subjected to insult, and at Gravesend, where Sir Simon Burley had laid claim to a labourer as his villein, insurrections broke out. Wat Tyler was chosen for the general leader, accompanied by John Ball, the popular itinerant preacher. But the insurrection was not confined to these counties only, it extended from Winchester to Scarborough. It was in all respects a revolutionary movement. Manor-houses were pillaged and destroyed, and the court rolls, where the villeins' names were written, were burnt. Officials, those who had served on juries, justices, and even lawyers, were put to death. The rebels were particularly embittered against John of Gaunt, swearing to admit no king of the name of John, and refused all taxes except the customary tenth and fifteenth.

The insurgents entered Southwark, and pillaged the palace of Lambeth; on the following day penetrated into London, freed the prisoners in Newgate, destroyed Lancaster's house of the Savoy, and showed their national spirit by killing some fifty Flemish merchants. The King was alone in London; he offered to meet them at Mile End. He there received their petition, which demanded not political but social rights,—the abolition of villeinage, the reduction of rent to fourpence an acre, the free access to all fairs and markets, and a general pardon. The King granted their demands; and charters were at once drawn up for every township. But, in the meanwhile, the more advanced leaders, disliking the moderation of the bulk of their followers, broke into the Tower and ransacked it. On the following day, the King came across these men in Smithfield. Tyler was at their head. He advanced to have a personal interview with the King, and was suddenly killed by Walworth, the Lord Mayor, as he played with his dagger, an action which was construed as a threat. The young King, with remarkable presence of mind, rode forward to the astonished rebels, declared that he would be their leader, and induced them to follow him to Islington, where they found themselves in the presence of Sir Robert Knowles and 1000

Insurrection of
the Villeins.
1381.

Death of Wat Tyler.

soldiers. They at once yielded, and demanded the King's mercy; he declined to punish them, and dismissed them to their homes. When time had thus been gained, the crisis was over. Richard found himself at the head of an army. Several defeats and numerous executions broke the spirit of the rebels, and the insurrection was suppressed.

In autumn the Parliament met. The King declared he had recalled his charters, but asked the Commons to consider the propriety of abolishing villeinage. The ignorance and want of sympathy with the feelings of the class below them, which existed among the representative Commons, was then made evident. No men, they said, should rob them of their villeins. The charters were therefore finally revoked; and not only the charters, but the general pardon also: at least 250 persons were exempted from it. Meantime, the House of Commons made political capital out of the insurrection; they declared that the cause of the insurrection was not the social oppression of the labourer, but their own grievances, purveyance, the rapacity of the officers of the Exchequer, the maintainers, or bands of robbers who carried on depredations in some counties, and the heavy taxation. This was followed by a further inquiry into the royal household.

Lancaster continued in power for three years longer. His ministry was unmarked by success; and the feeling against him, which had been exhibited in the insurrection, found frequent expression. With regard to Church reform he had completely changed his tactics. When Wicliffe passed beyond his attacks upon the abuses of the Church, and touched its doctrine, questioning even the fundamental point of Transubstantiation, Lancaster withdrew his support. Although Wicliffe was so far upheld by Parliament, that a statute which had been passed for the suppression of his "poor priests" was repealed, he was unable, without Lancaster's assistance, to withstand the power of the Church, and was compelled to make some form of recantation before he regained his living of Lutterworth, where he died in 1384. But Lancaster reaped no advantage from this change in his conduct. Every disaster was still laid to his charge, and the old suspicion that he harboured covert designs upon the throne still clung to him. The great schism was at this time dividing the Catholic Church. For seventy years the Papacy fixed at Avignon had been the servant of the French king: the Babylonish captivity the Italians called it. Gregory XI. restored the Papacy to Rome, but his death was followed by suppressed.

Insurrection

Parliament
rejects the villeins' claims.

Lancaster's
government.

He deserts
Wicliffe.

a double election. The French cardinals elected Clement VII., the Roman cardinals Urban VI.; and the Christian world was divided in its allegiance. In the interests of Pope Urban, who was received in England, the Bishop of Norwich, a remarkable prelate, who had distinguished himself in the suppression of the late insurrection, was engaged to lead an army against France. He selected the old road of attack. The Flemish citizens, in spite of the death of their great leader, Philip Van Artevelt, and of a crushing defeat they had received from the French chivalry at Rosbecque, continued their enmity to France. The Bishop was to act in concert with them.

His expedition failed; it was currently reported that Lancaster had thwarted it. A certain friar came to the King offering to prove traitorous designs on the part of Lancaster.

Sir John Holland, the King's half-brother, and a partisan of Lancaster's, into whose charge he was given, killed him. His death was no doubt suspicious. His story against Lancaster was believed. In 1385, Scotland, which had been subsidized by France, became Jealousy of him

thwarts the Scotch invasion.
1385.

troublesome. Richard led an army against it; but the advice of De la Pole, the King's chancellor and favourite minister, who pretended to dread the designs of Lancaster, induced Richard to retreat, and the expedition came to nothing. Moreover, still further to mark his fear of Lancaster, Richard declared Roger, Earl of March, his presumptive heir. The enmity between March and Lancaster, in which perhaps may be traced the first beginnings of the Wars of the Roses, had been already marked in the last reign. Peter de la Mare was the steward of the Earl of March, while Sir Thomas Hungerford, the speaker of the following Parliament, occupied the same office in the household of Lancaster.

He is glad to have to support his claims in Castile.

John of Gaunt, thus mistrusted and opposed, was glad to embrace the opportunity of leaving England, which was offered him by affairs in Spain, where he wished, in union with the Portuguese, to push the claim to the throne of Castile, which he derived from his wife, the daughter of Pedro the Cruel.

He was at once succeeded in his influence and in his party leadership by a far more dangerous man, another uncle of the King, Thomas, Duke of Gloucester. Meanwhile the politics of England had changed, and had fallen back into their normal condition. We have seen that the King had been allowed the free selection of his own household. He had surrounded himself by men not drawn from the higher baron-age.¹ His chief favourite was De Vere, whom he had made Earl of Oxford, and subsequently Duke of Ireland, and to whom he had intrusted the government of that disturbed country; while his ministers nominated by Parliament were also men who owed their position to their capacity rather than to their birth. The chief of these was Michael de la Pole, the chancellor, whom the King had raised to the rank of Earl of Suffolk. He was thus open to the old charge of favouritism.

The King's
favourites.

The Lancastrian party had set themselves against his favourites. Already one of them, the Earl of Stafford, had been killed by Sir John Holland, and Gloucester found no difficulty in forming a powerful party among the barons, taking for his cry the reform of the administration, and seeking to excite the national feeling, by keeping alive the animosity against France, towards which country Richard was much drawn; while the specious pretext of reform as usual attracted the Commons. In 1386, Gloucester took advantage of a threatened invasion from France to produce charges against the administration. The King's officers, it was said, had used the public revenues for their own purposes; the Commons had been impoverished by taxes, the landowners could not get their rents, and tenants were compelled to abandon their farms through distress. The three last of these charges were traceable, not to government, but to economical changes, but served well as a party catchword; and so successful were they, that in a Parliament held at Westminster, Commons and Lords united in demanding a change of ministry.

Gloucester
heads an opposition.

After a contest of three weeks the King yielded. Suffolk was dismissed, and his dismissal was immediately followed by his impeachment. The charges brought against him were held to be partly proved, and he was sentenced to be kept in prison during the King's pleasure. After the dissolution of Parliament he was released. His place was taken by Arundel, Bishop of Ely.

Change of Ministry demanded.
Impeachment of Suffolk.

This blow, though severe, was followed by a worse one. The old baronial policy of establishing a committee of reform was renewed. To intimidate the King, the statute of the deposition of Edward II. was produced in Parliament. The estates having declared that unless he granted their requests they would separate without his permission, he was finally compelled to authorize a commission of eleven peers and bishops, to inquire into abuses and

Commission of Government

¹ In 1385, during his Scotch expedition, his uncles, Cambridge and Buckingham, had been made Dukes of York and Gloucester; Lancaster's son Henry, Earl of Derby; the Duke of York's son George, Earl of Rutland; Robert de Vere, Marquis of Dublin; and De la Pole, Earl of Suffolk.

regulate reform. Their duty was a very wide one, touching the household, the treasury, and all complaints out of the reach of law. The partisans of Gloucester formed the majority of this committee, of which the Duke himself and his chief friend, Lord Arundel,¹ were members. It was arranged that the power of the committee should last for one year only. It does not seem to have brought to light any great abuses, nor was its government sufficiently superior to that which had preceded it to justify its establishment. Richard had no mind to submit to a limitation of his prerogative which seemed so little called for. He set to work with his usual secretiveness. At prepares a counterblow.

The King
1387.

Shrewsbury, and again at Nottingham, he inquired of the judges how far the late conduct of the reformers was constitutional. Their reply was strongly in favour of the prerogative. They declared the late measures treasonable, and its authors liable to capital punishment, denied the power of Parliament to impeach, and declared Suffolk's condemnation false. Fulthorpe, one of the King's judges, though sworn to secrecy, at once told Gloucester of the King's questions. Consequently, when Richard had made all preparations for a sudden coup d'état, he was alarmed to find that Gloucester, Arundel, and Nottingham, had reached

The five Lords Appellant in arms impeach
the King's friends.

London the same day as himself, with a numerous army. At Waltham Cross the Earls of Derby and Warwick joined them, and they proceeded to appeal, or, as we should say, accuse of high treason, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian the judge, and Sir Nicholas Brember, whose influence had been employed to secure London for Richard. The accused sought refuge in flight, and the Duke of Ireland succeeded in raising troops in the West, and attempted to bring the matter to the issue of battle. But the Lords Appellant were beforehand with him; he was unable to cross the Thames, as he hoped, at Radcot; and being there surrounded, with difficulty escaped by swimming the river.

The appellants, now masters of the kingdom, made a thorough clearance of all who could be considered King's favourites. Eleven of his intimate friends were imprisoned, a number of the lords and ladies of the Court removed, and in February 1388, a Parliament known as the "Wonderful or merciless Parliament" assembled, which, in a long session of 122 days, was employed almost entirely in destroying the enemies of Gloucester. His appeal was heard, and all the five accused gentlemen were found guilty; three escaped, Tresilian and Brember were put to death. Some of the judges were likewise executed, some pardoned on the intercession of the bishops, and four knights, old and intimate friends of Richard, of whom Sir Simon Burley is the best known, were also impeached and beheaded. Parliament closed with an ordinance, declaring that the treasons for which these men had suffered were not established by any statute, and should not form a precedent; and by exacting a repetition of Richard's coronation oath. For a year, Gloucester ruled at his will, without any marked success. The Percies were defeated by the Scotch at Otterbourne, and an invasion from France was only averted by the incessant dissensions which had arisen in that country during the minority of Charles VI. Before the end of Gloucester's administration, however, truces were concluded with both Scotland and France.

The Wonderful
Parliament.

¹ Brother of Arundel, Bishop of Ely, subsequently Archbishop of York and of Canterbury.

Gloucester's
unimportant
government.

Richard appears to have been able to dissemble profoundly; he had been most submissive to his conquerors, who believed their power safe, when, at a council in the spring of 1389, he quietly asked Gloucester how old he was. Gloucester replied that he was twenty-two. "Then," said the King, "I am certainly old enough to manage my own affairs. I thank you, my lords, for your past services; I want them no longer." He then proceeded to change the ministry, removed Arundel from the chancellorship,¹ and took the government into his own hands. Although the ministry was changed, there was no great reversal of policy, no punishment of the Lords Appellant. On the contrary, the King, under the advice, it is probable, of William of Wykeham, seemed determined to ignore party, and to attempt a moderate government. He declared that he would be bound by the decisions of the late Parliament, employed among his most intimate counsellors, Derby, who had been one of the appellants, and the Duke of York, who had been on the commission of 1386; and it would appear that he did not even remove Gloucester from his councils. In pursuance of this national and healing policy, in the following year, the chief officers temporarily resigned their offices, that their administration might be examined. The Commons found not the slightest cause of complaint, and they were reinstated at once. This peaceable state of affairs continued till 1397. During the whole of that time, we must believe that Richard was only waiting his opportunity. There were indeed some signs of his secret thoughts. Some of his banished friends were relieved or obtained places in Ireland. On the death of

Richard assumes sole authority.
1389.

¹ William of Wykeham again took the Seal.

Robert de Vere he succeeded in obtaining the Earldom of Oxford for his uncle, Aubrey de Vere; and a year or two afterwards he brought his friend's body, which had been embalmed, from abroad, and before it was reburied, had the coffin opened, and gazed with much emotion upon the dead man's face. But outwardly such unity reigned, that national matters could be considered, and the period is marked by the completion of the quarrel with the Papacy with regard to Provisors, and by an expedition to Ireland.

England, it has been said, embraced the cause of Urban VI. In his gratitude he had given the King the nomination to the two next vacant prebends in all collegiate churches. But the appointment by the Pope of an Abbot of St. Edmunds, in 1380, produced a repetition of the Statute of Provisors of Edward III.'s reign.¹ Still the laws were repeatedly evaded, the Pope always presenting to benefices which fell vacant at Rome. As the cardinals generally died at Rome, this was a large exception. In 1390, the 29th of January of that year was settled as a term. All Provisors before that year were legal; all after, together with the introduction of any Papal letter of recommendation, absolutely illegal. In 1391, the new Pope, Boniface IX., declared all these enactments void, and proceeded to grant Provisors. Consequently, in 1393,² was drawn up the final Statute of Provisors, or Præmunire. By this any man procuring instruments of any kind from Rome, or publishing such instruments, was outlawed, his property forfeited, and his person apprehended.

The following year the King made an expedition to Ireland. The condition of that country had long demanded attention. Since the invasion of the Bruces, the native tribes had made considerable advances on all sides, but their domestic dissensions prevented any permanent success. A far greater evil was the condition of the Irish of old English race. The want of strong central authority had allowed the individual chieftains to establish something like royal power in their own dominions; they were gradually falling back into barbarism, and in a way very unusual among conquering races, had been gradually adopting the manners and laws of the conquered race around them. Among them, as among the natives, perpetual discord and fighting existed. So disorderly were they, that Edward III. had ordered that no official places should be occupied except by men born in England; and Lionel of Clarence, who had been appointed to bring the country into order, had, in 1364, procured, at the Parliament of Kilkenny, statutes, directed not against the Irish, but against the English settlers, making the adoption of Irish habits, and of the Brehon or Irish law, high treason. Earlier in the reign, Richard had appointed his favourite De Vere to restore order. His success had been prevented by the attack upon him by the Lords Appellant in 1387. The King now, in the year 1394, determined to go in person. His measures were just and moderate, and he succeeded in inducing all the native princes to swear fealty.

¹ 38 Edward III.

² 16 Richard II.

He was called home by the excesses of the Lollards, as the followers of Wicliffe were called. They had prepared a petition, containing a forcible exposition of their own tenets, and a vigorous attack on the priests. The Church demanded the presence and protection of the King, who, on his arrival in England, expelled the Lollards from Oxford. At the same time he contracted a marriage, consonant with his known French views, with Isabella, the daughter of Charles VI. of France, a Princess of ten years of age. In 1397, the marriage ceremony having been performed, the young Queen was crowned. It seems possible that it was in reliance upon this new friendship with France that the King now determined to execute his long dissembled vengeance. The seven years of peaceful government had allayed suspicion, and won him popularity. Lancaster, who had returned from Spain, had ceased to take a very prominent part in the government, and had, moreover, been gratified by the legitimization of his children by his mistress Catherine Swinford. His son, the Earl of Derby, had deserted his former associates, and was one of the King's advisers. Mowbray of Nottingham, another of the Lords Appellant, had also been won over. The Duke of York had throughout been friendly disposed to the King. On the other hand, Gloucester had been continually acting in a spirit of covert hostility. He had made political capital by opposing the French match, and by publicly speaking against the extravagances of the royal household, which appear to have been very great. Froissart, indeed, mentions a story, which however needs confirmation, that he had combined with Warwick and the Arundels in a plot to seize the King.

Richard carried out his plans of vengeance with his usual secrecy and skill. Suddenly, Warwick, Arundel and Gloucester were apprehended, and sent to different and distant castles. He then proceeded against them as they had themselves proceeded against his friends. They were appealed of treason by a number of Earls in the royal interest. Rickhill, one of the

Marriage with Isabella of France.
1397.

Richard's vengeance after seven years'
peace.

justices, was sent to Calais to obtain Gloucester's confession, and a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, in which the good will of the Commons had been already secured. As a preliminary measure, all pardons to Gloucester, Arundel and Warwick were revoked. An impeachment was then brought against the Archbishop Arundel, and the appeal against the Duke and the two Earls was heard. Arundel refused to plead anything but his pardon. This having already been revoked, he was at once condemned and executed. The Earl Marshall, to whom Gloucester had been intrusted, was ordered to produce him, but replied that the Duke was dead. It seems almost certain that he had been murdered by Richard's orders at Calais. The Archbishop was condemned to banishment for life; and Warwick, who pleaded guilty, was exiled to the Isle of Man. Lord Mortimer, who was also involved in the accusation, fled to Ireland, and was outlawed. A shower of new titles was lavished on the obsequious Lords. Derby and Rutland were made Dukes of Hereford and Albemarle; Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; De Spencer, Neville, Percy and Scrope, respectively, Earls of Gloucester, Westmoreland, Worcester and Wiltshire. A statute was passed making it treason to levy war against the King, and declaring the penalty of treason against any one who should attempt to overthrow the enactments of this Parliament. The next Parliament at Gloucester, in 1398, acted in the same obsequious manner. The Acts of the Wonderful Parliament were repealed. To the grant of a subsidy was added the tax on wool and hides for life; and a permanent committee of twelve peers and six commoners was appointed to represent Parliament for the future.

Hereford and Norfolk
banished.

The new Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk alone remained unpunished of the old Lords Appellant of 1386. These two men, who had shared in the destruction of their former associates, had now quarrelled, and Hereford brought a formal charge against Norfolk of treasonable conversation. To the Parliamentary committee this question was now referred, and by them laid before a court of chivalry; at the same time the committee enacted laws in the royal interest, exactly as though it had been the Parliament. It was agreed that the dispute between the two dukes should be settled by the arbitrament of battle. The lists were prepared at Coventry, but as the combatants were about to engage, the King took the matter into his own hands, and, on what principle it is impossible to conceive, punished both; Hereford he banished for ten years, Norfolk for life. Richard had thus destroyed his old enemies, rid himself of the constraint of Parliament, and was practically despotic.

"Then the King began to rule," says Froissart, "more fiercely than before. In those days there were none so great in England that durst speak against anything that the King did. He had council meet for his appetite, who exhorted him to do what he list. He still kept in his wages 10,000 archers. He then kept greater state than ever, no former king had ever kept so much as he did by 100,000 nobles a year."¹

He acted in accordance with his position. He raised forced loans, meddled in the administration of justice, and went so far as to declare no less than seventeen counties outlawed, for having, as he asserted, favoured the Lords Appellant before the affair at Radcot Bridge. But he overrated his real power. His government had been accepted because it had been constitutional and moderate. The change which was evident since his acquirement of the sole authority induced the people to give the credit of that moderation to Hereford, who had been a chief member of that council, and who was a popular favourite. Thousands had attended him as he left England for his banishment, and excitement spread through the country when the King, in contravention of his promise and of law, refused him the succession to his father's title and property upon the death of that prince. Regardless of the discontented feeling of the people, Richard unwisely determined upon another expedition to Ireland, to complete his work there, and to exact vengeance for the death of the Earl of March, whom he had named as his successor. The kingdom was thus left vacant, and in the charge of the Duke of York, whose subsequent conduct proved that he shared in the national feeling.

His arbitrary rule alienates
the people.

During his absence in Ireland,
1399,

The new Duke of Lancaster took advantage of this act of folly to land at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, declaring loudly that he came but to demand his family succession. The Percies, the old friends of the Lancastrians, received him with gladness, and his march southwards soon became formidable. The King's ministers, Wiltshire, Bussy, and Greene, fled for refuge to Bristol. Thither York also betook himself, thus leaving the capital open. Lancaster, now at the head of a powerful army, also drew to the West. As he came within reach of the Duke of York, civilities were exchanged, which proved that he had no opposition to fear from him. Bristol opened its gates. The King's favourites were seized and executed, and the King, who had landed in Wales from Ireland,

Hereford returns and is triumphantly received.

¹ BERNER'S Froissart, IV., chap. 78.

with the Duke of Albemarle and other nobles, saw his army rapidly dissolve, and had to take refuge in the castle of Conway. Captures Richard. Henry of Lancaster found himself joined by all the nobility. He commissioned Percy of Northumberland to procure a meeting with Richard at Flint. The proposed meeting was a trap to catch the King; as he rode from the castle with Northumberland, Richard found himself in the midst of hostile troops. When he was introduced to the presence of Lancaster, he knew that his fate was sealed, and with his peculiar power of accepting circumstances, was entirely submissive in his behaviour.

A Parliament had been summoned to meet in September; but before that time, Richard was induced to make a formal resignation of the kingdom. Not content with this, when the Parliament met, Henry caused the coronation oath to be read. It was contended that Richard had broken it, and therefore forfeited the crown. The Bishop of Carlisle alone raised his voice in favour of the fallen King, and demanded that he should at least be heard in his defence. His interference was, of course, in vain. Makes him resign the kingdom. The deposition of the King was voted. The throne being thus vacant, the Duke was not long in laying claim to it. In a curious document, in which he mingled the claims of blood, of conquest, and the necessity of reform, he put forward his demands. They were unanimously admitted. The Archbishop of Canterbury took him by the hand and led him to the throne. It was his cue to act with strict legality, yet he could not afford to do without a Parliament so obviously devoted to his interests. As that Parliament had expired by Richard's deposition, he immediately issued writs for a new one, returnable in six days, thus rendering it absolutely impossible to make any new elections. It was with the Parliament thus secured that he began his reign.

STATE OF SOCIETY.

1216—1399.

ALTHOUGH the narration of political facts implies much of the history of the country, it leaves out of sight much that touches the real life of the people. During the last hundred years great social changes had been going on, and great social progress made. In fact, till the end of the reign of King John, the social, like the political history of the country scarcely deserves the name of national. The description of any feudal society will in a great measure suit it. But the national existence had been worked out in the reign of Henry III., and was completed and finally established by the great time of Edward I. From that time onwards, continuous change and growth had been visible, and that growth had been national. The great fact of all modern history is the breaking up of the feudal and ecclesiastical system of the middle ages, and the introduction, as political and social elements of weight, of the middle and industrial classes. It is the beginning of that process which constitutes therefore the history of this period. The points to observe will be, therefore, the growth and advance of the commons, the decay of the aristocracy. But it is as yet quite impossible to speak of the commons as one body. The line which divided the class which sent its representatives to Parliament, and which was already becoming of political importance, from the mass of the labouring part of the nation, was very clearly drawn, and the characteristics, the employments, and the feelings of the one class, as well as the causes of their advance, will be very different from those of the other. A brief sketch has been already given of the gradual introduction of the commons into Parliament. But it still remains to explain and illustrate the sources of their wealth, their aristocratic tendencies, and the prevalence among them of a strong distaste for the pre-eminent position occupied by the Church. It was their wealth which gained them admission to Parliament, and the way in which that wealth was gained which greatly influenced their views after they had been admitted.

Trade, on which their riches depended, was as yet in its infancy ; and the views which regulated its management as yet too crude to be spoken of by such a dignified title as political economy. As far as they went, however, they were very clear, and were, in fact, though afterwards improved, the same in spirit as those which existed in England before the time of Adam Smith. Observing only the obvious fact, that the possession of money enabled a man to purchase whatever he wanted, early traders conceived the idea that money was wealth, and that nothing else was. And as the wealth of the nation was of the last importance, both to the governor and to the governed, and as trade was the chief method by which money could be supplied, and by which money might be drawn from the country, the regulation of trade became one of the most important duties of the King and the Parliament. Now money being the sole wealth, in that regulation of trade it became necessary to aim first at the introduction of money ; secondly, at its retention. It was to these objects that the frequent ordinances and statutes with regard to trade were directed. Although very various and, as such regulations were almost certain to be, frequently inefficacious, they were energetic and simple. England was not as yet a manufacturing country. Its trade was an export trade of raw materials, principally derived from sheep farming on the vast spaces of uncultivated land which then existed, and from its mineral wealth. Its principal commodities were wool, sheep-skins, or wool-fells, and leather, together with tin and lead.¹ Only the coarsest kind of cloth was manufactured ; sometimes intentionally rough and coarse, to be changed into fine cloth afterwards in Flanders, but exported as cloth to avoid the tax on wool. Primitive trade, when the seas were beset with pirates, had been carried on chiefly inland, and great fairs, such as that of Troyes in France, had been established under the guardianship of feudal lords, who guaranteed the safety of the merchants for a toll. Domestic trade was carried on in the same way, and one of the forms of royal exaction was to open a fair, and insist upon all other shops and other places of sale being closed during its continuance.¹ As the seas became safer, and the mercantile spirit of the Flemings rose, the great free cities of Flanders became as it were perpetual fairs, and were known as staples, from the German "stapeln," to keep up. In order that trade should be well under command, it was necessary that it should be carried on in few channels. The English government had therefore chosen some of these Flemish towns, and ordered that all the chief productions of England, which have been already mentioned, should be sold in those towns, and nowhere else. These goods were therefore called staple commodities ; the merchants who traded in them, the merchants of the staple. And this staple trade was put under an organization—there being a mayor, a constable, and courts of the staple. At these staple towns, the King's customers, or custom-house officers, by means of this organization, had every bargain under direct supervision ; and every bargain thus supervised was obliged to be made for a certain sum of actual coin, the government thus securing a continual flow of silver into the hands of the English merchants. The staple towns were frequently changed. To reward any particularly faithful ally, or to raise the importance of any particular town, as for instance Calais, the staple was removed to that Prince's province, or to that town. The proportion of each bargain to be brought over in coin was also constantly varying. Indeed, the frequent interference of government in such matters was not among the least of the restrictions of trade. Edward III. was said, at one time of his life, to have had a different plan every month. Upon the whole, however, the principle was the same. Amongst the most remarkable plans of Edward III. was one for keeping the evident riches that accrued to the staple towns within the limits of England. In the twenty-seventh year of his reign he named nine towns in England which were to be the exclusive selling places of the English staple commodities. For an Englishman to carry such commodities beyond the seas was punishable by death. As Edward could not protect the foreign merchants visiting his staples, and as the additional trouble of purchasing goods at them naturally lowered prices, this plan did not answer. It was, in fact, suicidal for an island people, since it destroyed all object in the keeping up a mercantile navy. It was therefore speedily abandoned ; and after the reign of Henry VI., Calais became the sole English staple town. A similar attempt was made in the fourteenth year of Richard II., when it was enacted that no Englishman should buy wool except of the owners of the sheep, and for his own use. The export trade was thus again for a time given over to the foreign merchant, for the sake of securing to the wool-grower the profits of the retail as well as the wholesale trade; the effect was naturally a decrease of purchasers, which reduced the growers to great distress. The government had, by insisting on money payments in every bargain, secured an influx of silver; but as the nation was too far advanced in civilization to do without foreign products, there were a certain number of foreign importers, who threatened in their turn to withdraw it again. One or two attempts were indeed made to confine English trade to the limits of the country. Thus, it was the view of Simon de Montfort, who disliked all extravagance in dress, that the production of the country was enough to supply its own inhabitants; and in 1261, and in 1271, exportation of English wool was forbidden, and people acquired the habit of dressing in undyed native cloth. Such primitive patriotism could not last in an advancing nation. Trade soon resumed its old course. The greater part of the foreign merchants were Germans, and to keep them under government supervision, they were formed into a guild, given certain privileges, allowed to possess a guild-hall, and are generally known as the Merchants of the Steelyard.¹ Other alien merchants there also were, who were protected by law; notably by the great statute of Edward I., "De mercatoribus." But although the goods they brought were necessary, their bargains, no less than those of the staple merchants, were under supervision. They were bound to employ a certain proportion of the money obtained from their sales in English goods.² Moreover, all foreign merchants were held to be mutually responsible for each other's debts. Thus the retention of the silver in England was also secured, while, to avoid any varieties in the value of money, English coin alone was current, and foreign coin had at once to be exchanged at the royal exchangers.

¹ There is an account preserved in the exchequer of the exports and imports in the year 1354. The total value of the exports was £212,338. They consisted of 81,651 sacks of wool, at £6 a sack ; 65 wool-fells, hides, to the value of £89 ; 4774 pieces of cloth ; 8061 pieces of worsted stuff. The imports mentioned consist of a little fine cloth and wax ; 1830 tons of wine ; and linens, mercery, and grocery to the value of £23,000. To show the severity of the wool tax, it is to be observed that on the above-named exports the duty was £81,846, or more than 40 per cent. Robert of Avesbury gives a somewhat different account. He put the exports at 100,000 sacks of wool. He is thought to have died about 1356.

¹ In 1250 a fair was held in Tothill Fields, and all the shops in London were shut.—Matthew of Paris.

Since money was so important an object, the coinage was naturally regarded with great care. It was an exclusive royal monopoly, and in the reign of Edward III. the punishment of death was enacted against false coiners. There was a constant dread lest in the exchange England should be the loser. The belief was prevalent that the value of the money depended upon the denomination. It had not yet entered men's minds to think that it was but another commodity, worth exactly its intrinsic value, which no change of name could alter. Up till the reign of Edward III., although clipped and lightened in use, and although Edward I. had begun the bad practice of depreciating the coin by diminishing its legal weight, the coinage had been on the whole but little tampered with. But between the years 1344 and 1351, the number of silver pennies made from the pound of silver had increased from 243 to 270. In that year, groats of the nominal value of 4d., but of the weight of only three and a half of the diminished penny, were issued. It is impossible to make any true estimate of the comparative value of money then and at the present time. The facts with regard to the actual amount of silver employed are these: The pound, which only nominally existed, was a full pound of silver, which would at present be coined into £2, 16s. 3d. The shilling, which seems also to have been a nominal coin, was the twentieth part of this, or 2s. 9½d. The silver penny, which was, till the time of Edward III., almost the only coin, was therefore worth 2½d. Edward introduced several new coins; some of gold, which, as there was no fixed proportion between them and silver, were not popular, and were recalled; and nobles of the value of 6s. 8d., or half a mark; together with the groats above mentioned. But of the purchasing value of the money thus made no fixed estimate can be given, as that of course depends upon the relative value of the articles purchased; and under the very different circumstances of those times the relative value of those articles was so different, that to compare the value of money with any one of them would give a totally false impression. It is usual to say roughly that to reach the present value of any sum mentioned it should be multiplied by fifteen.

Coinage

¹ There were also great Italian merchants and bankers. Thus we hear that Edward III. ruined the Bardi, that the taxes at the end of Edward I. were pledged to and collected by the Frescobaldi. The extent of the German transactions may be seen by a complaint in 1348, that the Tidmans of Limburg had bought up all the Cornish tin.

² By the 14th Richard II. half the money they received was to be expended in the commodities of the land.

This form of commerce, restricted as has been before explained, was certain to break down as the wants of the nation increased. There was a company of merchant adventurers ^{Guilds.} founded, perhaps, though this seems very uncertain, as early as Henry III.'s reign, which had the right to trade in other commodities besides the staple, and to choose its own ports. It was the growth of this company which, in the next century, had most to do with breaking down the staple monopoly. It is needless to point out the bad effects which this constant interference must have produced. It is certain that the foreign merchant paid himself well for the extreme difficulties placed in the way of his business; while, at the same time, the difficulties of procuring foreign articles of luxury must have gone far to render the habits of ordinary life rough and simple. The same principle of restriction, which was established in the commerce of the country, existed in the retail trade. The towns of England were of natural and accidental growth, accumulations of men who had gathered for purposes of self-defence or convenience, living in accordance with the ordinary habits of the country, in the same position, in fact, with regard to the king and their lords as any other society of men—citizens originally by right of the possession of land, and as the system of lordship established itself, bound to customary duties to their lord, just as the inhabitants of the country were. In the same way the citizens of the town, with the exception of these customary duties, were free and self-governing. They gradually, and chiefly by means of purchase, obtained freedom from the customary duties, and thus became independent, self-governing communities. Charters securing them freedom, in the case of the royal cities at all events, were many of them due to the necessities of the Angevin kings, and to their want of money for the payment of their mercenary troops. The close neighbourhood of the inhabitants of towns early introduced an artificial system of union, analogous to the frankpledge. Men formed themselves into what were known as frith-guilds,¹ the members of which were mutually responsible for one another, met at periodical feasts, supported one another's poor, and in other respects performed the duties of members of an artificial family. As trade increased these guilds in the generality of cases coalesced into one, which took upon itself the direction of trade, and was known as the merchant guild. With the natural tendency of a governing body, this old merchant guild became exceedingly exclusive. New-comers to the town were not admitted to it, and craftsmen were generally excluded from its limits. In turn those craftsmen established guilds of their own, known as craft-guilds, by the warden and leaders of which the bye-laws of the particular craft were formed. Between these and their aristocratic neighbours, the merchant guild, quarrels arose, and in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the contest between the two was fought out, the craft-guilds eventually securing their acknowledgment and a share in the government of the town. Speaking generally, therefore, we may conceive of the towns of England as being divided into a series of guilds, the leaders of which usually formed a governing body, and which were capable of making bye-laws for their own special members. The commercial aim of these associations was, to insure good work, to insure work for all its members, and to resist that spirit of competition which was gradually rising, and which ended in the creation of two classes, the capitalist and the workman. To secure these objects, they limited the number of master workmen, admitted candidates to their association only after lengthened apprenticeships, limited the number of apprentices each master might employ, and kept a close supervision over the articles made, which were usually authenticated by the corporation mark.¹

¹ For the history of guilds, see Dr Brentano's Preface to the "Ordinance of British Guilds," in the English Text Society

These restrictions upon industry at the close of our period were beginning to break down; round the master workmen, there was arising a class of journeymen or day labourers, whose ranks were constantly swelled by fugitive serfs from the country; while, on the other side, individual enterprise was making itself felt, and capital was being collected, the owners of which refused to submit to the old corporation laws. The constant supervision both of trade and of the work of artisans supported the notion that governing bodies had the right to set prices on the articles under their control, a principle which was used not only by the guilds, but by the Government, as when, in the famine years of 1315 and 1316, it prescribed the exact price of all articles of food. As this had the natural effect of keeping things entirely out of the market, so that butcher's meat disappeared altogether, it was shortly repealed; the prices to be demanded for victuals were constantly subject to the supervision of justices. The assize of bread, which is commonly assigned to the fifty-first year of Henry III., 1266, regulated the price in accordance with the market prices of corn, but the assizes of other matters, such as wine, wood, fish, fowls, etc., seem to have been perfectly arbitrary.

Though thus restricted, the trade of the English was very considerable. Their ships reached into the Baltic, where a constant communication was kept up with the Teutonic order, to whom Prussia belonged. The intercourse with that order was close. We hear of Henry, the first Duke of Lancaster, the Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV., and Thomas of Gloucester, repairing to their assistance. But the English merchants could never secure an equality of rights in the Baltic, the trade of which was regarded as a monopoly by the Hanseatic towns. English ships also visited Spain, so that Chaucer could describe his experienced shipman as knowing all the harbours from Gothland to Finisterre;² while Venetian and Genoese mer-

¹ The goldsmith's mark on all silver plate is a relic of this custom.

² Chaucer's Prologue:—

"He knew well alle havens as they were,
Fro' Gothlande to the Cape of Finisterre."

chants, in whose hands the whole trade of the East was, brought their goods largely to England; indeed, in 1379, a Genoese merchant is said to have suggested to Richard II. to make Southampton the emporium of all the oriental trade of the North. So great was the importance of the English shipping, that Edward III. distinctly claimed for himself and his predecessors the dominion of the sea.¹ The ships were, however, though numerous, of small burden; in the great fleet employed by Edward at Calais, there were 710 vessels, with crews amounting to 14,151 persons, which would give an average crew of about twenty men; and as it is said that there were about sixty-five sailors to every hundred tons, it would make the average size of the vessels very small. Indeed, a ship manned by thirty seamen, employed to convey Edward I. to the Continent, was regarded as a wonder for its size. Of navy, properly speaking, there was little or none. There were only twenty-five royal ships at Calais, the rest were all merchantmen pressed for the service. About this time it became habitual to put cannon on board ships. When used for military purposes, they were manned by troops and archers.

It has been mentioned that the trade of England was almost entirely in raw materials. The cloth manufactured had hitherto been of the roughest description, but Edward III., true to his view of keeping English trade for the English, and moved perhaps by the wealth of his allies the Flemish, attempted to introduce the manufacture of finer cloths. In 1331, he invited weavers and fullers from Flanders, and the patent exists which he gave to one John Kempe, to practise and teach his mystery.² This seems to have been the beginning of the finer cloth manufactures of England.

The fact of so much trouble being taken to organize trade shows the extent of it, and in spite of all ignorance and mismanagement, it was certain to produce wealth. The standard of comfort among all classes was improving, though there was nothing like what we should now speak of as luxury. The furniture used, even in the houses of the rich, was still rude. Things which are now found everywhere, and taken as matters of course, were then valuable rarities—beds, bedsteads, and rich clothing were frequently left by will. The lists of moveables, on which taxes were paid, are exceedingly meagre. A stool or two, a chest, and a few metal pots, constituted the ordinary supply of furniture. In the houses of the very rich, art had indeed begun to show itself. The payments of Henry III. to foreign artists for paintings in his house are mentioned. Intercourse with the French, and especially with the Spaniards, tended to increase these more luxurious habits. Carpets had always been used by Eastern people, and the Moors had introduced the custom in Spain. Thus, on the marriage of Edward I., before the arrival of Eleanor of Castile, her brother, the Archbishop of Toledo, made his appearance. The hangings of his chamber excited the wonder of the people, and Edward, always inclined to ostentation, had the rooms of the bride elect similarly decorated. This is said to have been the introduction of carpets to England; but still the usual covering of the floor was rushes. There is frequent mention of payments for rushes for the King's chambers. In the matter of clothes the same change is observable. The extravagant court of Edward II. is said to have introduced parti-coloured garments. In Edward III.'s reign, wealth had so increased in all ranks that it was found necessary to pass sumptuary laws, sharply dividing classes by the dress they were allowed to wear, and to confine silk and the finer woollen cloths to the higher ranks, for the sake perhaps of the English wool manufactures. In Richard II.'s reign, extravagance went still further. With his Queen, Anne of Bohemia, came in the awkward habit, soon adopted by all classes, of wearing long shoes, called cracovys or pykys, which required to be tied with silver chains to the knee before the wearer could move.¹ And Stowe says that Richard himself wore a garment made of gold, silver, and precious stones, worth 3000 marks. At the same time the rich built more comfortable houses. Castles ceased to be mere places of defence. They were at once strongholds and handsome dwelling-places. Warwick and Windsor castles may be looked on as fair specimens of the more magnificent buildings of the time. Meanwhile, though among the few, and on special occasions, splendour was found, houses, even in the streets of considerable towns, such as Colchester, the tenth city of the empire, were still built of mud. In Edward III.'s reign, it was still necessary to issue frequent orders for the cleansing of the streets of London, that his courtiers might not get into difficulties as they moved from Westminster to the City. Filth accumulated in the narrow by-lanes; and, as in the East, crows were held sacred as the only scavengers. Pavement there was none, and lanterns were hoisted from the top of Bow Church, to guide the wayfarer through the paths of the heaths that surrounded the metropolis.

¹ "Quod progenitores nostri, Reges Angliæ, domini maris et transmarini passagii, totis præteritis temporibus extiterunt."—Rymer, ii. 953

² Rymer, ii. 823.

¹ Half a yard long.—Mon. Evesham.

Barbaric profusion in the matter of food made up for the want of substantial comforts. At the coronation of Edward I.,

Food. 380 head of cattle, 430 sheep, 450 pigs, 18 wild boars, 278 fitches of bacon, and 20,000 capons, was the amount of food provided. The conduits ran wine, and hundreds of knights, who attended the great nobles, let their horses run free, to be the prize of the first captor. In 1399, at a Christmas feast of Richard II., there were daily killed twenty-eight oxen and 300 sheep, beside numberless fowl. Richard of Cornwall, at his marriage, is said to have invited 30,000 guests; while we are told that the usual household of Richard II. numbered 10,000. But though at these great festivals there was vast abundance of meat, at other times, especially at the Church fasts, fish, often of the coarsest sort, was eaten. The wife of Simon de Montfort ate the tongue of a whale dressed with peas, and a porpoise dressed with furmenty, saffron and sugar. Enormous quantities of herrings were consumed, spoken of as Aberdeens; in six days of March, Eleanor de Montfort's household consumed no less than 3000. Her meals were diversified by dog-fish, stock-fish, conger eels, and cod. Wine was drunk in great quantities, frequently mixed with honey. Hops, though known in Flanders, had not been introduced; the beer which was largely consumed was made of any grain, and seasoned with pepper.

The House of Commons. It was the increasing wealth of the country, especially of the mercantile classes, which had caused their introduction to Parliament. Thither they came with all the exclusive notions which their trade traditions had fostered. They were as careless of the class below them as the Barons. Indeed, it would be true to say that the feeling of the House of Commons was completely aristocratic. One part of it was of necessity entirely so: the knights of the shire, originally the representatives of the lower baronage, were elected in the county court, which was the general meeting-place of all freeholders, whether they held immediately from the crown or not. Consequently, the baronial freeholders became merged in the lesser freeholders, and the class of gentry was created. Many things had tended to the increase of that class. The breaking up of great properties, the division of property among younger children, and alienation, had increased the number of freeholders. The statute "Quia Emptores," intended as a check upon subinfeudation, had really increased alienation by authorizing it. The smaller estates, thus separated from the large baronies, had to be worked to profit, and could not be regarded merely as means of military or political influence. There thus had arisen an industrial as well as a military class of landholders. The representatives of towns, also elected upon a writ directed to the Sheriff, were, if not at first, certainly soon after elected in the county courts. This similarity of election united the two classes in feeling; and the smaller baronies, small landowners, and burghers, formed the body of representative Commons, aristocratic in feeling in accordance with the origin of the more aristocratic part of the class. It is thus that we find the Commons regarding the Barons as their natural leaders, not joining the crown against them as in France. Edward III., in his difficulties with Stratford, had tried to produce this combination, but had failed; and the Commons joining with the Barons, had insisted on the restoration to favour of that prelate. And thus, too, we find the Commons without sympathy with the demands of the rebels in Wat Tyler's insurrection. They had, indeed, certain grievances of their own, on which they were always petitioning, such as the encroachments of the King's purveyors, and the too great authority, sometimes misused, of the sheriffs. But apart from these particular wrongs, they may be regarded as siding as a whole with the Barons.

In their hatred to the Church they made common cause with all classes. The peculiar position which the submission of John had given the Popes in England was the primary cause of this dislike. Annates, or first-fruits, had been early demanded, but the great grievance, as we have seen, was Provisors. Against this assumption of authority, which forestalled the rights of the patrons, there was the strongest feeling. The exactions of the Pope had been strongly spoken of in the Statute of Carlisle in the end of Edward's I.'s reign. Edward II., like other weak princes, had yielded to this assumption. But in Edward III.'s reign, a series of enactments were passed, each one stronger than the last, against the interference of the Papacy. In 1343 the Statute of Carlisle had been read, and it was enacted that no more Papal instruments should be allowed in England. In 1344, the penalty of exile was pronounced against all provisors. By a Statute of the 25th year of Edward III.'s reign, it was ordained that "kings and all other lords were to present unto benefices, of their own or their ancestor's foundation, and not the Pope of Rome." If the Pope interfered the matter was to come into the King's hands, and penalties were enacted. In the 38th year of his reign these enactments were all confirmed and strengthened by the Statute of Provisors, by which the introduction of Papal Bulls and Briefs was forbidden. The strife, as we have seen, was continued in Richard II.'s reign, and finally completed in the 16th year of that King, by a statute declaring the freedom of the crown of England, which was in earthly subjection to no realm, and pronouncing the penalties of the Præmunire against all who should purchase or procure any Bulls from the Court of Rome; any who were guilty of this should be put out of the King's peace, and forfeit all their property. In Edward III.'s reign, also, the annual tribute, or census, as it was called, of a thousand marks was left unpaid. At the end of Edward I.'s reign 17,000 marks had become due. Edward II. paid this, and continued throughout his reign to discharge the debt. Edward III. was again strong enough to refuse the payment, and in 1366, Urban V. demanded the arrears of thirty-three years. The King laid the matter before his Parliament, and an instrument was drawn up in the name of the King, Lords, and Commons, declaring that John had acted without the advice of his realm, and that any demand for the money would be resisted to the utmost. It was not again claimed. But it was not against the Roman Church only that the popular feeling had been aroused. The Church itself had become unpopular. The wealth and idleness of the older monastic orders, the spiritual encroachments and licentious lives of the new mendicant orders, had excited popular anger. The charges against them are humorously summed up in the Song of the Order of Fair-ease, a description of an imaginary order, to which each existing class of monks subscribes a characteristic or two. The monks of Beverley give the habit of deep drinking, in which they are joined by the Black Monks; the Hospitallers dress well and amble fairly on grey palfreys; the Secular Canons are the willing servants of the ladies; the Grey Monks are given to licentiousness; while the Friars Minor, whose order is founded on poverty, will never lodge with a poor man so long as there are richer men to be found. In the same way the constant interference of the consistory courts was the cause of popular complaint. "Yet there sit somnours, six or seven, misjudging all men alike, and reach forth their roll: herdsmen hate them, and every man's servant, for every parish they put in pain."

To crown all, the doctrine itself of the Church had begun to be questioned. In 1360, the name of Wicliffe first becomes prominent. His first attack was upon the mendicant orders, who had contrived to get into their hands much of the education of the country. From this time onwards he continually waged war against the abuses of the Church. The clergy, he urged, should be poor, in imitation of Christ. This doctrine he carried out by the establishment of an order of poor priests. With regard to the Sacrament, he appealed to common sense; and while not yet ready to attack the doctrine of Transubstantiation, upheld that the elements taken were really bread and wine. But his great work was neither his assault on the wealth of the clergy, nor his attack on their doctrine, but the translation of the Bible into English, which was, in fact, an appeal to private judgment in opposition to ecclesiastical authority. His influence was very widespread. His poor priests worked largely among the lower orders, and his view of the necessity of poverty for the clergy was so in harmony with the feelings of the day, that it met with ready acceptance. As has been mentioned, the Church was too strong for him. He was obliged, when the support of John of Gaunt failed him, to make some sort of recantation, and retire to his living of Lutterworth. But his disciples are said to have numbered a third of the population of England, and when, as was inevitable, social and political views were added to their religious doctrines, they became an object of dread, not only to the Church, but also to the Government.

It is perhaps in the lower commons that social change is most obvious. The great insurrection of Wat Tyler is a sign of something more than mere temporary discontent. The lower classes. Agricultural villeinage was disappearing, and giving birth to a new class almost peculiar to England, the free but landless labourer. The existence of this class first comes prominently into notice in the Statute of Labourers. In the terrible pestilence of the Black Death which had ravaged England, a third, perhaps a half, of the population had been carried off. Labour became scarce. The labourers took the opportunity of making what we should now call a strike for higher wages. Such a demand, however consonant with economical principles, was quite repugnant to the feelings of that age, when prices were a constant matter of legal enactment. The Statute of Labourers, stating in its preamble that servants, taking advantage of the necessities of their masters, would not serve except for excessive wages, enacted that every able-bodied man should be bound to serve any one who required him at the old wages under pain of imprisonment; and that every master giving more than the old wages should forfeit thrice the sum he had offered. Such an ordinance could not be kept; but strenuous efforts were made to insist upon it, and again and again in some form or other it was re-enacted. But whether successful or not, it shows the existence of labour for wages, and of a rising knowledge on the part of the labourers of the value of their work. Several causes combined to create this labouring class. The early form of agricultural society may be roughly described as a village of serfs lying round the manor-house of their lord. Each serf had his share in the common fields of the village, and was bound to join in the cultivation of his lord's domain or manor farm. For the simple farming at that time prevalent this forced labour was sufficient; and the lord valued his serfs more for military purposes than as agricultural labourers. As subinfeudation and alienation went on, the holders of small properties were obliged to work their land to better profit. The alienations also were chiefly made from the lord's domain, but it was not usual to part with serfs. Consequently, their number increased, while the domain land diminished; there were more hands than the lord could employ, and the tenant working for profit could therefore find labour among the surplus serfs who would work for wages. A change in the character of war took place at the same time. The insular condition of England made the feudal arrangement with its limited term of service inconvenient; in the highest ranks, therefore, military service was changed to scutage or money payment, and a large number of dependants became less desirable than money; proprietors were willing to work their farms with fewer servants and to receive money rent instead of service. There were thus at work the two principles which broke down villein labour; labour paid by wages, and land held for money rent. The change in war had another effect. Armies were raised by contract with some great lord. The payment was beyond the ordinary agricultural wages. The earl himself received a mark a day, the common foot-soldier, 3d. or 4d., and the archer, 6d.¹ Anxious to fulfil his contract, the leader would not be careful to inquire whether he was enlisting serfs or not. On his return from a war, the well-paid soldier would be unwilling to fall back into a state of serfdom. He swelled the ranks of wage-paid labour. Again, the residence of a year and a day uninterrupted within the limits of a borough gave freedom. Serfs, seeing the advantage of money payments, fled thither and became free. Again, the Church, in whose eyes all men were equal, would not refuse to admit them within its ranks; a serf could thus become a priest or monk, and withdraw himself from his lord's power. On the same principle, the Church constantly urged the manumission of serfs. To all these causes was now added the disarrangement of labour consequent on the Black Death. With a general demand for labour all superfluous hands would find easy employment, perhaps at a considerable distance from their old homes. With a sufficient supply himself, the lord would not waste time or money to redeem them. We thus see how there may have been a vast number of free labourers in England. The Statute of Labourers, destroying their freedom of bargain, attempted, though with but partial success, to force these free labourers back into a semi-servile condition. But they had now joined the ranks of freemen, such as the small farmers of Kent, and the unincorporated artisans of towns. The spirit of equality fostered by the teaching of the mendicant friars, who had reached England in Henry III.'s reign, and who took up their abode among the poor city populations, was still further increased by the teaching of Wicliffe and his poor priests.

¹ The Welsh infantry, who were largely employed after Edward I., had 2d. a day

"When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?"

a doggerel couplet frequent in the mouths of the insurgents of 1382, shows how the lessons of the Bible made public by Wicliffe's translation could be turned in the same direction. The feeling that it was the plebeian archer, and not the lordly man-at-arms, who had won the great victories in France, and the success with which, during the last half century, the smaller trade corporations had in the cities forced themselves into an equality with the great ones, all led to the same democratic feeling. The lower freemen made common cause with the villeins. They had all felt the heavy pressure of the tax-gatherer. The popular songs of the day are full of wretchedness. One, said to belong to the reign of Edward I. or II., speaks thus—

"To seek silver for the King, I sold my seed, wherefore my land lies fallow and learns to sleep. Since they fetched my fair cattle in my fold, when I think of my old wealth I nearly weep; this breeds many bold beggars. There wakes in the world consternation and woe, as good is it to perish at once, as so to labour."¹ The democratic outbreak of Wat Tyler was the consequence.

While the two sections of the commons were thus rising in social position, a change had also taken place in the character of the nobil-

¹ "To seche silver to the kyng y mi seed soide, Forthi mi lond leye lith ant leorneth to slepe.
Seththe he mi feire feh fatte y my folde,
When y thenk o mi weole wel neh y wepe;
Thus bredeth monie beggares bolde.

Ther wakeneth in the world wondred ant wee,
Aso god is swynken anon as so for to swynke."

Political Songs, p. 152.

ity. It may be roughly characterized as the change from feudalism to chivalry.¹ Many of the same causes which had conduced to the freedom of the labourer had tended to loosen the territorial system on which the ancient strength of the nobility rested. Especially had the voluntary character of military service dealt heavy blows at the practical side of feudalism. Soldiering was no longer the necessary duty of every man; but the military spirit remained, and to the bulk of the aristocracy fighting became a pastime. The subordination of proprietors gave place to a sort of system of freemasonry, to which all knights were admitted. Knighthood made its holder any man's equal for actual military purposes. It was no longer the great noble, but the good soldier, who was the commander. Manny, Chandos, Knowles, all of them simple knights, were the generals to whom Edward III. trusted. As an amusement war was decked with ostentatious ornament. This is the period of showy tournaments, of armorial bearings, and of grotesque vows, like that of the young knights who attended Edward with black patches over their eyes. It is this chivalrous aspect of war which explains the short-lived character of Edward's expeditions. But it had a more important effect. Importance in the country became a more personal matter; partly from love of show, partly to produce respect, great men began to surround themselves, not with feudal followers, but with paid retainers. To these they granted liveries. It was a point of honour among these retainers to stand by each other and by their chief. Quite in the beginning of Richard II.'s reign, the Commons petitioned against these liveries and the bands of maintainers,² who upheld each other in illegal actions. Thus great households, and by degrees factions, were formed, and things were ready for the great outbreak of faction fighting, which ended in the destruction of the old nobility in the Wars of the Roses.

The feeling of national life, which is one of the characteristics of the time, had shown itself in literature. Public transactions were still carried on in French or Latin; but it will be remembered that as early as the Provisions of Oxford it had been found necessary to publish any important proclamation in English as well. Up till that time the languages of the nobility and of the common people had been distinct. From that time onwards they begin to blend. This, as it happens, can be very well observed. Geoffrey of Monmouth wrote a Latin Chronicle of England in 1130. Before the end of the century it was versified by two writers; one wrote for the nobles and the aristocracy, the other for the common people. Master Wace, a native of Jersey, translated Geoffrey for Henry II. into Norman-French. Layamon, who wrote about 1180, translated it into a language which may be fairly called Anglo-Saxon, although of a somewhat degraded type. We have here a perfect division of the languages. But about the middle of the next century the same work was translated by Robert of Gloucester. In his language there is a much nearer approach to English, and a considerable number of French words are easily to be traced. Some fifty years afterwards, Robert Mannyng, or De Brunne, again rewrote the Chronicle; and again the further introduction of French words is striking. We have thus means of testing, as it were, at three different points, the process of amalgamation that was going forward. The Court language still continued to be French, but French not much like the language of France, and it was ceasing to be thoroughly understood by the bulk of the people. By the time that Chaucer wrote, he could laugh at English-French. His Prioress spoke Cockney-French,

¹ The historian of this chivalrous knighthood was Froissart.

² Maintainers seem to have been of two sorts. On the borders of the counties palatine, confederacies were formed, who made sudden irruptions into the neighbouring counties, and carried off young women, particularly heiresses. They then retired within the freedoms of the counties palatine, and held their captives to ransom. The bodies of retainers who gathered round individual nobles, and stood by one another in such illegal actions as forcible despoil or ejection of rightful owners from their property, also received the name.

"After the scole of Stratford atte Bowe,
For Frenche of Paris was to hire unknowe."

And in recommending English writing, he says,—"Certes there ben some that speke thyr poysy mater in Frensche, of whyche speche the Frensche men have as good a fantasye as we have in hearing of Frensche mennes Englyshe." This indeed was to be expected. From the Conquest the language of schools had been French; but in 1356, John of Cornwall had begun a change in this habit, and taught Latin translation by means of English, and not French. The consequence, as described by Trevisa, was, their "avauntage is, that thei lerneth her gramer in lasse tyme than children were wont to do; desavauntage is, that now children of gramer scole kunneth no more Frensch than her lifte heele." Other signs also point to this change. Latin had ceased to be the language of public documents in the reign of Edward I. In 1362, in answer it appears to a petition from the Commons, the opening address delivered in Parliament was in English, and the Commons' debates in English also. At the same time it was ordered that English should be the language of courts of law, because the French tongue was too much unknown. But it was not till the reign of Richard III. that the statutes and rolls of Parliament were written in English. It is probable that Parliamentary business continued to be carried on in both languages for some time longer. In 1381 English seems to have been generally used. There were thus during this period extant three languages for literary purposes—Latin, the language of learned men and historians; French, an acquired Court language, in which most of the legends of chivalry and lengthened rhyming chronicles were produced; and the gradually rising English language, which, as the popular tongue, was chiefly employed in songs and political satire. The earliest form of English poetry was alliterative,—metrical, but without rhyme, and depending for its effect upon a certain number of words in each couplet beginning with the same letter. But rhyme, and not only rhyme, but very easy and varied metres, were introduced as early as the reign of Henry III. Not unfrequently both principles were blended, and rhyme and alliteration occur together. Latin was also employed, we must suppose by the clergy, in satirical songs. All classical metres were then discarded, and Latin was used as a rhyming language. There are some instances also of verses, partly in one language, partly in the other. It may be worth while to give an instance of two of these various metres. Thus a verse of a song shortly after the battle of Lewes runs thus:—

"Sire Simond de Mountfort hath swore bi ys chyn, Hevede he nou here the Erl of Waryn,
Shulde he never more come to is yn,
Ne with sheld, ne with spere, ne with uther gyn
To help of Wyndesore.
Richard, thah thou be ever trichard,
Trichen shalt thou never more."

This is rhyme, the rhythm is free, and there is a refrain. In the following verse, from a satire on the consistory courts, alliteration and rhyme go together:—

"Ther sitteth somenours syxe other sevene
Mysmotinde men alle by here evene,
Ant recheth forth heore rolle;
Hyrd-men hem hatieth, ant uch mones hyne,
For everuch a parosse heo polketh in pyne,
Ant clastreth with heore colle."

The next specimen, from a song on the venality of judges, shows how Latin was adapted to modern versification:—

"Sunt Justitarii,
Quos favor et denarii
alliciunt a jure;
Hii sunt nam bene recolo
Quod census dant diabolo et serviunt hii pure."

While in the next verse is shown the mixture of two languages; it is drawn from a song against the King's taxes:—

"Une chose est cointre foy, unde gens gravatur
Que la meyté ne vient al roy, in regno quod levatur
Par ce qu'il n'ad tot l'enter, prout sibi datur,
Le pueple doit le plus doner, et sic sincopat.
Nam que taxantur, regi non omnia dantur."

These satirical poems are directed against nearly every class of society, the monks, the judges, the taxers, the nobility, the ladies, the logicians of the university, and even the doctors meet with their share of abuse. The democratic spirit which is visible in them found a more complete and worthy expression in the poem known by the name of the Vision and Creed of Piers Ploughman. It is supposed to be the work of a poet of the name of Langland. The form is allegorical, a form which the great celebrity of the French "Romance of the Rose" made permanent both in France and England for many years. A pilgrim of quite the lowest rank sees in a vision virtues and vices pass before him, and also representatives of all the various classes of society. Each in turn is criticised; none can lead him in the path of virtue, till Peter the Ploughman appears, who, in a religious conversation, shows him the right way. His character is one of typical perfection, and becomes confused towards the end of the poem with that of Christ. The poem is written in alliterative verse, and in English by no means so much like our present English as some of the songs that preceded it. But at length the time was come for the complete nationalization of the language. French was in decay, the popular songs were in rude English, and when the union of all classes in Parliament had completed the real nationality, any further division of the languages was impossible. The junction was effected by Chaucer. He set himself intentionally to work to make a compound and national tongue. He took for its basis the English; and on it he grafted, sometimes in their own form, sometimes in an altered form, vast numbers of French words. It is a curious instance of an intentional formation of a language. Many words he admitted apparently upon trial, and they have been rejected. Others have been somewhat changed in form, but in his works we have a language which a very little trouble will enable any Englishman to read, and the grammar and structure of which, with few exceptions, is like our own English. The great work for which he employed this language, the "Canterbury Tales," was well fitted to establish it. While the prologue describes every class of English society, each drawn with an incomparable delicacy and humour, the tales which form the bulk of the work are of every description. Love romances for the knights; coarse or farcical incidents for the commonalty; sober religious prose for the serious. Compared with this poem, there is nothing for more than a century worthy of mention. Gower, who wrote at the same time with Chaucer, and in the three languages, is wholly deficient in humour, and heavy and prosaic to the last degree. His followers in the next century, Lydgate and Occleve, were poets by profession and not by inspiration, always ready to turn out a poem upon demand. Chaucer was not only the founder of the English language, but, before the appearance of Spenser, the only great poet whom England produced.

HENRY IV.

1399-1413.

Born 1366 = 1. Mary of Bohun.
= 2. Joan of Navarre.

Henry V. Thomas, Duke of Clarence.	John, Duke of Bedford.	Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester.	Blanche = Duke Philippa = King of Bavaria. of Denmark.
---------------------------------------	---------------------------	-------------------------------	---

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain (Castile).
Robert III., 1390. James I., 1405.	Charles VI., 1380.	Wenceslaus, 1378. Robert, 1400. Sigismund, 1410.	Henry III., 1390. John II., 1406

POPES.—Boniface IX., 1389. Innocent VII., 1404. Gregory XII., 1406. Alexander V., 1409. John XXII., 1410.

Archbishop.

Thomas Arundel, 1397.

Chancellors.

John Searle, 1399.	Thomas Arundel, 1407.
Edmund Stafford, 1401.	Sir Thomas Beaufort, 1409.
Cardinal Beaufort, 1403.	Thomas Arundel, 1412.
Thomas Longley, 1405.

THE reign of Richard II., with its strange and rapid revolutions, had been the beginning of that great faction fight which was concluded a century afterwards by the accession of Henry VII. After pursuing during that reign a policy of inconsistent, and even treacherous, self-seeking, the Duke of Lancaster now came forward as the champion of order. The coup d'état by which he put himself on the throne is another of those instances which history has so abundantly furnished, of the willing acceptance by a nation, after a period of long discomfort, of any one who would bring it rest. There are thus two points of view from which to regard his reign. It is the reign of a usurper bent upon establishing a dynasty, the reign of a conservative who bases his position on the maintenance of the existing state of society, and therefore for a time checks the natural progress of the nation. The necessity which a usurper feels for popularity will explain the improved constitutional position of the Commons during the earlier years of his reign; his position as a reactionary that attachment to the Church which produced the famous statute, "De Hæretico comburendo."

The arbitrary character of the government at the close of the late King's reign, and the acts of vengeance which had marked it, were the evils which were most prominent at the moment.

Reversal of the acts of the late
King.

Henry's first step was of necessity the reversal of these acts, and the restoration of the state of things which had existed in 1388. The Parliament was therefore induced to declare all the acts of the last Parliament null, while those nobles whose adhesion to the late King had procured them fresh rank fell back to their old titles. Thus, the Dukes of Albemarle, of Surrey, and of Exeter, appear again as the Earls of Rutland, Kent, and Huntingdon,

Tumultuous scene in the first Parliament.

the Marquis of Dorset as Earl of Somerset. The scene in the House of Lords in the first Parliament marks the pitch to which passion had risen, and the preparation already made for future civil war. Rutland, the son of the Duke of York, was challenged by Lord Fitz-Walter, and when Lord Morley, the friend of the new King, challenged Lord Salisbury, no less than forty lords threw down their hoods as gages of battle on one side or the other. This point is further illustrated by the petition of the Commons, that all liveries except those of the King should be forbidden. The nobles had been gathering paid retainers around them, and getting themselves ready for the threatening quarrel. Meanwhile, the King had been crowned, supported by his two great partisans—whose names show the great influence of the North in the late change of government—Percy, Earl of Northumberland, now made Constable of England, and Neville, Earl of Westmoreland, with the rank of Marshall. It by no means suited Henry to excite remark as to his right. He therefore stepped as quietly as he could into the position of his predecessor, and his son Henry was declared Prince of Wales and heir-apparent, entirely without mention of the young Earl of March, the real heir, who was then a child in the custody of the King at Windsor. A grant of a tax on wool and insecure position for nine years, 1400.

The King's

leather for three years closed the session, and enabled Henry to take measures to secure his position; for it was not to be supposed that the party which had lost its influence would calmly acknowledge the new King. He was scarcely crowned when plots began to be formed against him, nor was it till he had been nine years upon the throne that the dangers which assaulted him both from his own kingdom and from foreign countries were finally overcome. It was during this period of weakness and uncertainty that he had to rest principally upon the Commons, who supported him as the champion of order against baronial disorder, but did not fail to take advantage of his weakness.

The first of these difficulties arose from those lords who had been the appellants against Gloucester, and whose loss of rank has been already mentioned. A week before Christmas, 1399,

Insurrection of the late Lords Appellant.

several others of the depressed party met at Westminster, and there the Earls of Huntingdon, Rutland, Kent, and Salisbury entered into a conspiracy for the restoration of Richard. Their plan was to seize the King at Windsor, but Rutland, a never-failing traitor, disclosed the project to his cousin; the King hastily betook himself to London, and the insurgent lords, finding that their plans were discovered, fell back towards the West. The King was rapidly pursuing them; but at Cirencester, the inhabitants, under their Mayor, surrounded their lodgings, took them prisoners, and afterwards beheaded Kent and Salisbury. Several escaped for the time, but the same fate at length overtook Despenser at Bristol, and Huntingdon at Pleshy in Essex. Subsequently, Sir Thomas Blunt and eighteen others were executed at Oxford. Among them was a priest, Maudelin by name, who had been chosen for his strong personal resemblance to represent the late King in the insurrection. That the leaders of this conspiracy should have all fallen victims to popular vengeance sufficiently shows the feelings of the bulk of the nation with regard to King Henry and his rival.

Meanwhile, Richard had been imprisoned in Pontefract Castle. In February a report was spread that he was dead. On this the Privy Council begged that, if still alive, he might be carefully

Imprisonment
and secret death of Richard.

secured. The answer was given that he was already dead, and a corpse was exhibited in London, the face of which, from the eyes to the chin, was left uncovered, the rest of the body being carefully clothed. This peculiar arrangement excited suspicions, which were probably groundless, but were further supported by the complete mystery which hung over the manner of the King's death. Hunger and violence were both alleged; while some asserted that the corpse exhibited was not that of Richard, but of the priest Maudelin.¹

¹ The priest had, however, been dead a month before.

His domestic enemies for the present silenced, Henry could look abroad. He made advances towards friendship with France, but it soon became plain that that kingdom was inclined to support the cause of the late King, whose young widow, Isabella, was the daughter of Charles VI. The title of King of England was refused to Henry, Isabella and her dowry demanded, and hostility thus kept continually alive. In Scotland, also, the same feeling showed itself. The King, Robert III., was confined by weakness of body and mind almost exclusively to the Isle of Bute; his brother, the Duke of Albany, was the real ruler of the country. Henry, who had a party in the country, and at whose court Dunbar, the Earl of March, the chief enemy of the Douglas family, was resident, thought it desirable to show his power. He therefore marched as far as Leith, demanding homage from the Scotch King similar to that claimed by his predecessors, but the Duke of Rothesay, heir-apparent, held firm in the Castle of Edinburgh, and want of provisions speedily obliged the English to beat a somewhat hasty retreat. As in the case of France, this transaction with Scotland established a constant hostility.

In the other dependency of England affairs were still worse. Owen Glendower, a Welsh gentleman of good family educated in England, incensed at the rejection of a suit about a certain property of Lord Grey of Ruthyn, had roused the national animosity, and claimed for himself the title of Prince of Wales. For the present Henry could do nothing effective against him. The war assumed a national character; the Welsh were expelled from the towns in the Marches. Edward I.'s statutes against the Welsh were re-enacted, even including that which ordered the destruction of the bards. The conduct of the war was placed nominally in the hands of Henry, Prince of Wales, a lad of thirteen. But the whole of the following year Glendower's successes continued. Grey of Ruthyn and Edward Mortimer, uncle of the imprisoned Prince, the Earl of March, were taken prisoners, and an expedition undertaken by Henry in person towards the close of the year was forced to retire from the mountainous strongholds of the Welsh. The storms and snowdrifts seemed to fight against them in that wild district, and gave rise to the belief that Glendower was a magician.

Could these various enemies but find some powerful adherents in England, it was plain that Henry's position would be precarious. A quarrel with those who had hitherto been his chief supporters, the Percies of Northumber-

Hostile attitude of France and
Scotland.

Useless and impolitic march into Scotland.

Insurrection in Wales. Owen
Glendower.
1400.

Quarrel with the Percies.
1402.

land, supplied this element of danger; while a strange report, that the late King was still alive in Scotland, gave a central point round which all Henry's enemies might gather. About Whitsuntide, in 1402, the rumour reached England that Richard had escaped from Pontefract, and had made his appearance at the house of the Lord of the Isles, by whom he was handed over to the Court, and there kept so strictly that no man could get sight of him. The existence of such a pretender was certain. It was in vain that Henry attempted to suppress the rumour by executions; in vain that he even proceeded to execute certain Franciscan monks who had been engaged in spreading it. The secrecy which covered Richard's death, and which for some reason Henry could not break, prevented any clear proof of the imposture. The false Richard is believed to have been a man of weak intellect, called Thomas Ward of Trumpington. The reason of the King's quarrel with the Percies is by no means clear, but various causes of discontent can be shown. The Duke of Albany, after much fighting on the borders, had made an expedition on a large scale against Carlisle. On its return home, the army, heavily laden with booty, was met by the Percies, and defeated at Homildon Hill. The defeat was complete; many Scotch nobles fell into the hands of the English, among them Murdoch, Earl of Fife, the son and heir of the Earl of Albany, and Douglas, Earl of Angus. For such prisoners the Percies expected a large ransom. Their anger and disappointment was great when the King took Murdoch from them and claimed the ransom of the rest. A somewhat similar affair took place in Wales. Of Glendower's great prisoners, Grey of Ruthyn was allowed to ransom himself, a privilege refused to Mortimer; when the younger Percy, Hotspur, who had married Mortimer's sister, urged his claim, he met with a rebuff. The King also owed the Percies large sums of money; £20,000 was due to them, which the entanglement of the finances made it impossible to pay. The general feeling that they had been badly rewarded for the invaluable assistance they had afforded Henry, acting upon the unusually hot temper of the younger Percy, drove them into a change of policy.

Before the end of the year 1402, they entered into negotiations with Glendower; and Mortimer, instead of attempting to gain his liberty, married the daughter of the insurgent chief, and recognized him as Prince of Wales. The Percies at the same time gained the assistance of their prisoner Douglas, and the conspiracy was completed by the support given to

The pretended Richard.

Causes of the quarrel with Northumberland

The Percies
combine with Glendower.

Glendower by France. On all sides the King's difficulties seemed to increase. The Earl of Worcester joined the Percies; Richard's old followers crowded to their standard, and an army, insidiously collected as though for an attack on Scotland, rapidly marched on Shrewsbury to make a junction with the Welsh. Thither Henry, with his son the Prince of Wales, hastened, and the decisive battle of Shrewsbury was fought, in which, after a keen struggle, Hotspur was killed, and most of the other leaders, including Worcester and Douglas, captured. Worcester and the other English leaders were beheaded; Douglas was retained in prison. The King had still to destroy the insurrection of the elder Percies in the North, where all the inhabitants of the country had taken the crescent—the livery of Northumberland. The royal army was, however, obviously too strong for opposition, and the Earl made his submission, and met the King at York. The House of Peers claimed as a right the trial of their fellow, and he was found guilty, not of high treason, but only of misdemeanour, and let off with a fine.

The great conspiracy was thus but half broken. Wales, Scotland, France, and the English malcontents were still in communication. From France, indeed, serious difficulties seemed to threaten. In presence of the weakness of Charles VI., the King of that country, the real power was disputed by his brother Louis of Orleans and his uncle the Duke of Burgundy. Louis had at this time the upper hand. He took in great dudgeon the events which had taken place in England; and rumours were abroad, strengthened by the distribution among the malcontents of Richard's crest by the old Countess of Oxford, the mother of De Vere, the late King's favourite. These rumours pointed to a great conspiracy, coupled with an invasion of Essex by France, in favour of the spurious Richard in Scotland. For a time the threat of invasion compelled the King to remain quiet; but after the French fleet, which had attacked the Isle of Wight and Plymouth, had been defeated at Portland, he was able to turn his attention to the North, and again to compel Northumberland to come to an explanation. But that explanation he found himself obliged to accept. Almost at the same time a fresh alarm met him. Lady Constance Spenser had contrived to withdraw the young Earl of March from Windsor, and to fly with him. She was shortly captured, and the young Prince brought back, but it was plain that the danger was great.

Battle of Shrewsbury.
July 23, 1403.

Submission of Northumberland
1404

Widespread conspiracy.

Flight of the young Earl of March.
1405.

In April the King went against Wales. His absence in that direction was at once taken advantage of by his northern enemies. The difficulty with which he could secure supplies was one of Henry's main obstacles to success, and in the last Parliament the opposition had been headed by Sir Thomas Bardolph. That gentleman now appeared in close conjunction with Northumberland, assisting him to garrison his fortresses. At the same time Mowbray, the son of that Duke of Norfolk with whom Henry had quarrelled at the time of his banishment, and Scrope, the Archbishop of York, the brother of that Lord Scrope who had been Richard's chancellor at the beginning of his reign, and whom that King had been forced to remove, joined the insurrection. The Earl of Westmoreland, who remained constantly faithful to Henry, was sent against them while Henry was engaged in Wales. Again, the royal army was too strong for the insurgents. Scrope and Mowbray were induced to disband their forces, and were then immediately apprehended. Gascoigne, the chief justice, was called upon to try them and convict them summarily. He was one of those constitutional lawyers who were gradually rising in England, and he refused to do so, pointing out that he should infringe the liberties both of the Church and the House of Lords. Henry found in Sir William Fulthorpe a more complacent judge. They were both beheaded, not without arousing, as Gascoigne had foreseen, the anger of the Lords. Upon the capture of his confederates, Northumberland fled with Bardolph to Scotland, but being refused an interview with the impostor, and mistrusting the honesty of Albany, he subsequently withdrew to Wales. It was there alone that the war continued, nor was it finally suppressed during the reign.

But, in the next two years, events occurred which at length placed Henry in a position of security. The friends of the Scotch King, fearing the ambition of Albany, which had already induced him to take the life of the Duke of Rothesay, the heir-apparent, determined to withdraw James, the King's second son and heir-apparent, from danger. He therefore took ship for France, but on the way was captured by English cruisers, and brought a prisoner to Henry, who grimly remarked that they might as well have sent him direct to him, as he could have taught him French quite well. He justified this boast; for though he kept the young Prince prisoner, he gave him an education which, upon his subsequent release, well fitted him for the throne he occupied. Henry had now in his hands pledges of

Renewed
activity of Northumberland,
Scrope and Mowbray.

Events which secured Henry's triumph.
1406.

Capture of James of
Scotland.

safety from all his enemies. The Earl of March was still with him; Murdoch of Fife, Albany's son, served as a hostage for his father; while James served as security from all attacks from the royalist party in Scotland. The following year (1407) was still more fortunate. The overweening vanity of Orleans, his licentiousness, which, it is said, did not even spare the young Duchess of Burgundy,

Murder of Orleans.
1407.

excited the anger of the Duke of Burgundy, the King's cousin, to such a degree, that he caused the Duke of Orleans to be murdered in the streets of Paris. Henry's chief enemy in France was thus removed. With Burgundy, who had lately inherited Flanders, and thus become the Prince of a trading nation and the champion of the city populations, he had much in common; and though he did not espouse his cause in any active manner, he felt secure from any immediate danger. Without his French allies, Owen Glendower was gradually driven back to the Final defeat and death of Northumberland.

mountains of North Wales, and in despair, Northumberland and Bardolph again appeared in the North, took arms, and were defeated and killed at Bramham. Thus safe on the side of France, with Scotland pledged to peace by the captivity of its princes, the Percies finally defeated, and Owen Glendower confined to the limits of the purely Celtic part of Wales, Henry was at length triumphant.

Henry's improved
position.

During the whole of these years of difficulty, the King had found it necessary to keep the Commons in good temper. Although he suffered from constant want of money, and in vain tried to induce his frequent Parliaments to act liberally towards him, he seems on no occasion to have employed illegal means for improving his position. It had become an accepted axiom, that consent of all the estates of the realm was necessary for the levying of taxes; and the Commons had made their position so good, that, in the very year of his final triumph, they ventured upon a quarrel with the Lords, claiming for themselves the exclusive right of originating grants, and insisting on the absence of the King while they were discussed. More than that, they had attempted, though unsuccessfully, to oblige the King to answer their petition of grievances before they made their grant, and succeeded in establishing the custom of appropriating their grants to special objects, and of paying them into the hands of treasurers of their own appointment. But their increase of power was chiefly visible in their interference with the royal expenditure and administration. In the fifth year of his reign, the King had been obliged to displace four of his ministers

His enforced respect for the Commons.

at the request of the Commons, to declare his intention of governing economically according to law, and to name his Privy Council in Parliament. And in the eighth year of his reign, when already he seemed upon the point of triumphing over his enemies, he was compelled to grant his assent to a petition of the Commons, which put as strict limitations upon his power as any to which Richard, even at the time of his greatest depression, had submitted. He had to name sixteen counsellors, by whose advice solely he was to be guided. His ordinary revenue was to be wholly appropriated to his household and the payment of his debts. No officer of the household was to hold his place for life or for a fixed term. The council was to determine nothing which the common law was capable of determining; and the elections of knights were regulated. At the head of this council was put the Prince of Wales.

Climax of their power 1407.

It is difficult to understand how the King should submit to this arrangement, which virtually established a strictly limited monarchy, just at the moment of his success. It is perhaps explained by his failing health. A disease had attacked his face, which changed into a form of leprosy, and during the remainder of his life he was subject to attacks of epilepsy. It was not unnatural that he should wish to withdraw somewhat from public affairs. Under these circumstances, it is not quite clear how far he is to be credited with the remaining events of his reign. But the prudence and state-craft exhibited in them, which could hardly have been expected from so young a man as Prince Henry, and the more vigorous opposition which he subsequently made to the demands of the Commons, would seem to show that he was still practically ruler. This restoration of vigour is marked by his refusal, towards the close of his reign, to grant any extension of the right of liberty of speech, and by the humble tone adopted by the Parliament in the thirteenth year of his reign, when he was entreated to declare that he was not offended, and that he regarded them as his loyal subjects.

Explained by
the King's failing health.

Renewed vigour
at end of reign.

Having secured his position at home, though not, as has been seen, without some sacrifices, the King's attention was chiefly directed towards securing the permanence of his dynasty by foreign matrimonial alliances, and to obtaining a strong position abroad by interfering in French politics. His two sisters were already respectively Queens of Castile and Portugal. He had himself married, in 1403, a Princess of Navarre. As

Henry's foreign policy.
Marriages.

a husband for his eldest daughter he procured Louis, Count Palatine, the son and heir of Rupert, King of the Romans; while his younger daughter married Eric, who had consolidated a great Scandinavian monarchy in the North.

In France he made his weight felt by alternately siding with one or other of the great parties which divided that kingdom. His natural connection would have been the Burgundians; and he first attached himself so far to that party as to send a considerable army to their assistance. A battle fought near St. Cloud (1411), in which the Armagnacs (as the friends of Orleans were now called) were worsted, for the time rendered the Duke of Burgundy the master of France. Henry chose this opportunity to change sides, and entered into an arrangement with the defeated princes, by which he was secured the full possession of Guienne. He intended at the same time to have led an army into France, and to have imitated the career of Edward III. The national danger produced a temporary friendship between the French parties, and Burgundy, at a meeting held at Auxerre, succeeded in persuading the Armagnacs to annul their arrangement with the English. Henry's health prevented him from leading the expedition, as he intended; but an army, under the Duke of Clarence, his second son, laid waste Maine and Touraine, and was only stopped by the payment of a large sum of money. After this Clarence withdrew to complete the conquest of Guienne. Thus, though unable to fulfil his ambitious project of invasion, Henry had contrived to make his position abroad very different from what it was at the beginning of his reign, when the French could refuse him the royal title, and paralyze his home policy by a threat of invasion.

Success of his policy.

From one point of view, as a usurper founding a new dynasty, he had now been quite successful. As a preserver of society, he probably regarded himself as not less so. Though the son of John of Gaunt, the favourer of Wicliffe, and not averse in his youth to the doctrines of that teacher, he had seen that Lollardism pointed, not only to ecclesiastical, but to political changes. From the beginning of the reign he had determined that the preservation of the Church in all its privileges and possessions was the surest means of checking the rising democracy. He had therefore been always its staunch supporter. In pursuance of this policy, in the second year of his reign, he had given his assent to a persecuting statute, formed, it seems probable, on the petition of the clergy, without the participation of the Commons. This statute, which is known under the title of "De Hæretico comburendo," forbade teaching and preaching without the license of a bishop, to whom also was given the right of condemning heretical books and writings, while the State undertook to carry out the bishop's sentence. Should any person thus condemned continue in his heresy, he was to be regarded as relapsed, and handed over to the civil arm, to be publicly burned. The first victim of this statute was William Sautré, at one time parish priest of Lynn, and involved in the treason of Kent and Huntingdon. On his persisting in the errors with which he was charged, the new law was carried into effect. The persecution once begun did not cease without more victims, and produced the effect, so common in cases of persecution, of driving the Lollards into further extremes of fanaticism. The germ of socialism which no doubt existed in the Lollard doctrine, and which showed itself in the constant demand for the abolition of the wealth of the clergy, alarmed the barons, and made them strong supporters of orthodoxy. The Commons, on the other hand, although they appear to have differed in feeling at different parts of the reign, were on the whole willing enough, while supporting orthodoxy of faith, to countenance the secularization of Church property. Indeed, they went so far in this direction, that in the year 1410, in answer to the reiterated request of the King for a settled yearly subsidy for his life, they pointed out to him the advisability of appropriating some of the ecclesiastical revenues, which would be enough, they said, to supply him with 15 earls, 1500 knights, and 6200 men-at-arms for military service. They begged also that those condemned for heresy might be withdrawn from the bishop's jurisdiction, and tried by secular courts.¹

His alliance with the Church.

Persecuting statute. 1401.

Views of the nation with regard to the Church.

The popularity of the Prince of Wales, his position as head of his father's Council, not unnaturally gave the King some uneasiness in his last years. It seems not improbable that, having been once put at the head of the Council, he virtually performed many of the duties of the Government. Documents are extant in which he seems to be regarded as the King's representative. Moreover, the course of events seems to show certain changes of policy which can be explained in this way. It is evident from his after policy, that he was much attached to the Burgundian party in France. We may therefore credit him with the assistance sent to them, which proved so useful to them at the Battle of St. Cloud, especially as the force was commanded by his friend, Sir John Oldcastle. The sudden change of foreign policy coincides in time with the King's altered tone in replying to the petitions of the Commons. These changes may very probably mark a determination on the part of the King to re-establish his authority, too much weakened by the position and popularity of the Prince. The stories of the Prince's wild life in London are mentioned by writers who are almost contemporary, yet do not seem to agree well with what is certainly known of his industry in public business. They, as well as the strange travesty of Oldcastle, a good soldier and stern religious enthusiast, into Shakspeare's jovial knight, Sir John Falstaff, are perhaps based on the malicious view taken by the orthodox of Oldcastle's religious tendencies. It is well known that one of the charges alleged against all enthusiastic religionists is immorality. Prince Henry's subsequent prosecution and punishment of Oldcastle would be represented as the discharge of his old favourites. The aspiring and dangerous character of the Prince, in the eyes of his father, is represented by the story which describes him as having taken the crown from his father's bedside during one of his fits, and placed it on his own head; and having answered to the remorseful observations of the King as to the unjust manner in which he had gained it, that he "was prepared to guard it against the world in arms." It is at all events certain that coolness existed between father and son at the close of the reign. The French expedition was intrusted, not to the Prince of Wales, but to the Duke of Clarence, and for the last year and a half Prince Henry was removed from his position as President of the Council. The disease which Henry's death had so long tormented Henry came to a fatal termination on the 20th of March 1413.

Henry's jealousy of the Prince of Wales.

¹ Walsingham, 379.

HENRY V.

1413-1422.

Born 1388 = Catherine of France.

Henry VI.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James I., 1405.	Charles VI., 1380.	Sigismund, 1410.	John II., 1406

POPES.—John XXII., 1410. Martin V., 1417.

Archbishops.	Chancellors.
Thomas Arundel, 1397. Henry Chicheley, 1414.	Cardinal Beaufort, 1413. Thomas Longley, 1417.

THE position of Henry V. on coming to the throne contrasts sharply with that of his predecessor. Henry IV., with disputed title, and in the midst of excited passions of faction, in which he had himself taken a prominent share, had to work out for himself the establishment of his dynasty and the restoration of political order. His son entered into the fruits of his labour. He had but to continue his father's policy. The dynasty seemed secure, the apparatus of government was in good working order, and the new King, already practised in the work of government, brought with him that popularity which brilliant qualities, a handsome person, and the vigour of youth, are sure to secure. The painstaking prudence of the late King, overshadowed as it was by his ill-health and gloomy character, was forgotten, and the hopes of the nation were fixed upon the fortunate youth whose faults as yet had been but those which are easily pardoned as the natural wildness incident to his age.

The young King seemed to please himself with the idea that his peaceful accession was to complete the healing of faction in the country, and to begin a period of glory and happiness. He made but few changes in the ministry of his father, but both Thomas Arundel, the Archbishop, and Sir William Gascoigne were removed from their offices. It is possible that they may have been the advisers of the late King during that period when he was at enmity with his son. Already, before his coronation, of their own free will the nobles did him homage; and his Parliament granted him without difficulty the tax on wool for four years. To complete the general harmony, he published an amnesty, dismissed many political prisoners, and the greater part of his Scottish captives, and entered into negotiations for the liberty of the Scotch King. He even went so far as to reinstate both the Earl of March, the real claimant to the throne, and Henry Percy, son of Hotspur, his father's persistent enemy, in their property and position. The body of Richard II. was removed from Langley, and honourably interred in Westminster. The past was, as it were, to be forgotten, and Henry would rule as the popular and accepted King of all parties.

In the midst of this show of security and peace there were, however, visible signs that his father's work was not yet completed. The royal favour shown to the Church and to the orthodox party during the last reign, and the persecution which had fallen upon heresy, had not by any means destroyed the Lollards. The same policy had still to be pursued. The religious, it might be called the bigoted, tendency of the house of Lancaster was very strong in the young King. He had been one of the chief petitioners against heresy in 1406, and had shared in and superintended some of the religious executions; especially is mentioned that of John Badby, in 1410. The Prince had interrupted this man's execution, and attempted the conversion of the half-burnt sufferer; finding him firm, however, he allowed the execution to be completed. This tendency induced him to enter into close alliance with the Church, and throughout his reign to adopt the language of religious enthusiasm, pretending to regard himself as the appointed instrument of God's vengeance on the sins of the French. He thus became the willing agent of the clergy in completing their persecution of the sectarians, and listened readily to the exaggerated reports for which the conduct of the Lollards afforded some ground. The head of this party was now Sir John Oldcastle, who sat as a Peer in right of his wife under the title of Lord Cobham. His castle of Cowling, in Kent, afforded shelter to their persecuted teachers, while his high character and old friendship with the King made his influence important. The Archbishop determined to attack this man, at first pretending that he desired his conversion only. He

General amnesty and release of prisoners.

Signs of slumbering discontent.

The Lollards.
1414.

placed in Henry's hands an heretical book which had been found in an illuminator's shop, and which belonged to Oldcastle. Henry tried first of all to argue with Oldcastle (who, however, denied having read the book), but could not convert him. The duties of friendship being now fulfilled, the Church was allowed to take the matter in hand. The heretic appeared several times before his judges, but firmly refused to depart from his points, that the Pope was Antichrist, and that in the Lord's Supper, though the body of Christ might be present, yet the bread was bread. This firmness produced the only possible result, and he was condemned to be burnt; but in the interval allowed him before the completion of his sentence, he managed to escape.¹

The attack upon their chief roused the Lollards, and they are said to have entered into a general conspiracy for surprising and mastering the King and his brothers at Eltham, during the festivities of Christmas. Henry had early news of a meeting which was to be held on the 7th of January 1414, in St. Giles' Fields. It is quite unproved how far the intentions of the conspirators really reached. Henry, with the Church behind him, was ready to believe anything. He feared, perhaps, an insurrection similar to Wat Tyler's. Causing, therefore, the gates of the city to be closed, he spread armed men round the place of meeting, and as the Lollards approached, singly or in small bodies, they were seized. The news that the King's forces were abroad soon spread, and prevented any great number from falling into his hands. A jury was hastily summoned to declare that Oldcastle had treasonable plans, and a price was set on his head. The same jury then proceeded to try the thirty-nine prisoners, all of whom were either hanged or burnt. This event was followed by a still stricter proscription of heretical preachers and books. Chicheley, who succeeded Arundel as Archbishop this year, followed in his predecessor's steps, and a statute was passed by which all judges and municipal authorities were bidden to apprehend and try Lollards, while conviction of heresy entailed confiscation of goods.

Henry prided himself on having won his first victory in the cause of the Church; but his naturally ambitious character led him to desire triumphs of another kind. It seems indeed as if a strange combination of motives impelled him to take the false step which gave the character to his reign, and

Henry's reasons for the impolitic
French war.

¹ Four years afterwards he was captured and put to death, not as a traitor, but as a heretic. This throws considerable doubt on the truth of his connection with the present insurrection, a charge which was very slightly supported by evidence.

plunged the country into a lengthy and ultimately disastrous war with France. His father is said to have urged him, with mistaken worldly wisdom, to withdraw the minds of his subjects from dangerous topics by filling them with thoughts of military glory. The Church, frightened by the suggestions of confiscation in the last reign, urged him to pursue the same course. The natural but mistaken admiration for military glory induced him to listen readily to their advice, while the wickedness and misery exhibited by the French nation at once afforded him an admirable opportunity, and may have suggested to his fanatical mind, that it was his duty to punish such vice, and to reduce such turbulence into order. Experience proved, as it often has proved, the mistake, nay, the wickedness, of averting domestic dangers by the wanton pursuit of warlike success. Meanwhile, at first, and during the whole of this King's short life, the step seemed perfectly successful. The reign, as a period of English history, is almost devoid of interest. The attention of the nation was centred in a French war.

Since the Duke of Clarence had secured Guienne the state of France had become only more deplorable. The Treaty of Auxerre produced no real union between the factions. There was a certain show of national action under the pressure of a threatened invasion from England; the King and the Great Council of France sat in Paris; the States General were summoned, and under the influence of the University certain reforms introduced. But the death of Henry IV. prevented for the time all danger of invasion; and the cause of union being removed, the factions again separated. The Duke de Guienne, the French King's eldest son, and representative of the crown during his father's fits of madness, was devoted to the wildest licentiousness, and disliked his gloomy father-in-law, John of Burgundy. He began to intrigue for the restoration of the Orleanist Princes. The ruffianly populace of Paris, headed by the guild of

Expulsion of the Burgundians
from Paris.

butchers, and led by Caboche, a skinner, were devotedly attached to the Burgundians. A fierce and murderous uproar arose; but its violence was such, that the better class of citizens were aroused, expelled the Cabochiens, who fled to the Duke of Burgundy, and readmitted the Armagnacs, as the Orleanists were now called. The counter-revolution was complete, the Armagnacs got possession of the government, attacked the Burgundian Duke, and drove him before them, till they were checked at Arras. A temporary

Attempt at national government.

truce was then patched up; but the Duke of Guienne soon after contrived for a moment to banish both parties from the capital, and to establish a sort of national government.

It was at this time that Henry V. began to meddle in French affairs. Already, during the retreat to Arras, Burgundy had opened negotiations with him, and these, in his anger against the Duke of Guienne, he now pressed still more warmly. Meanwhile, Henry negotiated also with the central authority in Paris. By this double negotiation, which included a plan for the marriage of Henry, on the one hand, with Catherine of France, and on the other, with Catherine of Burgundy, Henry made Burgundy neutral, while he pressed claims on the unfortunate French monarch of so outrageous a description, that he must have intended by securing their rejection to give himself a plausible ground for war. His first demand was nothing less than the cession of the whole French monarchy. When this was refused, his ambassadors restricted their demand to all the countries ceded to Edward III. by the Peace of Brétigny, as well as Normandy, the coast of Picardy, Anjou, Maine and Touraine, the suzerainty of Brittany and Flanders, 1,600,000 crowns, as the residue of King John's ransom, with the hand of the Princess Catherine, and a dowry of 2,000,000 crowns. The Duke of Berri, the King's uncle, was at that time the chief member of the government. He naturally refused Henry's enormous demands, but offered all the districts of Aquitaine to the south of the Charente, and 600,000 crowns as dowry for the Princess.

All this while, Henry continued his preparations, raised troops, borrowed ships from Holland and Zeeland, and summoned in April a great council of Peers.¹ He there declared his intention of seeking his rights in France, appointed his brother John, Duke of Bedford, Lieutenant of the kingdom, and fixed the conditions of the contracts which he made with nobles for supplying him with soldiers.² He arranged also the manner in which the spoil was to be divided, and other details for the supply of the army. The devotion of the Church was to supply him with the means of meeting these vast expenses. Archbishop Chicheley and the Churchmen, fearing, no doubt, the democratic tendencies of the Commons, were willing to make some sacrifice. They agreed that no foreigners should hold benefices, and thus allowed the King to use the incomes of all the priories of the foreign orders of the kingdom to the number of 122. The proceeds of this transaction, increased by loans from foreigners, the pawning of his jewels, and the pledging of the tax on wool, supplied him with finances. An embassy from France, with still larger offers, including Limousin, and a dowry of 800,000 crowns, produced no improvement in the relations between the two countries.

¹ There were fifteen Prelates and twenty-eight Temporal Peers at this council.

² A duke, 13s. 4d. a day; an earl, 6s. 8d.; a baron, 4s.; a knight, 2s.; a man-at-arms, 1s.; an archer, 6d.; a hundred marks to each who supplies thirty armed men.

Before Charles VI. could reply to the despatch of his ambassador, announcing the rejection of these terms, on the 3rd of August, the English army, of about 6000 men-at-arms and 24,000 archers, was already embarked. On the 14th of August it landed at the mouth of the Seine, where Havre de Grace now is. No steps were taken to prevent the disembarkation. The kingdom was in a state of fearful misery and disorder. The conduct of the war was given to the Armagnacs, Charles d'Albret was appointed constable; the Duke of Burgundy therefore held aloof, and the English had, in fact, only one half of the country against them.

An event had occurred before the English embarkation which, by proving to the King that his position was not so secure as he thought, may have made him still more determined in his present course. He was engaged at Southampton preparing his expedition, when a conspiracy was discovered, in which the King's cousin Richard, brother of the Duke of York, and lately created Earl of Cambridge, and one of his most trusted counsellors, Henry Scrope of Masham, were implicated. They were accused of an intention to take Edmund, Earl of March, with them into Wales, to crown him there, and declare him rightful King, if Richard were really dead. They had also summoned from Scotland Thomas of Trumpington, the false Richard. The Earl of Cambridge had married Ann of Mortimer, the sister of the Earl of March. We have here the beginning of that close union between the supporters of the legitimate line and the House of York, which again appears in the Wars of the Roses. Cambridge and Scrope were both executed.

Conspiracy of Cambridge.

The first place to be attacked was Harfleur; it was bravely defended by the garrison under the Sire d'Estouteville. The inhabitants were told by the Court to take courage and trust to the King, but no help was sent them, though 14,000 or 15,000 men were within reach. On the 22nd of September they were compelled to capitulate. The conquered town was treated as Calais had been; the wealthier inhabitants were put to ransom, the goods seized, the people given their choice of leaving the city or becoming English. But this success had been hardly earned, the losses both by sickness and in fighting had been great. A large number of invalids had to be sent back to England. With little more than half his army Henry could venture no further into France. He determined to march along the coast to Calais. The strictest discipline was maintained in the little band, and the King strove to foster in it a religious and enthusiastic spirit; pillage was punished with death; rations only were demanded from the inhabitants.

Henry had intended to cross the Somme at Blanchetaque, where Edward III. had passed it. False information was brought him that the ford was guarded. In reality, the feudal army was as yet only collecting near Abbeville, around the standard of the Constable d'Albret, a man but little fitted for his post. Had Henry passed at once he might have reached Calais without a great battle; as it was, he was compelled to follow the river upwards, and time was afforded to the French to collect their forces, and seek their own destruction in a pitched battle. Henry sought a ford across the river for a long time in vain. He passed Amiens, and had got within a league of Ham, in a very dangerous position among the strong fortresses of Ham, St. Quentin and Péronne, when at length a ford was discovered near Béthancourt. The Constable, who was at Péronne, might have destroyed him in the passage. He let him pass unmolested. Following feudal fashion, he sent to ask Henry to name a day and place for the battle; but whatever external chivalry may have been visible in Henry, his military character was that of a hard, practical, modern soldier. He answered that there was no need to name day or place, as he was always to be found in the open fields. For four days the armies followed almost parallel lines of march, the French making no use of their superiority in numbers to disturb the quiet advance of the English, although they spread nightly among the villages for shelter. At length the Constable, with singular want of prudence, took up his position a little to the north of Hesdin and Cressy, on a small confined plain, where his large army, of at least 50,000 fighting men, was jammed in between two woods. This force consisted almost entirely of nobles and their feudal followers, who in their foolish pride of class had rejected the assistance of the infantry of the towns. The ground was arable land, and the soil deep and heavy, so that the heavy armed French in their splendid harness sank deep at every step, while the English, clad mostly in leather jerkins, and many of them barefoot, moved with comparative ease. The night, we are told, was passed in riot by the French; in sober preparation or religious exercise by the English.

The French drew themselves up in three massive lines or battles;

Henry compelled to retire upon Calais.

the two first dismounted and fought on foot, for which their heavy armour but little fitted them; the third line retained their horses, as did two small wings intended to crush the archers. The state of the soil obliged them to adopt a defensive method of fighting quite contrary to their habits. The English advanced upon them—the archers in front, the heavy-armed infantry behind, the mixed archers and infantry on the flanks. They are described as having a miserable, ragged appearance after their weary march, as contrasted with the splendour of the French. Henry rode among them, cheering them with the memories of bygone victories. He had previously ordered every archer to supply himself with a stake sharpened at each end, which he was to plant before him, and thus make a moveable palisade. At eleven o'clock, after a brief and useless parley between the armies, Sir Thomas Erpingham, the English Marshal of the Host, tossed up his baton with the cry "Now strike," and the battle began. The English advanced a few steps, expecting a charge from the enemy, but the hostile ranks remained immovable; they were, in fact, planted knee-deep in the mud, and afforded a fine aim for the English archers, who did not spare them. At length, putting their heads down to avoid as much as possible the fatal arrows, the first line came heavily on, and the mounted wings began to close round the English; but the stakes of the archers served them in good stead. Of the horses, a large proportion tripped and fell in the rough ploughed land; not one in ten of their riders, we are told, came hand to hand with the archers. Unsupported and almost immovable, the infantry broke. The archers seeing their plight, issued from between their stakes, threw down bow and arrow, seized their axes and maces, and fell headlong upon them. "It seemed," says the chronicler, "as though they were hammering upon anvils." The men-at-arms fell beneath the furious charge, and were smothered by their own companions as they fell over them. The same fate awaited the second line. The English men-at-arms had come up to support the archers, and the battle was fiercer, and for a time more equal. Certain of the French knights, under the Duke of Alençon, swore to take the life of Henry, and did their best to keep their oath. One of them cleft in two the golden crown on the helmet worn by Henry, and Alençon killed his cousin, the Duke of York, at his side. It was in vain; the English steadily advanced; the defeat of the first line, the rush of the fugitives, disordered and confused the cavalry, and they turned and fled. The English were already masters of the field, when news was brought that a fresh

Battle of Agincourt.
Oct. 25, 1415.

enemy was in their rear, and flames were seen arising from the village of Maisonnelle behind them. Henry, afraid of this new attack, and of a rally of the fugitives, gave the terrible order that all the prisoners should be killed. When his troops hesitated, he told off 200 archers to do the work; and already very many had been killed in cold blood, when the discovery that the alarm was a false one induced Henry to revoke his order. Of the 10,000 Frenchmen who died 8000 were of noble blood; among them were the Dukes of Alençon, Brabant, and Bar, the Constable d'Albret, and all the chief officers of the army. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Counts of Vendôme and Richemont, and Marshal Boucicaut, with 15,000 knights, remained prisoners. Besides the Duke of York and the Earl of Oxford, the English had lost 1600 men. The King, with his triumphant army, at once proceeded to Calais, and thence to England. He attributed his wonderful success to Heaven, whose instrument he was in punishing the crimes in France. "Never," said he to the Duke of Orleans, "was greater disorganization or licentiousness, or greater sins, or worse vices than reign in France now. It is pitiful even to hear the story of them, and a horror for the listeners. No wonder if God is enraged at it."

The destruction of princes and feudal nobles at Agincourt seems to have annihilated the Armagnac party. The hatred of the Dauphin for the Duke of Burgundy prevented the unity which such an event might have produced. He summoned Bernard of Armagnac from the south of France, where he then was, and gave himself completely into his hands, making him Constable, Governor-General of the finances, and Captain of all the fortresses of France.

The party of the Constable, which had once been that of most of the princes of the royal blood, consisted now of adventurers, pledged to continue a civil war, to which they owed their importance. The real governors of France and Paris were the Gascon noble D'Armagnac and the Breton Tannegui Duchâtel. Their tyranny was of the bitterest description; their hired men-at-arms did all the harm an undisciplined soldiery can do; the people were taxed, in the midst of bitter famine, to the last farthing; their bloody tyranny induced them to forbid bathing in the Seine, lest the bathers should find there the corpses of their victims. The sole virtue of the party was that they continued the war with England, while Burgundy renewed his treaty with that nation. The Constable's efforts were not successful. An attempt to regain Harfleur was defeated by the Duke of Bedford.

The French Government falls into the hands of the Armagnacs.

But Henry for the present was content to stand on the defensive. The Parliament, in its enthusiasm at his great success, had granted him large subsidies, and the tax on wool for life; and he was spending his time in recruiting the strength of his army, and in giving a magnificent reception to Sigismund, King of the Romans.

That Prince had succeeded in re-establishing the obsolete supremacy of the head of the Roman Empire. This he had done by the activity and success with which he collected a general council of the Church at Constance. His object at the council was to heal the great schism, which since 1378 had divided the Church. On the death of Gregory XI., who had brought back the Papacy to Rome, after its seventy years' servitude to the French at Avignon, a double election took place, and the world was divided between Urbanists, who owned Urban VI., the Roman Pontiff, and the Clementines, who acknowledged Clement VII. of Avignon. Each Pope had his successors, and an attempted compromise at Pisa in 1409 had produced a third Pope. The three claimants to the honour were now Gregory XII. at Rome, Benedict XIII. at Avignon, John XXIII. at Pisa. The new council declared itself superior to all Popes, and proceeded to secure the dismissal or resignation of these three prelates. It also undertook to suppress the Wicliffite heresy, which had spread to Bohemia. Its efforts in this direction led to the condemnation and burning of John Huss and Jerome of Prague. The negotiations with Pope Benedict, who was acknowledged in Spain, were intrusted to Sigismund, who thus not unreasonably thought himself the arbiter of Europe, and determined to add to his ecclesiastical successes the healing of the war between France and England. For this purpose he passed through Paris, but met with indifferent success, and then betook himself to England. With Henry, as suppresser of heresy and champion of the Church, he had much in common, and he soon laid aside his position of arbiter to become an English partisan.¹ One incident of his visit is interesting, as marking both his position and the determined independence of the English. While in Paris he was present at a trial, and one party to the dispute seemed on the point of losing his case because he was not of knightly rank. Sigismund immediately knighted him. This interference was not pleasant to Visit of Sigismund. His position in Europe. 1416.

His close union with Henry.

¹ The close connection between Sigismund and England is illustrated by the fact that in the following reign, on one occasion, a magnificent table decoration was introduced, representing Henry VI. and Sigismund receiving at the hands of a kneeling priest ballads in derision of the Lollards.

the French, and gave rise to the idea that the Emperor was claiming universal supremacy. On his approach to England, therefore, one of the King's brothers and some other lords rode out into the water by the side of the ship, and there made him solemnly assert that he came as a friend, and claimed no jurisdiction in England.

Sigismund's efforts at procuring peace had been thwarted in Paris by the determination of D'Armagnac, whose position had become apparently more assured than ever. One after the other, Charles VI.'s two elder sons died, and his third son, Charles, who had been brought up by the Armagnac party, was now Dauphin. Besides the Constable, there was no one but his mother who had influence over him. That influence Bernard was determined to destroy. The avaricious character and licentiousness of the Queen afforded easy opportunity. He drove her into privacy at Tours, and seized her money. Henceforward she hated the Dauphin heartily, and was ready to do anything to injure him. Thus, when Burgundy approached Paris with an army, he was suddenly summoned to rescue the Queen from her captivity, and France became still more distinctly divided into the party of the Dauphin and the party of the Queen. Still further to complete the separation, and to give a shadow of legitimacy to their action, the Queen and Burgundy established a counter-Parliament at Amiens, and a rival Great Council of France. The civil war went on increasing in atrocity, and D'Armagnac was too hard pressed to interfere with Henry, who, on August 14th, landed at Honfleur for his second invasion, and proceeded to master Normandy. With Flanders, Artois and Picardy on the one hand rendered neutral by the friendship of Burgundy, and Brittany on the other under a truce with him, he could act at his ease. Caen, Bayeux, L'Aigle, were captured one after the other, and the next year, with four divisions spreading from Artois to Brittany, he pushed southward, conquering all the strong towns as he went. He was not a merciful conqueror. He exacted to the full the rights of war. Most of the towns were treated as Harfleur had been, but in nearly every case a certain number of the citizens were beheaded under the title of rebels.

It was impossible for the French parties, savage as they were, to look on calmly at the English successes; a great attempt at reconciliation was made, but again the obstinacy of the Constable brought it to nothing. The idea of mediation.

Failure of Sigismund's

Armagnac attacks Queen
Isabella.
1417.

She allies herself with Burgundy.

Henry's second
invasion.

The Parisians, anxious for peace, admit the Burgundians.

the cessation of the civil war had filled the Parisians with hope. The failure of that hope was more than they could bear. The keys of the gates were secured, and L'Ile-Adam, who commanded one of the garrisons which the Burgundians had pushed close to Paris, was admitted within the walls. The people rose in thousands upon their hated tyrants. Tannegui Duchâtel succeeded in saving the young Dauphin, and retired with him to Melun. Meanwhile, the prisons were crowded with captive Armagnacs, and a few days afterwards the passions of the extreme Burgundian partisans broke loose. The Cabochiens, who had lived as exiles in Burgundy, and returned with the Duke, again made their appearance. A fearful massacre took place at all the prisons; among the number slain was the Constable himself. From this time onward, the Armagnacs were spoken of as the Dauphinois; their leading spirit was Duchâtel, who followed closely in the footsteps of the late D'Armagnac. He would hear of no peace with Burgundy.

Yet that peace was terribly wanted, for Henry had now laid siege to Rouen, the capital of Normandy. The defence was in the highest degree gallant. Promises were given by Burgundy that help should be sent, but none came. At length a part of the garrison determined to cut their way through. When a portion of them had already crossed the bridge, it broke with the remainder, and the attempt had to be given up. Men charged Guy Bouteiller, the governor, and not unreasonably, with treacherously sawing the supports. At length all hope, unless succour arrived, was gone. Every eatable thing had been devoured. Hundreds of useless mouths had been driven without the walls, and not being allowed to pass the English lines, lay starving in the ditches. The extent of charity the garrison could afford to show, was to draw the new-born babes up the walls in baskets, to have them baptized, and then return them to their mothers to starve. Driven to extremities, the garrison sent deputies demanding assistance from the King, and threatening if it did not come to become his fiercest enemies. They were bidden to wait till the fourth day after Christmas. In spite of their miserable plight, they resolved to wait the fortnight that was left. On that day there arrived, not assistance, but a message from the Duke of Burgundy to make what terms they could with the King of England. They asked what those terms would be. He bade them surrender at discretion. But they knew his character too well to trust to his mercy, and resolved to fire the town and make their way out as they could. This threat brought Henry to reason, and for a ransom of 300,000 crowns he gave them the same sort of terms as he usually did. Seven men were excepted from pardon; of these all but one were ransomed. That one, Alain Blanchart, the King, ever unable to appreciate bravery in an enemy, caused to be beheaded.

Fall of Rouen.
Jan. 15, 1418.

At length it seemed as though the French factions had come to an understanding; the cry of the whole nation was too strong to resist. A truce was made between the parties for three months, and the Duke of Burgundy, with the Queen and the King, who had been in their custody since the recapture of Paris, met Henry at Meulan, and attempted to come to terms. But Henry still demanded more than it was possible to grant. Burgundy therefore withdrew in anger, and at Pouilli-le-Fort held a personal meeting with the Dauphin, and apparently came to terms with him. The show of friendship was only hollow. Shortly after, at the instigation of Duchâtel, a second meeting was demanded at Montereau sur Yonne. It was nothing but an ambush. The meeting was to be held on the bridge, and barricades were to keep back all but ten partisans of either side; but no sooner was the Duke with two followers within the barrier than Tannegui Duchâtel shut the door on that side, while from the other end the Dauphinois crowded in. The Duke was there murdered, and of his following one man alone escaped.

Negotiation for peace.
Attempted reconciliation of the French parties.

Murder of Burgundy.

The effect of this murder was instantaneous. The son of Jean sans peur, Philip, Count of Charolais, at once put himself at the head of his party, and forgetting everything but revenge, opened negotiations with the English. On October 17th, the plenipotentiaries met at Arras, and the preliminaries of the treaty were drawn up; by which Henry was to marry Catherine of France, and to be recognised as heir after the death of the reigning king. Meanwhile he was to have the administration of the country. All the exchange asked was, that he would make no peace with the Dauphin, and join in carrying on war with that Prince. These preliminaries were to be ratified by the King, the Queen, and States General. The King's imbecility prevented any opposition from him, and the Queen was only too glad of an opportunity of disinheriting her son; she calculated that at least her daughter Catherine, whom she loved dearly, would enjoy the crown. An unexpected consequence followed this treaty, which was completed at Troyes. This was the resurrection of the party of the Dauphin, which henceforward became the national party. Henry was at once called upon to give vigorous assistance, and found occupation for all his army at the siege of Melun, which was defended with extreme courage. But in December he found an opportunity of making a triumphal entry into Paris, where his stern and haughty manner, and "his words which cut like razors," won him but little favour; and thence he passed to England to meet a magnificent reception with his wife.

Young Burgundy joins England. Treaty of Troyes, 1420.

He there heard bad news. One of the signs of the renewed activity of his enemies had been a treaty with Castile, and the employment of the Castilian fleet. Already, in the preceding year, the Spanish fleet had defeated the English, and then proceeding to Scotland, had returned with a reinforcement of some 4000 men under the Earl of Buchan and Lord Stewart of Darnley. Strengthened with these troops, the Dauphin's party had attacked the English in the west. Clarence, the King's brother, who had been left in charge of the kingdom, advanced to meet them. The armies encountered at Beaugé in Anjou, and there, forgetting the national tactics, and neglecting the use of the archers, they suffered a complete defeat, in which the King's brother was killed. It was the first reverse the English arms had met with, and Henry well understood the moral effect it might have. He hastened at once to France, and leaving alone for the present the disaffection which was showing itself in Picardy, went direct to Paris to re-establish his prestige. Thence he marched to the attack of Meaux, whence an Armagnac garrison was pillaging the country to the very gates of Paris. It was under the command of the Bastard of Vaurus, a savage soldier, who delighted to hang his prisoners by dozens on the branches of a large elm outside his town. The bravery of his defence equalled his barbarity. It was not without the greatest efforts that the town and castle, called the Marché, were reduced.

English defeat at Beaugé.

Henry hurries to Paris.

Meanwhile the war had broken out again in Burgundy, and Henry was summoned to the support of his allies at the siege of Cosne. He would not send help, he said, but would come at the head of his whole army. The boast was a vain one. His army, indeed, set out under the command of the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Warwick, but the King's health, which had been failing for the last two years, quite broke down, and the generals were hastily recalled to be present at the deathbed of their sovereign, who died on the 31st of August 1422. Conscious of his approaching end, he had made dispositions to meet it; he had laid special stress on the continuation of the treaty with Burgundy; had begged Bedford never to make peace under less advantageous terms than the entire cession of Normandy; had intrusted the regency of

While re-establishing his affairs he dies. 1422.

France to the same brother should the Duke of Burgundy decline it ; put England into the hands of Gloucester ; and intrusted the education of his infant son to Warwick. He then died amid all those signs of religious enthusiasm which had marked his life, declaring that he had intended to lead a crusade to Jerusalem, and covering all remorse, which his cruel war might well have excited, by the thought that he had acted with the approbation of those most holy men the English bishops. Stern, haughty, an un pitying soldier, he had yet by his exhibition of firm justice and love of order gained the admiration and respect, if not the love, of his new subjects ; and Englishmen forgot his reactionary policy, and misjudged the want of wisdom in his foreign undertakings, amid the enthusiasm his successful career excited. Very shortly after his conqueror, the old King Charles VI. also died, and his son Charles became the representative of the French monarchy. He caused himself to be at once crowned at Poitiers ; but the English failed to recognise his title, and spoke of him as the Dauphin.

HENRY VI.

1422-1461.

Born 1421 = Margaret of Anjou, 1445.

Edward. Died.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James I., 1406.	Charles VI., 1380.	Sigismund, 1410.	John II., 1406.
James II., 1436.	Charles VII., 1423.	Albert II., 1438.	Henry IV., 1454.
		Frederick III., 1440

POPES.—Martin V., 1417. Eugenius IV., 1431. Nicolas V., 1447. Calixtus III., 1455
Pius II., 1458.

Archbishops.

Henry Chicheley, 1414.
John Stafford, 1443.
John Kemp, 1452.
Thomas Bouchier, 1454.

Chancellors.

Thomas Longley, 1417.
Cardinal Beaufort, 1424.
Cardinal Kemp, 1426.
John Stafford, 1432.
Cardinal Kemp, 1450.
Earl of Salisbury, 1454.
Cardinal Bouchier, 1455.
William Waynflete, 1456.
George Neville, 1460.
Sir John Fortescue, 1461.

BY the fiction of the English constitution, England was now governed by a child of nine months old. The late King had thoughtfully arranged for the government by the nomination of Gloucester to the regency in England, Bedford to the regency in France ; but experience of former regencies, and the constant adherence to constitutional forms which marked the English nobility, led the Privy Council to make different arrangements. It was determined, in fact, that the Council should be virtually the governing body. This was in accordance with several precedents ; even as late as the reign of Henry IV., a council named in Parliament had, during the last years of that monarch's life, governed England. When the hero, whose popularity and ability had for a time carried all men with him, was dead, it was natural that the kingdom should fall back into the same system of government. In the first Parliament therefore, by the advice of the Council, Bedford was made Regent of both France and England, while to Gloucester was given the title of Defender or Protector of the kingdom.

Arrangements of the kingdom.
1422.

which amounted to little more than the position of President of the Council, by whose advice he was bound to act, and of which the members were nominated in Parliament. After this, the grant of the wool tax and of tonnage and poundage, for two years, closed the session.

All interests were still centred in France. To all appearance, both in geographical position and in the talents of their leader, the advantage lay with the English. Bedford shared all the better qualities of his elder brother; as able, both as a general and a statesman, he was of a gentler and a finer character; on the other hand, the Dauphin Charles was a man without vigour, sunk in sensual pleasure, and still under the influence of unprincipled adventurers. His possessions, too, were much restricted. He found himself confined to the centre and south-east of France. It was only from south of the Loire to Languedoc that his power was unquestioned. Either England or its great ally Burgundy possessed or dominated all other parts of France; while Savoy and Brittany, at the extreme and opposite corners, were professedly neutral. The strength of this position, such as it was, lay in its central situation. The immense extent of country the English held required resources beyond the power of that country single-handed to produce; by alliance with Burgundy alone was it possible. But misgovernment and party feeling prevented any great exhibition of strength on the part of France. She had to rely chiefly on mercenaries, and the war was merely kept alive. In 1423, Bedford succeeded in forming anew a close alliance with Burgundy, in which Brittany also joined. It was cemented by a double marriage; on the one hand, Bedford married Anne, Philip's sister, while Arthur of Richemont, the brother of the Duke of Brittany, married her elder sister Margaret.

Position of parties in France.

Bedford's marriage.
1423.

The treaty was scarcely finished when Bedford had to move southward to relieve Crévant on the Yonne, closely besieged by the Scotch and French. The expedition was very successful. A simultaneous attack from the city and the relieving army destroyed the besiegers; 1200 knights, chiefly Scotch, were said to have been left on the field. But fresh recruits were continually coming to the French, some from Italy, some from Scotland; notably 5,000 men under Archibald Douglas, who was raised to the Duchy of Touraine; while Stewart of Darnley, their former leader, received the lordships of Aubigné and of Dreux. Bedford attempted to cut off this source of help by arranging for the release of the Scottish King, who had now been twenty-four years a captive in England. In

Release of the
Scotch King.

September 1423, his freedom was arranged, on the payment of £10,000 for his past expenses, and upon a promise on his part that he would keep peace with England, and marry an English lady. He was told to choose his own wife, as English ladies were not in the habit of proposing for husbands, and married Joan Beaufort, daughter of the Earl of Somerset, granddaughter of John of Gaunt. He did his best, though not always successfully, to keep his promise of peace. But this step on the part of Bedford did not stop the Scotch in France. They pushed on even to the borders of Normandy, and captured Ivry. Bedford addressed himself to the recovery of that fortress. 18,000 troops, Scotch, French, and Italians, led by the Duke of Alençon and Earl of Buchan, now Constable of France, marched to relieve it. This they were unable to do, but revenged themselves by the capture of the neighbouring town of Verneuil. Thither the Regent pursued them, and there he brought them to action. It was the old story over again. The French had not yet learnt wisdom by experience; and again the mass of heavy-armed foot, with cavalry on the flanks, was shattered by the English archers from behind their impenetrable wall of pointed stakes. The Scotch auxiliaries were nearly destroyed; and among the 5000 dead were the Earls of Douglas, Buchan and Aumale. The victory was likened in Parliament to the Battle of Agincourt. Its effects were almost as complete. For the time the French had to withdraw completely behind the Loire.

It was the unbridled folly of Gloucester which disturbed the favourable position which Bedford had secured. The Countess Jacqueline of Hainault and Holland had married John of Brabant, and had fled from her husband. She had taken refuge in England, and just before the death of Henry V., Gloucester, during the life of her former husband, had taken her for his wife. The Duke of Burgundy was the cousin and close ally of John of Brabant, and had hoped to bring all the Netherlands under his power by his kinsman's marriage with Jacqueline. Gloucester would hear of no compromise, but, in 1424, appeared with 5000 English troops in Calais, and took possession of Hainault. Philip of Burgundy at once wavered in his friendship for England, drew closer his connection with Brabant, and even procured a truce with the Dauphin. Preparations for a duel, to which he had challenged Burgundy, called Gloucester home. The immediate effect of his departure was the

It is useless.

Battle of Verneuil.
1424.

Consequent strength of the English
in France.

It is disturbed
by Gloucester's
marriage.
First blow to Burgundian alliance.
1424.

occupation of Hainault by John of Brabant. Jacqueline herself was taken prisoner, but managing to escape in man's clothes, she reached her other dominions in Holland, and thence proceeded to begin a war with Burgundy. Her English lover could send her but little help, and at last, after her husband's death in 1428, she surrendered to Philip, and declared him her heir. Gloucester's infidelity broke off relations between them, and eventually, in 1436, the whole of the Netherlands came into the power of Burgundy. It has been said that, without the friendship of Burgundy, the English resources were insufficient to retain France. This was the first shock that friendship received.

This outbreak of Gloucester's was but one instance of his intemperate and ambitious character. At home, he had already involved the government in difficulties, by his constant rivalry with Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, second son of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swinford. This Prince had already been engaged in all the prominent affairs of the last reign. But though a man of vast wealth and large ambition, his aspirations in England were rather for his family than for himself; and in the financial difficulties which began to beset England his money was freely advanced without interest to Government. In 1424, he had been made Chancellor, for the express purpose of counterbalancing the power of his nephew Gloucester, and in pursuance of this object, he had, during Gloucester's absence in Hainault, garrisoned the Tower, from which Gloucester on his return found himself excluded. This produced an open quarrel and an appeal to arms, only repressed by the intervention of the Prince of Portugal, at that time in England. There was one man only who could decide this quarrel, and that was the Duke of Bedford, who on coming to England would at once become the constitutional Regent. He found it therefore necessary to leave France, where he was much wanted, and to return to England. He contrived to bring about a reconciliation, at a Parliament held at Leicester. The Bishop of Winchester, from patriotic motives, resigned his chancellorship, and got leave to absent himself from England to go on a pilgrimage. At the same time, the Parliament defined as before the power of Gloucester, establishing the practical supremacy of the Council. This definition Bedford accepted. Eventually, though much against his will, Gloucester was induced to do so also; but his real view was expressed in the words attributed to him, "Lat my brother governe as hym lust, whiles he is in this lande, for after his going overe to Fraunce, I wol governe as me semethe goode."

Rivalry of Beaufort and Gloucester.

It was plain that the views of Bedford and Gloucester as to the government of England were very different. Nor had Bedford long left England to return to France when his brother gave rise to a fresh scandal. He had already forgotten Jacqueline, and even while getting supplies from the Commons, with whom he was very popular, for the purpose of upholding her cause, had married his former mistress Eleanor Cobham.

Gloucester's
marriage with Eleanor Cobham.

On his return to France, the Duke of Bedford found that his brother's conduct had increased his difficulties. Richemont, the brother of the Duke of Brittany, had been won to the French side, and received the rank of Constable, vacant by the death of Buchan, and was now using all his influence to induce his brother-in-law Burgundy to follow his example. Bedford's presence for the moment improved the position of the English. He contrived to renew an alliance with both Burgundy and Brittany, and was thus secured upon either side of Normandy. Encouraged by this success, the English generals were eager to press forward beyond the Loire, which had hitherto been the limit of their conquests. It seems probable that Bedford, with a clearer view of the difficulties of his position, would have been well content to have carried out the wishes of his brother Henry by securing Normandy. He, however, yielded to the pressure brought to bear upon him, and in October, the siege of Orleans, situated on the northernmost angle of the river Loire, and from its position holding command of that river, was undertaken. The town itself stands upon the northern bank, but is connected with a southern suburb, the Portereau, by a bridge, terminating in a strong castle called Les Tournelles. The siege was intrusted to Salisbury,¹ who began the attack upon the southern side. He established his troops in a fortified camp in the ruins of a monastery of Augustinians, and before long succeeded in capturing Les Tournelles, and breaking the bridge. He was unfortunately killed, while examining the country from that fortress, with a view to further investment of the town. The command devolved upon the Earl of Suffolk, who succeeded before the close of the year in erecting a string of thirteen strongholds, called bastides, round the Northern city. But the weather and want of resources compelled him to put Bedford again secures Burgundy,

and attacks
Orleans.

¹ This Lord Salisbury was son of Sir John de Montacute, a zealous Lollard, the faithful adherent of Richard II. who was beheaded, 1400, at Cirencester. Henry IV. restored the Earldom to his son. Lord Salisbury's daughter married Richard Neville, the Yorkist partisan, and father of the Kingmaker Warwick.

these too far apart, and the intercourse of the defenders with an army of relief under the Count of Clermont at Blois was not broken off. Early in the following year, this army hoped to raise the siege by falling on a large body of provisions coming to the besiegers from Paris under Sir John Fastolf. The attack was made at Rouvray, but Fastolf had made careful preparations. The waggons were arranged in a square, and, with the stakes of the archers, formed a fortification on which the disorderly attack of the French made but little impression. Broken in the assault, they fell an easy prey to the English, as they advanced beyond their lines. The skirmish is known by the name of the Battle of the Herrings. This victory, which deprived the besieged of hope of external succour, seemed to render the capture of the city certain.

Already at the French King's court at Chinon there was talk of a hasty withdrawal to Dauphiné, Spain, or even Scotland; when suddenly there arose one of those strange effects of enthusiasm which sometimes set all calculation at defiance.

In Domrémy, a village belonging to the duchy of Bar, the inhabitants of which, though in the midst of Lorraine, a province under Burgundian influence, were of patriotic views, lived a village maiden called Joan of Arc. The period was one of great mental excitement; as in other times of wide prevailing misery, prophecies and mystical preachings were current. Joan of Arc's mind was particularly susceptible to such influences, and from the time she was thirteen years old, she had fancied that she heard voices, and had even seen forms, sometimes of the Archangel Michael, sometimes of St. Catherine and St. Margaret, who called her to the assistance of the Dauphin. She persuaded herself that she was destined to fulfil an old prophecy which said that the kingdom, destroyed by a woman—meaning, as she thought, Queen Isabella,—should be saved by a maiden of Lorraine. The burning of Domrémy in the summer of 1428 by a troop of Burgundians at length gave a practical form to her imaginations, and early in the following year she succeeded in persuading Robert of Baudricourt to send her, armed and accompanied by a herald, to Chinon. She there, as it is said by the wonderful knowledge she displayed, convinced the court of the truth of her mission. At all events, it was thought wise to take advantage of the infectious enthusiasm she displayed, and in April she was intrusted with an army of 6000 or 7000 men, which was to march up the river from Blois to the relief of Orleans. When she appeared upon the scene of war, she supplied exactly that element of success

Battle of the Herrings.

Danger of Orleans.

Joan of Arc.

which the French required. Already long and bitter experience had taught them the art of war. They were commanded no longer by favourites of the Court, but by professional soldiers, such as Dunois, the Bastard of Orleans, La Hire and Saintrilles; and the cause of their weakness was the deep-rooted immorality both of public and private life, which the disastrous party struggles of the last reign had produced. A national instead of a party cry, strict morality enforced by a Heaven-sent virgin, and the enthusiasm of religion, were well calculated to remove this cause of weakness. It is to this combination of experience with enthusiasm that the success of the French henceforward must be traced. Aided by the skill of Dunois, Joan succeeded in entering Orleans by water, while her army the day after marched in unopposed upon the northern side. After various attacks upon the Bastides, she at length, on the 6th and 7th of May, attacked the lines upon the south of the river. The camp in the Augustinian monastery was captured, and after a fierce assault the Tower of the Tournelles fell into the hands of the French, Gladsdale, the commander on the left bank, being killed. The effect of her uniform success, and the superstitious dread she inspired, is shown by the fact that three such generals as Suffolk, Talbot and Fastolf, who commanded on the northern side of the river, took no steps to assist their distressed comrades, and on the following day raised the siege.

Causes of her success.
The siege is raised.
May 8.

The release of Orleans was quickly followed up. The English were hotly pressed. In June, Jargeau on the Loire was taken, and Suffolk with it; while on the 18th of the same month, Talbot and Fastolf suffered a thorough defeat at Pataye, while attempting to save other fortresses lower down the river. Joan of Arc had set herself two great duties to perform—the relief of Orleans, and the coronation of the Dauphin at Rheims. To this second duty she now addressed herself. Her difficulties arose chiefly from the folly of the Dauphin, who was under the influence of his favourite, La Tremouille, a strong Armagnac, whose object it was to prevent his master from entering upon an independent course of action. These difficulties were at length overcome. At the head of a small army, Charles and the Maid of Orleans marched successfully into the heart of their enemy's country, securing either by force or by negotiation the strong cities on the way. At Rheims the coronation was completed, and thence the French generals directed their march on Paris at the persuasion of Joan. But there, while Joan had been overcoming the reluctance of the French Prince, Bedford had assembled an army of sufficient strength to resist them. He had summoned to his aid the Bishop of Winchester, who had returned from his pilgrimage to Rome with instructions to collect troops to assist the Emperor Sigismund against the heretic Hussites of Bohemia. With this little army he now joined his nephew; and Bedford, alarmed by the rapid defection of great towns such as Blois, Beauvais and Compiègne, determined, if possible, to destroy the superstitious confidence of the French by a successful battle. In this he was disappointed, for, after an indecisive skirmish near Senlis, he was compelled to fall back to cover Paris. For the present, however, this formed the limit of the French successes. A fruitless attack on the city, in which the Maid was wounded, caused timid counsels to prevail, and the army withdrew behind the Loire.

March to Rheims to crown the Dauphin.

and unsuccessful attack on Paris.

The winter was employed by Bedford in continued efforts to retain the friendship of the Duke of Burgundy; and the united armies of Burgundy and England were attempting to regain Compiègne, when in March Joan of Arc again took the field. She succeeded in passing through the two armies, and in entering the city, but was surprised during a sally and taken prisoner. Her capture gave the English hopes that they might still retain their conquests, as the sluggish and vacillating character of the French King was well known. Bedford set to work to do all he could to regain the prestige he had lost the preceding year. Shortly after the coronation of Rheims, he had caused King Henry to be crowned at Westminster, and with his brother Gloucester had retired from his official situation. He now determined to have the coronation repeated in France. Henry was brought over for that purpose, but it was found impossible to crown him at Rheims, now completely in the hands of the French. Bedford had to content himself with a coronation at Paris. Meanwhile the unfortunate prisoner had been given up to be tried as a sorceress. She was found guilty, and handed over to the secular arm; for a moment she was induced to confess herself guilty, abjuring the truth of her Divine calling; her resumption of arms in the prison was regarded as a relapse into heresy: she was therefore burnt at Rouen. The strangely superstitious character of the age, and the devout belief which existed in sorcery, cannot excuse what was, in fact, an act of base revenge.

Capture of Joan of Arc.
1430.

Coronation of King Henry.

Joan's death.
1431.

From this time onwards the fortunes of England declined. Difficulties accumulated on all sides. The long war had caused such a drain on the finances, that the payment of the troops had already been lowered, and a dangerous mutiny had broken out at Calais. At the same time, Gloucester's meddlesome and overbearing character perpetually kept the Government at home in disturbance. In 1428, an attack was made on the Bishop of Winchester. He had returned from Rome a Cardinal, and with the rank of Papal Legate for the purpose of collecting troops against the Hussites. His authority thus clashed with that of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was ex officio Legate when no one else was specially appointed to that office. Displeased at being superseded, Chicheley joined with Gloucester, and suggested that Winchester, by becoming Legate without royal permission, had incurred the penalties of præmunire. Winchester was therefore excluded from the Council, and from the Chapter of the Garter, of which he was the Prelate, held in 1429. His place in the Council was restored to him in gratitude for his conduct in the following year, when he lent troops to Bedford after the relief of Orleans. Nevertheless, during his absence in 1431, he was asked to resign his bishopric, as being the officer of a foreign power, and Gloucester brought formal charges against him, and caused the writ of præmunire to be actually prepared. The execution of the writ was postponed till the King's return, when Beaufort was allowed to clear himself, and a declaration vouching for his loyalty given him under the Great Seal. While thus attacking the Cardinal, Gloucester

Conduct of Gloucester.

had been attempting to increase his popularity, already very great, by assuming the position of champion of the Church, and persecutor of heresy. In 1430, a man calling himself Jack Sharpe had been put to death at Oxford, and a clergyman of Essex had also been burnt. But there was evidently still existing a strong undercurrent of Lollardism; for the people came in crowds to the place of execution, and made offerings as though the victim of persecution had been a saint. But even worse for Bedford than these troubles at home was the loss of his wife, who died in November 1432, childless, thus breaking the strongest link which had hitherto bound England and Burgundy together. This misfortune was made worse by one of the few acts of indiscretion which can be alleged against Bedford. He married Jacquetta, daughter of the Count of Saint-

Bedford
re-marries.
Second blow to the Burgundian
alliance.

Pol, of the House of Luxembourg, a marriage in itself politic enough, but which, contracted as it was without the permission of Burgundy, the lady's feudal superior, caused a quarrel between the two Dukes. This was the second heavy blow which the alliance between England and Burgundy had received. Yet this alliance was absolutely necessary for the successful carrying on of the war. It began to be a question whether peace of some sort was not becoming necessary. Bedford even in the year 1431 received leave from the English Parliament to treat. Abroad the feeling in favour of peace was still stronger. Pope Eugenius IV. had set seriously to work to put an end to the warfare. The Emperor Sigismund, with Frederick of Austria and Louis of Orange, alarmed at the rising power of the Burgundian House, had made offers of assistance to the French King. The Bretons, headed by the Count of Richemont, were anxious to renew their natural alliance with France. Burgundy himself, in 1432, had gone so far as to make an armistice with the French; the presence at the French Court of La Tremouille, one of the murderers of the Duke's father and the constant supporter of the war, seemed the only obstacle to reconciliation: if that reconciliation were made Bedford must of necessity make peace. Other difficulties were leading him in the same direction. The finances were in the greatest disorder; the garrison of Calais mutinied for pay. Bedford therefore, in 1433, returned to England to see what could be done. He made Lord Ralph Cromwell his treasurer, and intrusted him with the duty of examining and making a statement as to the condition of the finances. It became apparent that the yearly outgoing exceeded the income by £25,000. Bedford at once insisted on economy, and patriotically gave up a considerable portion of his own salaries. But the discovery of his failing resources, the necessity for his presence in England, where Lords and Commons united in intreating him to remain, the increase of the power of France, and the constant danger of reconciliation between Charles and Burgundy, induced him to be quite ready to make arrangements for a peace on honourable terms which should include the possession of Normandy. Such views did not suit Gloucester. He put himself prominently forward as the head of the war party, producing a great but impracticable plan for pressing the war with vigour. Bedford's residence in England was short. During his absence all went wrong; St. Denis was lost, and the Earl of Arundel taken prisoner. He was forced to return to France, and to leave the parties in England (now clearly defined as peace and war parties) to carry on their quarrels. But the general feeling for the necessity of peace, and for the release from their long imprisonment of the captives taken at Agincourt, gained ground abroad. So much was this the case that Burgundy found means to assemble

Formation of peace and war parties.

on the 14th of July what may be fairly called a European congress, at Arras, to settle if possible the peace of Europe. Thither came ambassadors from the Council of Bâle, (at that time sitting,) the Legate of the Pope, and ministers from the Emperor, Castile, Aragon, Navarre, Portugal, Naples, Sicily, Poland, Denmark, the Parisian University, and the great commercial towns of the Hansa and of Flanders. Archbishop John of York at first represented England. The Duke of Bourbon, who had already entered into agreement with Burgundy, represented France. Even on their first appearance, the English ambassadors were displeased with the precedence given to the French. The rival demands were these :— France wished either for a peace with Burgundy, and the continuation of the war with England, or if there was a cessation of that war, that the peace should be unconditional, with the restoration of all prisoners and all conquests, the three Norman bishoprics alone being left to the English, and those only as fiefs of the French crown; the English demanded the retention of their present possessions and an armistice. The pretensions of the two nations were evidently incompatible; even Cardinal Beaufort, who had joined the congress, was afraid of the war party at home, and on the 6th of September the English embassy withdrew.

At this inopportune moment an event happened which settled the wavering mind of Burgundy, and induced him to make a full reconciliation with the French. This event was the death of the Duke of Bedford. There was no one to fill the place of that great man. It had been his personal influence more than anything else which had kept Burgundy true to England. On his death the Duke at once declared himself ready to receive the terms which France offered. These were humiliating enough. Charles apologized for the death of Duke John, declared that he held the act in abhorrence, that he had been brought to consent to it by the advice of wicked ministers, and would henceforward exclude all Armagnacs from his council. At the same time he granted to Burgundy, Macon and Auxerre, together with the basin of the Somme, or Ponthieu. At first, news of this treaty served only to arouse the warlike feeling of the English. The appearance of the Burgundian envoy in London was the signal for violent riots. It was determined to prosecute the war with vigour. A great loan was raised throughout the country, and the prosecution intrusted to the young Duke of York. It was not to be expected that this young prince, however great his ability, could do what Bedford congress at Arras.

Great peace
1435.

Bedford's death.
Consequent
defection of Burgundy.

Obstinacy of the war party.

had been unable to accomplish. United with Burgundy, England had scarcely held its position in France. Against France and Burgundy united, it was helpless.

Already before York's arrival a great piece of Normandy, and even Harfleur, had been lost. In April the French King, with Burgundy, advanced on Paris, and was admitted by the townspeople. The war party grew only more obstinate. Gloucester revived his absurd claims upon Flanders in right of Jacqueline, and assumed the title of Count of Flanders. York and Talbot succeeded in driving back the Burgundians from Calais; but this was almost the only English success. In July 1437, York was recalled, and Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick,¹ appointed in his place. But it was too late for any one to check the advance of the French. That country was indeed exhausted and miserable to the last degree; but England was in little better plight. For several years the plague had been raging, and an unusually bad harvest added to the horrors of disease. Bread there was none, the people were reduced to live on pulse.

Moreover, the English forces were divided by the threatening aspect of affairs in Scotland. The young King had done his best to keep his promise of peace, but found it impossible to break off the long-standing connection with France. In 1428, his daughter Margaret had been betrothed to Charles VII.'s son, Louis of Anjou. This had excited the fears of the English, and in the following year, the Bishop of Winchester, under the plea of collecting help for his proposed crusade against the Hussites, had visited Edinburgh. A marriage treaty had even been proposed between the two countries, but it came to nothing, and a vigorous diplomatic struggle was still being carried on between the rival parties of France and England, when, in 1434, the folly of Sir Robert Ogle, who led a raid into the Scotch Lowlands, turned the scale in favour of the French. The marriage between Margaret and Louis of Anjou was at once carried out, and, in 1436, an army, with King James at its head, attacked Roxburgh. Fortunately for England, the Scotch King, bred at the Court of Henry V., and eager to introduce into his own kingdom the orderly constitution he had known in England, had excited the anger of his nobles. News of a conspiracy reached him, and he withdrew from his invasion only to fall a victim to that conspiracy in the following

¹ This Beauchamp was the 5th Earl of Warwick, and it was his daughter who carried the title to Richard Neville the Kingmaker.

Continued ill success.
1437.

Danger from
Scotland.

James's death.

year. Weakened by these domestic confusions, Scotland was content to enter into a truce for ten years.

Neither the suffering of the people, nor the danger from Scotland, nor the constant want of success abroad, had any influence on the

Peace party procure the liberation of Orleans.
1440.

passionate obstinacy of Gloucester. Meetings with regard to peace were in vain held at Paris, the English refused to recede from their demands. At length, however, Cardinal Beaufort and the peace party so far prevailed, that, after the fall of Meaux, they procured the liberation of the Duke of Orleans, hoping to find in him an efficient mediator. As a protest against the measure, while the Duke was taking the oaths required of him before his liberation, Gloucester, refusing to be present, betook himself to his barge and remained upon the river. The measure did not produce the desired effect. The Duke of Warwick had died in May 1439. Somerset, who had succeeded him, retook Harfleur, but, in the two following years, not only did the French successes increase in Normandy, even Guienne was in its turn assaulted. All efforts to save it were in vain, and it became quite evident that the policy of peace was the only one which could extricate England with honour from its disastrous situation.

The death of Bedford had left Cardinal Beaufort at the head of the party who desired a reasonable peace. But Beaufort was old, and the influence of Gloucester, as first Prince of the blood and the leader of the popular party, kept him much aloof from public business. In his place there arose a new minister, De la Pole, Earl of Suffolk. This man, a descendant of a wealthy merchant in the reign of Edward III., and grandson of the favourite of Richard II., was fully engaged upon the side of the Lancastrian dynasty. He had been taken prisoner after the siege of Orleans, and had in France formed connections which pointed him out as a fitting person to manage negotiations with that country. It was determined, if possible, to make the marriage of the young

Marriage of Henry with Margaret of Anjou.

King with a French Princess the basis of a peace. The Princess fixed on was Margaret, the daughter of René, Duke of Bar, representative of the Angevin house, the titular King of Sicily and of Jerusalem.¹ Suffolk undertook to manage the delicate negotiation, although conscious, it would seem, of the obloquy he would probably meet with. He succeeded in obtaining an armistice to extend from June 1444 till April 1446, and the marriage treaty was completed; but so far from receiving a dower with his wife, as might have been expected, (but which her father, who had surrendered his duchy to the Duke of Burgundy, was quite unable to give,) it was arranged that Henry should surrender to the French, as the price of their consent, all that was left to the English of Anjou and Maine, where the war was still being carried on. In carrying out this arrangement, Suffolk had the consent of the Privy Council, but it is probable that they did not contemplate so complete a cession of English rights. His successful return secured him the title of Marquis, and the friendship of the young Queen (whose masculine mind soon got entire command of her husband's will), and enabled him to hold a position of complete superiority in the English councils.

¹ This Prince was the second son of Louis II., Duke of Anjou, Count of Provence, and (as heir to his father, Louis I., who had been adopted by Joanna I. of Naples) titular King of Naples. All these titles René inherited, besides the duchy of Bar, from his uncle, and the duchy of Lorraine from his wife. He was, moreover, himself named heir by Joanna II. of Naples, but failed to obtain the crown. At the time of Margaret's marriage, of all his territories Provence was the only one he retained.

Alliance with the French, on the somewhat disgraceful terms on which it had been contracted, not unnaturally raised the anger of Gloucester and his party. The rivalry grew hot between him and Suffolk. There were probably private causes of trouble between them, but at all events, in 1447, the Parliament was held at Bury St. Edmunds, and Gloucester was summoned thither. He went with a considerable following, but does not seem to have suspected danger, although he found the town fortified, and the guards everywhere doubled. He was suddenly apprehended on the charge of high treason, and before any trial was granted him, the public were told that he was dead. A death so opportune for his enemies naturally excited suspicion, and the most sinister rumours of foul play were spread among the people. It is impossible not to join in these suspicions; at the same time it is fair to notice that at a late examination his physician had declared his constitution radically unsound, and that some contemporary writers mention his death as having arisen from natural causes.

His death left room for Richard Duke of York's appearance upon the stage of politics. The son of Anne, sister of the Earl of March, and of that Duke of Cambridge who was put to death for his share in the conspiracy immediately preceding Henry V.'s first expedition to France, he stepped naturally into the place of leader of the Plantagenet Princes. Ever since that family ascended the throne, those branches of it which had not been actually reigning had been for the most part in opposition. Till their accession,

Pre-eminence of Suffolk.

Gloucester's
death.

York takes his place.

the Lancastrians had been the leaders of this party; their place was now taken first by Gloucester, then by York. It will be seen in the sequel that those same families which had formed the discontented party in the reign of Richard II., and in opposition to the Lancastrians, now sided chiefly with York. He had been already employed in public affairs, had been twice governor of Normandy, and in that capacity had quarrelled with the Duke of Somerset, who had been joined with him in command. To rid himself of so important an enemy, Suffolk, the leading statesman of the ruling party, had got him appointed in 1446 to the government of Ireland. This was a post of considerable difficulty; for under the management of the Earls of Ormond, one of the old Anglo-Irish settlers, that country had fallen into great disorder.¹

After Gloucester's death Suffolk had become unquestioned chief Minister, for Cardinal Beaufort had not long survived his nephew. He took upon himself all the unpopularity which the Lancastrian dynasty had latterly earned: It is plain that among the people there was deep-seated discontent. The persecution of the Lollards had never relented. Frequent executions are recorded for heresy. The support the Lancastrians had constantly given to the Church had even produced several outbreaks. In 1438, and again in 1443, there had been uproars in several parts of England, directed against the Catholic ecclesiastical foundations. Nor was this unnatural. Amidst the misery and desolation caused by repeated plagues and famines, and the expenditure both of men and money incident upon a foreign war, the Church alone, represented by the wealthy Cardinal Beaufort, had retained its prosperity; while, to crown all, national honour had been deeply wounded by want of success in France. To this inherited unpopularity, Suffolk added that which arose from the late dishonourable marriage treaty with France. Instead of attempting to lessen the feeling against him, he followed the common course of upstart ministers. The Princes and great nobles found themselves excluded from the Council. His ministers were chiefly bishops, especially Ascough, Bishop of Salisbury, and De Moleyns, Bishop of Chichester, and men of little eminence, as Lord Say. His government in fact resembled that of Bernard of Armagnac in France, and took that particularly objectionable form, the superiority of the lesser nobles.

His foreign policy, too, was eminently unsuccessful. At the close of the truce, in 1446, he had not secured any permanent peace; and early in 1448, an ill-judged outbreak of some ¹ For a description of this disorder see a letter from "The chief persons in the county of Kildare to Richard Duke of York," Ellis Letters, second series, vol. i. 117.

English auxiliaries, who captured the town of Fougères, again plunged England into war. John, Duke of Somerset, perhaps in despair at his ill success, had killed himself. His brother Edmund succeeded to his title and position in France. His opposition to the French, who attacked him in great force, was entirely unavailing, and before the year was over Rouen and a large part of Normandy had been regained by the French. In May an armament under Sir Thomas Kyriel had been defeated near Fornigny; in July Caen surrendered; and in August the last remnants of the English army returned to England from Cherbourg. In the following year a last effort was made to retain some position in Guienne with equally bad success.

The loss of Rouen, in 1449, brought the anger of the people to its highest point. In an uproar they put to death De Moleyns, Bishop of Chichester, at Portsmouth; and at length the House of Commons, led by Tresham their speaker, insisted upon the apprehension of Suffolk, who had now become a Duke, upon a charge of treason. On the 7th of February eight charges were brought against him of a somewhat indefinite character, especially charging him with a wish to marry his son John to Margaret Beaufort, thus aiming at the kingdom, and with gross mismanagement and treachery in France. These were followed by sixteen more specific charges, in which it was asserted that he had appropriated and misused the royal revenues, interfered with the course of justice, and treated treacherously with the French. On the 13th he appeared before the King in the House of Peers. He denied most of the charges, and excused himself on others on the ground that he had acted with the approbation of the Privy Council. He however, declining the privilege of his peerage and trial by the House of Lords, threw himself entirely upon the King's mercy; and Henry, hoping to get over the difficulty without giving up his friend, without a trial banished him for five years. This was a manifest breach of the Constitution, and served only to increase the general discontent. The Duke escaped privately to his own estates, and took sea at Ipswich, but was met by an English squadron, taken on board the largest ship, the "Nicholas of the Tower," and after a sham trial by the seamen, obliged to enter a little boat. He was there beheaded, with a sort of parody of the usual forms of execution. It is pretty evident that behind the popular anger there was the influence of the Duke of York and other noblemen at work.

At the next Parliament, which was held at Leicester, many of the Absolute ministry of Suffolk.

His unpopularity.

Renewal of
the war.

Fall of Rouen.
1449.

Popular outbreak against Suffolk.

Murder of Suffolk.

nobles appeared in arms. At the same time the news of the defeat of Kyriel at Formigny arrived; and at once the men of Kent, who were probably in close alliance with the seamen who had executed Suffolk, rose. Their leader was Jack Cade. He led the insurgents under strict discipline towards London, assuming the name of Mortimer, and we cannot but believe with the knowledge of the Duke of York. Two papers were sent in to the Government; one called the Complaints, the other the Demands, of the Commons of Kent. In these were summed up the causes of the unpopularity of Suffolk; and the restoration of Richard of York to favour was demanded. Unable to hold their advanced position, the insurgents fell back to Sevenoaks, but there they were successful against a hasty attack by Sir Humphrey Stafford.¹ The King retired from London, and so far yielded as to order the apprehension of Lord Say, one of the obnoxious councillors. Cade then advanced, took possession of Southwark, and appeared in London, under the title of the Captain of Kent, and in the arms of Stafford. The burghers of London, full of sympathy for the demands of the Kentish men, and pleased with the strict discipline preserved, sided at first with the insurgents. At a formal trial presided over by the Lord Mayor, Say, who had fallen into the hands of the people, was condemned and immediately executed. Meanwhile, almost at the same time, Ascough, the obnoxious Bishop of Salisbury, was put to death by his own followers at Eddington. Thus all the obnoxious ministers had been got rid of. London was now in the hands of the populace. The temptation was too strong for them, and some plundering took place. On this the Londoners took fright, and, when the insurgents retired for the night to Southwark, broke down and defended the bridge. Cade, unable to regain London, fell back, and after his followers, deceived by a promise of general pardon, had chiefly dispersed, was pursued and put to death near Lewes by Iden the sheriff.

The disaffection was by no means quieted. Complaints were bitter, that by repeated prorogations of Parliament supplies were obtained without any redress of grievances, and that the bishops and clergy sided with the oppressors. While public feeling was in this irritable condition, York, suddenly leaving his government of Ireland without leave, appeared on the Welsh border with 4000 of his vassals. In this threaten-discontent.

Continued

York's appearance in arms.
1452.

¹ The Staffords, the head of whom was the Duke of Buckingham, were descended from Anne Plantagenet, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, son of Edward III.

ing manner, and accompanied by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Devonshire and Salisbury, the whole clan of the Nevilles, and the Lords Cromwell¹ and Cobham, he appeared at Westminster. Meanwhile, Somerset, the acknowledged head of the rival party, returned from France, and received the office of Constable. The parties were assuming form, and a crisis was evidently at hand. York made a formal demand for the dismissal of Somerset and the punishment of the Duchess of Suffolk. As yet, however, the Government was strong enough to refuse these demands, and during the whole of the year 1451, without any public acts, the quarrel was becoming more embittered. In Devonshire Lord Bonville was at open war with the Earl of Devonshire. In the North, Percy, Lord Egremont, was fighting with the Earl of Salisbury. And in the winter, the Welsh vassals of York were gathered round the castle of Ludlow. Hitherto York and his partisans had persistently declared themselves the faithful servants of the Crown, interested only in the removal of the King's bad ministers. None the less, in the beginning of the year 1452, Somerset and the King marched into the West, where York had been collecting his vassals, while York, moving in the opposite direction, passed the royal troops, and appeared in Kent, where he felt sure of support.

This summoned the King back towards London; he took up his position at Blackheath, and there received the demands of York, to which he consented, promising to imprison Somerset, and to form a new council. Trusting to this promise, York disbanded his army, and went to have an interview with the King. He there discovered, to his dismay, that he had been deceived. His rival was in the tent, and evidently still in favour. Hot words were exchanged, but ultimately York was compelled to renew his oath of loyalty, and the Somerset party for the instant triumphed. The next Parliament was strongly in their favour; the speaker, Thomas Thorpe, a strong partisan of the Lancastrians. The King's half-brothers, the sons of Owen Tudor, (Edmund, Earl of Richmond, and Jasper, Earl of Pembroke,) were brought prominently forward as members of the royal house, and Cardinal Kemp, now Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor, declared that the Government would enforce peace by arms if necessary.

This triumph was of short duration. News arrived of the failure of the new expedition for the rescue of Guienne, and of the death of ¹ Cromwell had been a great friend of Bedford and his financial reformer, but dislike to the conduct of the Suffolk party had driven him to join York.

Talbot, Lord Shrewsbury, its leader, at Castillon. And worse than that, the King, who had all his life suffered both from bodily and intellectual weakness, fell into a condition of hopeless imbecility. Under these circumstances, the birth of a Prince called Edward, which might have added to the strength of the Lancastrian party, was but a source of weakness. York, as heir presumptive to the throne of a sickly monarch, might have been contented to wait; the birth of a new heir apparent urged him to do what he had to do quickly. The opportunity, too, now offered itself; during the imbecility of the King, some regent was wanted; there was no excuse for passing over York. An instant change of government was the consequence. Somerset was apprehended. Even the Parliament chosen under the Lancastrian influence could not refuse, after it had obtained proof of Henry's folly, to appoint Richard. The amount of authority given him seems to have been exactly that which Gloucester had enjoyed. He was President of the Council, and chief executive officer. His office was terminable at the royal will. Though thus limited, his power was sufficient to enable him to change the constitution of the Council, to carry through a breach of Parliamentary privilege by imprisoning for a debt Thorpe the speaker, and on the death of Cardinal Kemp, to appoint his brother-in-law Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, to the chancellorship.

But the supremacy of York disappeared as suddenly as it had arisen. At the end of 1454, on Christmas Day, the King recovered his senses. Everything was immediately reversed. Somerset was taken from the Tower and declared innocent. York's officers were displaced. True to the policy of his house, Henry restored the chancellorship to the Church by the appointment of Thomas Bouchier, Archbishop of Canterbury. But York had now determined upon an appeal to arms. Urged by fear of Somerset, and by dislike to the secondary position which the Prince's birth had given him, and in company with the Nevilles, Lord

Recovery of the King.
1454.

York again appears in arms.

Salisbury, and his son the Earl of Warwick, he advanced towards London, to forestall the action of the Parliament summoned to meet at Leicester, which he expected to be hostile to him. At the same time the royal troops were marching northward. The two forces consequently met. From Royston, York wrote a letter still declaring his loyalty, and stating his conditions. It was unanswered, and on the 21st of May the armies met at St. Albans. The King had with him the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Devonshire, Stafford, Dorset, Wiltshire, Clifford, and Sudely. The battle was fought in the town, and the victory, chiefly owing to Warwick, fell to the Duke of York. Somerset, Northumberland, and Clifford fell. Most of the other leaders were wounded, and the King himself was suffering from an arrow wound when York and the Nevilles came to him, knelt before him, begged his favour, and carried him with them in apparent harmony to London.

First battle of
St. Albans.
May 22, 1455.

On examining the chief names which occur as those of the leaders on either side in this the first battle of the Wars of the Roses, it will be seen that it was the Nevilles and Norfolk chiefly on whom York relied; his own relations, the Percies, and other gentlemen of the North, which constituted the strength of Henry's party. There seem to have been three principles of division at work—family, geographical position, political views; and with regard to family, it would seem that the quarrel was one of very long standing, dating back as far as the reign of Richard II. It has been already pointed out that there was constantly some branch or other of the Plantagenet party in opposition to the reigning branch, which took for its cry reform of government and the good cause of England. In Richard II.'s reign Gloucester had represented this party. If we take the names of the Lords Appellant in the year 1387, we find them to be Gloucester and Derby, Plantagenets; Warwick, a Beauchamp; Nottingham, a Mowbray; and Arundel. Now, of these, the second, Derby, became afterwards King as Henry IV., and the opposition which he had at one time helped to direct was turned against himself and his family. The families of Mowbray and of Arundel had coalesced in the Duke of Norfolk. The heiress of the Beauchamps had married the Earl of Salisbury's son Richard Neville, who with his wife had inherited the title of Warwick. The addition therefore to the party was that of the important family of the Nevilles, which had been consistently faithful to Henry IV. But this family had now become allied by marriage with the Duke of York himself (who had married Cecily Neville), with the Duke of Norfolk, and as we have seen with the family of Beauchamp. In addition to this, the fact that the rival house of the Percies had since the restoration of the son of Hotspur been firm supporters of the Lancastrian dynasty, would have been enough to put the Nevilles on the opposite side. The two families had ever been rivals for the chief influence in the North of England; and even now Lord Egremont, a Percy, was at open war with the Earl of Salisbury in the Character of the two parties.

neighbourhood of York. Of the leaders appearing on the side of Henry, Northumberland was a Percy, and therefore enemy of the Nevilles; Somerset was a Beaufort, and of the Lancastrian house; Pembroke and Richmond were the King's half-brothers; Clifford was one of the great lords of the North, and an opponent of the Nevilles; Wiltshire was James Butler of Ormond, of that family whose misgovernment York had been sent to cure. Of Buckingham and the Staffords, whose mother was a Plantagenet, it may be supposed that in the family quarrel they preferred the reigning house.

This seems to lead to the conclusion that in the main the war was a fight of faction, a tissue of hereditary family rivalries resting upon merely personal grounds. But beyond these there were geographical and political reasons which had their influence on the bulk of the nation. The demand for reform of government, the support given to the national prejudice in favour of continued war, and the opposition to the strong Church views of the Government, had rendered the party of York distinctly the popular one. The North of England was always more subject than the South to baronial influence. It was in the South therefore, in Kent, and in the trading cities, that the strength of the Yorkist party chiefly lay. To this of course must be added the very large estates held by York himself, as the heir of the Mortimers in the West; and the vast property of the various branches of the Nevilles. On the other hand, the Lancastrian party was that of the lower nobility, and of the Church, and found its strength in the baronial North. Politically, to speak broadly, it was the party of the Conservative gentry and the High Church, pitted against the party of reform of Church and State headed by a few great nobles; geographically, it was the North withstanding the attacks of the South.

One effect of the battle of St. Albans was, that the King again sank into lethargy. Again, for a brief space, was the power of York irresistible; he was appointed by the Lords to his old position of Protector. He was still careful not to speak of his claim to the crown, and accepted the Protectorate only as the gift of both Houses of Parliament. Again, however, the King suddenly recovered. In February, York was removed from his protectorate, and the Queen and Somerset were again ruling. The following year, a great meeting of the Council was held at Coventry, where York and his friends were again compelled to renew their fealty. But the loss of life at St. Albans had rendered the party feud much more violent, and York was induced to believe that the Queen had aims against his life. He and his friends at once

York's second brief Protectorate.
1456.

separated; York to his western castle of Wigmore, Salisbury to Middleham in Yorkshire, Warwick to Calais, of which town he was the governor. Whatever influence the King had seems to have been directed to produce reconciliation. For this purpose he induced, in January, the rival chiefs to meet in London. The peace of the town was intrusted to the citizens, and a solemn reconciliation brought about, based upon money payments to be made by the Yorkists to the sufferers at St. Albans. Meanwhile, Warwick, a lawless and independent person, was living as a sort of authorized pirate at Calais. He attacked a fleet of ships, as he believed Spanish; they afterwards proved to be Hanseatic vessels. He was consequently summoned to Court to explain his conduct. There a quarrel arose between his servants and those of the King, and at once the ephemeral reconciliation was destroyed.

Both parties prepared again for war. The Court having been told that Salisbury was going to Kenilworth to concert measures with Duke Richard, Lord Audley was sent with an armed force to intercept him. The consequence was the battle of Blore Heath on the confines of Shropshire, in which Salisbury was completely victorious. A general meeting of the three great Yorkist nobles took place at Ludlow, where Warwick brought his veterans from Calais, under Sir Andrew Trollope. Again the old proclamation against evil governors was issued; but for some unexplained reason Trollope suddenly deserted, and, deprived of their most trustworthy troops, the leaders thought it wise to fly. York took refuge in Ireland, with his son Edmund of Rutland, while his eldest son, Edward of March, with Warwick, found security in Calais. Their flight caused something like a revolution, so complete was the triumph of the Lancastrians. The Parliament was assembled at Coventry, probably with much illegal violence, and bills of attainder were passed against the Yorkist leaders. But Warwick was determined upon further action. Having command of the sea, he contrived an interview with Richard in Ireland, and accompanied by his father and the young Earl of March, he landed in Kent, where he was rapidly joined by the people, and appeared at the head of 30,000 men in London. Having captured the capital, with the exception of the Tower, which Lord Scales held, they advanced northwards. The two armies met in the neighbourhood of Northampton.

with the Nevilles he retires from Court.

Hollow reconciliation of parties.
1458.

Renewed hostilities. Battle of Blore Heath.
Sept. 23, 1459.

Flight of the Yorkists from Ludlow.

Lancastrian
Parliament at Coventry.

Fresh attack of the Yorkists.
Battle of Northampton.
July 10, 1460

The Lancastrians were strongly intrenched, but the intrenchment once broken through, a terrible slaughter ensued. Buckingham, Shrewsbury, Beaumont, and Egremont were slain. The wretched King was found deserted in his tent. Again the scene after St. Albans was repeated, and York, returning from Ireland, was once more master of affairs.

On the 7th of October a Parliament was held in London. All the acts of the Parliament of Coventry were annulled, on the ground that its members had been illegally elected, and in some instances that they had not been elected at all. And then first did York, who appears to have thought that all less decided measures had been tried in vain, bring forward a distinct claim to the throne. This claim he sent in writing to the

Yorkist
Parliament in London.

York at last advances claims to the throne.

House of Lords, with whom alone it was said the decision could lie, pointing out, what was undeniable, that his hereditary claim was better than that of Henry VI. The majority of the Lords were at heart Lancastrian. They had, moreover, again and again sworn fealty to the reigning house; and to their common sense as proprietors it seemed ridiculous that an undisturbed possession of more than fifty years, defended by numerous Acts of Parliament, should be set aside by mere hereditary claim. With the Yorkists triumphant, they were naturally disinclined to give any answer, but it was in vain they applied to the judges or to the crown lawyers. The judges declared the question beyond their cognizance, and the crown lawyers argued that it was therefore much more beyond theirs. Thrown back upon themselves, the Lords devised a compromise by which they could save their consciences with regard to the oath of fealty, and yet give effect to the hereditary claim, which was urged by such awkwardly strong supporters. They agreed that the King should hold the crown for life, that it should then pass to Richard and his heirs, that Richard should meanwhile be created Prince of Wales and heir presumptive, and be the practical ruler of the Kingdom. That in spite of his victorious position he should have been able only to secure this compromise, seems to prove the close equality of the parties, and perhaps, taken in connection with his previous action, the moderation of Richard.

The Lords agree on a compromise.

The Queen had no intention of submitting to this verdict. Trusting to the power of the North, which was constantly true to her, and collecting round her all the great chiefs of her party, she moved to York. Richard at once determined to hasten against her. Salisbury accompanied him; Edward, his eldest son, was ordered to collect troops;

Warwick was charged with the care of the King. With extreme rashness, York met vastly superior forces in the neighbourhood of Wakefield. Unexpectedly attacked, his little army was completely destroyed. He was himself taken prisoner, dragged with every sign of indignity before the Queen, mockingly crowned with a wreath of grass, and then beheaded. His second son, Rutland, but seventeen years of age, was killed in cold blood as he fled, and Salisbury, who was also captured, was beheaded at the demand of the people. March was collecting troops in the West when he heard of his father's death, and hastening northwards, he suddenly turned upon a small pursuing force under Pembroke and Wiltshire, and completely defeated them at Mortimer's Cross. The Queen's army meanwhile pushed southward. The wild northerners seemed to fancy they were marching through a foreign country. The fiercest destruction and plundering marked the course of their march. To meet them, Norfolk and Warwick had come from London to St. Albans, and there a second battle was fought, this time with the complete defeat of the Yorkists. The King again fell into the hands of the Queen. This battle, as all the others during these wars, was marked by extraordinary destruction among the chiefs, and followed by vindictive executions. Had the Queen pushed direct to London the Yorkist party might have been destroyed. But she could not hold her wild troops in hand. Their devastations excited the anger of the people. All round London the populace rose, determined to avoid the government which promised to be so cruel. The young Earl of March, whom Warwick had joined with the remnant of his troops, took advantage of this feeling, and advanced triumphantly to the capital. At a meeting in Clerkenwell, the Chancellor, the Bishop of Exeter, explained the claims of the House of York. The question "Shall Edward be your King?" was received with general cries of approbation. The news was brought to the young prince in Baynard's Castle, and the next day he ascended the throne in Westminster Hall, explained with his own lips his hereditary claims, and then proceeded to the Abbey where his coronation was performed.

York is defeated and killed at Wakefield.
Dec. 30, 1460.

The young Duke of York wins
the Battle of Mortimer's
Cross.
Feb. 2, 1461.

The Queen,
advancing to London, wins
the second
battle of St.
Albans.
Feb. 17.

Sudden rising of the home counties.

Triumphant entry of Edward.

EDWARD IV.

1461-1483.

Born 1441 = Elizabeth Woodville.

Edward V. Richard, Duke of York. George. Elizabeth = Henry VII. Six other daughters

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James III., 1460.	Louis XI., 1461.	Frederick III., 1440.	Henry IV., 1454. Ferdinand V., 1474.

POPES.—Pius II., 1458. Paul II., 1464. Sixtus IV., 1471.

Archbishops.
Thomas Bouchier, 1454.

Chancellors.
George Neville, 1461.
Robert Stillington, 1467.
Laurence Booth, 1473.
Rotherham, 1475.

THOUGH in after years much addicted to sensual pleasure, Edward IV. never lost his practical energy; he was not a man to leave unimproved his present triumphant position. He at once despatched the Duke of Norfolk to the East of England to collect an army, and with the Earl of Warwick himself hastened northward, with an army composed chiefly of Welshmen from his own possessions, and of men of Kent, the great supporters of his house. In Yorkshire he met his enemy. The passage of the river Aire was disputed at Ferry Bridge; the Yorkists, under Lord Falconbridge (a Neville), falling upon the rear of Clifford and his Lancastrians, stopped his passage, and killed that leader. On the 28th of March the armies were in presence, some eight miles from York. The battle was to be a decisive one. No quarter was to be expected on either side. The numbers engaged—of the Lancastrians, 60,000, of the Yorkists 48,000—were much larger than in most of the battles of these wars. For once the nation felt some interest in the quarrel. The change of the wind

Edward secures
the crown.
1461.

Battle of Towton.
Mar. 29.

1461]

CONTINUATION OF THE WAR

329

blew the snow continually in the eyes of the Lancastrians, and when the battle had raged through a great part of the night and till noon of the following day, the Yorkists had secured a complete victory. Again, the greatest names of the nobility are mentioned among the slain. Northumberland fell in the battle, Devonshire and Wiltshire were beheaded after it, and many reports speak of from 28,000 to 33,000 men left dead upon the field.¹ Henry and his Queen, with Somerset and Exeter, fled into Scotland, and purchased such assistance as that country could give in the midst of its own intestine commotions by a promise of Berwick and Carlisle. Edward now felt safe on his throne, and returned to London, where the joy was great. There, in November, he met his first Parliament, by whom the three last monarchs were declared usurpers, and the acts of their reigns annihilated, with the exception of such judicial decisions as would if repealed have thrown the country into confusion. All the great leaders of the Lancastrian party were attainted, and their property confiscated. The session closed with a personal address of thanks from the King to the Commons, an unusual occurrence, and marking the political position of the House of York.

Meanwhile, Margaret had been seeking assistance from her own country, France; but Louis, busy in his own affairs and content with the enforced neutrality of England, only gave her a small sum of money, and allowed Peter de Brezé, Seneschal of Normandy, to enlist troops for her. With these forces she succeeded in capturing the three northern fortresses of Bamborough, Dunstanburgh and Alnwick. But before the end of the year, the two first of these were recovered, and Edward was so strong, that even Somerset and Percy deserted to his side. Again, the next year, the Queen with De Brezé attempted in vain to relieve Alnwick. Her fleet was wrecked, and with difficulty she made her way back to Scotland. But, though beaten, her cause was still alive. In various parts of the country, disturbances showed themselves. The clergy missed the favour they had received from the Lancastrians; and, in the beginning of the following year, the Percies and Somerset had gone back to their own party, and renewed attempts were made upon the North of England. But Warwick's brother Montague, at Hedgeley Moor, and again at Hexham, destroyed their forces, and both Percy and Somerset met their death. This was the second Duke of Somerset who had died in ¹ William of Worcester, however, puts it at 9,000.

Yorkist
Parliament

With French
help Margaret keeps up the war.
1462.

Hedgeley Moor.
Hexham.
April 1464

these wars. He was succeeded by his brother Edmund. A greater prize was the King, who, after hiding for some time, was captured, in 1465, in Yorkshire, and brought with all signs of indignity to London. He was there, however, properly taken care of in the Tower.

Supported by his Commons, who granted him the wool tax and tonnage and poundage for life, King Edward seemed firmly seated on the throne. He was essentially a popular king. He sat and judged on his own King's Bench, talked familiarly with the people, and allowed the Commons to pass popular measures of finance, without regard to their want of wisdom. A revocation of grants from the Crown was made, but with exceptions which rendered it nugatory; the importation of foreign corn or foreign merchandise was forbidden. The arrangement of the staple, by which wool and cloth could be sold only at Calais, and for bullion or ready money, was re-established; and still further to uphold the current theory of the day, and to keep gold and silver in the country, strict sumptuary laws were passed. Abroad, too, all seemed peaceful. The Pope had acknowledged the new King. France was too busy to interfere. With the rest of Europe treaties of amity were set on foot; and even with Scotland a long truce was made.

Edward's popular government.
Apparent security of his throne.

But the King had a weakness of character which destroyed his fine position. He was a slave to his passions; and now, regardless of all prudence, though various royal matches were suggested, especially one with Bona of Savoy, the sister of the French Queen, he was carried away by his admiration for Elizabeth Woodville, the daughter of Jacquetta, the Duchess Dowager of Bedford, and Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, and the widow of Sir John Grey, a strong Lancastrian partisan. On the 29th of September, in spite of the opposition which he could not but have expected, the King was publicly married in the chapel at Reading. Had not the King recognised the weakness of the nobility, caused by the slaughters of the late wars, he would scarcely have ventured on a marriage so much beneath him. As it was, the few great nobles who remained were deeply hurt, and Edward found himself obliged to make the best of his plebeian marriage. An unusually ostentatious and solemn coronation was held, and an air of aristocracy given to the ceremony by the presence of his wife's relative, John of Luxembourg. His other measures for the same purpose were not so well judged. The marriage might have been pardoned had it not brought with it the elevation of the whole of the Queen's family, whom the

Destroyed by his marriage, 1466.

King thought it necessary to raise in social rank. Her father was made an Earl, and given in succession the offices of Constable and Treasurer, and this at the expense of the nobles who were then holding those places. Her brother Anthony, a man of great accomplishments, was given the daughter, inheritance, and titles of Lord Scales. Another brother, John, at the age of twenty, was married, it is to be presumed, chiefly for interested reasons, to the old Duchess of Norfolk, who was nearly eighty. Her five sisters found husbands among the noblest of the Yorkist party.¹

The displeasure of the Nevilles did not, however, at first show itself, and Warwick stood godfather to the young Princess Elizabeth. Their position indeed was still one of enormous influence; George, the youngest brother, was Chancellor and Archbishop of York; to his third brother, John of Montague, had been given the property and title of the Percies, and he was now Earl of Northumberland; and Warwick, Warden of the Western Marches of Scotland, and in the receipt of public income said to amount to 80,000 crowns, was the most popular man in the country. He lived with an ostentatious splendour, which threw all his rivals into the background.² Nevertheless the marriage, and the formation of the new nobility consequent on it, began to divide England into new parties: on the one side, such as were left of the old nobility; on the other, the new. It was plain that the Nevilles, pledged though they were to the Yorkist side, would sooner or later side with their order against the King and his new friends. A still more important cause of quarrel existed in the difference between their foreign policy and that of the King. The House of Burgundy and Louis XI. of France were constant rivals; and while Warwick and the Nevilles inclined towards a French alliance, thus deserting the old policy of the Yorkists, Edward, seeing the advantages he would reap in a mercantile point of view, lent a willing ear to the advances of Charles, known afterwards as Charles the Bold of Burgundy, who was now demanding his sister Margaret as his wife. As a contingent advantage he knew that he would find in the Burgundian Prince a ready acknowledgment of his title to the crown of and rise of the Woodvilles.

Power of the Nevilles.
Their French policy. Burgundian policy of Edward. 1467.

¹ Stafford, the young Duke of Buckingham; the heir of Bourchier, Earl of Essex; Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel; Lord Strange of Knokyn; and Lord Herbert. Thomas Grey, her son by her first marriage, was engaged to the daughter and heiress of the Duke of Exeter, the King's niece.

² "Every tavern was full of his meat, for who that had any acquaintance in that house, he should have had as much sodden and roast as he might carry upon a long dagger."—Stowe.

France, which he still had some thought of making good. On the return of Warwick from a friendly embassy to France, he found an alliance with Burgundy already concluded. The Count de la Roche, the natural brother of Charles, had appeared in England on the pretext of fighting a chivalrous duel with Anthony, Lord Scales; and had apparently arranged the marriage between Charles and Margaret which was consummated early in the following year. It would seem that this had been done contrary to the will of the Nevilles; for just before the arrival of De la Roche, at the opening of Parliament, Warwick was absent, and the King had suddenly deprived the Archbishop of York of his chancellorship, which he had given to the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

With these causes of quarrel, Warwick and the Nevilles fell back into their old position of opposition to the Crown; and more completely to reproduce the often-repeated state of English politics, succeeded in securing a Plantagenet Prince as their nominal leader. The Duke of Clarence, Edward's brother, was induced, in spite of the King's prohibition, to go to Calais, and there marry Isabella, Warwick's daughter. This ominous union soon produced fruits. The lower orders—those orders that are below the burgher class—cared but little for the name of the ruler; it was much the same to them whether Lancastrian or Yorkist was on the throne, their interests were confined to evils which pressed upon themselves. They were therefore ready instruments in the hands of the opposition. And upon a quarrel upon some Church dues, the men

Defection of
the Nevilles.

Popular risings inspired by them.
1469.

of the northern counties rose under a popular leader, Robert Hilyard, commonly called Robin of Redesdale. The insurgents soon found nobler leaders. Lords Latimer and Fitz-Hugh, relations of Warwick, and Sir John Coniers appeared at their head, and with 60,000 men marched southward, declaring that Warwick alone could save the country, complaining that the money wrung from the people was squandered upon the Queen's relatives, and demanding the dismissal of the new counsellors, such as Herbert, Stafford, and Audley. At the same time, Warwick and his brothers promised the men of Kent that they would appear at their head to make demands similar to those of the northern insurgents. Herbert, who had just beaten Jasper Tudor with the last remnant of the Lancastrians in Wales, and received his title of Earl of Pembroke, and Humphrey Stafford, who had been made Earl of Devonshire, advanced against the rebels; but quarrelling between themselves, they were defeated, and Pembroke beheaded, while shortly after, Rivers and Sir John Woodville, the Queen's father and brother, were captured and met the same fate. It was sufficiently plain that Warwick had instigated this rebellion. The destruction of his chief enemies made his power for the time paramount. He even kept Edward for a short period prisoner in his castle of Middleham. But his disapprobation of the Government had not yet gone so far as to make him wish for a return of the Lancastrians. And when that party again raised its standard in the North, he felt himself unable to cope with it without the King's assistance, and therefore released him. A complete pardon was granted to the Nevilles, and apparent harmony again reigned.

But it must have been obvious to all parties that it was but a temporary truce.¹ Had Clarence been a man of more ability, Warwick would probably have put him on the throne. Failing him, it began to be plain to the Earl that it was only by connection with the Lancastrian party that he could hope finally to triumph over his enemies—the new nobility. A new insurrection broke out in Lincoln, against the oppressions of the royal tax-gatherers. The insurgents, finding themselves no better off under the new dynasty than they had been before, declared for King Henry. At their head was young Sir Robert Wells. The King, not yet aware of Warwick's designs, under promise of pardon drew Lord Wells (Sir Robert's father) and Sir Thomas Dymock from the sanctuary, and kept them as hostages, and intrusted Warwick and Clarence with the duty of collecting troops to repress the insurgents. They collected troops, indeed, but did not suppress the insurgents; and the King discovered that they were acting in union with Sir Robert Wells. He at once put Dymock and Wells to death, routed the insurgents near Empingham in Rutland, at a battle known by the name of "Lose Coat Field," and turned his arms against Clarence and Warwick, who had been seeking assistance in vain from his brother-in-law Stanley in Lancashire. They did not await his coming, but rapidly fled through Devonshire to France. Sir Robert Wells, anxious to revenge his father, had driven matters on too hastily for the success of the conspiracy. Warwick had always been anxious for a French alliance, and was therefore well received by Louis, who felt that there was now but little chance

Clarence's
weakness drives
the Nevilles to the Lancas-trians.

Wells' rebellion,
1470.

Flight of Warwick.

¹ Even ordinary observers saw this. "I cannot tell what will fall of the world, for the King verily is disposed to go into Lincolnshire, and my Lord of Warwick, as it is supposed, shall go with the King; some men say that his going shall do good, and some say that it doth harm."—Paston Letters.

of peace with England except by restoration of the Lancastrians. He therefore contrived to bring the Earl and Margaret together; and the old enemies, finding that they had in common their hatred to the new nobility and their views of foreign politics, agreed to forget their old differences, and made a treaty by which Ann Neville was to marry the Prince of Wales, upon whom the throne was settled. Failing him it was to pass to Clarence. This treaty, which put Clarence's claims in the background, did not please him; and, utterly without principle, he at once opened negotiations with his brother, although he did not as yet openly join him.

In spite of all the warnings which he received from Burgundy, Edward remained in a condition of false security, even allowing Montague to retain his offices in England. He was absent from London in the North, when the Queen, Warwick and Clarence landed in Devonshire, issued a proclamation calling on the nation to arm, and soon found themselves surrounded by a sufficient army. So far did Edward carry his want of suspicion, that Montague, who at once declared for the Red Rose, as nearly as possible captured him at dinner in the neighbourhood of Doncaster; he had just time to escape, and fled (not without danger from a Hanseatic fleet) to Flanders. Warwick and his friends proceeded to London, drew the old King from the Tower, and re-crowned him with all ceremony. A Parliament assembled on the 26th of November. All the Acts of Edward's reign were annulled, and a general change took place in property and offices. It marks the effect of the fusion of parties, that this revolution, unlike most of the events of this war, was almost bloodless. Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, who had rendered himself hateful by his severity as Constable, was almost the only victim.

Though on many grounds (personal hatred to Warwick, sympathy with Edward's enmity to France, and mercantile and family reasons) the Duke of Burgundy would have been naturally attached to the House of York, this friendship was of new growth, and could not make him forget his long connection with the House of Lancaster. It was therefore with much difficulty that Edward got from him a small pecuniary assistance. With such as it was, however, he collected about 2000 men, and took, what at first sight appears, the foolhardy step of landing at Ravenspur in Yorkshire. But he knew that he had friends in his enemy's camp. At first, declaring, in imitation of Henry IV., that he only came to claim his rights as Duke of York, he passed un-

Warwick returns and re-crows Henry.

Edward gets help from Burgundy.
1471.

molested through Yorkshire, where Montague was. Even Warwick, who lay in the midland counties, watched his progress unmoved. He had received letters from Clarence, begging him not to stir till he joined him with reinforcements. But when Clarence took the field, it was not Warwick, but Edward to whom he went. Strong enough now again to assume the name of King of England, Edward marched to London, where the Archbishop of York had tried in vain to raise enthusiasm for the Lancastrian King. Too late, Warwick found that he had been deceived, and he also marched towards London. Edward met him with inferior forces in the neighbourhood of Barnet, and there a battle was fought, in which Warwick was entirely defeated, and himself and his brother Montague killed. Probably the great bulk of the people cared but little who was their ruler. York's army was very small—less than 10,000 men. A series of accidents gave him the victory. The indifference of the nation, weary of the squabble, explains the rapid success of these revolutions.

Meanwhile, the day before the battle, Queen Margaret had landed at Weymouth. For the moment, the true Lancastrians were almost glad when they heard that they were rid of their new Yorkist ally. The Queen's generals intended to march through Wales, there make a junction with Jasper Tudor, who was collecting forces, and thence move to their strongholds in the North. Edward divined their plan, and pushed rapidly across England, to secure if possible Gloucester and the valley of the Severn. The armies encountered at Tewkesbury, where the Queen had taken a strong position among the abbey buildings and the neighbouring enclosures. Again the superior skill of Edward secured the victory to his much inferior forces. The few remaining Lancastrian nobles, the Prince of Wales, Devonshire, Lord John Beaufort, and others, fell upon the field. The Duke of Somerset, the fourth and last of the Beauforts, was executed after it. Margaret and some others were taken prisoners.

There was one other danger, and then the Lancastrian party seemed destroyed for ever. The Bastard of Falconbridge suddenly appeared with a considerable fleet before London. The gallant defence of the citizens, and the arrival of assistance from the King, thwarted this last effort, and Edward returned in triumph, having proved the stability of the house of York. His arrival was immediately followed by the secret mur-

Clarence joins him.

Battle of Barnet.
April 14.

Margaret lands.

Battle of Tewkesbury.
May 4.

Edward's
triumphant return.
Murder of
Henry VI.

der of King Henry, one of those dark deeds which has been attributed without much ground to Edward's brother, Richard of Gloucester. A bloody court of justice held in Canterbury, for the punishment of the Kentish men, closed this revolution of eleven weeks. On the subsequent death of Holland, Earl of Exeter, whose body was found upon the sea in the Straits of Dover, there were but two important members of the Lancastrian party left. These were Oxford, and Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, who made good their escape to Brittany, whence Jasper's nephew subsequently returned to England in that expedition which terminated in Bosworth field. The clergy and the lesser nobles, seeing further contest useless, made their peace with the reigning house, and received pardons, and after Parliament had re-established the Yorkist dynasty, the wars of the Roses seemed to be at an end, and England at peace.

But the house of York was now to feel that ineradicable evil which beset the Plantagenets. The princes of the family could not agree.

Clarence's
quarrel with Richard.
1476.

Clarence had already occupied the position of chief of the opposition. He had already joined in the struggle between the old and new nobility as the partisan of the former party. Richard, a man of far greater ability, and of a reflective turn of mind, was in his heart inclined in the same direction. For the present, however, he saw his advantage in remaining the true and very efficient assistant of his brother Edward, by whom he had been intrusted with the government of the North. Clarence, incapable of being a great party leader, showed his disposition in lesser matters, and quarrelled with both his brothers. He had himself married Warwick's eldest daughter, Isabella, and was anxious to appropriate all the great Warwick possessions. When Richard, therefore, determined upon marrying Anne, the younger sister, he hid the young lady, who is said to have been discovered by her lover in the dress of a servant-maid, and when he was unable to prevent the marriage, refused to divide the inheritance. A fierce quarrel was the consequence, and it required the intervention of Parliament to secure an equitable division of the property. Thus embroiled with one brother, the Duke of Clarence speedily fell out with the other. On the death of his wife in 1476, he turned his thoughts to a second marriage with Mary of Burgundy, who became, on the death of Charles the Bold at Nancy in 1477, the heiress of his vast dominions. Edward prevented the marriage. In the first place, he would have much disliked to see his brother, on whom he had not the smallest reliance, powerful in Burgundy, and again, the Queen, and the Queen's party of the new nobility, were anxious that Mary should be married to the Earl of Rivers. The breach between the brothers was complete, and Edward, who never knew pity, only watched for an opportunity to rid himself of Clarence. The occasion chosen was trivial enough, but very characteristic of that age. A gentleman of Clarence's household, called Burdett, had uttered some angry words against the King. He was shortly after tried for necromancy, and as in the course of the inquiry it appeared that, among other acts of magic, he had cast the King's horoscope, he was condemned to death. With this verdict Clarence violently interfered. Edward was now able to charge him with interfering with the course of justice. He was impeached and tried before the House of Lords. The King in person was his accuser, and after a hot personal quarrel, in which the King charged him with all sorts of ungrateful acts of treason, he was condemned to death in 1478. A petition of the Commons, always at the command of Edward, removed the King's last scruple, and Clarence disappeared privately at the Tower, drowned it is said in a butt of Malmsey wine.

With Edward.
1477.

His trial.

His death.
1478.

These quarrels had occupied several years, but meanwhile matters of more national interest had also engaged Edward's attention. Charles the Bold was full of vast plans for increasing his possessions, and with the Duke of Brittany alone of the peers of France, resisted the centralizing policy of Louis XI. He found no great difficulty in enlisting Edward in a coalition against that King. As early as 1472, the war had been spoken of as probable. It did not actually take place till 1475, after a treaty had been made by which Lorraine, Bar, and other districts lying between Burgundy and Flanders were to be given to the Duke, while Edward was content to stipulate for the acknowledgment of his title as King of France, and a formal coronation at Rheims. The war, begun on such feeble conditions, had a disgraceful conclusion. Money, of which Edward was very fond, was scraped together, chiefly by the personal application of the King for loans known as benevolences, and a considerable army landed in France. But Edward did not meet with the reception he had expected. Charles, whose mind was incapable of carrying out the vast schemes that it planned, was engaged in war in other parts of his dominions, and brought no help to his ally. The gates of Peronne were shut against him. St. Quentin, which Charles had told him would be given up to him by the Constable of St. Pol, opened fire upon his troops.

Edward joins Burgundy
against France.
1475.

Failure of his expedition.

Provisions were scantily supplied, and Louis, who well knew the character of his invader, saw his opportunity. At a private interview with the herald who brought the declaration of war, he bribed him, and won from him the hint that he might apply successfully either to Stanley or to Howard, counsellors high in Edward's favour. He took the hint, found those Lords ready recipients of his bribes, threw Amiens open, and supplied the English army lavishly with food; and shortly persuaded Edward to arrange terms at a personal interview at Pecquigni. He was thoroughly afraid of the English soldiers, but rated them very low as diplomatists, and, as his manner was when he had great objects in view, was lavish with his money. A yearly pension, the expenses of the war, 50,000 crowns as a ransom for Margaret, and handsome bribes judiciously given to the chief members of the King's Council, secured the withdrawal of the English army. At the same time it was arranged that the Dauphin should marry the Princess Elizabeth. It mattered little to him, having now the English King in his pay, that the English to cover their disgrace spoke of the money payments as tribute, and that Edward continued to bear the title of the King of France. Nothing can give a better view of the despicable character of that new nobility on which Edward rested, than the readiness with which they accepted the French King's bribes.

*Treaty of Pecquigni.
Sept. 13.*

The chief objects of Edward's life were, to collect money to be spent in magnificent debauchery, and to secure the position of his house by great marriages for his daughters. He had thus arranged for the marriage of Elizabeth, his eldest, with the Dauphin of France; Mary was to have been married to the King of Denmark; Cicely to the eldest son of James III. of Scotland; Katherine to the son of the King of Castile; and Anne was destined for the son of Maximilian of Austria, who by his marriage with Mary of Burgundy had become the possessor of that duchy. None of these marriages took effect. The events connected with some of them fill up the remainder of the reign.

James III. of Scotland was a man much like Edward, a product of the renaissance at that time making its way in England. Addicted to art in all its forms, he had surrounded himself with artists, and ennobled members of the lower orders, and had estranged all the old nobility. At the head of the discontented party was the King's brother, the Duke of Albany. Although James had already received some of the dowry of the English Princess, in

Ambitious projects of marriage for his daughters.

Affairs in Scotland.

consequence probably of some French intrigues, he seemed inclined to withdraw from the engagement. Therefore, when Albany, a fugitive from Scotland, sought his protection, Edward determined to support him and his party, and, finally, made a treaty with him at Fotheringay, in which he spoke of him as King Alexander. He obtained from him a promise of homage, and of the cession of Berwick and some other districts. Albany also engaged to marry the Princess Cicely, who was to be transferred to him, although previously engaged to the son of the Scotch King. An invasion of Scotland under Richard of Gloucester, and a conspiracy which broke out at the Bridge of Lauder, where James's favourite, Cochrane, was hanged, seemed for a moment to raise Albany to the summit of his ambition. But the Scotch had no intention of changing the succession to the throne, or suffering their kingdom to be in any way dependent on England. They restored Albany his property, but also returned the dowry of Cicely, and intimated that the match was entirely broken off. The advantage that the English gained from the whole affair was the much disputed town of Berwick.

*Edward supports Albany.
1482.*

England obtains Berwick.

The arrangements for the marriage between Elizabeth and the Dauphin were equally unsuccessful. Although that Princess had assumed the name of the Dauphiness, Louis was in no hurry to complete the marriage, and had indeed directed his views elsewhere. In 1477, Mary of Burgundy had married Maximilian the Archduke of Austria; and now Edward engaged to join him against France upon condition of receiving from him the same pension as Louis had paid him since Pecquigni. But, as usual, Louis' diplomacy got the better of Edward's. Mary of Burgundy died in 1482, and the French King contrived to make a treaty with Maximilian, by which the Dauphin, deserting Elizabeth, engaged himself to Margaret, the heiress of Burgundy. Edward was vowing vengeance at this trick, and speaking of a new invasion of France, when he died on the 9th of April, worn out probably by his self-indulgence.

His personal beauty, his success in war, the familiarity of his manners, his splendid household, and the share which he allowed himself to take in the commercial enterprise of the day, endeared Edward to the burgher class, and rendered him on the whole a popular monarch. But beneath this splendid exterior there existed a pitiless cruelty, a selfishness which sought its gratification in unbounded license, and which was ready to crush relentlessly any, however nearly related to himself, who crossed his path. The mixture of sensuality, love of the new state of society, mingled with political selfishness and cruelty, remind us rather of the character of an Italian tyrant than of an English king. The character of the monarchy which he established was also different from that which had hitherto been seen in England. It has been usual to name the reign of Henry VII. as that in which this change began. It is true that that Prince and his successors completed it; but already there are visible all the elements of that peculiar despotic government resting upon popular favour, which is the characteristic of the Tudor rule. In all respects Edward is the popular King. The old nobility had for the most part been destroyed. As around the Buonapartes of modern time, a new nobility of relatives or personal friends of the King had begun to be called into existence. The balance of the Constitution had been changed by the removal of the Baronage, the great check on the royal power, which now stood, as it were, face to face with the Commons, who were as yet unfitted to make head against it. The practice of tampering with the elections had ruined the independence of Parliament. The Church, no longer in sympathy with the nation, sought to secure their wealth by devotion to the Crown. The King thus found no class sufficiently strong to check his prerogative. For a time, therefore, the constitutional advance of the preceding century was lost, and the government of England was practically despotism. At the same time, as the disturbances caused by the Wars of the Roses were not yet wholly over, and a short period of rapid revolutions intervenes before the final establishment of the constitutional change now begun, it is more convenient to adopt the old division, and to place the epoch of the new monarchy at the Battle of Bosworth.

*Edward's death.
His character.
1483.*

EDWARD V.

1483.

RICHARD III.

1483—1485.

Born, 1450 = Anne of Warwick.

Edward. Died 1484.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James III., 1460.	Charles VIII., 1483.	Frederick III., 1440.	Ferdinand, } Isabella, } 1479.

POPES.—Sixtus IV., 1471. Innocent VIII., 1484.

Archbishop.	Chancellor.
Thomas Bouchier, 1454.	John Russell, 1483.

EDWARD V. was between twelve and thirteen when he came to the throne. His reign, which lasted from the 9th of April to the 26th of June, was entirely occupied by a short and not very intelligible revolution, which terminated in the accession of his uncle, Richard of Gloucester. On the death of Edward IV., the state of parties was rather complicated. In the period of success which followed his restoration in 1471, he had collected round him counsellors from all parties, although chiefly inclined to the new nobility. His friends were thus divided into three sections—the Queen and her family, the most prominent members of which were Anthony, Lord Rivers; Grey, Earl of Dorset; his brother Sir Richard Grey, and Lord Lisle, who seem to have worked in unison with the Chancellor, Cardinal Rotheram, Archbishop of York, and Morton, Bishop of Ely: there were, secondly, the new nobility, of whom Hastings and Stanley were the representatives: and, thirdly, a certain number of the older nobles led by Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, and Sir John Howard. The two latter sections were full of jealousy of the Queen's party, in which feeling Richard joined. But his real connection was with Buckingham and the old nobles. His first step was, by a union of the other two parties, to overthrow the influence of the Queen. This he immediately proceeded to do.

As the young King was being brought to London for his coronation, under the care of Rivers and Grey, to whom his education had been intrusted, and under whose charge he had lived at Ludlow, Richard and Buckingham, with 900 men, appeared upon their line of march at Northampton. Rivers and Grey, conscious of the advantage which the appearance of the King in London would give them, were unwilling to come to an open quarrel, and sent Edward forward to Stony Stratford, while they went to pay their respects to Gloucester, who had taken the oath of allegiance, and hitherto put on all the appearance of loyalty. The two Lords were taken prisoners at Northampton, and Richard and Buckingham suddenly advancing to Stratford, by the rapidity of their movements dispersed 2000 men who accompanied Edward, and took possession of him. The news spread dismay in London. The Queen, her son Richard and her daughters, with Lord Lisle and the other Grey, took sanctuary at Westminster; while Hastings calmed men's minds by assuring them of Richard's loyalty, that he had only withdrawn the King from the pernicious influence of his relations, and that he would speedily appear with him to crown him. Upon Richard's appearance, therefore, everything at first went on in the regular order

Richard first
overthrows
Queen's party.

According to precedent, Richard was appointed Protector or President of the Council. With the exception of the removal of Rotherham, and the appointment of Russell, Bishop of Lincoln, in his place, no important changes were made, and the Parliament was summoned, and the coronation appointed for midsummer.

Having thus vanquished one party, Richard determined to get rid of his other rivals also, and to rest exclusively upon Buckingham and the old nobles. The coronation was settled for the 22nd of June, when suddenly Richard despatched a messenger, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, to the North, where he was much beloved, bidding the people hasten to his aid, as the Queen was aiming at the life of himself and Buckingham. There is no proof of any such conspiracy. But the quarrel between the two sections of the Council is marked by the fact that they met apart, Hastings and his

Is made Protector.

Quarrels with the new nobles.

followers at St. Paul's, Richard, Buckingham, and their friends, at Crosby Place. They were however all joined on the 13th of June in the Tower, when Richard suddenly appeared with angry and suspicious countenance, charged the Queen and Jane Shore, the King's mistress, who now lived with Hastings, with aiming at his life by sorcery, in proof of which he exhibited one of his arms, which was smaller than the other, and included Hastings in the charge. At a given signal armed men entered the chamber, and Hastings, Stanley, and the Bishops of York and Ely, were apprehended. Hastings was beheaded without trial on the spot.

Hastings' death and fall of his party.

This coup d'état was immediately followed up. The people were summoned to the Tower, where Buckingham and Richard appeared in rusty armour, as though in their extreme necessity they had taken it from the armoury. Jane Shore was compelled to do penance through the streets of London. The Queen was persuaded by the Archbishop of Canterbury to surrender the young Prince Richard. And news arrived that, both in the North and in Wales, the people had risen for Richard. At the same time Grey and Rivers, hitherto kept prisoners in Northampton, were beheaded. It only remained for Richard to find some pretext for assuming the crown. He felt the necessity of forestalling the coronation, which would probably have withdrawn from him the protectorate, and have brought a commission of regency into power. On the very day that the coronation was to have been held, Dr. Shaw, brother of the Mayor of London, was put up to preach at Paul's Cross. He took for his text, "The imperfect branches shall be broken off, their fruit unprofitable,"¹ and proceeded to expatiate upon the lax life of the late King; and moreover, to renew the charge which Clarence had once made, that that King was himself illegitimate. As for the present Princes, he asserted that they too were bastards. According to him, before Edward's marriage with Elizabeth Woodville, he had been engaged to Lady Eleanor Talbot; by the laws of the Church, therefore, his subsequent marriage was void, and the King and his brothers illegitimate. He drew attention to the want of resemblance between Richard of York and Edward IV., and the close likeness which existed, on the other hand, between Richard and the Protector. At this moment the Protector made his appearance, expecting that the crowd would cry, "Long live, King Richard!" But the charges were too new and surprising; he was received in perfect

Richard, with Buckingham's
help, secures the crown.

¹ Wisdom iv. 5.

silence. The failure of this attempt induced him to repeat it; and two days after, Buckingham came to Guildhall, and there addressed the people in a similar strain. He was determined to take no refusal, and upon a few cries of approbation, commanded the people to follow him to Baynard's Castle, where Richard then was. The Parliament was just assembling, a number of Lords and representatives from the Commons joined the crowd, and enabled him with some show of truth to draw up a petition called "The choice and prayer of the Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons of England," in which, after recapitulating his story, he requested Richard to accept the crown. After some show of resistance, Richard accepted the petition, and took solemn possession of the throne at Westminster Abbey on the 26th. That this choice was by no means unanimous is plain from the order issued, commanding the inhabitants of London to keep within their houses after ten o'clock, and forbidding the wearing of arms.

Having once secured the throne, the object of Richard seems to have been to heal, as far as possible, the wounds that the war had made. John Lord Howard was the one of his followers whose reward was the most striking. His mother having been a Mowbray, he was made Duke of Norfolk and hereditary Marshal of England. The prisoners the King had taken, in company with Hastings, were released, and with strange and rash magnanimity, Stanley was given the office of Constable of England, while Morton of Ely, an old Lancastrian, whose influence he seems to have underrated, was sent to reside in a castle in the West of England. He even caused the body of Henry VI. to be removed from Chertsey Abbey to Windsor, as though the breach between the families was healed. The King was crowned in London, and then proceeded to make a progress through England. He had every reason to think his position was a good one. The people everywhere received him with a fair show of good-will. In York, where he was a second time crowned, his reception was enthusiastic. His foreign relations were also promising. It is true that the recognition of France was somewhat brief and grudging; but with the young Philip of Burgundy there was an amicable correspondence; while Queen Isabella of Castile congratulated him heartily on having removed the stain of his brother's degrading marriage, and desired a close alliance with him against France, the chief reason perhaps of her show of affection.

But, though all at first seemed so promising, Richard soon learnt

Richard's policy of conciliation.

His strong position.

that it was not for him to pass unopposed into the position of a peaceful governor of a united England. The injury he had done the memory of, his late brother, the cold-heartedness with which he had pushed aside the nephew of whom he was the guardian, and who with his brother was kept in secret confinement in the Tower, revived the old affection with which the South of England had regarded Edward IV. Moreover, the Queen's party was not destroyed, while Richard's own generosity had left at liberty supporters of the old state of affairs. Consequently the whole South of England, from Kent to Devonshire, showed signs of an intended insurrection.

It was just at this moment, and perhaps in the hope of removing those around whom disaffection might centre, that the King caused the report to be spread that the young Princes had disappeared from the Tower. It is needless to enter into a discussion as to their fate. The picturesque story which represents them as smothered beneath their bedclothes is the creation of the next age. Indeed, the popular view of the events of this reign and of the character of Richard is derived almost wholly from Sir Thomas More's life of him. All that contemporary writers mention is that the Princes disappeared, and were probably killed. Comines, the French historian, an excellent observer, says simply that Richard had the Princes killed in the Tower. And the fact that all those who had the charge of them, even down to Forest, the warden, were rewarded, makes it almost impossible that this should not have been the case.

The effect was not what Richard expected. The friends of his late brother and of the Queen became still more anxious to preserve the old stock, and, probably at the suggestion of Morton, a Lancastrian who had found favour in Richard's sight, the project of a marriage between Edward's daughter Elizabeth and the young Richmond began to be discussed. The conspiracy soon proved to be very widespread, and it must have been a terrible surprise to Richard to hear that his chief friend and accomplice, Buckingham, had declared for the house of Lancaster. That nobleman's motives are not clear, but he probably found that the party of the old nobility, of which he was the leader, was no better off under Richard than it had been under Edward. Like other men of a tyrannical turn of mind, Richard had found his chief support in obsequious followers, and Ratcliffe, Catesby, and Lovel were his real advisers and friends. The Duke,

Weak points
in it.

Disaffection in the South.

Death of the Princes.

Projected marriage of Elizabeth and Richmond.

Defection of Buckingham.

therefore, an unprincipled and very ambitious man, thought he saw his advantage in becoming a principal agent in the restoration of the exiled house. It is probable, also, that the influence and skill of Morton, with whom he had been in communication, may have had something to do with it.

News was also brought to Richard that the young Richmond, who after Tewkesbury had fled with his uncle to Brittany, and had there become the centre of the Lancastrian party, was meditating a descent on England. Richard displayed his usual energy. He called on the men of York, on whom he could rely, to meet him at Leicester; hastily wrote to the Archbishop of York to send him the Great Seal, an unconstitutional act which Russell did not resist; put a price on the head of Buckingham; and appointed, as though sure of victory, a vice-constable to superintend any summary executions that might be necessary. Meanwhile, Kent, Surrey, Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Devon had risen, and Grey, Lord Dorset, had declared for Henry Tudor in Exeter. It was the intention of Buckingham, who was in Wales, to form a junction with the Southern leaders. For this purpose it was necessary to cross the Severn. But Sir Humphrey Stafford had broken the bridges, the

Death of Buckingham and failure of the conspiracy.

floods were out, and the river impassable. His Welsh followers deserted, and Buckingham was obliged to fly. He sought a refuge with a dependant of his own in Shropshire, of the name of Banister, by whom he was betrayed. After vain entreaties for a personal interview with Richard, and for a legal trial, he was summarily executed. Richmond's part of the conspiracy had been an equal failure. His fleet had been scattered by a storm. He himself reached Plymouth, but the news of the failure of Buckingham, and the appearance of the King in the South, before whose approach all the gatherings of the rebels dissolved, induced him to return to Brittany.

Again undisputed master of England, Richard summoned a Parliament to meet him in January. As was usual when one party was predominant, it proved to be devoted to the Government. Richard's special favourite, Catesby, was chosen for speaker, and all Richard's claims to the throne were declared to be just. Nor was this all: the oath of allegiance was demanded from all the adult population of England; and a huge bill of attainder and confiscation, mentioning more than 500 names, was passed. As the King was allowed to regrant the confiscated property, he was enabled to fill the southern counties with northern and great confiscation.

Parliament
1484.

proprietors devoted to his cause; while with questionable wisdom, as it afterwards appeared, he sought to purchase the fidelity of the Stanleys, by giving to Lord Stanley, her present husband, the property of the Countess Margaret of Richmond, who was included in the bill of attainder.

But though defeated in his first efforts, her son, Henry Tudor, continued his preparations abroad. It was in vain that Richard, by promising Francis of Brittany his assistance against France, and by bribing the all-powerful minister Pierre Landais, succeeded in procuring Henry's dismissal from Brittany. He fled to the Court of Charles VIII. of France, where he was well received, and where the Lancastrian exiles gathered round him. Richard felt that all his efforts were necessary to oppose this Prince. He collected troops, demanded ships from the Cinque Ports, attempted a reconciliation with the Queen Dowager, by allowing her with her daughters to leave the sanctuary at Westminster, and contemplated a marriage between his own son Edward and her eldest daughter Elizabeth,

Continued
schemes of Richmond.

Richard's efforts to oppose him.

Attempts to win the Queen.

a marriage which would have been the death blow to the Lancastrian party. He succeeded moreover in procuring a three years' truce with Scotland, and the promise of a marriage between the Duke of Rothesay, the heir to the Scotch crown, and his niece.¹ The most important part of his plan was frustrated by the untimely death of his son, which plunged him in the deepest grief. But he strove to supply his place by nominating his nephew John de la Pole, the Earl of Lincoln, his heir.

Death of the
Prince of Wales.
Lincoln declared heir.

Meanwhile the feeling of uneasiness increased. Lancastrian emissaries moved to and fro through the country. Clifford and some others of them were apprehended and put to death. But the evil was too great to admit of a speedy remedy. Libels were freely scattered through the country; among others the well-known couplet, "The rat, the cat, and Lovel the dog, rule all England under the Hog," a plain allusion to his chief friends, Ratcliffe, Catesby and Lovel. William Collingbourne, its author, was captured and put to death. But libels increased in number, especially when there seemed to be grounds for asserting that, though his wife was still living, he was himself thinking of a subsequent marriage with the Princess Elizabeth of York. The opportune illness and death of his wife, and, it may be, the love² felt for him by the Princess, added such an air of truth to uneasiness in England.

General
1485.

¹ She was the daughter of his sister Elizabeth and the Duke of Suffolk.

² The love of the Princess rests upon a doubtful letter abridged by Buck in Kennett I. 568.

the story, that, at the instigation of his best friends, he was induced to make a public contradiction of it before the Common Council in London. His finances, too, were in disorder. Free-handed and ostentatious, he had speedily spent the wealth which his brother's avarice had accumulated; and though he had himself caused a bill to be passed to put an end to benevolences, he was reduced to have recourse to that illegal method of taxation which the people in bitter jest termed the raising of malevolences.

He was however prepared, when Richmond, supported by the French, made his second attempt upon England. But unfortunately for Richard, treason was at work among his own followers, and the Stanleys, without principle, without gratitude, and with a constant eye to their own aggrandizement, were in secret alliance with their young kinsman the Lancastrian Prince. At length the invasion came. The place of landing, which had been kept a profound secret, was Milford Haven: for the Tudor thought it prudent to enlist the national prejudices of the Welsh in his favour. The Leopard of England and the Dragon of Wales floated side by side on his standards. He advanced in safety to Shropshire; and the Welsh leaders joined him, as well as the Talbots of Shrewsbury. Richard had assembled his forces in the centre of England. Northumberland brought him troops from the North, Howard from the South, Brackenbury from London, Norfolk from the East. But it was very doubtful what part the Stanleys would take; and it was through the county where they were powerful, both as proprietors and as the King's governors, that Richmond had to pass. Lord Stanley demanded leave to go to his county; but the King, whose suspicions had been raised, insisted on his leaving his son Lord Strange as a hostage. Pleading illness, Lord Stanley had refused to join Richard, and with 5000 men retired before the invader, whom his brother Sir William had now openly joined. In August the armies approached one another in the neighbourhood of Atherstone.

Battle of Bosworth.
Aug. 22.

Richard then threw aside all doubts. He ordered Lord Strange to be beheaded, and felt that the struggle must be a final one. Lord Strange's keepers, however, thought it well to await the issue of the battle before carrying out the command: and in the middle of the struggle, Lord Stanley, who, afraid for his son's life, had kept aloof with his troops, suddenly joined Richmond. This turned the fortunes of the day; and in spite of the greatest personal bravery, Richard's army was completely beaten, and himself killed.

His character has been the subject of much discussion, nor is this strange. Had he lived in times of greater security, he would have been an able and admirable governor. Several of the enactments of his reign attest his wisdom and his love of justice. He recognized the evil of benevolences, and forbade them, although necessity drove him to have recourse to them. His efforts were much directed to the re-establishment of justice, to support which he had caused a bill to be passed, to secure the respectability of jurymen, by forbidding any but freeholders to the amount of 40s. from serving in that capacity. He restrained the lawlessness of the barons by the suppression of liveries; and while promising to uphold the liberties of the Church, had shown that he would not allow any interference with the civil power. He had also fostered the trade of England by opening fresh markets for English wool both in Spain and in Iceland. His personal character, too, was attractive. With beautiful though peculiar features, he was liberal and at times forgiving to the verge of folly. He had pardoned and extended constant favour to the wives and families of his political victims. In spite of his strange charge of adultery against her, he had been always a dutiful and affectionate son to his mother. The gentle side of his disposition is perhaps shown by his passionate love of music. But the troublous times in which he lived called out all his worst characteristics; and for political ends he had shown himself scheming, cold, and cruel; while the tyrannical temperament, which could brook no opposition, hurried him into deeds of violence which were the proximate cause of his downfall.

Richard's character and laws.

It is necessary, as the border-land is thus reached between modern civilization and that of the middle ages, to say a few words on the political condition of the nation, which allowed of the establishment of the personal monarchy of the Tudors, and of the social state of the people from which modern forms of civilization were to spring.

Political condition of the nation.

During the earlier part of the Lancastrian rule, Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, had apparently continued to rise in power. The Constitutional growth of the fourteenth century had been continued. The Commons had secured the unquestioned right of originating money bills, not to be altered by the House of Lords, nor discussed in the presence of the King. They had secured the right not only of recommending in petitions, but also of joining as an equal estate of the realm in the passing of laws. They had the story, that, at the instigation of his best friends, he was induced to make a public contradiction of it before the Common Council in London. His finances, too, were in disorder. Free-handed and ostentatious, he had speedily spent the wealth which his brother's avarice had accumulated; and though he had himself caused a bill to be passed to put an end to benevolences, he was reduced to have recourse to that illegal method of taxation which the people in bitter jest termed the raising of malevolences.

He was however prepared, when Richmond, supported by the French, made his second attempt upon England. But unfortunately for Richard, treason was at work among his own followers, and the Stanleys, without principle, without gratitude, and with a constant eye to their own aggrandizement, were in secret alliance with their young kinsman the Lancastrian Prince. At length the invasion came. The place of landing, which had been kept a profound secret, was Milford Haven: for the Tudor thought it prudent to enlist the national prejudices of the Welsh in his favour. The Leopard of England and the Dragon of Wales floated side by side on his standards. He advanced in safety to Shropshire; and the Welsh leaders joined him, as well as the Talbots of Shrewsbury. Richard had assembled his forces in the centre of England. Northumberland brought him troops from the North, Howard from the South, Brackenbury from London, Norfolk from the East. But it was very doubtful what part the Stanleys would take; and it was through the county where they were powerful, both as proprietors and as the King's governors, that Richmond had to pass. Lord Stanley demanded leave to go to his county; but the King, whose suspicions had been raised, insisted on his leaving his son Lord Strange as a hostage. Pleading illness, Lord Stanley had refused to join Richard, and with 5000 men retired before the invader, whom his brother Sir William had now openly joined. In August the armies approached one another in the neighbourhood of Atherstone.

Battle of Bosworth.
Aug. 22.

Richard then threw aside all doubts. He ordered Lord Strange to be beheaded, and felt that the struggle must be a final one. Lord Strange's keepers, however, thought it well to await the issue of the battle before carrying out the command: and in the middle of the struggle, Lord Stanley, who, afraid for his son's life, had kept aloof with his troops, suddenly joined Richmond. This turned the fortunes of the day; and in spite of the greatest personal bravery, Richard's army was completely beaten, and himself killed.

His character has been the subject of much discussion, nor is this strange. Had he lived in times of greater security, he would have been an able and admirable governor. Several of the enactments of his reign attest his wisdom and his love of justice. He recognized the evil of benevolences, and forbade them, although necessity drove him to have recourse to them. His efforts were much directed to the re-establishment of justice, to support which he had caused a bill to be passed, to secure the respectability of jurymen, by forbidding any but freeholders to the amount of 40s. from serving in that capacity. He restrained the lawlessness of the barons by the suppression of liveries; and while promising to uphold the liberties of the Church, had shown that he would not allow any interference with the civil power. He had also fostered the trade of England by opening fresh markets for English wool both in Spain and in Iceland. His personal character, too, was attractive. With beautiful though peculiar features, he was liberal and at times forgiving to the verge of folly. He had pardoned and extended constant favour to the wives and families of his political victims. In spite of his strange charge of adultery against her, he had been always a dutiful and affectionate son to his mother. The gentle side of his disposition is perhaps shown by his passionate love of music. But the troublous times in which he lived called out all his worst characteristics; and for political ends he had shown himself scheming, cold, and cruel; while the tyrannical temperament, which could brook no opposition, hurried him into deeds of violence which were the proximate cause of his downfall.

Richard's
character and laws.

It is necessary, as the border-land is thus reached between modern civilization and that of the middle ages, to say a few words on the political condition of the nation, which allowed of the establishment of the personal monarchy of the Tudors, and of the social state of the people from which modern forms of civilization were to spring.

Political condition of the nation.

During the earlier part of the Lancastrian rule, Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, had apparently continued to rise in power. The Constitutional growth of the fourteenth century had been continued. The Commons had secured the unquestioned right of originating money bills, not to be altered by the House of Lords, nor discussed in the presence of the King. They had secured the right not only of recommending in petitions, but also of joining as an equal estate of the realm in the passing of laws. They had succeeded during the reign of Henry VI. in preventing any changes in the form of their petitions (which had not unfrequently been introduced when, after the session, the petition was enrolled), by bringing in complete Statutes, called Bills, to be rejected or accepted as a whole, instead of their old petitions. They had, in several instances, practised unquestioned the right of impeachment, and claimed, with some degree of success, the freedom of their members from arrest, even during the recess of Parliament. But in spite of this apparent advance, the real power of the Parliament before the close of the Wars of the Roses had almost disappeared. A statute in the eighth year of Henry VI. limited the franchise, with regard to the election of knights of the shire, to freeholders of lands or tenements to the value of forty shillings. This at once gave an aristocratic tone to the House. In addition to this it had become the fashion both of the nobility and of the Crown to tamper with the elections. With the new restricted franchise, the power of local magnates in the county elections was predominant, while, as regards the boroughs, the sheriffs exercised a power of summoning burgesses from such towns only as they pleased, and it was not difficult for the Crown or ruling party to bring the sheriffs under their influence. While the House of Commons thus lost its independence, the old Upper House had been virtually destroyed, and the new nobility was by its very nature dependent on the Crown. Another most important element of freedom had likewise disappeared. The great Churchmen, to whom the liberties of England owe so much, had been victorious over their enemies the Lollards. In the struggle they had lost their sympathy with the people. Their desire for the spiritual welfare of the country had shrivelled to a selfish eagerness for the preservation of orthodoxy. They had been drawn into closer communication with Rome, and had begun to share its interests. Cardinal Beaufort, in spite of all opposition, had succeeded in retaining his Roman rank, and it had become habitual that the Archbishop of Canterbury at least should bear the title of Cardinal. Wealthy, worldly and self-seeking, the leaders of the clergy were inclined to devote themselves to political life; and, conscious of the alienation of the lower orders, and fearing for their property, which had already excited the envy of the laity, and which, while confiscation was reducing the nobles to beggary, had remained almost untouched, they sought employment and safety in becoming the devoted servants of the King.

At the same time that the practical efficiency of the Parliament had been decreasing, the power of the King's Council had been on the increase. The limits of its rights, springing as it did from the Concilium Ordinarium of the Plantagenet kings, had always been questionable, and its encroachments, in meddling with the petitions of the Lower House, and in issuing ordinances without the consent of Parliament, which had yet the authority of temporary laws, had been constantly objected to by the Commons. The long minority of Henry VI., during which the chief direction of the Government had been almost unavoidably in the hands of the Council, had tended greatly to increase its power.

Nevertheless, though constitutional growth had been checked, and the Commons had politically lost ground, the Wars of the Roses did not produce that complete exhaustion Effects of the Wars of the Roses. and depopulation of the country which might have been expected. The population appears to have been little, if at all, decreased, the number of inhabitants was still between three and four millions. In fact, it must be remembered that the broken hostilities of these wars did not on the whole amount to much more than three years of actual warfare; that the armies were in the field only for short consecutive periods, were usually few in number, and composed of untrained men, who returned, immediately their short service was over, to the cultivation of the fields. Thus the destruction and turbulence seemed to pass over the head of the great bulk of the population. Nor is this all. During the whole continuance of the war, the ordinary apparatus of justice was uninterrupted; courts were held, and judges went their circuit as usual. Indeed, it would seem to have been a period of unusual litigation, attended no doubt often with violence. For as property rapidly changed hands the titles to it became insecure, and the process therefore by which a title was questioned was frequently the violent dispossession of the present holder. But still it was to the courts of law that the ultimate appeal was made. Again, although the loss of France and the exclusive attention to home politics greatly diminished the national strength upon the sea, trade does not appear to have been seriously damaged. At all events, it was so kept alive, that upon the establishment of peace it revived with fresh vigour; and we are told that Edward IV. himself engaged in the pursuit. This trait is characteristic not only of the man but of the time. The pursuit of trade had risen greatly in estimation; great traders had become nobles, and Suffolk, the prime minister, was an example of the height to which such families might rise. From the decay of noble families, and other more permanent causes, land had been necessarily brought into the market. Wealthy traders had purchased it, set up for landowners, and aimed at the dignity of knighthood. At the same time, the secondary gentry of the country, taking advantage of the decline of the nobility, found means in the midst of the disturbances to increase their property and influence. In spite therefore of the apparent insignificance of Parliament, the middle classes were in a vigorous and improving condition.

Lower down in the social scale the case was somewhat different. Serfdom had indeed almost disappeared, and existed only here and there in isolated cases. Free labour for wages had become general, and land was largely held by payment of money rents. Thus far there was improvement. But the change from slavery to personal freedom is always purchased at a somewhat heavy price—that price is the existence of poverty; it is no longer incumbent on employers to look after the wellbeing of free labourers; in time of want they are thrown upon their own resources. The new possessors of the soil too were inclined to work it to better profit than their predecessors had done; grazing became more common and employment proportionately scarcer. The unemployed labourer had two courses open to him: he might betake himself to the towns, or join the ranks of the rapidly increasing class of beggars. He there found himself in company of numbers of idle and needy men who took advantage of the disturbed state of the country. Discharged soldiers and sailors, and vagabonds who called themselves travelling scholars, were so plentiful, that as there was as yet no poor law in existence, stringent enactments were made against them. The number of those punished for crimes of lawlessness and violence was enormous. Fortescue describes with pride how the poor Englishman, seeing others possess what he wanted, would never scruple to take it by violence rather than be without it. Those of the unemployed labourers who preferred to seek the towns went to increase the crowd of journeymen, whose position could not have been very enviable. For the guild system was breaking down and giving place to the more modern arrangements of unlimited competition. The craft guilds, which in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries had triumphed over the merchant guilds and aristocratic citizens of the towns, had speedily begun to deteriorate. The object for which they were founded was to secure for all members of the craft a fair chance of livelihood, without the danger of destructive competition. This object implied that the guild was co-extensive with the trade and that its members were themselves craftsmen, carrying on their work with their own hands, with the assistance of apprentices. But a crowd of enfranchised villeins and unemployed labourers had gathered in the towns, and formed a class of journeymen or day-labourers, and the guild, originally a corporation of working men, changed gradually into an exclusive body of capitalists. Moreover, even within their own limits, their principles had failed as early as the reign of Edward III. We hear, for instance, of certain pepperers, who, separating themselves from their guild, became grocers [grossers] or general dealers. In other words, as individuals accumulated capital, they refused to have their enterprise limited by the guild laws; and thus setting up as independent capitalists, began to introduce the same relations between employer and employed which exist at present. Under these circumstances the unincorporated journeymen found the restrictions of the guild an obstacle in the way of advance, and were exposed to all the evils of an eager competition.

Changes in the lower classes.

While thus the political position of the different orders was giving room for a temporary establishment of almost absolute monarchy, but at the same time allowing the formation of that middle class which was to overthrow it, and while the exclusive system of the middle ages was giving way to the modern relations of labour, the new culture, the existence of which more than anything else separates the middle ages from modern times, was beginning to make its way. As the leader in this direction Humphrey of Gloucester may be mentioned. In spite of his turbulent and disorderly character, he was a sincere lover of literature. He was in communication with several of the greater Italian scholars. More than one classical translation was dedicated to him. He carried his love of inquiry so far that he is believed to have dabbled in magical arts; and it is generally reported that his books, which he left to Oxford, were the nucleus of the present great library there. He did not stand alone in his literary tastes. Tiptoft the Earl of Worcester was likewise impregnated with Italian learning, and, among the newer nobles, Lord Rivers gave distinguished patronage to the art of printing, which Caxton introduced into England in the year 1469. Altogether, it would seem that among the upper classes the rudiments of learning were beginning to be widely spread, and that the laity were gradually becoming sufficiently cultivated to rival the Churchmen, and to take their proper part in the government of the country. It may be observed as an indication of this that Henry VI.'s reign was marked by the foundation of Eton, and that several considerable colleges were founded both in Oxford and Cambridge during the century. It is probable that these were chiefly intended as defences for orthodoxy, the teaching being as yet confined to the worst form of scholasticism.

Influence of the Renaissance.

It is strange, immediately after the great civil war, and before the outbreak of nautical energy under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to meet with constant complaints of the degeneracy of the English as soldiers. But it seems as if changes in the military system, and the love of money and luxury which accompanied the Renaissance, were really producing their effects. Archery was giving way to the use of gunpowder; and we meet with statutes fixing the price of bows, and enacting general practice of archery, which clearly show that the use of the national weapon had to be artificially fostered. There was considerable difficulty in collecting a sufficiency of troops before the Battle of Bosworth, and Caxton writes to Richard III. a deplorable account of the decay of knighthood, to be cured, as he thinks, by the reintroduction of tournaments and the perusal of chivalrous romances. A change in warfare was, in fact, going on in Europe, which called into existence abroad standing armies, and the effect of which was felt in England, though circumstances postponed the establishment of a regular army some time longer. It was thus amid the general weakness in all classes except the Crown, and during the development of great social changes, that the Tudor sovereigns found it possible to establish that peculiar personal monarchy which occupies the transition period between mediæval and modern times, and under the shadow of which the various classes regained strength for the subsequent re-establishment of the Constitution.

INDEX

- ACRE, siege of, 119; taken by Richard I., 120
 Adela, daughter of Robert of Flanders, marries Cunt, 54
 Elfgar, son of Leofric, given Harold's earldom of the East Angles, 22; succeeds his father as Earl of Mercia, 23
 Elfgifu, wife of King Edwy, 12, 13
 Elfric, Ealdorman of the Mercians, deserts Wiltshire and Salisbury, 17
 Æthelbald, son of Æthelwulf, marries Judith, 6; conspires against his father, 6
 Æthelberht, Bretwalda, King of Kent, first Christian king, 3
 Æthelberht, King of Wessex and Kent, 6
 Æthelræd, daughter of Alfred, Lady of the Mercians, 9; her castles, 10
 Æthelrith, King of Northumbria, 2
 Ætheling, legitimate son of the royal family, 34
 Æthelmær, brother of Stigand, Bishop of the East Angles, 49
 Æthelred, King of Wessex and Kent, repels the Danes, 7
 Æthelred the Unready, his enmity to Dunstan, 15; his weak rule, quarrels with Cumberland and Normandy, 16; marries Emma, massacres the Danes, 17; flies to Normandy, is recalled and restored, 18; dies, 19
 Æthelstan, son of Eadward, incorporates Bernicia, his supremacy acknowledged by Scotland, 11
 Æthelwine, Bishop of Durham, receives Robert de Comines, 46; deprived and outlawed, 49; at Hereward's camp, 50; made prisoner, 51
 Æthelwulf, King of Wessex, fights against the Danes, forms a connection with Rome, divides his kingdom, 6
 Agriculture, the early system, 28; ignorance of, causes famine, 72; neglected, 87; effect of the Black Death on, 229; sheep farms, 256; improvement in, 267
 Aidan, missionary from Iona, 4
 Alan Fergant of Brittany joins Philip of France against William I., marries William's daughter Constance, 53; his son joins Matilda, 82
 Alexander II. of Scotland, swears fealty to John, 132
 Alexander III. of Scotland, swears fealty to Edward I., 172; dies, 181
 Alexander II., Pope, sends a ring and banner to William I., 25
 Alexander III., Pope, acknowledged by France and England, lives at Sens, 94; anxious to secure Henry II.'s friendship, gives Becket slight support, 96; receives him on his flight from England, returns to Italy, Frederick of Germany still refuses to acknowledge him, intercourse forbidden by Henry II. between him and England, 98; appoints legates to examine Becket's case, 99; removes the excommunications, 100; he suspends Becket, 100; sends a commission, 100; after Becket's death sends legates for a formal inquiry, 101; Henry II. promises adhesion to, 103
 Alfred the Great, anointed at Rome, 6; conquers the Danes at Ashdown, 7; makes peace, 7; improves the fleet, 8; flies from the Danes, 8; defeats them at Edington, 8; makes the Treaty of Wedmore, 8; establishes supremacy over Northumbria, 9; his character, 9
 Alfred, son of Æthelred, retires to Normandy, 19; returns to Essex and is murdered, 21
 Alice, sister of Philip II., quarrel concerning, 112; repudiated by Richard I., 118
 Alodial proprietor, or freeman, 33
 Alphege, Archbishop of Canterbury, killed by the Danes, 18; reburied with honour by Cnut at Canterbury, 20
 Amiens, award of, 162
 Angles, come from Sleswig, 1; settle in England, 2
 Anjou [see Fulk and Geoffrey], Henry II. conquers, 91
 Anselm, Fitz-Arthur, delays the funeral of William I., 55
 Anselm, Abbot of Bec, made Archbishop of Canterbury, 61; reforms the Church, opposes William II., William accuses him of remissness in an expedition against Wales, 62; he retires to Rome, 62; recalled by Henry I., 63; threatens to excommunicate Robert's friends, 65; swears fealty to Matilda, 69; asserts the independence of the Church, goes to Rome, submits to a compromise at Bec, holds a synod at Westminster, 71
 Appellants, impeach the friends of Richard II., 248

Appellants against Gloucester promoted, 252; deprived, 276; conspire against Henry IV., 277
 Armagnacs, quarrel with Burgundians, 284-290; have charge of the war, 292
 Army, house-carls, 20; militia, 25; javelins and axes the national weapons at Battle of Hastings, 26; arrows at Battle of the Standard, 80; change in character of, 225, 227; raised by contract, 268
 Arras, congress of, 314
 Artevelt, alliance with Edward III., 219; offers to make Prince of Wales Count of Flanders, murdered, 224
 Arthur, son of Geoffrey of Brittany, guardianship claimed by Philip II., 111; supported by Longchamp, 121; Richard I.'s recognition of, not renewed, supported by Philip, 126; does homage to him, deserted by him, 127; besieges Queen Eleanor, 128; his death, 129
 Arundel, Bishop of Ely, Chancellor, 247; deposed, 249; Archbishop of Canterbury, banished, 252; supports Henry IV., 254; deprived of his chancellorship, 258
 Arundel, Lord, one of the Lords Appellants, 248; arrested, 251; executed, 252
 Ascough, minister under Suffolk, 318; executed, 320
 Assize of Clarendon and of Northampton, 106, 108
 Augustine, the Missionary, comes to England, 3
 Auxerre, Treaty of, 284; its effect, 290
 BAUBY, burnt, 283
 Bagsecg, a Danish leader, 7
 Baldwin of Flanders takes Philip II. prisoner, 124
 Baldwin of Redvers rebels against Stephen, 79
 Balliol, John, claims the Scotch throne, 182; decided by Edward I., 183; his position, 183; his rebellion, 185
 Balliol, Edward, first invasion of Scotland, 216; second invasion, 217
 Bamborough, founded by Ida, 2; Mowbray besieged in, 59
 Banking-houses of Italy, 179; of Bardi, 224
 Bari, Council of, 62
 Barons of the Exchequer, 75, 106; assessed the taxes, 114
 Battles—
 Agincourt, 295
 Arsouf, 120
 Assandun, 19
 Auray, 234
 Aylesford, 2
 Bannockburn, 203
 Basing, 7
 Beaugé, 301
 Blore Heath, 325
 Boroughbridge, 207
 Bouvines, 136
 Bramham, 282
 Brenneville, 68

Battles—continued

Brentford, 19
 Brunanburh, 11
 Châlons, 173
 Cressy, 225, 227
 Cricklade, 10
 Deorham, 2
 Dol, 104
 Dunbar, 185
 Edington, 8
 Ellandune, 5
 Englefield, 7
 Evesham, 167
 Ferrybridge, 328
 Formigny, 319
 Halidon Hill, 217
 Hastings, 26
 Heathfield, 3
 Hedgeley Moor, 320
 Hengestesdun, 5
 Herrings, the, 308
 Hettin, 111
 Hexham, 329
 Ipswich, 18
 Lewes, 168
 Lincoln, 83, 142
 Maldon, 16
 Maserfield, 4
 Merton, 7
 Mortimer's Cross, 327
 Mount Badon, 2
 Navarette, 235
 Neville's Cross, 228
 Northampton, 325
 Ockley, 6
 Orford, 19
 Otterbourne, 240
 Pataye, 310
 Pen Selwood, 19
 Poitiers, 231
 Fuyasac, 67
 Radcot, 248
 Reading, 7
 Rochelle, 236
 Sherstone, 19
 Shrewsbury, 280
 Stamford Bridge, 26
 Sluys, 220
 St. Albans, 323, 327
 St. Cloud, 284
 Swanage, 8
 Tenchebray, 66
 Tewkesbury, 335
 The Standard, 80
 Thetford, 7
 Towton, 328
 Verneuil, 305
 Wakefield, 327
 Wilton, 7, 84
 Basset, the Justiciary, hangs forty-four thieves at one Court, 74
 Beauchamp, Guy, second Earl of Warwick, opposes Gaveston, 200; beheads him, 202
 Beauchamp, Thomas, fourth Earl, one of the Lords Appellant, 248; arrested, 251; exiled, 252

Beauchamp, Richard, fifth Earl, succeeds York in France, 315
 Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, quarrels with Gloucester, 306; lends troops to Bedford, 311; legate, attacked by Gloucester, 312; at Arras, 314; visits Edinburgh, 315; head of peace party, 316; dies, 318
 Beaumont, Robert, Count of Mellent, good adviser of William I. and II., 62; supports Henry I., his large property, 65; dies, 68
 Beaumont, Waleram, Count of Mellent (son of Robert), opposes the Church, 81, 82; offers the crown to Theobald, 83
 Beaumont, Robert, Earl of Leicester (second son of Robert), offers the crown to Theobald, 83; joins Henry of Anjou, 85; left in charge of England, 91; ordered to pronounce sentence against Becket, 98; joins the Great Rebellion, 104
 Beaumont, Henry de (no relation to Counts of Mellent), favourite of Edward II., 201, 204
 Bec, compromise at, 71
 Beck, Anthony, Bishop of Durham, agent of Edward I., 172; sent to Scotland, 181
 Becket, first employed by Archbishop Theobald, 91; made Chancellor, 92; his magnificence, arranges Henry's marriage, 92; joins in Henry II.'s war with France, 93; made Archbishop, 95; changes his life, resigns his temporal offices, 95; upholds the encroachments of the Church, case of Philip Brois, 95; accepts the Constitutions of Clarendon, then retracts, 95; his reason for objecting, summoned to a council at Northampton, 96; charges against him, 97; his courage, leaves the court before judgment is given, and escapes to Gravesend, 98; puts himself under the protection of Louis VII., 98; favourably received by the Pope, 98; he excommunicates his enemies, retires to Sens, 99; meets the legates, but refuses to retract, suspended by the Pope, repeats his excommunications, 100; Henry yields, but refuses the kiss of peace, 100; at Fretheval he receives the kiss and a safe-conduct to England, returns, and continues his excommunications, his death, 101; Henry does penance at his shrine, 105; his bones removed to Canterbury Cathedral, 143
 Bedford. [See John.]
 Belesme, Robert de, son of Roger of Montgomery, opposes William II., 57; quarrels with Grantmesnil, 53; succeeds his brother Hugh as Earl of Shrewsbury, 59; constant opponent of Henry I., his great possessions, 65; Henry takes four castles from him, 66; he retires to Normandy, 66; taken prisoner by Henry at Bonneville, 67; his cruelties, 73

Benedictine rule, introduced into England by Dunstan, 15; abbey established at Chester by Anselm, 61
 Bereta, Christian wife of Æthelberht, 3
 Berengaria, daughter of Raymond of Barcelona, betrothed to Richard I., 93; marries him, 113
 Bernicia, a division of Northumbria, 2; conquered by Æthelstan, 11; made an earldom by Dunstan, 15
 Bigod, Roger, supports Henry I. against Robert, 65
 Bigod, Hugh (son of Roger), takes the Earldom of East Anglia (Norfolk), 79; declares for Henry II., 86; surrenders castles, 91; joins the Great Rebellion, 104
 Bigod, Roger, fourth Earl of Norfolk, one of the council, 159
 Bigod, Hugh (his brother), escapes, 164
 Birinus, converts Wessex, 4
 Black Death, 229; its effect on labour, 267
 Black Prince, at Cressy, 227; his expedition, 229; at Poitiers, 231; in Aquitaine, 234, 235; illness, 236; his political party, 239; dies, 240
 Blanche of Castile, engaged to Louis, 127; rules France, 145; defeats Henry, 148
 Blanchelande, Treaty of, 52
 Blanchetaque, ford of, 225, 293
 Bocland, explained, 31
 Bohun, third Earl of Hereford, refuses to command the army for Guienne, 187
 Bohun, fourth Earl, marries daughter of Edward I., chief of the baronial party, 202; killed, 207
 Boniface of Savoy, Archbishop of Canterbury, 151; wastes his see, 154; lives abroad, 158; collects an army, 164
 Borough, origin of, 32
 Bouchier, Robt., 1st lay chancellor, 221, 239
 Bouchier, Thomas, archbishop and chancellor, 322
 Breakspear, the only English Pope, Adrian IV., 90; grants Ireland to Henry I., 91
 Brember, Sir Nicholas, impeached, 248; executed, 249
 Brétigny, Peace of, 233
 Bretwalda, title of the dominant chief, 2
 Brian Fitz-Count, grandson of William I., holds Wallingford for Matilda, 82; attests her oath, 83; defends Wallingford against Stephen, 85
 Brihtnoth, fights the Battle of Maldon, 16
 Brihtic, brother of Eadric Streona, 17
 Britons expel the Romans, 1; invite the Saxons, 1; their possessions in the West, 3; independent north of the Dee, 5
 Brittany, suzerainty of, given up by Louis VI. to Henry I., 67; Henry II. gets a hold upon it by securing Nantes, 92; Earl Conan grants it to Henry II., 99; does homage to France, 127; alliance with England, 145; disputed succession in, 222; war in, 243; alliance with Henry V., 298; with France, 307; with England, 307; with France, 313; receives the Tudors, 336; banishes them, 347

Bruce, claim to the Scotch throne, 182; an English judge, 191
 Bruce, Robert, grandson of the claimant, 191; murders Comyn, crowned, 192; reconquers Scotland, 199; wins Battle of Bannockburn, 203; his offer of peace rejected, 204; excommunicated, 205; truce with, 206; promises help to the rebel barons, 207; title acknowledged by Edward II., 208; war with Edward III., marriage treaty, 214; dies, 216; his use of infantry, 227
 Bruce, Edward, accepts the throne of Ireland, 204; killed, 205
 Buckingham. [See Stafford.]
 Burgundy, Duke of (uncle of Charles VI.), disputes power with Orleans, 280
 Burgundy, John, murders Orleans, 282; negotiates with Henry V., 291; holds aloof from the war, 292; joins the Queen's party, 298; deserts Rouen, 299; murdered, 300
 Burgundy, Philip, son of John, negotiates with Henry V., 300; alliance with Bedford, 304; alliance weakened by Gloucester, 305; obtains the Netherlands, 306; renewed alliance, 307; quarrel with Bedford, 312; alliance with France, 314
 Burgundy, Charles the Bold, marries Margaret, sister of Edward IV., 331; alliance with Edward against France, 337; death of, 336
 Burgundy, Mary of, proposals of marriage for, 336; marries Maximilian, dies, 339
 Burihed, King of Mercia, 7, 8
 Burnell, Chancellor, 172; his advice, 179
 CADE, Jack, his rebellion, 320
 Calais, siege of, 228
 Calne, Dunstan's synod at, 15
 Calverley, general of the Free Companies, 234
 Castles, built by Edward, the nucleus of towns, 10; built by William I. as garrisons, 43, 45-47; set up in Wales, 59; Wales kept in subjection by, 70; multiplied in Stephen's reign, a sign of anarchy, 80; tortures perpetrated in them, 87; number of, 90; put down by Henry II., 90
 Catesby, favourite of Richard III., 345; speaker of his Parliament, 346; couplet on him, 347
 Catherine of France, marries Henry V., 300
 Caxton, introduces printing, 353
 Ceawlin, a Bretwalda, 2
 Cenwulf, Christian king of Mercia, 4
 Ceolwulf, a Danish agent, king of Mercia, 8
 Ceorl, or freeman, 29
 Cerdic, a Saxon leader, 2
 Chancellor of the Exchequer, his duties, 75; head of the secretaries, 106
 Chandos, English general in France, 234, 235
 Charlemagne corresponds with Offa, 5; checks the Danes, 5
 Charles d'Albret, Constable of France, 292; his character, 293

Charles IV. demands homage of Edward II., 209
 Charles VI., accession, 234; foments rebellion in Aquitaine, 235; his daughter marries Richard II., 251; his madness, 290; dies, 302
 Charles VII., becomes Dauphin, 298; rescued by Duchâtel, 299; succeeds to the throne, 302; character of, 304; crowned at Rheims, 310; enters Paris, 315
 Charter, the Great. [See Magna.]
 Charter of Henry I., 64; of Stephen, 78
 Chartres, treaty of, 189
 Chateau-Gaillard, taken by Philip, 129
 Chaucer, 271, 273, 274
 Chester, conquered by Egberht, 5; a Danish burgh, 8; taken by William, 48; made a Palatine county, 51; constant fighting with Wales, 58
 Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, persecutes the Lollards, 289; grants money for the French War, 291
 Chinton, peace of, 136; renewed, 143
 Church, organized by Theodore of Tarsus, 4; increased importance of, 14; Dunstan's reforms, 15; its important position at the time of the Conquest, 36; marriage of the clergy permitted, 36; ecclesiastical and secular jurisdiction separated, 38, 49; its national character, 48; William I. tries to Romanize it, 88, 48; marriage of the clergy forbidden by Lanfranc, 49; William I. head of, 49; general improvement of, 50; oppressed by William II., his bad appointments, 60; archbishopric vacant four years after Lanfranc's death, 61; want of discipline in, 61; Anselm defends ecclesiastical rights, 62; his reforms, 62; Irish and Scotch bishops acknowledge the supremacy of Canterbury, 62; laymen forbidden to confer investitures, 62; dispute between Anselm and Henry I. as to the supremacy of the Church or State, 71; ends in a compromise at Bec, 71; decrees against abuses in the Church at a synod at Westminster, 71; its civilizing power, 71; continued bad appointments in, 72; its influence secures Stephen the throne, 77; its great power, 78; offended by Stephen, espouses Matilda's cause, 81, 82, 83; mediates a compromise between Stephen and Prince Henry, 86; gives scutage in Henry II.'s wars with Wales, 91; and with France, 93; abuses arising from the clergy not being amenable to the secular courts, 94; claims upheld by Becket, 95, 96; Richard I.'s ransom chiefly paid by, 123; dispute as to the election of archbishops, 130; interdict in John's reign, 131; money extorted from, 133; rights secured by Magna Charta, 138; supports De Burgh, 143; Langton resists Papal tyranny, 144, 146, 147; society formed against foreign priests, 148; opposes Des

Roches, 150; joins the lay opposition, 152; revival in, 153; foreign priests, 155; Papal extortions, 158; Statute of Mortmain, 175, 196; half their property demanded by Edward I., 185; refuses further grants, 186; outlawed, 187; represented in Parliament, 194; quarrel with Edward II., 209; Edward III. attempts to exclude the Bishops from Parliament, 221; begins to be disliked by the people, 238, 239; attacked by Wicliffe, 245, 267; Statute of Provisors, 250; hated by the people, 266; supported by Henry IV., 284; persecutes the Lollards, 289; urges Henry V. to the French war, 290; grants him the incomes of priories held by foreigners, 291; remains prosperous during the war, 318; retains its property during the Wars of the Roses, 340; loses spirituality and sympathy with the people, 350
 Cistercian order, Henry II. threatens to expel it for receiving Becket, 99
 Clare, Richard de, Earl of Gloucester, head of the Barons, 159; quarrels with De Montfort, 161; commands the baronial party, dies, 162
 Clare, Gilbert de, Earl of Gloucester, joins De Montfort, 162; on the committee, 164; deserts De Montfort, 166; rejoins the baronial party, 168; governor in Edward I.'s absence, 172
 Clarence. [See Lionel and Thomas.]
 Clarence, George, son of Richard of York, marriage, 332; supports Wells' rebellion, 333; accompanies Warwick, 334; joins Edward, 335; quarrels with Richard, 336; his death, 337
 Clifford, killed at St. Albans, 323; a northern lord, opponent of the Nevilles, 324
 Clifford (his son), killed at Ferrybridge, 323
 Clifford, executed by Richard III., 347
 Cnat, son of Swegen, acknowledged King of England by the Danes, compelled to retreat, 18; Edmund cedes to him Northumbria and Mercia, acknowledged King of England on Edmund's death, banishes the royal family, 19; desires to form a Scandinavian empire, his code of laws, goes to Rome, 20
 Cnat, King of Denmark, threatens to invade England, 54; dies, 55
 Cobham, Lord, joins York, 321
 Coinage, false, forbidden, 64; issued, 72; severe punishment against, 74; habit of breaking it, 74; private coinage, 86; renewed by Edward I., 175; described in Edward III.'s time, 258, 259
 Columba founds Iona, 4
 Comitatus, body of warriors attending a chief, 30
 Commendation, explained, 81; reasons for, 83
 Comyn, member of the regency, 181; his claim to the throne, 182

Comyn, John, regent, 190; makes a treaty with Edward I., 191; murdered, 192
 Conan, a citizen of Rouen, rebels against Robert, 57
 Conan, Prince of Brittany, marries a daughter of Henry I., 67; grants Brittany to Henry II., 99
 Conrad of Montferrat, King of Jerusalem, 119, 120
 Constance, daughter of William I., marries Alan Fergant of Brittany, 58
 Constance, marries Geoffrey, son of Henry II., 99; upholds Arthur's claims, 126
 Constantine, King of Scotland, receives Guthrith, defeated by Æthelstan, acknowledges his supremacy, 11
 Constitutions of Clarendon, produced by Henry II., 95; description of, 96; Becket accepts and recants, 96; Henry II. promises to abrogate, 103
 Conversion of the English, 3
 Convocation, origin of, 193
 Copsige, Earl of Bernicia, killed in a revolt, 44
 Cornwall, British possession, 3; submits to Wessex, 5; alliance with the Danes, 5
 Cosne, siege of, 301
 Cotentin given to Robert of Normandy, 65
 Councils—of Bari, 62; of Rome, 62; of Clarendon, 95; of Northampton, 96; of Lyons, 154
 Courcy, fights in Ireland, 103; suppressed by De Lacey, 132
 Courtenay, Thomas, sixth Earl of Devonshire, with York, 320; at war with Lord Bonville, 321; joins Henry VI., 323; beheaded, 329
 Courtenay, John, eighth Earl (brother of Thomas), killed at Tewkesbury, 335
 Courts (of law and justice) before the Conquest, 32-34; modified by William I., 37, 38; by Henry I., 74-76; dispute between secular and ecclesiastical, 94, 96; reorganized by Henry II., 106, 107, 108; superiority of central courts increased, 124, 125
 Cressingham, Treasurer of Scotland, 186; defeated by Wallace, 189
 Cromwell, Ralph, treasurer, 313; joins York, 321
 Crusades, Robert pledges Normandy to be free to join in, 59; his success at Dorylæum and Ascalon, 65; Ivo of Grantmesnil at the siege of Antioch, 65; preached by St. Bernard, 84; Henry II. promises to go on one, 103; causes for the third, 110; urged by the Pope, 111; preached by Heraclius, Bishop of Jerusalem, 111; bad effect of, in England, 116; of Richard I., 117-121; perversions of, 153; made excuse for taxes, 146, 155
 Cumberland, overrun by Danes, 8; refuses to pay the Danegelt, 16; a Scotch district, 51; William II. peoples it from the destroyed villages near Winchester, 58; David I. does homage for, 79

Curia Regis, established by William I, 38; organized by Henry I, 75; has no legislative authority, 76; reconstituted by Henry II, 106; restricted to five persons, 107

Customs, origin of, 174

Cymric, a Saxon leader, 2

Cytric of Northumbria does fealty to Æthelstan, 11

DANES, first appearance of, 5; winter in Thanet, 6; conquer Northumbria and East Anglia, 7; further conquests, treaty of Wedmore, 8; in Ireland, 11, 14; in the Lothians, 14; fresh invasions in Æthelred's reign, 15; massacred by Æthelred, 17; fresh invasion under Thurkill, 17

Danegelt, begun by Æthelred at Sigeric's advice, 16; imposed by William I. on Cnut's threatened invasion, 54; Henry II. makes scutage take its place, 93; farmed, 113; renewed by Richard I., 125

Danelagu, country granted to the Danes, 10; joins Swegen, 18

Danish burghs, names of, 8; Edmund Ironside gets possession of them, 13

David of Wales, his rebellion and death, 176

David I., King of Scotland, supports Matilda's claims, conspiracy to make him King of England, invades England, 79

David II. of Scotland, marries Jane, sister of Edward III., 214; deposed by Balliol, takes refuge in France, 217; invades England, taken prisoner, 228; his conduct as prisoner, 231; released, 232

Decretals, False, note, 94, 96

Deira, southern division of Northumbria, 2

De Lacey. [See Lacey.]

Derby, son of Henry of Lancaster, sent to Gascony, 224

Dermot, King of Leinster, carries off O'Ruark's wife, 102; does homage to Henry II., Strongbow marries his daughter, 102

Despenser, Thomas, made Earl of Gloucester, 252; deprived, 276; executed, 277

Despensers, favourites of Edward II., 204; power increases, 205; quarrel with the Welsh marchers, banished, 206; recalled, 207; triumphant, 208; prevent Edward II. from going to France, 209; executed, 210

Devonshire. [See Courtenay.]

Domain, royal, origin of, 31, 33; increased by William I., 43; granted by Stephen to his new earls, 80; source of royal revenue, 113

Domesday-Book, a register of land, 38; entries of "waste" in it, 47; Hereward's property mentioned in, 51; made by William I., 55; Ralph Flambard proposes to complete it, 57; surveyors for it examined on oath, 108; a similar survey ordered by Richard I., 126

Dominicans, in England, 153

Dress, in Edward III.'s time, 263

Dublin, a Danish town, conquered by Strongbow, surrendered to Henry II., 102; colonized by English, 103

Dunois, French general, 310

Dunstan, legends concerning him, 12; his life, 13; his imperial rule, 14; his reform of the Church, 15; his enemies force him to retire, 15

Dyfed, a province in Wales, granted to Arnulf of Montgomery, 59

Dymock, joins Wells' rebellion, 333

EADGAR the Peaceful, Dunstan raises him to an imperial position, 13, 14, 15

Eadgar, grandson of Edmund Ironside, Harold elected king instead of, 24; elected king by the Southern Witan, 41; offers the crown to William, 41; attempts a rebellion, flies to Scotland, 45; returns, 46; received by Malcolm Canmore, 51; serves with Robert of Normandy, taken prisoner at Tenchebray, but set free, 66; dies, 67

Eadred, conquers Northumbria, 11; his reign, 13

Eadric Streona, his bad influence, marries Æthelred's daughter Edith, 17; his treachery, 18; Cnut employs him to kill Edwy, 19; made Earl of Mercia, 20; put to death, 20

Eadric the Forester, or the Wild, ravages Hereford, 44; supports Edgar against William I., 45; besieges Shrewsbury, and is defeated, 46, 47; goes with William to Scotland, 52

Eadward the Elder, his reign, 10, 11

Eadward the Martyr, 15

Eadwine, King of Northumbria, 3

Ealdred, Archbishop of York, offers William I. the crown, 41; death of, 49

Ealdorman, origin of, 29; rise of, 31; duties of, 32

Earl, origin of, 29, 35

Earldoms, Dunstan divides Northumbria into three, 14; Cnut divides England into four, 20; Godwine's family obtain large, 22; William I. limits their size to one county each, 37, 43; only three in 1131, 80; Stephen creates many, 80

East Anglia, foundation of, 2; subject to Kent, conversion of, conquered by Eadwine, 3; conquered by Danes, 7; helps Hastings against Alfred, 9; acknowledges the supremacy of Wessex, 10; supports Dunstan's party, 13; repels the Danish invasion in Æthelred's reign, 16; resists the Danes under Ulfcytel, 17; Cnut makes it an earldom, 20; helps Harold against William I., 26; Ralph of Gwader, Earl of, 52; Bigod becomes Earl of, 79

Egbert, King of Wessex, secures its supremacy, 5

Edith, daughter of Godwine, marries Edward the Confessor, 21; dies, 53

Edmund, King of East Anglia, 7

Edmund, King, 11; makes Osulf Earl of Northumbria, 12; grants part of Strathclyde to Scotland, 12

Edmund Ironside marries the wife of Sigeforth, 13; chosen king by London, 19; fights five battles against the Danes, 19; gives up Northumbria and Mercia to Cnut, 19; fate of his sons, 19, 20

Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, 147; causes Des Roches' fall, 150; his death, 151; his reforms, 153

Edmund, son of Henry III., accepts the kingdom of Sicily, 157; governor in Henry III.'s absence, 172; negotiates with Philip IV., 184

Edmund, fifth son of Edward III., Duke of Cambridge and York, fighting in France, 235; his marriage, 236; friendly to Richard II., 249, 251; assists Lancaster, 253

Edmund, Earl of March, ignored by Henry IV., 276; attempted escape, 280; reinstated by Henry V., 288; conspiracy to crown him, 292

Edmund, Duke of Rutland, son of Richard of York, escapes to Ireland, 325; beheaded, 327

Edward I., governor of Gascony, 156; engaged to Eleanor, 157; a reformer, 160; joins his father against the Barons, 162; prisoner after Lewes, 163; desire for his release, 164; escapes, 166; wins battle of Evesham, receives De Montfort's property, 167; goes on a crusade, 168; his coronation, 172; his character, 173; conquers Wales, 175, 176; mediator between France and Aragon, 178; checks disturbances, banishes the Jews, 179; proposes a marriage treaty with Scotland, 181; death of his wife, 182; awards the crown of Scotland, 183; war with France, 184; with Scotland, 185, 186; outlaws the clergy, 187; arbitrary taxation, 187, 188; goes to Flanders, 188; makes treaty of Chartres, 189; marries Margaret, 190; defeats Wallace, 190; second conquest of Scotland, 191; death, 192

Edward II., betrothed to Maid of Norway, 181; governor in Edward I.'s absence, 187, 188; betrothed to Isabella, 190; his character, 197; favours to Gaveston, first expedition to Scotland, 198; imprisonment the Templars, 199; second invasion of Scotland, 200; restores Gaveston, flies from Lancaster, 202; third invasion of Scotland, Bannockburn, 203; accepts Lancaster as Minister, 205; favours the Despensers, 206; fourth invasion of Scotland, 208; quarrels with the Church, with France, 209; taken prisoner, 210; murdered, 211

Edward III., engaged to Philippa, 210; made king, 211; overthrows Mortimer, 215; receives Balliol's fealty, his claim to the French throne, 217; prepares for war, 219; assumes the title of King of France, wins the battle of Sluys, 220; displaces his ministry, quarrels with Stratford, 221; supports John of Montfort, 222; lands at La Hogue, 225; battle of Cressy, 227; at Calais, 228; invades Scotland, 229; makes peace with Scotland, 232; invades France, Peace of Brétigny, 233; failure and old age, 236; death, 241

Edward IV., takes refuge in Calais, lands with Warwick, 325; collects troops, 326; enters London, 327; wins the battle of Towton, 328; his first Parliament, 329; his marriage, 330; his Burgundian policy, 331; imprisoned by Warwick, 333; escapes to Flanders, 334; wins the battle of Barnet, 335; quarrels with Clarence, 336; expedition to France, 337; projects of marriage, 338; death and character, 339

Edward V., brought to London, 342; deposed, 343; murdered, 345

Edward, son of Henry VI., born, 322; marries Anne of Warwick, 334; killed, 335

Edward, son of Edward IV., captured, 343; murdered, 345

Edward, son of Richard III., dies, 347

Edward the Confessor, king, 21; love of Frenchmen, 22; character and death, 24; names Harold his successor, 25

Edward. [See Black Prince.]

Edwin, son of Ælfgar, succeeds to his earldom of Mercia, 24; defeated by Tostig, 26; deserts Harold, 26; hopes to be elected king, 40; refuses to assist Eadgar, 41; reinstated in his earldom, 44; joins a rebellion, but submits to William I., 45; joins Hereward's rebellion, 50; is killed, 50

Edwy, King, legends concerning him, 12; banishes Dunstan, 13; divides the kingdom with Eadgar, 13

Eleanor, divorced wife of Louis VII., marries Henry of Anjou, 85; her claim to Toulouse causes war between England and France, 92; she urges her sons to rebellion, 108; is disliked by Henry, 109; restrains John in Richard's absence, 122; boldly opposes him, 123; assists John against Arthur, 126; besieged in Mirabeau, 128

Eleanor, daughter of Henry II., marries Alphonso of Castile, 109; connects England with Spain, 114

Eleanor of Provence, marries Henry III., 151; assaulted by the Londoners, 162; assembles an army, 164

Eleanor of Castile, marries Edward I., 157; her death, 182

Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV., proposed marriages for, 338, 345, 347

Ella, leader of the Saxons, called Bretwalda, 2

Ella, King of Northumbria, 7

Emma, daughter of Richard the Fearless, marries Æthelred, 17; followed by many Normans, 17; retires to Normandy, 19; marries Cnut, 20

Emma, sister of Fitz-Osbern, marries Ralph, 52; defends Norwich, 53

English language, Provisions of Oxford published in, 160, 170; becomes the language of the people, 271; statute of Parliament in, 272; made national by Chaucer, 273

Englishry, law of, explained, 48

Equitable power, meaning of, 76

Esplechin, treaty of, 220

Essex, Earl of, judicial duel between him and De Montfort, 91

Ethel, land held by hereditary succession, 31

Ethelbald, King of Mercia, 4

Ethelric, Bishop of Selsey, 49

Eustace of Boulogne, husband of Edward the Confessor's sister, 22; attacks William's town of Dover, 44

Eustace, son of Stephen, Henry of Winchester demands from Matilda his foreign possessions for him, 84; Stephen brings him forward in opposition to Prince Henry, 85; dies, 86; Papal bull obtained to prevent his coronation, 92

Exchequer Court organized by Roger of Salisbury, 75; origin of the name, 106

Exeter, conquered by the Danes, 8, 17; faithful to Harold, 44; desires independence, 45; captured by William, 45

Exeter, Earl of. [See Holland.]

Eye, castle of, given to Becket, 92; he borrows money on, 97

FALCONBRIDGE. [See Neville.]

Fastolf, Sir John, at battle of the Herrings, 308; at Pataye, 310

Faukes de Breauté, destruction of, 145

Ferrand of Flanders, 133; attacks Phillip II., 134

Ferrars of Derby joins the Great Rebellion against Henry II., 104

Feudal system existed in England before the Conquest, 28; its institutions in Germany before the Saxon invasion, 29; origin of the connection between vassal and lord, 30; German institutions introduced into England, 31; connection between land and judicial power, 33; every man made the man of the King, 35; its natural growth checked by William I., 37; fresh institutions introduced, 37; unbridled in Stephen's reign, 78; introduction of new nobles, 137; chivalry takes its place, 270

Finance. [See Taxes.]

Fitz-Gerald, son of Nesta, invades Ireland with Strongbow, 102

Fitz-Gilbert, fights against Wales, 78; dies, 79

Fitz-Gilbert at Marlborough, 82

Fitz-Osbern, made Earl of Hereford, 43; the North left in his charge, 44; given the castle of York, 46; subdues the Rebellion in the West, 47

Fitz-Osbern, Roger, his conspiracy, 52, 53

Fitz-Peter, Geoffrey, Justiciary, 125; Earl of Essex, 126; character and death, 135

Flanders, Phillip, Count of, threatens to invade England, 100; joins the Rebellion against Henry II., 104

Fleet, improved by Alfred, 9; made powerful by Eadgar, 14; collected by Æthelred against the Danes, 17; condition of, in Edward III.'s reign, 261, 262

Flemings, Henry I., colonizes Wales with, 70

Folcland, public land, 31; becomes royal domain, 33; made crown property by William I., 43

Food, profusion of, 264

Franciscans, their success in England, 158

Frankpledge, described, 35; cannot be proved before the Conquest, 37; used by Henry I. as the basis of his police system, 74; the Hundred Court saw to its being carried out, 76

Frederick Barbarossa, asserts the supremacy of the secular power; sets up a rival Pope Victor IV., 94; on Victor's death sets up Pascal III., 98; asks for two daughters of Henry II. for his son, and for Henry of Saxony, 99; punishes Henry for deserting him, 109; dies on his way to the third crusade, 119

Free Companies of France, 232-234

Free-holders degenerate into villeins, 35

Froissart, his account of Gloucester, 251; describes Richard II.'s rule, 253

Fulk IV. of Anjou, assists Maine against William I., 52; against William II., 59; assists Henry I. against Robert, 66; supports William Clito against Henry I., 68; is won back by Henry, 68; turns against him on Robert's death, 69

Fulthorpe, betrays Richard II.'s plans to Gloucester, 248; convicts Scrope and Mowbray, 281

GASCOIGNE, Judge, refuses to convict Scrope and Mowbray, 281; removed, 283

Gascony, De Montfort's government of, 156

Gaston de Bearn, his rebellion, 156; treaty with Edward I., 172

Gaveston, Piers, favourite of Edward II., banished, 198; returns, 199; anger of the Barons against, banished, 200; returns, beheaded, 202

Geoffrey, Bishop of Coutances, relieves Montacute, 47; opposes William II., 57

Geoffrey, son of Fulk of Anjou, marries Matilda, 70; invades Normandy, 79; Stephen purchases a truce from, 79; Theobald proposes that the crown of England should be offered him, 84; dies, 85

Geoffrey of Lusignan, quarrels with Richard, 112

Geoffrey of Monmouth's Chronicle, 271

Geoffrey, son of Henry II., marries Constance of Brittany, 99; joins the Great Rebellion against his father, 104; is pardoned, 105; joins Henry against Richard and his father, 110; joins John against Richard, 111; hurt by his father's partiality to John, claims Anjou, his father refuses, he flies to France, and dies, 111

Geoffrey, natural son of Henry II., repels a Scotch invasion, 104; made Bishop of Lincoln, 105; made chancellor, attends Henry at his death, 112, 113; made Archbishop of York in exchange for the chancellorship, 117; promises not to enter England in Richard's absence, 117; comes, and is arrested by Longchamp, 121; John takes his part, 121

Geraldus Cambrensis, the historian, his parentage, 70

Gerberol, reconciliation at, 54

Gerbod, the Fleming, stepson of William I., made Earl of Chester, 51

Gesith, comrade of the king, 30

Gisors, treaty of, 67; dispute concerning, 110; meeting at, 111

Godwine, made Earl of Essex, 20; gets the South of England for Harthacnut, practically rules himself, accused of murdering Alfred, his eloquence secures the throne for Edward, his daughter Edith marries the king, 21; his national policy opposed to Edward's French policy, obtains more earldoms for his family, 22; his rivalry with Leofric, banished, 22; returns in triumph, his death, 23; his support of the secular clergy, 25; his domains confiscated to William I., 43

Gospatrie, Earl of Northumberland, invades Cumberland, 61

Gregory the Great sends missionaries to England, 8

Grey of Ruthyn, taken prisoner, 278; ransomed, 279

Grey, Thomas, engaged to the heiress of the Duke of Exeter, 331; Earl of Dorset, 341; has charge of Edward V., apprehended, 342; beheaded, 343

Grey, Richard, 341; takes sanctuary at Westminster, 342

Grossetête, Bishop of Lincoln, his reforms, 153

Gryffith, his insurrection, 70

Gualo, Papal Legate, 141; recalled, 143

Guilds, described, 250-261, 352, 353

Guineamp, not granted to Henry II. with Brittany, 99

Gurth, fourth son of Godwine, made Earl of East Anglia, 23; killed at battle of Hastings, 27

Guthrum, Danish invader, King of East Anglia, 7; conquers Wareham and Exeter, baptized under the name of Æthelstan, 8

Gutred, King of Northumbria, 9

Guy of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, meets Richard I. at Cyprus, 118; besieges Acre, allies himself to Richard, 119; Richard, knowing his incompetence, makes Henry of Champagne king instead of him, 120

Gwynneth, his insurrection, 91

Gytha, mother of Harold, flies to the Channel Isles, 45

HALFDENE, Danish leader, 7; overruns Strathclyde, 8

Harlebur, capture of, 292

Harklay, defeats Lancaster at Borough-bridge, 207; executed, 208

Harold, son of Cnut, a barbarian, made King by Godwine, 21

Harold, son of Godwine, outlawed and goes to Ireland; his Earldom given to Ælfgar, 22; returns in triumph, succeeds to his father's earldom, fights successfully against Ælfgar and the Welsh, 23; elected King, 24; story of his oath to William, prepares to resist William's invasion, 25; conquers Tostig, forms his camp at Senlac, 26; killed in the battle, 27; strong party for his family in the West, 44; his sons dispersed, 45; land in Devonshire, 46; defeated and escape to Ireland, 47

Harold Hardrada, King of Norway, his exploits, joins Tostig, slain, 26

Harthacnut, King of South of England, 21

Hasting, a Danish pirate, 9

Hastings, his claim to the Scotch throne, 181

Hastings, of the new nobility, 341; joins Richard, 342, beheaded, 343

Haverfordwest, colonized by Flemings, 70

Heathenism, sustained by Penda, 3; succumbs to Oswy, 4

Hélle de la Flèche, resists William II. in Maine, 59; assists Henry I. against Robert, 66; William Clito intrusted to him, 67; flies with him, tries in vain to rouse the nobles in his favour, 67

Henry I., quarrels with Robert, 53; heir-apparent, 56; joins Robert against Conan of Rouen, 57; besieged in Mont St. Michel, 58; hunting in the New Forest, crowned, 63; conciliates England, his marriage, character of his policy, 64; overcomes Robert and his partisans, 65, 66; unites England and Normandy, 67; his son's death, 68; war against William Clito, 69; his death, 70; his dispute with Anselm, 71; his administration, 74-76

Henry II., born at Le Mans, 112; comes to England, succeeds to Anjou, his marriage, 85; his character, 89; his reforms, 90; fights in Anjou, Scotland, and Wales, 91; his friendship for Becket, marriage treaty with Louis VII., goes to war for Toulouse, 92; introduces scutage, 93; objects to clerical courts, 94; produces the Constitutions of Clarendon, 95; his dispute with Becket, 96-98; invades Wales, obtains Brittany, 99; reconciliation with Becket, 100; his behaviour at Becket's death, 101; his conquest of Ireland, 102, 103; suppresses the great insurrection, 104; makes peace with France, 105; his legislation, 106-108; his position in Europe, 109; difficulties with his sons, 110-112; his death, 113; his administration, and importance in Europe, 113, 114

- Henry III., declared of age, 144; quarrels with De Burgh, 147; fails in Poitou, 148; becomes his own Minister, his marriage, 151; second expedition to Poitou, 154; his favour for foreigners, 155; quarrel with De Montfort, 156; accepts the kingdom of Sicily, 157; promises reform, 159; swears to the Provisions of Oxford, 160; gets absolved from his vows, 161; at the battle of Lewes, 163; dies, 168
- Henry IV., made Earl of Derby, 247, friendly to Richard II., 251; quarrels with Norfolk, 252; returns from banishment, 253; captures Richard, 254; his coronation, 276; his difficulties, 277; expedition to Scotland, 278; his quarrel with the Percies, 279, 280; captures Prince James of Scotland, 281; his submission to the Commons, 282; his failing health, 283; his foreign policy, 284; his Church policy, his jealousy of the Prince of Wales, 285, 286
- Henry V., in command of the war in Wales, 278; at the battle of Shrewsbury, 280; head of the Council, 283; his character as Prince, 286; his popularity, 287; his Church policy, 288, 289; his reasons for the French war, 290; his preparations, 291; he captures Harfleur, 292; battle of Agincourt, 293, 295; his friendship for Sigismund, 297; his second invasion of France, 298; besieges Rouen, 299; makes the Treaty of Troyes, 300; enters Paris, dies, 301
- Henry VI., his education intrusted to Warwick, 302; coronation, 311; marriage, 316; his interview with York, 321; first fit of imbecility, recovers, 322; wounded at St. Albans, 323; second fit of imbecility, his recovery, 324; he attempts reconciliation, 325; deserted after the battle of Northampton, 326; rescued by the Queen at the second battle of St. Albans, 327; escapes to Scotland, 329; captured and imprisoned, 330; recrowned, 334; murdered, 336
- Henry of Poitou, Abbot of Peterborough, his bad character, 72
- Henry the Lion of Saxony, Frederick I. asks for Henry II.'s daughter for him, 99; he marries Matilda, 109; rival of Frederick, deserts him, 109; asks the help of Henry II., 109
- Henry, son of Henry II., marries Margaret of France, 92; crowned, 100; demands actual possession of part of his kingdom, 103; objects to his brother John's marriage-treaty, 103; befriended by Louis VII., joins the Great Rebellion against his father, 104; is conquered, his dependants have to abjure their fealty to him, 105; is reconciled with his father, 105; his character, 110; demands homage from his brothers, is refused, dies, 110
- Henry VI., Emperor of Germany, marries Constance of Sicily, 118; keeps Richard I. in prison, 122; receives his homage for England, 123
- Henry of Lancaster, second son of Edmund, joins Isabella against Edward II., 210; his opposition to Mortimer, 215; member of Edward III.'s council, 216
- Henry, Bishop of Winchester, brother of Stephen, secures him the throne, 77; upholds the dignity of the Church, escorts Matilda, demands the See of Salisbury for his nephew, 82; when Stephen refuses, declares his adhesion to Matilda, 83; alienated by her refusal of his request for Eustace, demands Stephen's release, besieged by Matilda at Winchester, 84; deprived of his legatine authority, 85; mediates a compromise between Henry and Stephen, 86; retires to Clugny, 90
- Henry d'Almeine, son of Richard, King of the Romans, prisoner after battle of Lewes, 163; desires conciliatory policy, 168; murdered, 172
- Heraclius, Bishop of Jerusalem, preaches a crusade, 111
- Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, defeats Jasper Tudor, killed, 332
- Hereford. [See Bohun.]
- Hereward, attacks the monastery of Peterborough, collects the old English exiles, 50; is defeated and escapes, legends concerning his death, 51
- Hidage explained, 113
- Hide of land explained, 31
- Hildebrand. [See Pope Gregory VII.]
- Holland, Sir John, brother of Richard II., kills a friar, 246; kills the Earl of Stafford, 247
- Holland, Duke of Exeter, flies to Scotland with Henry VI., 329; murdered, 356
- Horsa, Jutish Ealdorman, 1; killed, 2
- Houise-caris, explained, 20; used tyrannically, 21; faithful to Harold, 26
- Howard, Sir John, counsellor of Edward IV., 338; supports Richard III., 341; made Duke of Norfolk, 344; at the battle of Bosworth, 348
- Hubba invades England, 6
- Hubert de Burgh, has charge of Arthur, 129; defeats French fleet, 142; Regent, 143; destroys his enemies, 145; his rule, 146; prevents Henry III.'s expedition to France, 147; his fall, 148; character, 149; property restored, 150
- Hugh, Bishop of Rouen, deserts Stephen, 83
- Hugh of Avranches, Earl of Chester, assists Odo, 54; loses and wins back Anglesey, 59; invites Anselm to establish Benedictine Abbey at Chester, 61
- Hugh de Grantmesnil, holds large property in England, 46; opposes William I., 57; quarrels with Belesme, 58

- Hugh of Nenfchâtel receives Robert of Normandy, 53
- Hugh de Pudsey, Bishop of Durham, joins the Great Rebellion against Henry II., is conquered, 105; buys the earldom of Northumbria, 116; supplanted by Longchamp, becomes his enemy, 117; produces his grievances against him, 121
- Humphrey, fourth son of Henry IV., Duke of Gloucester, proposed Regent in England, 302; President of the Council, 304; marries Jacqueline, 305; quarrels with Beaufort, 306; persecutes the Lollards, 312; head of the war party, 313; his claim on Flanders, 315; his obstinacy, 316; his death, 317; his literary tastes, 353
- Hundred, analogous to the German Pagus, 29; England divided into, 31
- Hundred Court, in Saxon times, 32; connected with the Curia Regis by Henry I., 75, 76; its duties, 76
- Huntingdon, Earl of, deprived, 276; conspires against Henry IV., 277; executed, 277
- IMPEACHMENT, first instance of parliamentary, 240; by the Lords Appellant, 248
- Ingvar invades England, 6
- Interdict in John's reign, 131
- Investitures, dispute as to, 71
- Ireland, Danes in, 11; Harold's sons fly there, 22, 45; granted to Henry II. by Adrian IV., 91; condition of Strongbow's invasion, Henry II.'s conquest of, 102; land granted to his followers, 103; John restores order in, 132; Edward Bruce King of, 204; English government re-established, 205; Richard II.'s expedition to, 250; his second visit to, 253
- Irish Church, accepts Roman discipline, 102
- Isaac of Cyprus, conquered by Richard I., 118
- Isabella de la Marche, marries John, 128; marries Count de la Marche, 154
- Isabella of France, marries Edward II., 190; insulted at Leeds, 207; goes to France, 209; conspires against Edward II., 210; deposes him, 211; her rule, 213; her deposition, 216
- Isabella of France marries Richard II., 251; her restoration demanded, 278
- Isabella, wife of Charles VI., joins the Burgundians, 298
- Itinerant justices, sent out by Henry I., 75; by Henry II., 107, 108
- Ivo of Taillebois, 50
- Ivo of Grantmesnil, 65
- Ivry, siege of, 305
- JACQUELINE of Hainault, 305
- Jacquetta of St. Pol, marries Bedford, 312
- Jane, sister of Henry III., marries Alexander II., 143
- Jane, sister of Edward III., marries David II., 314
- Jane of Montfort defends Brittany, 222
- Jane Shore does penance, 348
- James I. of Scotland, captured and educated by Henry IV., 281; released, marries Joan Beaufort, 305; makes alliance with France, invades England, murdered, 315
- James III. of Scotland, his character, 338
- Jerusalem, kingdom of, refused by Robert, 65; character of, 111; overwhelmed by Saladin, 119
- Jews, admitted to England by William I., 115; their condition, persecuted by Richard, 116; by John, 133; banished by Edward I., 179
- Joan of Arc, 308-311
- Joanna, daughter of Henry II., marries William of Sicily, 109; imprisoned by Tancred, 118; restored to Richard I., accompanies him to Palestine, 118; marries Raymond of St. Gilles, 124
- John, Duke of Bedford, third son of Henry IV., Lieutenant of England, 291; Regent in France, 302, 303; character, marriage, 304; visits England, 306; returns, renews alliance with Burgundy and Brittany, 307; captures Joan of Arc, 311; his second marriage, 312; visits England, 313; dies, 314
- John, Bishop of Oxford, sent to the Pope, 98; his excommunication by Becket, 99; it is removed by the Pope, 100; sent as Becket's escort, 101; made Bishop of Norwich, 105
- John de Grey, Bishop of Norwich, elected Archbishop of Canterbury, great administrator, 130; governor in Ireland, 132
- John (King), marries Alice of Savoy, 103; favourite of Henry II., 109; war with Richard, 110, 111; Henry II.'s grief at his rebellion, 113; his great possessions, 117; tries to secure the succession, 121; restrained by his mother, purchases Philip's favour, 122, 123; his party destroyed, 123; nominated successor, crowned at Rouen and Westminster, 126; his strong position, 127; excites the anger of his subjects, 128; kills Arthur, loses Normandy, 129; quarrels with the Church and the Pope, 131; is excommunicated, settles Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, 132; his extortions, joins the League, 133; dethroned by the Pope, 134; is reconciled with the Church, goes to Poitou, 135; defeated at Bouvines, 136; signs Magna Charta, 137; attempts to break it, 139; dies, 140
- John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III., commanding in France, marriage, 236; assumes the government, 237, 239; renewed power, 240; protects Wicliffe, 240; hated by the people, 240, 244; head of the Council, 243; deserts Wicliffe, 245; character of his government, 245, 246; goes to Spain, 246; returns, 251; dies, 253

John, King of France, 229; taken prisoner at Poitiers, 231; liberated, 233; dies, 234
 Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, ancestress of Matilda, wife of William I., her three marriages, 6
 Jurisdiction, early organization of, 32; connected with the possession of land, 33, 36; of the Witan, 34; old machinery retained by William, 37; ecclesiastical separated from secular, 38, 94; private, 87; punishment of corrupt judges, 179
 Jury, origin of, 108
 Justiciary, his duties, 38; president of the Curia Regis, 75
 KEMP, Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor, 321; dies, 322
 Kenilworth, last stronghold of the Barons, 167, Dictum of, 168
 Kent, Earl of, half-brother of Edward II., his conspiracy and death, 215
 Kent, Earl of, his conspiracy against Henry IV., beheaded, 277
 King, the origin of, 30; his personal relation becomes territorial, 38; his office elective, 34; becomes supreme landowner, 37; practically irresponsible, 38; position of William I., 42; of Henry I., as feudal lord, 64; his equitable power, his power of making laws and levying taxes, 76; misery caused by a weak king, 78, 86, 87; rivalry with the Church, 94, 105; his judicial power, 107; opposition to his overstrained power, 125, 137, 138, 159; view of his position in a political poem of Henry III.'s time, 169, 170; desire of Edward I. for despotism, 173; opposition of his clergy and barons, 187, 188; his legislative power, 193; Edward II.'s prerogative restricted by the Ordinances, 201; Richard II.'s despotism, 253; Henry IV.'s power checked by the Commons, 282, 283; character of Edward IV.'s monarchy, 330, 340
 Knowles, general of the Free Companies, 284, 285; opposes Wat Tyler, 244
 LACEY, Hugh de, does homage for land beyond Hereford, 59
 Lacey, Hugh (his nephew), sent as envoy to O'Connor, 102; made Earl of Meath, 103
 Lacey, Hugh de (son of Earl of Meath), obtains the kingdom of Ulster, 132
 La Hire, French general, 310
 Lancaster, Thomas, Earl of, opposition to Gaveston, 209; his great possessions, Edward II. flies from, 202; made minister, 205; joins Hereford in rebellion, 206; surrenders, is beheaded, 207
 Land, how apportioned by the Saxons in England, 31; tenure becomes military, 37; granted to Normans by William I., 43
 Landrica, his jurisdiction, 33; his position, 34
 Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, connects the Church with Rome, 38; establishes ecclesiastical courts, 49; England left in charge of, 53; supports William II., 56; restrains him, 57; prevents the quarrel on investitures from reaching England, 60; dies, 57
 Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated, 131; opposes John, 135; causes Pandulf's fall, 143; excommunicates Hubert's enemies, 145; his national policy, 146; dies, 147
 Latimer, leader of a rebellion against Edward IV., 332
 La Tremouille, favourite of Charles VII., 310; opposed to peace, 313
 Layamon, his translation of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Chronicle, 271
 Leicester, [See Beaumont.]
 Leofric, Earl of Mercia, 20; competes with Godwine, 22
 Leofwine, fifth son of Godwine, outlawed, 22; Earl of Essex and Kent, 23; killed at Hastings, 27
 Lindisfarne, episcopal see in, 4
 Lionel, third son of Edward III., Duke of Clarence, left in command of England during the French war, 228; governor of Ireland, 250
 Lisle, Lord, 341; takes sanctuary, 342
 Literature, 270-274, 353
 Llewellyn, John's son-in-law, submits to him, 182
 Llewellyn, attacks Mortimer's lands, 162; refuses to obey the summons of Edward I., 175; conquered and killed, 176
 Llet, position of, 29; origin of, 30; settle on the demesne land, 31
 Lollards, their petition, 251; their doctrines, 267; persecuted by Henry IV., 285; by Henry V., 288, 289; by Gloucester, 312; by Suffolk, 318
 Longchamp, Chancellor, buys bishopric of Ely, 116; justiciary and legate, 117; Richard I. orders his arrest, his dispute with Geoffrey and John, is dismissed, 121; retires to France, 122
 Lothians, granted to Scotland, 14
 Louis VI., upholds William Clito, defeated at Puyssac, makes peace, 67
 Louis VII., divorces Eleanor, 85; his friendship secured by Henry II., 90; cemented by a marriage-treaty, war with Henry II., 92; receives Alexander III., 94; protects Becket, 98; war with Henry II., 100; supports Prince Henry, 103, 104; makes peace, 105; jealous of Henry II.'s power, 109
 Louis VIII., engaged to Blanche of Castile, 127; summoned to England, 139; retires, 142; dies, 145
 Louis XI., makes Treaty of Pecquigny, 338
 Louis of Bavaria, Emperor, dispute with the Pope, 219; joins France against Edward III., 222
 Lovel, favourite of Richard III., 345

MAOSES ETAS, men of Hereford, 19
 Magna Charta, 107, 137, 138, 139; re-enacted, 168; confirmed, 188
 Maid of Norway, betrothed, 161; dies, 182
 Maine, Robert, Governor of, 52, 53;
 William II. fights against, 59; suzerainty of, given up by Louis VI. to Henry I., 67
 Maintainers, complaints against, 245; explained, 270
 Malcolm I., King of Scotland, holds part of Strathclyde by military service, 12
 Malcolm II., King of Scotland, does homage to Cnut, 20
 Malcolm III., Canmore, King of Scotland, helps Eadgar, 45; commends himself to William I., 46; his savage invasions, 51; marries Eadgar's sister, does homage to William I., 52; his wars with William II., does homage to him, killed at Alnwick, 58
 Malcolm IV., King of Scotland, resigns three counties to Henry II., 90; does homage for Huntingdon, 91; follows Henry to his war with France, 98
 Malet, Count of, supports Robert, 65; banished, 67
 Manny, Sir Walter, raises siege of Hennebont, 222; invades Picardy, 233
 Manor, origin of, 32
 Mansell, holds seven hundred livings, 152; on Henry II.'s council, 159; driven to France, 162; joins Eleanor's army, 164
 Marcel, revolutionary leader in Paris, 232
 Margaret, sister of Eadgar, marries Malcolm, 52
 Margaret, daughter of William the Lion, sent as hostage to John, 132
 Margaret, of France, marries Edward I., 190
 Margaret, marries Henry VI., 316; character, 317; wins battles of Wakefield and St. Albans, rescues the King, 327; flies with him to Scotland, attempts to overthrow Edward IV., 329; defeated at Tewkesbury, 335; ransomed, 338
 Margaret, sister of Edward IV., marries Charles of Burgundy, 331
 Mark system, described, 28; how carried out, 31
 Marlborough, castle of, held for Matilda, 82
 Marriage of the clergy, permitted by Dunstan, 14, 15; forbidden by Lanfranc, 49
 Marshall, William, first Earl of Pembroke, ordered to supplant Longchamp, 121; summoned to Rouen, 126; advises John to disband his troops, 129; declares Henry III. King, 141; his character, government, 142; death, 143
 Marshall, William, second Earl, head of the Barons at Brackley, 136; his property attacked, 144; quarrels with De Burgh, 146
 Marshall, Richard, third Earl, his patriotism, 149; outlawed, murdered, 150
 Marshall, Gilbert, fourth Earl, restored to favour, 150
 Martin, Papal agent, his exactions, 154
 Mary of Burgundy, rivals for her hand, 336, 337; marries Maximilian of Austria, 339
 Matilda, wife of William I., helps Robert, 53; dies, 54; her claim on Flanders, 69
 Matilda, niece of Eadgar Ætheling, marries Henry I., 64; dies, 68
 Matilda, daughter of Henry I., marries Henry V., 67; the Barons swear fealty to her, 69; marries Geoffrey of Anjou, 70; her claim passed over, 77; David of Scotland supports her, 79; Robert of Gloucester declares for her, 81; lands, 82; supported by Henry of Winchester, 83; offends London and the Church, retires to France, 84
 Maud of Boulogne, wife of Stephen, fights for him, 84
 Mellent, [See Beaumont.]
 Mercenaries, of William I., 46, 54; of Stephen, 81; of Henry II., 90, 93; of John, 133, 136, 139
 Mercia, foundation of, 2; kingdom of, 4; submits to Wessex, 5; conquered by the Danes, 7; submits to Eadward, 10; Dunstan's reforms in, 14, 15; rebels against Æthelred, 16; overrun by Danes, 18; surrendered to Cnut, 19; made an Earldom for Eadric, 20
 Militia, Harold's, 26; William II.'s, 59; reorganized by Henry II., 109
 Milo, Constable of Gloucester, Earl of Hereford, Robert of Gloucester's agent, 81; fights for Matilda, 82; attests her oath, 83; his son Roger surrenders his castles to Henry II., 90
 Moleyns, Bishop of Chichester, Minister under Suffolk, 318; killed, 319
 Monarchy, [See King.]
 Montgomery, Roger, fights at Hastings, 27; made Earl of Shrewsbury, 51; opposes William II., 57
 Montgomery, Hugh, second Earl, killed while assisting Hugh of Chester, 59
 Montgomery, Roger, third son of the first Earl, does homage for Powys, 59
 Montgomery, Arnulf, fifth son of the first Earl, does homage for Dyfed, 59
 Montgomery, Robert, eldest son of the first Earl, [See Belesme.]
 Montmirail, Peace of, 100
 Morkere, a Thegn of the Danish Burghs, 18
 Morkere, son of Ælfgar, elected Earl of Northumbria, 24; defeated by Tostig, 26; calls a Witan, 40; hopes to be elected King, deserts Eadgar, 41; reinstated in his Earldom, 44; rebels and is pardoned, 45; joins Hereford's rebellion, 50; made prisoner, 51
 Mortain, Count of, [See Robert.]
 Mortimer, Hugh, descended from Belesme, surrenders to Henry II., 90
 Mortimer, Roger, attacked by Llewellyn, 162; tries to liberate Edward, 164; succeeds, 166

Mortimer, Roger, subdues Ireland, 205; surrenders to Edward II., 207; escapes from the Tower, 208; in France with the Queen, 210; his government, 213, 214; made Earl of March, executed, 215

Mortimer, Roger, fourth Earl of March, made heir-apparent, 246; killed, 253

Mortimer, Edward, outlawed, 252; taken prisoner, 278; refused leave to ransom himself, marries Glendower's daughter, 279

Morton, Bishop of Ely, apprehended, 343; released, 344; proposes marriage between Henry Tudor and Elizabeth of York, 345

Mowbray, Robert, Earl of Northumberland, kills Malcolm at Alnwick, 58; his conspiracy against William II., 59

Mowbray, Roger (son of Robert's nephew Nigel), opposes the invasion of David I., 79

Mowbray, John, Edward I. relies upon, 191

Mowbray, Thomas, Earl of Nottingham, one of the Lords Appellant, 248; won over to Richard II., 251; made Duke of Norfolk, 252; banished, 252

Mowbray, Thomas, joins Scrope's rebellion, beheaded, 281

Mowbray, John, third Duke of Norfolk, joins York, 321; defeated at St. Albans, 327

NEVILLE, Ralph, Chancellor, 151

Neville, Ralph, made Earl of Westmoreland, 252; partisan of Henry IV., 276; conquers Scrope and Mowbray, 281

Neville, Earl of Salisbury, joins York, 321; Chancellor, 322; retires, wins the battle of Blore Heath, 325; beheaded, 327

Neville, Earl of Warwick, the "King-maker," at St. Albans, 322; retires to Calais, 325; wins battle of Northampton, 329; takes charge of Henry VI., 327; defeated at St. Albans, 327; his power, 331; keeps Edward IV. prisoner, pardoned, supports Wells' rebellion, 333; makes a treaty with Margaret, recrowns Henry VI., 334; killed at Barnet, 335

Neville, John, of Montague, wins battles of Hedgeley Moor and Hexham, 329; made Earl of Northumberland, 331; declares for Henry VI., 334; killed, 335

Neville, George, Archbishop of York, Chancellor, 331; deprived of his chancellorship, 332

Neville, William (son of Ralph), Lord Falconbridge, at Ferrybridge, 323

New Forest, made by William I., 39; Richard dies there, 54; the displaced people taken to Cumberland, 58; death of William II. in, 60

Nicholas of Ely, Chancellor, 159

Nicholas of Tusculum, Papal Legate, 185

Nigel, Bishop of Ely, nephew of Roger of Salisbury, surrenders Devizes to Stephen, 81; joins Matilda, 83

Normandy, connected with England by Emma, 17; Athelred and his sons fly there, 18, 19; Cnut forms alliance with, 20; Edward the Confessor's friendship for, 21, 22; William I. resides there, 53; given to Robert, 53, 56; anarchy in, 57; pledged by Robert to William II., 59; conquered by Philip II. from John, 129

Northumbria, founded, 2; claims supremacy, 3; submits to Wessex, 5; conquered by the Danes, 7; helps Hasting against Alfred, 9; acknowledges supremacy of Eadward, 10; incorporated with Wessex, made an Earldom for Osulf, 12; divided into three parts, 14; surrendered to Cnut, 19; Cnut makes it an Earldom, 20

O'CONNOR, King of Ireland, war with Dermot of Leinster, 102; submits to Henry II., 103

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, brother of William I., at Hastings, 27; made Earl of Kent, 43; left in charge of England, 44, 63; rules severely, aims at the Papacy; William imprisons him, 54; heads Norman opposition to William II., defeated, and retires to France, 57

Offa, King of Mercia, 4; his power, his dyke, 5

Olaf, King of Norway, invades England, retires on receiving Danegelt, 16

Oldcastle, his character, 286; persecuted, 288; escapes, his death, 289

Ordainers, appointment of, 200

Orleans, siege of, 307-310

Orleton, Bishop of Hereford, his conspiracy, 209

Osberht, King of Northumbria, 7

Osulf, Earl of Northumbria, 12; retains one third of it, 14

Oswald, King of Northumbria, 4

Oswi, King of Northumbria, 4

Otho, son of Henry the Lion, brought up in England, 114; elected Emperor, 123; promises help to John, his rivalry with Philip of Swabia, 127; supported by the Pope, 131; receives money from John, 132; crowned as Emperor, joins the Northern League, 133; defeated at Bouvines, 136

Otho, Papal Legate, his extortions, 146, 151

Owen Glendower, rebellion, 278; negotiates with the Percies, 279; conquered, 282

PALATINE counties, established by William I., 51; Ely made one by Henry I., 79

Pale, English, provinces in Ireland, 103

Pandulf, Papal Legate, forbids Philip to attack John, 184; his government, 143

Parliament, its origin, 106, 107; Knights and Burgbers summoned to, 165; three Estates represented at, 185, 193, 194; royal power restricted by, 201; a Peer's privileges in, 221; construction of, in Edward III.'s reign, 237, 238; mercantile classes introduced, 264; power of the Commons in Henry IV.'s reign, 282, 283

Paulinus, missionary to Northumbria, 3, 4

Peasantry, their sufferings in Henry I.'s reign, 72, 73; in Stephen's reign, 86, 87; effects of the Friars' preachings on, 153; disturbances in Edward I.'s reign, 179; their love for Lancaster, 207; effect of Black Death upon, 229; becoming more important, 237, 238; their insurrection under Wat Tyler, 244; oppression of the Commons, 245; day labourers increasing, 260, 261; effects of Wicliffe's preaching on, 267, 269; the Statute of Labourers, 267, 268; their sufferings after the French war, 318; their hatred of Suffolk, 319; Jack Cade's rebellion, 320; rebellions against Edward IV., 332, 333; their indifference in the War of the Roses, 332, 333, 335; increased freedom of, and poverty, 352, 353

Pecquigni, Treaty of, 338

Pedro the Cruel, King of Castile, supported by the Black Prince, 234; his daughters marry John of Gaunt and Edmund of York, 236

Pembroke. [See Marshall.]

Penda, King of Mercia, 4

Percy, Henry, first Earl of Northumberland, Constable, partisan of Henry IV., 276; quarrels with him, 278, 279; submits, 280; escapes, 281; killed, 282

Percy, Thomas, brother of the first Earl, made Earl of Worcester, 252

Percy, Hotspur, son of the first Earl, his marriage, 279; killed, 280

Percy, second Earl, reinstated, 288; killed at St. Albans, 323

Percy, Lord Egremont, son of the second Earl, fighting with the Nevilles, 321, 323

Percy, third Earl, killed at Towton, 329

Peter des Roches, Justiciary, 135; his character and policy, charges Hubert with treason, 144; retires to the crusades, 146; returns, causes Hubert's fall, 148; his rule, 149; his fall, 150

Peter of Savoy, uncle of Queen Eleanor, his possessions, 151; joins her army, 164

Peter de Aigue Blanche, Bishop of Hereford, 151; envoy to Rome, 158; attacked by Llewellyn, 162; joins Eleanor's army, 164

Peter III., of Aragon, conquers Sicily, 177

Peter's Pence, begun by Ethelwulf, 6; paid by William I., 50; collected in Ireland, 102

Philip I., jealous of William I., 58; assists Robert, 54, 59; jealous of William II., 60

Philip II., makes peace with Henry II., 110; claims the guardianship of Arthur, meets Henry at Gisors, 111; declares war, 112; goes on a crusade with Richard I., 116; called the Lamb in Sicily, 117; quarrels with Richard, 118; befriends Conrad, 119; withdraws from the Crusade, 120; invades Richard's dominions, 122; tries to prolong Richard's imprisonment, 123; general alliance against him, 124; helps Arthur against John, 126; makes treaty with John, 127; war with John, 128; takes Normandy, 129; league against him, 138; victory at Bouvines, 136; dies, 145

Philip IV., his likeness to Edward I., 173; quarrels with him, 184; alliance with the Scotch, 185; abolishes the Templars, 199

Philip VI., his quarrel with Edward III., 218; asks David II. to attack Edward, 228; dies, 229

Philip of Swabia, Emperor of Germany, 127; makes peace with the Pope, 181; assassinated, 182

Philip of Burgundy. [See Burgundy.]

Philippa, wife of Edward III., saves the lives of the men of Calais, 223

Piers Ploughman, Vision of, 273

Pole, Michael de la, advises retreat from Scotland, 246; made Earl of Suffolk, dismissed, 247; impeached, 248

Pole, William de la, in command at the siege of Orleans, 307; taken prisoner, 310; arranges the marriage of Henry VI., 316; made Marquis of Suffolk, 317; chief Minister, unpopularity of, 318; murdered, 319

Pole, John de la, marries sister of Edward IV., 347

Pole, John de la, Earl of Lincoln, declared heir, 347

Police, the early system of, 35; systematized at the Conquest, 37; strictness of William I.'s, 39; of Henry I., 73, 74

Pope, Adrian IV. the only English one, 90; grants Ireland to Henry II., 91

Alexander III. [See Alexander III.]

Alexander IV., extorts money for Sicilian war, 158; absolves Henry III. from his vow, 161

Boniface VIII., his claim on Scotland, 191

Boniface IX., grants Provisors, 250

Calixtus II., mediates a treaty between Henry I. and Louis VI., 68

Celestine III., excommunicates Long-champ's enemies, 122

Clement III., raised by Henry IV. of Germany, 60

Clement IV., excommunicates the Barons, 164

Clement VI., attempts arbitration, 223

Gregory VII., supports William I., 25; revives the Papacy, 49; demands homage and Peter's Pence, 50; friendly relations with England, 60

Gregory IX., his extortions, 147

Gregory XI., restores the Papacy to Rome, 245
 Honorius III., his character, 147
 Innocent III., decides the election at Canterbury, 180; consecrates Langton, 181; his interdict and excommunication, 181; declares John's crown forfeited, 184; his tyranny in England, 185; disallows Magna Charta, 189; dies, 140
 Innocent IV., his exactions, 154; offers Sicily to Edmund, 157
 John XXII., mediates between Edward II. and the barons, 205
 Victor III., acknowledged in England, 61
 Victor IV., acknowledged in Germany, 94
 Popes, position as arbitrators, 222, 223
 Powys, granted to Montgomery, 59
 Premunire, Statute of, 250, 266; writ of, used against Beaufort, 812
 Privy Council, origin of, 107
 Provisions of Oxford, 159
 Provisors, Statute of, 250, 265
 Purveyance, misery caused by, 73; restrained by Henry I., 74; restricted by Magna Charta, 139; checked by the Statute of Stamford, 200; exacted by the royal Princes, 215; complained of, 245
 RALPH of Gwader, son of Ralph the Staller, Earl of Norfolk, conspires against William I., 52; flies to Brittany, 53
 Ralph Flambard, justiciary, his cruelties, 57; arrested by Henry I., 64; escapes to Normandy, 64
 Ranulf, Earl of Chester, fights against Wales, 78; joins Matilda, 83
 Ratcliffe, favourite of Richard III., 842, 845, 847
 Raymond of Toulouse, quarrels with Richard, 112; marries Joanna, 124; revenge for injury done him, 133
 Reeve, his office, 31; his duties, 32
 Renaissance, its effects, 338, 353
 Réne, Duke of Bar, 816
 Representation, not understood in Saxon times, 34; used in making the Domesday Book, 55; used in inquiries for financial purposes, 125; first used in Parliament, 165; principle established, 172; 193, 194
 Revenue. [See Taxes.]
 Richard I., engaged to Berengaria, 93; joins the Great Rebellion against his father, 104; pardoned, 105; his success in Aquitaine excites Prince Henry's envy, 110; his war with him, 111; attacks Raymond of Toulouse, joins Philip II. against Henry II., receives his father's submission, 112; gets absolution, is crowned, 115; sells all offices in the Kingdom, and goes on a crusade, 116; his quarrels in Sicily, 117; conquers Cyprus, marries Berengaria, 118; takes Acre, 120; relieves Joppa, makes a truce with Saladin, 121; imprisoned in Germany, 122; does homage to Henry

VI., returns to England, 123; his wars with Philip, his death, 124; his heavy taxation, 125; names John as his successor, 126
 Richard II., made heir-apparent, 240; his interview with Wat Tyler, 244; his favourites, 247; his character, 248; assumes authority, 249; his expedition to Ireland, 250; his marriage, 251; his vengeance, 252; his despotism, 253; deposed, 254; death, 277
 Richard III., murder of Henry VI. imputed to him, 336; his quarrel with Clarence, 336; captures Edward V., 342; secures the crown, 343; his unpopularity, 345; his energy, 346; death of his son, 347; killed at battle of Bosworth, 348; his character, 349
 Richard, Prior of Dover, succeeds Becket as Archbishop of Canterbury, 105
 Richard, brother of Henry III., Count of Poitou, quarrels with De Burgh, 146; his patriotic efforts, goes on a Crusade, 162; marries Sancha, 154; refuses the Sicilies, 157; elected King of the Romans, 158; joins Henry against the Barons, 162; taken prisoner at the battle of Lewes, 163
 Richard, Earl of Cambridge, son of Edward III.'s son Edmund, his conspiracy, executed, 292
 Richard of York, son of the Earl of Cambridge, in command of the war in France, 314, 315; leader of the Plantagenet Princes, 317; concerned in Suffolk's death, 319; appears in arms, 320; duped into submission, 321; President of the Council, 322; victory at St. Albans, 323; Protector, deposed, 324; returns from Ireland, 325; claims the throne, 326; beheaded after Wakefield, 327
 Richard, son of Edward IV., in sanctuary, 342; given up to Richard, 343; murdered, 345
 Ridel, Godfrey, Becket's enemy, made Bishop of Ely, 105
 Rivaux, Treasurer, 148; obtains confiscated property, 150
 Rivers. [See Woodville.]
 Robert, brother of William I., fights at Hastings, 27; made Earl of Cornwall, 45; opposes William II., 57; banished, taken prisoner at Tenchebray, 66
 Robert de Comines, Earl of Northumberland, murdered, 46
 Robert, son of William I., Governor of Maine, 52; does homage for it to Philip I., 53; his rebellion and reconciliation with his father at Gerberoi, his expedition against Scotland, 54; Normandy bequeathed to him, 56; his character excites feudal anarchy, 57; makes Treaty of Caen with William II., 58; goes on a Crusade, pledging Normandy to William, 59; claims the throne of England, surrenders to Henry I., 65; taken prisoner at Tenchebray, 66

Robert of Rhuddlan, his wars with Wales, 51
 Robert of Flanders, supports William Clito, killed, 68
 Robert of Bathenon, rebels against Stephen, 79
 Robert, Earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I., swears fealty to Matilda, 69; suppresses Gryllth's Insurrection, 70; one of the three remaining Earls, renounces his fealty to Stephen, 80; his power in the West, 81; brings Matilda to England, 82; takes Stephen prisoner at the battle of Lincoln, 83; taken prisoner, exchanged for Stephen, 84; dies, his character, 85
 Robert of Artois, persuades Edward III. to the war with France, 218
 Robert of Gloucester, translated Layamon, 271
 Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, punishes false coiners, 74; organizes the Exchequer Court, 75; power of his family, 81; arrested, 81; dies, 82
 Rotherham, Archbishop of York, Chancellor, 341; deposed, 342
 Rouen, siege of, 299; loss of, 319
 Russell, Chancellor, 342, 346
 Rutland, made Earl of Albemarle, 252; title removed, 276; conspires against Henry IV., 277
 SAC and Soc, explained, 33; benefit of, 76
 Saladin, his power in the East, 111; greatness of his empire, takes Jerusalem, 119; his truce with Richard, 121
 Saladin tax, imposed by Henry II., 111
 Salisbury, Earl of, conspires against Henry IV., beheaded, 277
 Salisbury, commanding at Orleans, 307
 Salisbury. [See Neville.]
 Sanctuary, effects of taking, 149
 Say, minister under Suffolk, 318; executed, 320
 Scotland, does fealty to Edward the Elder, 10; to Ethelstan, 11; rebels, and defeated at Brunanburh, 11; the Lothians added to it, 14; submits to Cnut, 20; does homage to William I., 46; invades England, 51; the Lowlands anglicized, 52; war with William II., 58; does homage for Huntingdon to Henry II., 90, 91; does homage to Henry II., 105; repurchases its independence from Richard I., 116; does homage to John, 123, 132; peace and marriage treaty with Henry III., 143; its relations with England, 180; extinction of the royal family, 181; rival claimants, 182; Balliol made king, 183; conquered by Edward I., 186; Wallace's rebellion, 189, 190; reconquered by Edward I., 191; Bruce's rebellion, 192; invaded by Edward II., 198, 200; battle of Bannockburn, 203; truce with England, 206; Bruce acknowledged king by Edward II., 208; war with Edward III., 214;

Edward Balliol's invasion, 216; does fealty to Edward III., 217; David Bruce's invasion, 223; Edward III.'s "Burnt Candlemas," 231; peace with England, 232; war with Richard II., 246; refuses homage to Henry IV., 278; imprisonment of James II., 281; released, 304; murdered, 316; truce with England, 316; independent spirit of, 339; truce with, 347
 Scrope, William, made Earl of Wiltshire, 252
 Scrope, Henry of Masham (nephew of the Earl), his conspiracy with Cambridge, executed, 292
 Scrope, Archbishop of York, his conspiracy with Mowbray, executed, 281
 Scutage, first instance of, 91; second, 93; reason for, 109; explained, 113; demanded by John, 136; restricted by Magna Charta, 138; demanded by Henry III., 148
 Sheriff, his duties, 92; untrustworthy, 75; court of, 76; peculation of, 106; restrained by Magna Charta, 139
 Shire, origin of, 31, 32
 Sibylla, wife of Robert of Normandy, 65
 Sicily, Richard I. and Philip in, 117; genealogy of the kings of, 125; Papal efforts to drive the Hohenstaufen from, 156; accepted by Edmund, son of Henry III., 157; renounced by the council, 161; given to Charles of Anjou, 168; conquered by Aragon, 177
 Sigeric, Archbishop of Canterbury, succeeds Dunstan, 16
 Sigismund, visit of, 297
 Simon de Montfort, his ancestors, marriage, goes on a crusade, 152; his government of Gascony, 156; quarrel with Valence, 158; surrenders his castles, 160; quarrels with Gloucester, 161; chief of the baronial party, 162; wins the battle of Lewes, 163; his rule, 164; his parliament, 165; killed at Evesham, his property confiscated, 167; the people's love for him, 169
 Seward, Earl of Northumberland, assists Edward against Godwine, 22; mentioned in Macbeth, 23
 Slaves, causes of bondage, 29; at the Conquest, 85; English slaves in Scotland, 52; forbidden by the Church, 71
 Soken, meaning of, 23
 Sokmen, 85
 Somerset, John, Lieutenant-General in France, 316; commits suicide, 319
 Somerset, Edmund, succeeds him in France, 319; returns, triumphs over York, 321; killed at St. Albans, 323
 Somerset, Henry, in power, 324; flies to Scotland, joins Edward IV., rejoins Henry VI., killed at Hexham, 329
 Stafford, Henry, second Duke of Buckingham, marries Catherine Woodville, 331; head of the old nobility, 341; supports Richard III., 342; joins Henry Tudor, 345; executed, 346

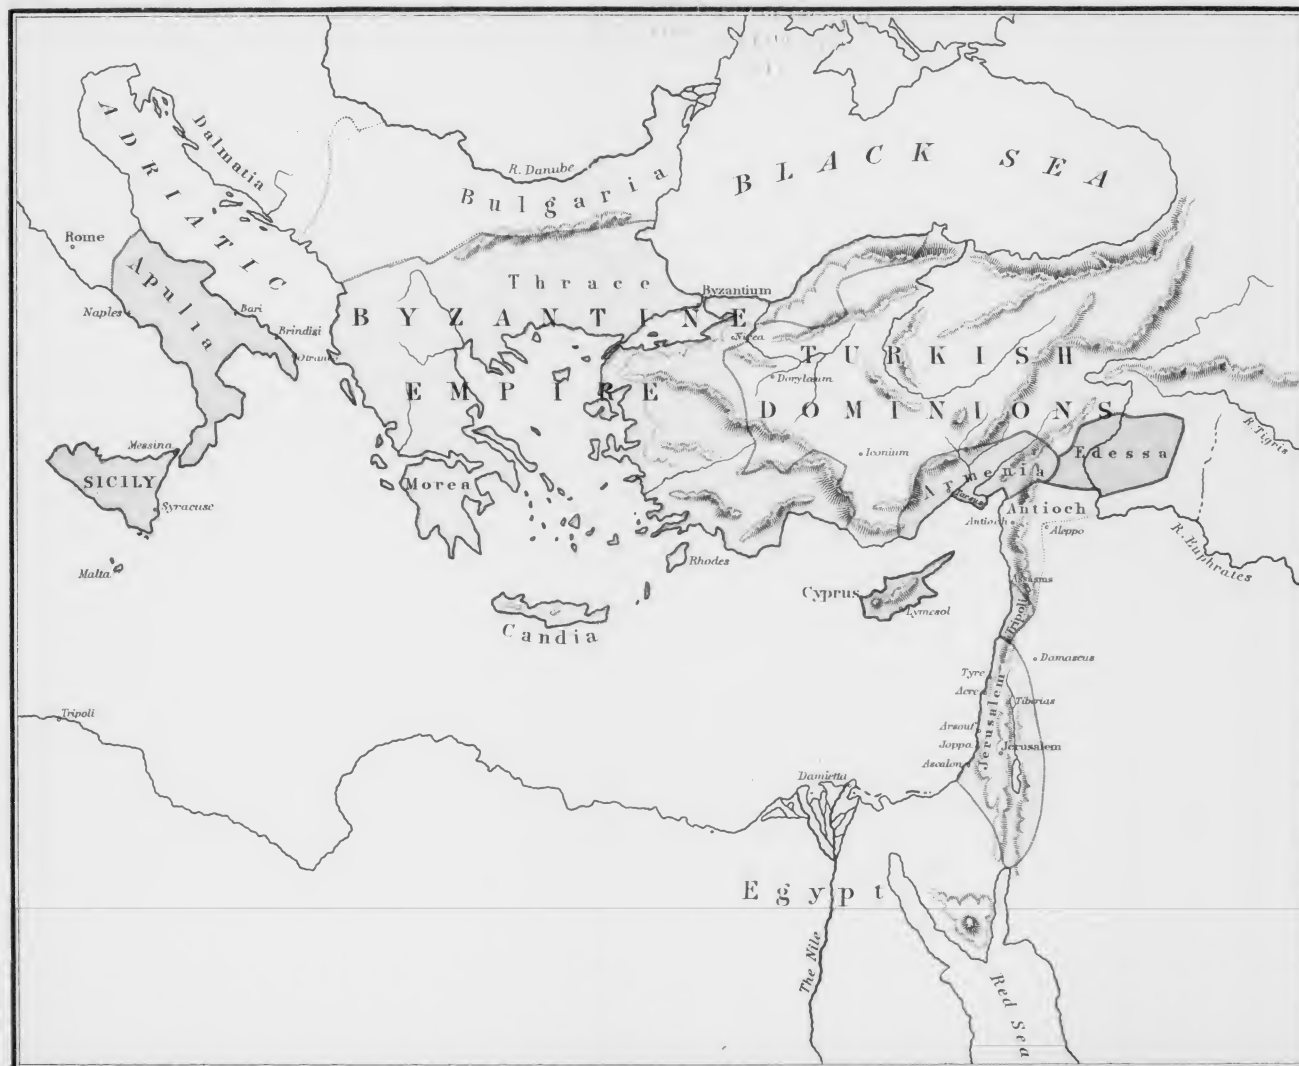

- Stafford, Sir Humphrey, defeated by Jack Cade, 320, (distant relation of the Duke's)
- Stafford, Humphrey (cousin of Sir Humphrey), Earl of Devonshire, defeated, 332
- Stafford, Sir Humphrey, prevents Buckingham from joining Henry Tudor, 346
- Stanley, one of the new nobility, 341; apprehended, 343; made constable, 344; marries Margaret of Richmond, 347; joins Henry Tudor, 348
- St. Brice, massacre of, 17
- Staple, Calais a staple town, 228; origin of, 257; rearranged by Edward IV., 330
- Statutes—
Of Carlisle, 265
De Donis conditionalibus, 196
De Hæretico comburendo, 276, 285
Of Labourers, 267
De Mercatoribus, 258
Of Mortmain, 175, 196
Of Præmunire, 250, 266
Of Provisors, 250, 265
Quia Emptores, 194, 196, 264
Of Stamford, 200
De Tallagio, 188
Of Wales, 176
Of Westminster, 174, 193, 195, 200
Of Winchester, 177, 195
- Stephen, second son of Stephen of Blois and Adela, daughter of William I., swears fealty to Matilda, 69; secures the throne, 77; his character, 78; goes to Normandy, purchases peace with Anjou, 79; makes peace with Scotland, grants castles, and creates earldoms, 80; by mercenaries defeats Gloucester's insurrection, 81; offends the Church, 81, 82; taken prisoner at the battle of Lincoln, 83; released in exchange for Gloucester, defeated at Wilton, 84; deserted by many of his nobles and by the Pope, 85; accepts Henry as his heir, dies, misery caused by his weakness, 86
- Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, 23; does not receive the Pallium from the Pope, 86, 49; William I. will not be crowned by, seeks his ruin, 42; is deposed, 48
- Stratford, John of, made Chancellor, 216; his quarrel with Edward III., 221
- Strathclyde, its extent, 8; peopled by Danes, 8; does fealty to Eadward, 10; Edmund grants part of it to Scotland, 12
- Suffolk. [See Poles.]
- Swegen, or Swend, son of King of Denmark, invades England, 16; his sister massacred, 17; his great invasion, made King of England, 18
- Swend, King of Denmark, nephew of Cnut, willing to help the English, 44; sends a fleet, 46, 47
- TALBOT, Sir John, defeated at Pataye, 319; defeats Burgundians, 315; dies, 321
- Tallage, exacted by Matilda, 84; explained, 113; considered illegal after Edward I., 195
- Tannequil Duchâtel, becomes Master of France, 299; rescues the Dauphin, 299; murders Burgundy, 300
- Taxes, before the Conquest, 35; whence derived, 38; on land, 64; no appeal against, 72; Henry I.'s, 73; in the hands of the King and Council, 76; Henry II. introduces scutage, 93; his revenue, 113; Richard I.'s tax on land, 125; John's severe taxes, 128, 133; restricted by Magna Charta, 188; complaints against De Burgh's, 144; Henry III. demands scutage, 148; tallages and aids, 155; Edward I. establishes customs, 174; his heavy taxes, 185, 186; clergy outlawed for refusing to pay, 187; complaints against, 188; method of levying changed, 193, 194; restricted by Ordinances, 201; Edward III.'s Maletolte, 219; his subsidies, 223; the poll tax, 240, 243; Wat Tyler's riots against, 244; Richard II.'s, 252, 253; sufferings of the poor under, 269; consent of Parliament necessary for levying, 282; Henry V.'s, 291; Bedford's, 313; Wells' insurrection against, 333; Richard III.'s malevolences, 348
- Templars, undertake a Crusade for Henry II., 103; suppressed by Edward II., 109
- Thegnas, their rise, 13; duties of, 80; court of, 93; become Barons, 85
- Theobald of Blois, grandson of William I., defeats Louis VI. at Puyssac, 67; urged to claim the crown after Henry I., 77; again refuses it, 84
- Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, joins Henry's party, mediates a compromise, 85; employs Becket, 92; dies, 95
- Theodore of Tarsus, organizes the Church, 4
- Theows, or slaves, 29
- Thomas, Duke of Clarence, second son of Henry IV., invades France, 284; killed at Beaugé, 301
- Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, sixth son of Edward III., Governor during the war, 233; succeeds John of Gaunt, 246, 247; one of the Lords Appellant, 248; constant opponent of Richard II., 251; arrested, 251; strangled, 252
- Thurkill, or Thuretyl, invades England, 17; joins the English, 18
- Thurstan, Archbishop of York, opposes David of Scotland, 79
- Tithing, explained, 35
- Tostig, third son of Godwine, made Earl of Northumbria, 23; deposed, 24; invades the North, slain, 26
- Trade of England, 256-253, 261, 262, 361
- Trail-bâtons, 195
- Tresilian, impeached, 248; executed, 249
- Trinoda necessitas, explained, 85; retained by William I., 37; reorganized, 109
- Troyes, Treaty of, 300

- Tudor, Edmund, son of Owen and Catherine of France, brought forward, 321
- Tudor, Jasper, brother of Edmund, brought forward, 321; defeated by Hubert of Pembroke, 332; almost the only Lancastrian left, 336
- Tudor, Henry, son of Edmund, proposed marriage, 345; first invasion, 346; second invasion, 348
- Twenge, his riots, 148
- VALENCE, Aymer of, Bishop of Winchester, 155
- Valence, William of, his possessions, 151; quarrels with De Montfort, 158; refuses to surrender his castles, 160; escapes from Lewes, 164; returns, 166
- Valence, Earl of Pembroke, defeats Bruce, 192
- Vere, Aubrey de, defends Stephen's cause, 92
- Vere, Robert de, ninth Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, favourite of Richard II., 247; impeached, 248; dies, 250
- Vere, Aubrey de, succeeds his nephew Robert, 250
- Vere, John de, thirteenth Earl of Oxford, almost the only Lancastrian left, 336
- Vexin, claimed by France, 55; war on account of, 60; Henry II. refuses to surrender it, 109; John secures it, 127
- Vitacum, extorted by William II., 59
- Villeinage, position of, 36; proposal to abolish it, 245; disappearing, 267-269, 352
- WALES, remains British, 3; Wessex establishes supremacy over, 5; southern part colonized by Danes, 8; assist Eadric the Wild against William I., 44; William I. establishes Palatine Counties to restrain it, 51; constant wars against William II., 53; land granted to Norman Earls, 59; Henry I. establishes colonies of Flemings in, 70; insurrections under Gryffith, 70; under Gwyneth, 91; under Llewellyn, 132; under Llewellyn, 176; annexation of, 177; Meredith's rebellion, 178; rebellion against Edward II., 204; quarrel with the Marchers, 206; insurrection of Owen Glendower, 278, 282; sympathy with the Lancastrians, 332, 335; sympathy with the Tudors, 346, 348
- Wallace, his insurrection, 189; defeat and death, 190; his use of infantry, 225
- Walter, Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, opposes John, 123; trained by Glanville, 124; withdraws from secular work, 125; summoned to Rouen, 126; persuades John to disband his troops, 129; dies, 130
- Waltheof, Earl of Nottingham, 44; destroys the castles of York, 47; conspires against William, 52; executed, miracles at his tomb, 53
- WARD of Trumpington, the false Richard II., 279, 292
- Warrenne, William of, first Earl of Surrey, conquers Hereford, 50
- Warrenne, William of, second Earl, supports Robert of Normandy, 65
- Warrenne, William of, natural son of Stephen (married the heiress of the third Earl), surrenders to Henry II., 91
- Warrenne, John, seventh Earl, opposes Edward I., 174; Commander in Scotland, 183; Guardian of Scotland, 186; defeated by Wallace, 189
- Warwick (John of Plesseys), Henry III.'s Commissioner, 159
- Warwick (William Maudit), one of the Barons' Council, 159
- Warwick. [See Beauchamp and Neville.]
- Watling Street, Danish boundary, 8
- Wat Tyler, his insurrection, 244
- Wedmore, Treaty of, 8
- Wells' rebellion, 333
- Weregild, explained, 29
- Wessex, foundation of, 2, 3; conversion of, 4; supremacy of, 5; invaded by Danes, 7; repels them, 8; retains the supremacy, 10; overrun by Thurkill, conquered by Cnut, 18; restored to Edmund Ironside, 19; helps Harold against William, 26
- Wicliffe, protected by John of Gaunt, 240; deserted by him, recants, 245; his preaching, 266, 267
- William I., visits England, 22; his claims to the throne, 24, 36; prepares to invade England, 25; lands at Pevensey, and fights the battle of Hastings, 26; checks the growth of feudalism, 37; establishes the Curia Regis, 38; character of his government, 39; marches to London, 41; crowned, 42; gradually transfers the land to Normans, 43; limits earldoms, 37, 43; leaves England, returns to suppress insurrections, 44; takes Exeter, and completes the conquest of the West, suppresses first Northern insurrection, 45; suppresses the rebellion at York, 46; lays waste Yorkshire, 47; his legislation, 48; his position with regard to the Church, 48, 49; conquers Hereford, 50; receives homage from Scotland, 52; suppresses the conspiracy of Norman nobles, 52; continues to reside in Normandy, quarrels with his sons, 53; threatened invasion of England, 54; Domesday survey and general oath of allegiance, his death and burial, 55; his will, 56
- William II., secures Lanfranc's support, is crowned, pleases the English by promises, 56; defeats baronial rebellion on Lanfranc's death leaves England to Ralph Flambard, 57; intrigues in Normandy, makes treaty with Robert at Caen, receives homage from Malcolm, renews war with him, 58; leaves the conquest of Wales to the Marchers, extorts viaticum from the host before going to Normandy, holds Normandy in

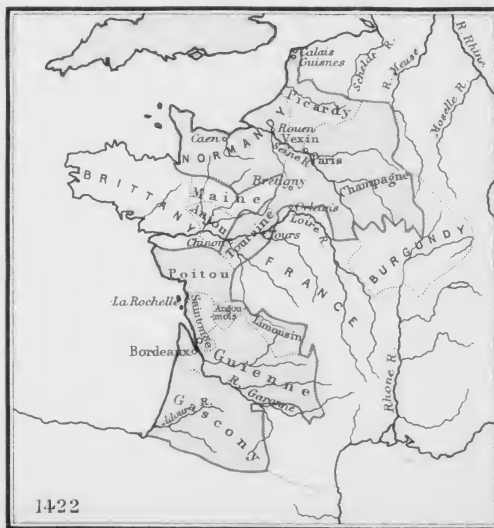

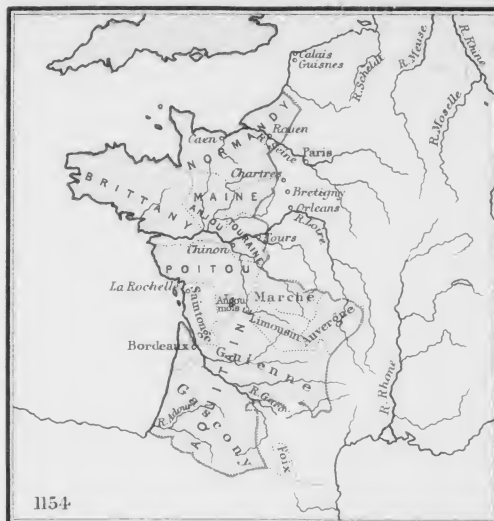

- pledge, 59; his formidable position, killed in the New Forest, his general success, 60; his conduct towards the Church, 61, 62
- William Clito, son of Robert of Normandy, pretender to the Duchy, supported by Louis VII., deserted at treaty of Gisors, 67; supported by Fulk of Anjou, and deserted, 68; supported and again deserted by both Fulk and Louis, Louis tries to put him on the throne of Flanders, his death, 69; his marriage, 72
- William, Earl of Boulogne, son of Stephen, promises homage to Henry II., 86
- William, son of Henry I., marries a daughter of Fulk of Anjou, 67; the barons swear fealty to, drowned in the White Ship, 68
- William of Albemarle, opposes invasion of David I., 79; his power in Yorkshire, submits to Henry II., 90
- William II., of Sicily, marries Joanna, 109; his death delays the Crusade, 117
- William the Lion, King of Scotland, joins the Great Rebellion against Henry II., 104; taken prisoner at Alnwick, does homage for Scotland, 105; buys back his privileges from Richard, 116; does personal homage to John, 128; makes full submission, 132
- Winchelsea, Archbishop of Canterbury, refuses grants to Edward I., 186; appointed adviser to Prince Edward, 187; excommunicates Gaveston, 202
- Wishart, Bishop of St. Andrews, a member of the Regency, 181; invites Edward I., 182; trusted by Edward I., 191; crowns Bruce, 192
- Witan, described, 32, 33, 37, 38; consents to the Danegelt, 16; assembled by Eadric, 18; elects Cnut King, 20; Godwine's quarrel referred to it, 22; called on Harold's death, elects Eadgar, 41; offers the crown to William I., 42; tries and condemns Waltheof, 53
- Woodville, rise of the family, 330, 331; Sir John, beheaded, 332; Anthony, made Lord Scales, 331; Lord Rivers, 341; patronizes printing, 353; beheaded, 342; Elizabeth, marries Edward IV., 330
- Wulstan, Archbishop of York, 13
- Wykeham, William of, Chancellor, deposed 239; restored, 240; deposed, 240; restored, 249

FOR THE CRUSADES.

ENGLISH POSSESSIONS IN FRANCE

NORTH OF FRANCE

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

0021064210

VOLUME 2

B 761
2

~~DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY~~

This book is due two weeks from the last date stamped below, and if not returned or renewed at or before that time a fine of five cents a day will be incurred.

27 APR 1965

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND

PERSONAL MONARCHY

1485—1688

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

By the Rev. J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D.,
Master of University College, Oxford; late Master of the Modern School in Marlborough College.

With numerous Maps and Plans. Crown 8vo.

This work is divided into four Periods of convenient and handy size, especially adapted for use in Schools, as well as for Students reading special portions of History for local and other Examinations.

Period I.—MEDIÆVAL MONARCHY: The Departure of the Romans to Richard III. From A.D. 449 to A.D. 1485. 4s. 6d.

Period II.—PERSONAL MONARCHY: Henry VII. to James II. From A.D. 1485 to A.D. 1688. 5s.

Period III.—CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY: William and Mary to William IV. From A.D. 1689 to A.D. 1837. 7s. 6d.

Period IV.—GROWTH OF DEMOCRACY: Victoria. From A.D. 1837 to A.D. 1880. 6s.

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.
LONDON, NEW YORK AND BOMBAY

[All rights reserved]

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND

BY THE REV.

J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D.

MASTER OF UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, AND HISTORICAL LECTURER IN BALLIOL, NEW, AND UNIVERSITY COLLEGES, OXFORD; LATE MASTER OF THE MODERN SCHOOL
IN MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE

PERIOD II.

PERSONAL MONARCHY

Henry VII. to James II.

1485—1688

With Maps and Plans

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.

LONDON, NEW YORK, AND BOMBAY

1896

[Seventh Edition]

A LIST OF SOME USEFUL AUTHORITIES.

GENERAL HISTORIES.

Froude's History of England, 1527-1588. Lingard's History of England. Mackintosh's History of England to 1588. Ranke's History of England in the Seventeenth Century. Macaulay's History of England, 1660-1702; the best general authority for this period. Hook's Lives of the Archbishops. Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors. Tytler's England under Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. Sharon Turner's Reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. Kenneth's Complete History (a collection of old histories). Hallam's Constitutional History. Burton's History of Scotland. Leland's History of Ireland (1773). Froude's History of Ireland, vol. i. Motley's Dutch Republic and United Netherlands.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

Hall's History to 1547. Stowe's Annals to 1592. Polydore Vergil to 1538 (Camden Society). Holinshed, a collection of chronicles to 1577, the last part by Holinshed himself; it contains in vol. i. Harrison's description of England. Herbert's History of England under Henry VIII. Rymer's Fœdera. Statutes of the Realm, vols. iii., iv., v. Howell's Collection of State Trials. Calendars of State Papers (Master of the Rolls' series). Parliamentary History of England. Somers' Collection of Tracts, the first 9 volumes. Ellis's Collection of Original Letters. Hardwicke's State Papers, 1501-1726.

HENRY VII.

Bacon's History of Henry VII. (1622); based chiefly on Hall, with a few small chronological errors; edited by Stebbing. Bernardi, Historia de Vita Henrici VII. (Rolls' series). Gairdner's Letters and Papers, and Memorials of Henry VII. (Rolls' series). Ruland Papers, edited by Jerdan (Camden Society).

LIST OF AUTHORITIES

HENRY VIII.

State Papers during the reign of Henry VIII. (Record Commission). Calendars of State Papers, with prefaces by Brewer (Rolls' series). Proceedings in the Privy Council (Record Commission). Giustiniani's Four Years at the Court of Henry VIII. 1515-1519. Erasmus' Letters and Life. Knight's Harleian Miscellany. Legrand's Histoire du Divorce. Cavendish's Life of Wolsey.

THE REFORMATION.

Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials. Seebohm's Oxford Reformers of 1498. Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Roper's Life of More. Burnet's History of the Reformation. Wright's Suppression of the Monasteries (Camden Society). Neal's History of the Puritans. Heylyn's History of the Reformation, edited by Rev. J. C. Robertson (Ecc. Hist. Soc.)

STATE OF ENGLAND.

Italian Relation of England from 1496 to 1502, probably the work of the Venetian ambassador (Camden Society). Burton's History of Leicestershire. Perlin, Description d'Angleterre. Harrison's Description of England. Eden's State of the Poor. Latimer's Sermons (Parker Society).

EDWARD VI.

Hayward's Life and Reign of Edward VI. (1636). Journal of Edward VI. (printed in Burnet's Collectanea). Machyn's Diary, 1550-1563 (Camden Society).

MARY.

Chronicle of Queen Jane and Queen Mary (Camden Society). Madden's Privy Purse Expenses of Queen Mary, with a memoir. Noailles' Ambassades en Angleterre (1763). Cardinal de Granvelle, Papiers d'Etat.

ELIZABETH.

Miss Aikin's Memoirs of the Court of Queen Elizabeth. Camden's History of Queen Elizabeth (1636). Birch's Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth (1754). Anderson's Collections Relating to Mary Queen of Scotland (1727). Morison's Seventeen Last Years of Queen Elizabeth's Reign (1882). Naunton's Observations (Somers' Tracts). Winwood's Memorials of Affairs of State in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I. (1725). Burghley's State Papers, from 1542-1596. Cecil's Secret Correspondence with James I., edited by Lord Hailes (1766). Egerton Papers, edited by Collier (Camden Society). Devereux's Lives of the Earls of Essex. Keith's History of the Affairs in Scotland from the Reformation to 1563 (Spottiswoode Society). Spenser's View of the

LIST OF AUTHORITIES

State of Ireland (1596). Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ (1608). Maskill's Martin Marprelate. Teulet's Relations Politiques, 1515-1588. Chamberlain's Letters (Camden Society). D'Ewes' Journal of Queen Elizabeth's Parliaments (1682). Birch's View of Negotiations between England, France, and Belgium, 1592-1617.

JAMES I.

Camden's History of James I. (1691). Miss Aikin's Memoirs of the Court of James I. Weldon's Court and Character of James I. Gardiner's History of James I., and History of the Spanish Marriage. Spedding's Life and Letters of Lord Bacon. Autobiography of Sir Simonds D'Ewes, 1602-1649. Cabala; or, Letters of Illustrious Persons (1654). Dalrymple's Memorials and Letters illustrative of the Reigns of James I. and Charles I. (1766). Manchester's Court and Society, from Elizabeth to Anne; edited from the papers at Kimbolton. Memoirs of Sully. Rushworth's Historical Collections, from 1618-1648.

CHARLES I.

Whitelocke's Memorials, from Charles I. to the Restoration (1732). Clarendon's History of the Rebellion. May's History of the Long Parliament. Cromwell's Letters, Carlisle. Forster's British Statesmen of the Commonwealth. Sandford's Illustrations of the Great Rebellion. Strafford's Letters and Life, by Sir G. Radcliffe (1789). Thurloe's Collection of State Papers, from 1638-1660, with his Life by Birch (1742). Nalson's Collection of the Affairs of State, 1639-1648. Carte's Collection from the Ormond Papers, 1641-1660. Carte's Life of Ormond. Journal of the Lords and Commons. Disraeli's Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I. Dugdale's View of the late Troubles in England (1681). Walker's History of Independency (1660). Charles I.'s Letters to Henrietta Maria (Camden Society). Heylyn's Life of Laud (1671). Hacket's Life of Williams (1693). The Fairfax Correspondence. Warwick's Memoirs of King Charles I. (1701). Baillie's Letters and Journal, 1637-1662. Life of Col. Hutchinson (Bohn series). Herbert's Memoirs of the two Last Years of Charles I. Ashburnham's Narrative of his Attendance on Charles I. Bruce's Treaty of Ripon (Camden Society). Memoirs of General Ludlow (1698). Guizot's Cromwell and the Commonwealth. Gardiner's England under Buckingham and Charles I.

CHARLES II.

Clarendon's Life. North's Examen, 1740 (entirely one-sided). North's Lives of the Norths. Thoresby's Diary, 1677-1724. Baxter's Life and Times. Masson's Life of Milton. Reresby's Travels and Memoirs. Burnet's History of his own Times. Samuel Pepys' Diary, 1659-1669. John Evelyn's Diary, 1623.

514

LIST OF AUTHORITIES

1659. Shaftesbury's Letters and Speeches, edited by W. D. Christie. Œuvres de Louis XIV. Négociations de Comte D'Avauze en Hollande, 1679-1684. Dalrymple's Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland.

JAMES II.

Life of James II., by himself, edited by Clarke. Fox's History of the Reign of James II. Echard's History of the Revolution. Welwood's Memoirs of the most Material Transactions in England, from 1588-1688. Luttrell's Relation of State Affairs, from 1678-1714. Gutch's Collectanea Curiosa. Clarendon Correspondence and Diary, 1689-1690, edited by Singer. Sydney State Papers, edited by Collins. State Collection, published on occasion of the late Revolution, in 1688. Yarranton's England's Improvement by Sea and Land (1677). Chamberlayne's Present State of Great Britain.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL MONARCHY OF THE TUDORS.

HENRY VII. 1485-1509.

	PAGE
1485 Character of the reign that of an Usurper, . . .	355
Change in the Character of the Monarchy, . . .	357
Measures for the Repression of the Yorkists, . . .	358
Lambert Simnel,	358
Perkin Warbeck,	359
1492 Acknowledged in France,	359
1493 " in Burgundy,	360
1496 " in Scotland,	361
1497 He lands in Cornwall,	361
1499 He is executed,	362
Henry's good position,	362
His foreign Policy,	363
1503 Marriage of Margaret with James IV.,	363
1501 Influence of Spain,	363
Marriage of Prince Arthur,	364
Other marriage schemes,	365
Exactions of his later years,	365
1509 His death,	365
Retrospect of his work,	365

HENRY VIII. 1509-1547.

Junction of the Houses of York and Lancaster, . . .	366
Henry's marriage,	367
Prosecution of Empson and Dudley,	367
1511 Henry engages in European politics, siding with the Emperor,	368
The Holy League,	368

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1512 English army in the South of France,	369
1513 " " Flanders,	370
Battle of the Spurs,	370
Difficulties with Scotland,	370
England invaded,	371
Battle of Flodden,	372
Dissolution of the Holy League,	372
1514 Peace with France,	372
Condition of Scotland,	372
1515 French interference there, and death of Louis XII., weaken the Treaty between the Nations,	373
1516 Van efforts to reconstitute the Holy League,	375
1518 Peace and Confederacy between England, France, and Spain,	375
1516 Wolsey made Legate,	375
His Policy, ecclesiastical and national,	376
His arbitrary rule,	377
1519 Death of Maximilian,	377
Rivalry for the Empire,	377
Charles V. elected,	377
English Alliance sought by Charles and Francis,	377
1520 Field of the Cloth of Gold,	378
Henry prefers alliance with Charles,	378
1522 Francis tries to excite Ireland and Scotland,	379
1523 Albany being worsted, Peace for eighteen years is made,	379
1524 Ill success of France,	379
1525 Francis defeated at Pavia,	380
1527 Sack of Rome,	381
Change of English Policy,	381
1528 Alliance with France,	381
Quarrel with Rome,	381
Legitimacy of Henry's marriage questioned,	382
The state of the Succession,	382
The Progress of the Reformation in Europe,	383
And Wolsey's policy,	384
Favour the idea of a divorce,	385
1529 Wolsey's fall caused by its failure,	385
His unpopularity, and heavy taxation,	386
Lay Government,	388
Rise of Cromwell,	389
The Reformation in England,	389
1530 Question of the Divorce renewed,	390
1531 Attack on the Church in Convocation,	390
1532 And in Parliament,	391
1533 Separation from Rome,	392

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1533 Marriage with Anne Boleyn,	392
1534 Catholic and Dynastic opposition,	393
The Nun of Kent,	393
The Act of Succession,	394
Imprisonment of More and Fisher,	395
Act of Supremacy,	395
Consequent persecutions,	395
1536 The Bull of Deposition,	396
Trial and Execution of Anne Boleyn,	399
Marriage with Jane Seymour,	400
Reaction against Reform,	401
Henry's dangerous position,	401
Insurrections in Ireland,	401
" " in the North,	404
Causes for the discontent of the nobles, clergy, and poor,	405
The Pilgrimage of Grace,	407
1537 Insurrection in the West,	409
The Reformation continued,	410
Dissolution of the greater Monasteries,	410
1539 Triumph of the Reaction,	411
The Reformation checked,	411
The Six Articles,	412
1540 Marriage with Anne of Cleves,	413
Consequent fall of Cromwell,	413
Marriage with Catherine Howard,	414
Affairs in Scotland,	414
1542 Execution of Catherine Howard,	415
1543 Marriage with Catherine Parr,	415
1542 Battle of Solway Moss,	416
1543 Triumph of the anti-English Party,	417
War with France,	417
1544 Peace of Cr�py,	418
England alone in Europe,	418
1546 Peace of Boulogne,	418
Strife of Parties and final triumph of Hertford,	419
1547 The King dies,	420
General character of the reign,	420

EDWARD VI 1547-1553.

Regency of Hertford,	422
He attempts everything at once,	423
The Reformation,	424

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1547 War with Scotland,	425
Battle of Pinkie,	425
War with France,	427
Reversal of the arbitrary Policy of the last reign,	427
The Vagrant Act,	428
1548 Protestant excesses,	429
Consequent insurrection,	429
Treason of Lord Seymour of Sudeley,	429
Act of Uniformity,	430
Popular tendencies of Somerset,	430
1549 Revolutionary outbreak in the West and East,	432
Warwick suppresses it,	433
Warwick and the Council resume their authority,	434
Fall of Somerset,	434
1550 Want of principle in the Council,	435
State of the currency,	436
Rapid and disorderly advance of the Reformation,	437
Ill-timed attack on Princess Mary,	439
European affairs prevent the interference of Charles V.,	439
1551 Failure of the policy of the Council,	439
Somerset regains influence,	439
1552 He is betrayed and executed,	440
Warwick, triumphant, aims at changing the Succession,	441
1553 The King's death,	442

MARY. 1553-1558.

Escape of Mary,	444
Coronation of Lady Jane Grey,	444
The nation rallies round Mary,	445
Northumberland fails in Norfolk,	445
Mary is proclaimed Queen,	446
She wishes to rejoin Rome,	446
But is checked by political reasons,	446
She gradually restores the Catholic Church,	447
Proposed Marriage with Philip,	448
1554 Consequent risings in various parts of the Country,	449
Courage of the Queen,	450
Execution of Lady Jane Grey,	451
Imprisonment of Princess Elizabeth,	451
Parliament authorizes the Spanish Marriage,	452
England accepts the Papal absolution,	453

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1555 Persecuting Statutes re-enacted and enforced,	454
The Queen is disappointed of an heir,	455
Renewed Persecution,	455
Philip leaves England,	455
Renewed Persecution, Death of Ridley and Latimer,	455
Death of Cranmer,	456
1556 The Dudley Conspiracy,	457
Renewed Persecution,	458
Many young Englishmen fly to France,	458
1557 France supports them,	459
War with France,	459
Battle of St. Quentin,	459
Loss of Calais,	460
1558 Negotiations for a European Peace,	461
Death of Mary,	461

STATE OF SOCIETY. 1485-1558.

Revolutionary Character of the Period,	462
Change in the character of royalty, nobility, and the army,	462
Pursuit of Wealth,	466
Ostentation of the English,	466
Accompanying Poverty,	468
Consequent Crime,	469
Causes of Poverty and Crime,	469
Mercantile landowners,	469
Pasture farms,	470
Diminution of agricultural labour,	470
Decrease of dependants,	471
Depreciation of the coinage,	471
Lax morality of Protestantism,	472
Change in the position of the Church,	474
Its greatness under Henry VII.,	474
Contrast in 1548,	475
Steps of this change,	476
Popularization of learning,	476
Consequent failure of credulity,	478
Destruction of the Monasteries,	479
Outward appearance of England,	484

ELIZABETH. 1558-1603.

1558 Elizabeth receives the news of Mary's death,	488
Appoints Cecil Secretary,	488

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1558 Religious and foreign policy of the reign under the difficult circumstances of the country, . . .	489
Based on a knowledge of the jealousy between France and Spain, . . .	489
Threatened danger from France, . . .	490
Character of Elizabeth's Ministers, . . .	490
Peculiarities of the Queen, . . .	490
Gradual establishment of the English Church, . . .	492
Peace with France, . . .	494
1559 Treaty of Cateau Cambrésis, . . .	494
General acceptance of the Oath of Supremacy, . . .	495
State of affairs in Scotland, . . .	495
1554 Regency of Mary of Guise, . . .	495
1557 Rise of the Lords of Congregation, . . .	496
They incline towards English alliance, . . .	497
1559 They take arms, . . .	497
English help sent, . . .	497
1560 Treaty of Edinburgh, . . .	498
Protestantism established by the Estates, . . .	498
1561 Queen Mary comes home, supported by the national party, . . .	499
Rise of Dudley, Earl of Leicester, . . .	500
1562 Beginning of Religious wars in France, . . .	501
Elizabeth helps the Huguenots, but with selfish objects, . . .	502
1563 Events of the war enable Catherine to bring about the Peace of Amboise, . . .	502
Disasters of the English at Havre, . . .	502
Affairs in Scotland, . . .	503
Mary's moderate government under Murray's influence, . . .	503
She intrigues with Spain, . . .	503
Pretends friendship for Elizabeth, . . .	503
1564 Refuses Leicester, offered her as husband, . . .	503
Demands in vain to be acknowledged successor, . . .	503
1565 Openly joins the Catholic Party, . . .	504
Mary marries Darnley, . . .	504
Discontented Lords fly to England, . . .	504
Elizabeth's difficult position, . . .	504
She repudiates Murray, . . .	505
Quarrels between Mary and Darnley, . . .	505
1566 Murder of Rizzio, . . .	506
Rise of Bothwell, . . .	507
The Bond of Craigmillar, . . .	507
1567 Murder of Darnley, . . .	508
Bothwell carries off Mary, . . .	510
Anger of the nobles, . . .	510
Battle of Carberry Hill, . . .	511

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1567 Mary is imprisoned in Lochleven, and abdicates, . . .	511
Elizabeth shrinks from helping the Lords, . . .	511
1568 Mary escapes. Battle of Langside, . . .	512
Mary seeks refuge in England, . . .	512
Consequent increase of Elizabeth's difficulties, . . .	512
Already enhanced by the affairs of the Netherlands, . . .	512
And by the rise of the Puritans, . . .	512
Marriage with the Archduke of Austria seems her best way of escape, but she refuses him, . . .	513
She determines on a double policy, . . .	514
To destroy Mary's influence but restore her to the throne, . . .	514
Conference of York, . . .	514
The Casket Letters suppressed, . . .	515
Mary's cause left undetermined, . . .	515
State of Parties in England, . . .	515
Cecil tries to draw Elizabeth into war with Spain, . . .	516
1569 Philip begins to adopt Mary's cause, . . .	517
General feeling in her favour, . . .	517
Various schemes centring round her marriage with Norfolk, . . .	517
Norfolk's vacillating conduct, . . .	517
He is arrested, . . .	518
Northern insurrection cruelly suppressed, . . .	518
1570 Consequent complications with Scotland, . . .	518
Murray is assassinated, unaided by Elizabeth, . . .	519
Elizabeth's position with regard to the Reformation, . . .	519
Her disastrous double policy in Scotland, . . .	520
It produces danger from France as well as from Spain, . . .	520
Pius V. excommunicates Elizabeth, . . .	520
England saved by the success of the Huguenots, . . .	521
Alliance with France, and marriage with Anjou suggested, . . .	521
Mary and the Catholics turn towards Spain, . . .	521
1571 The Ridolfi Plot, . . .	522
Protestant temper of the Parliament, . . .	523
Alva's view of the Ridolfi Plot, . . .	523
Norfolk again arrested, . . .	524
1572 Momentary energy of the Queen, . . .	524
Execution of Norfolk, . . .	524
Resumption of Diplomacy, . . .	525
Alençon suggested instead of Anjou, and a joint war against Spain in the Netherlands, . . .	525
The Protestants being again in insurrection after taking Brille, . . .	526
The Plan thwarted by Elizabeth's duplicity, . . .	526

CONTENTS

1572	Fall of Huguenot influence at the Massacre of St. Bartholomew,	526
	Elizabeth again roused to activity,	527
1573	She assists the King's party in Scotland,	528
	Her alarm subsides,	528
	Friendship with Spain renewed,	528
	Her views on the European situation wholly political,	528
1574	Her policy drives the Netherlands towards France,	529
	She attempts a compromise in vain,	530
	Events in France setting her free to act,	530
1576	She refuses to help the rebels,	531
	Apparent success, real failure of her plans,	531
1578	The Netherlands apply for help to Alençon,	533
1579	To retain her hold on them, she thinks of marrying him,	533
	The people of Europe begin to act for themselves,	533
	Political motives preventing the action of Princes,	533

IRELAND. 1558-1584.

	Condition of Ireland,	535
1565	The Ulster insurrection,	536
1568	Plans for colonization of Munster,	536
1569	Insurrection in Munster,	537
1573	Colonization of Ulster by Essex,	539
1577	Insurrection in Connaught,	540
	Disaffection of the Pale,	541
1579	Catholic expedition to Ireland,	541
	Insurrection of Desmond,	542
1580	Arrival of help from Spain,	542
	Destruction of the foreigners at Smerwick,	543
1584	Suppression of the Insurrection,	543

ELIZABETH—Continued.

1579	Jesuit plans in Scotland,	544
	D'Aubigny sent there as conspirator,	544
1581	Death of Morton,	544
	Triumph of the Catholic Party,	544
	Intended joint rule of Mary and James,	545
1582	Catholic reaction checked by the popular feeling,	545
	Raid of Ruthven,	545
1580	Jesuit schemes in England,	546
1581	Severe laws against Catholics,	547
	Rising difficulties with Spain,	547

CONTENTS

1581	The Alençon marriage renewed,	547
1583	Isolation produced by Elizabeth's policy,	548
	Great general Conspiracy against her,	548
1583	Arrest of Throgmorton—Discovery of the Plot,	548
	Dismissal of Mendoza,	549
1584	Breach with Spain,	549
	Declining importance of Mary,	549
	Deserted by her son,	549
1585	She is removed to Tutbury,	550
1584	Fear of Elizabeth's assassination,	550
	Increased by affairs in Flanders,	550
	Assassination of the Prince of Orange,	551
	Association to protect the Queen's life,	552
1585	Elizabeth is forced against her will to help the Netherlands,	552
	She secretly negotiates with the Spaniards,	553
	Consequent uselessness of the English help,	554
	Drake's energy thwarts her double dealing,	554
1586	Walsingham's spies discover the Babington Plot,	554
	Mary removed to Fotheringay,	555
	Mary's trial,	555
	The Queen's hesitation and its causes,	556
	Determination of her counsellors,	556
	The popular feeling,	557
1587	The warrant signed,	557
	The Council act upon it,	557
	Mary's death,	558
	The Queen's anger,	558
	The state of Europe neutralizes the effect of the execution,	558
1588	Day of the Barricades in France,	558
1584	Philip's preparations for invading England,	559
	English preparations for defence,	560
1588	Destruction of the Armada,	561
	The victory a national one,	562
	Characteristics of the rest of the reign,	563
	Increased demands of the people,	563
	Yearly expeditions against Spain,	563
	War of religion transferred to France,	564
	Day of the Barricades in France,	564
1589	Accession of Henry IV.,	564
1593	He becomes Catholic,	565
1598	Final compromise, Treaty of Vervins,	565
	Edict of Nantes,	565
1589	Part played by England in this war,	566
	Elizabeth's arbitrary conduct to her Parliament, and in ecclesiastical matters,	566
1572	Rise of the Puritans,	567

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1572 They are persecuted under Whitgift,	569
1583 The Court of High Commission,	569
Growth of the High Church Party,	570
1600 Final increase of Puritanism,	570
1589 Death of the old Ministers,	570
1593 Rise of young men of action,	570
Raleigh, Essex,	572
1596 Essex succeeds in continuing war with Spain,	572
1598 Loses the favour of the Queen,	572
Triumph of the Cecils,	572
National greatness,	572
Continuation of economic changes,	573
Attempts to check them,	573
1597 The Poor Law,	573
Growth of luxury,	574
Literature,	574
Shakspeare, Spenser, Hooker, Bacon,	575
1598 Importance of the year abroad,	575
Marked in England by Burghley's death,	576
Rivalry of Essex and Cecil,	576
Possible successors,	577
Advice of Cecil and Essex to James,	577
Irish affairs,	577
1599 Essex goes to Ireland, triumph of Cecil,	578
1600 Essex's hasty return and disgrace,	578
1601 His treason, trial, and death,	579
Sequel of Irish affairs,	579
The Queen's last Parliament,	579
Her wise withdrawal of Monopolies,	579

MONARCHY BY DIVINE RIGHT.

JAMES I. 1603-1625.

Change in the position of royalty,	581
The original idea of a King, as Proprietor of the land,	582
Divine right—official royalty,	583
James's own views,	583
1603 James well received by Puritans and Catholics,	584
Both France and Spain seek his alliance,	585
The Main Plot,	585
The Bye Plot,	586
Cecil gets rid of his rivals by mixing the Plots,	586

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1604 Conference at Hampton Court,	587
Triumph of the High Church Party,	587
James displeases his Puritan Parliament,	588
They insist on their privileges,	588
To appease them he persecutes the Catholics,	588
Gunpowder Plot,	589
1605 James's position now secure, he shows his real character,	592
1607 Consequent opposition,	592
Cecil's attempts to obtain money,	593
1612 Death of Cecil,	595
His policy against Spain,	595
1613 Marriage of Princess Elizabeth,	596
1612 Death of Prince Henry,	596
1611 Imprisonment of Arabella Stuart,	597
1613 Government of Favourites—Peace policy,	597
The first favourite, Robert Carr,	597
His marriage and disgrace,	597
1615 The second favourite, Villiers,	598
Consequent degradation of English politics,	599
1614 The Addled Parliament,	599
1617 Raleigh's last voyage to Guiana,	600
1618 His execution,	601
Beginning of the Thirty Years' War,	601
1620 Sympathy in England for the Protestant side,	602
James refuses to interfere,	603
1621 He takes advantage of the popular feeling to call a Parliament,	603
It disappoints him,	603
His conduct during the recess exasperates them,	604
1622 He dissolves them in anger,	604
Negotiations for the Spanish match continued,	604
1623 Charles and Buckingham go to Spain,	605
The match is broken off: Buckingham's popularity,	605
1625 Death of James,	606
Affairs in Scotland,	606
1606 James tries to introduce Episcopacy,	606
1612 It is authorized by the Estates,	606
1621 Anger excited by the Five Articles of Perth,	607
Scotch Colonies in Ireland,	607

CHARLES I. 1625-1649.

1625 Contrast of Charles's character to James's,	608
Consequent increased hostility of the nation,	609

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1625 Character of the House of Commons,	609
Nothing but the Parliament to restrain the King,	609
Protestant feeling of the country,	610
Position of foreign affairs,	610
Danger of the Protestant cause,	611
Richelieu forms a League,	611
1626 Treaty of Monçon,	611
1625 Unpopularity of the French match,	612
Arminian character of the Court religion,	612
Dislike of Buckingham,	612
First Parliament, June 18,	612
Loan of Ships to Richelieu,	613
Parliament dissolved, Aug. 12,	614
To court popularity, a fleet is sent to Cadiz,	614
Its complete failure,	614
1626 Second Parliament, Feb. 28,	615
Appoints three Committees,—for Religion, for Grievances, for Evils and their Remedies,	615
Charles's irritating speeches,	615
Impeachment of Buckingham,	616
Parliament dissolved to save him, June 15,	617
Money obtained by illegal means,	617
Under pretext of invasion,	617
Attempt to govern without a Parliament,	618
1627 Arminian preaching,	618
Sermons of Dr. Sibthorpe and Dr. Manwaring,	618
Danger of a Catholic reaction,	619
Discontent increases,	619
Imprisonment of those who refuse to pay the loan,	619
Trial of Habeas Corpus: its legality questioned,	619
The Judges decide for the Crown,	620
War with France,	620
Charles's reasons for helping the Huguenots,	620
Disastrous expedition to Rhé,	621
1628 Third Parliament, March 18,	622
The Petition of Right,	622
The King's evasive answer,	623
Scene in the House,	623
Triumph of the Commons,	623
Parliament prorogued, June 26,	624
Assassination of Buckingham,	624
Wentworth the mainstay of the Court,	626
1629 Parliament reassembles, Jan. 20,	626
Parliament dissolved, March 10,	627
Period of government without Parliaments,	627

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1631 Financial schemes,	628
1634 Ship-money,	629
1637 Hampden's opposition to it,	630
Importance of the decision to the Crown,	630
Unpopular action of the Church,	630
1637 Four instances of persecution,	631
The Star Chamber,	632
Wentworth, President of the North and Lord-Deputy,	632
Retrospect of Irish history,	632
1608 Colonization of Ulster,	632
1623 Falkland's Government,	633
1633 Wentworth's Government,	634
1636 He attempts the colonization of Ulster,	636
Consequent discontent of natives and Puritans,	636
Affairs in Scotland,	636
1628 Church property resumed,	636
1633 Charles visits Scotland and quarrels with the Parliament,	637
Land's ritualistic measures,	637
1636 His illegal canons,	637
1637 Introduction of the Service Book,	638
Uproars in Edinburgh,	638
1638 The Tables,	638
Renewal of the Covenant,	639
Claims of the Covenanters granted to gain time,	639
General Assembly called,	639
Assembly dissolved, but continues its sitting,	640
1639 Preparations for war,	640
France helps the Scotch,	640
Resources of England,	640
Leslie at Dunse Law,	641
Treaty of Berwick,	641
Arrest of Lowdon,	642
1640 Short Parliament, April 13,	642
Called in expectation of renewed war,	642
It proceeds to grievances, and is dissolved, May 5,	642
Financial difficulty and mutinous temper of the army,	643
The Scotch invade England,	643
Great Council,	644
Treaty of Ripon,	644
The Long Parliament, Nov. 3,	644
The Puritan and Republican element of the Reform Party,	645
Impeachment and trial of Strafford,	645
1641 Charles consents to the Bill of Attainder,	649
Strafford's execution,	649

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1641 Impeachment of Laud,	649
Flight of Windebank and Finch,	649
Root and Branch Bill,	650
Ship-money declared illegal,	650
The three Courts abolished,	650
The Army Plot discovered,	650
Triennial Bill passed,	651
Bill against dissolving Parliament passed,	651
Charles's motive for yielding,	651
His hopes from Scotland,	652
Suspensions of the Commons roused,	652
Charles goes to Scotland,	653
The Incident,	653
The Irish insurrection,	654
Three parties in Ireland,	654
Failure of the plot in Dublin,	654
Massacre in Ulster,	654
Question of Charles's complicity,	655
Charles loyally received on returning to London,	655
The Commons issue the Grand Remonstrance,	656
They in vain demand a guard,	656
Constant riots in London,	657
The words "Roundhead" and "Cavalier" coined,	657
1642 Attempt to arrest the Five Members,	657
Charles leaves London for York,	658
Sends the Queen to Holland,	658
Hull refuses him its arms and ammunition,	659
Ordinance of Militia and Commission of Array,	659
Division of England—Royalist and Puritan,	659
Essex and Rupert made Generals of the two armies,	659
Charles raises his standard, Aug. 22,	659
Battle of Edgehill, Oct. 23,	660
Charles approaches London,	660
He retires to Oxford,	661
Character of the war,	661
The Association,	662
1643 Inaction of Essex,	662
Royalist conquest of Yorkshire,	662
Checked at Hull and Winceby, Oct. 10,	663
Waller's disasters in the West,	663
Cromwell alone successful in the East,	663
To secure Scotch help, the Covenant is taken,	663
Charles ruins his cause by besieging Gloucester,	664
Essex relieves it,	664
Indecisive Battle of Newbury, Sept. 20,	664

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1643 Financial resources of the King and Parliament,	665
Assembly at Westminster,	666
State of Religion,	666
1644 Irish and Scotch take part in the war,	666
Truce with the rebels in Ireland enables the King's army to act,	667
It lands in Wales: is defeated at Nantwich,	667
The Scotch army enters England,	668
Gathering of the armies in Yorkshire,	668
Battle of Marston Moor, July 2,	668
Parliamentary disasters elsewhere,	669
Battle of Copredy Bridge, June 29,	669
Essex defeated in Cornwall,	669
Cromwell joins the Southern army,	669
Second Battle of Newbury, Oct. 22,	670
Rise of Independency,	670
Cromwell's practical, religious, and political views,	670
His quarrel with Manchester,	671
1645 The Self-denying Ordinance,	672
The remodelled army,	673
Failure of Presbyterian negotiations at Uxbridge,	673
The Truce in Ireland changed to a Peace in Charles's interest,	674
Montrose in Scotland,	674
First campaign of the new modelled army,	675
Battle of Naseby, June 14,	676
Charles trusts to the Scotch and Irish,	676
The mission of Glamorgan,	676
Fairfax victorious in the West,	676
Fall of Bristol,	677
Defeat of Montrose at Philiphaugh,	677
1646 No hope for Charles from Ireland,	677
Destruction of his army in the West,	678
Capture of Oxford,	678
He tries in vain to divide his enemies,	678
He flies to the Scotch at Newark,	678
They refuse to join his intrigues,	679
1647 Their arrears being paid, they withdraw, giving up Charles,	679
Ormond places the Irish war in the hands of Parliament,	680
Triumph of the Presbyterians in Parliament,	680
They attempt to disband the army,	681
Rendezvous at Newmarket,	682
The army gets possession of the King,	682
It advances towards London,	682
Offers Charles moderate terms,	683
Presbyterian reaction in London,	683

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1647 The army marches through the City,	684
Charles refuses the terms he had already accepted,	684
His duplicity renders compromise hopeless,	684
He flies to Carisbrook,	685
1648 He intrigues with the Scotch,	685
Reaction in his favour,	685
The Scotch invade England,	685
They are defeated at Preston,	686
Negotiations at Newport,	686
Charles is taken from Carisbrook,	686
Pride's Purge,	686
1649 Trial and death of the King, Jan. 29,	687

THE COMMONWEALTH. 1649-1660.

CROMWELL.

Establishment of the Republican Government,	688
Cromwell continues the Irish war,	689
His difficulties with the Levellers,	689
Their mutinies suppressed,	690
Uncertainty of Charles II.'s movements,	691
Proposals of the Scotch and Irish to him,	691
Cromwell goes to Ireland,	692
Reduces Drogheda, Wexford, and the South,	692
1650 He is recalled to England,	693
Charles accepts the Scotch proposals,	693
Montrose's defeat and death,	693
Fairfax refusing to fight the Scotch,	694
Cromwell accepts the command,	694
Wins the Battle of Dunbar, Sept. 3,	694
And takes Edinburgh,	696
Division among the Scotch,	696
Protesters and Resolutioners,	696
1651 Charles is crowned,	697
He marches into England,	697
Cromwell overtakes him at Worcester,	697
Charles escapes to France,	697
Cromwell's strong rule in Scotland,	698
Foreign difficulties of the Commonwealth,	698
The Navigation Act,	699
Oligarchical character of the Parliament,	699
Cromwell desires a settlement. . . .	699

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1651 Conference between the Parliament and the army,	700
1652 War with Holland,	700
Petition from the officers,	702
Parliament considers a dissolution,	702
1653 The Great Conference,	702
1653 Cromwell expels the Long Parliament, April 20,	703
He calls the Little Parliament, July 4,	703
It dissolves itself, Dec. 12,	704
Cromwell made Protector under the Instrument,	704
1654 His vigorous rule,	705
Vowel's Plot,	705
Cromwell's second Parliament, Sept. 3,	705
It will not produce a settlement,	706
Cromwell turns out his opponents,	706
1655 Parliament still does nothing and is dissolved,	706
Danger from Anabaptist and Royalist Plots,	707
Cromwell's Major-Generals,	707
1656 His foreign policy,	708
War with Spain,	708
Capture of Jamaica,	708
1657 Fearing invasion, Cromwell calls his Third Parliament,	709
Plots against his life,	709
Proposal to call him King,	710
The Petition and Advice,	710
He objects to the title of King,	711
His success abroad,	711
Attempts at rebellion thwarted,	712
1658 Parliament reconstructed, Jan. 20,	712
It falls and is dissolved, Feb. 4,	713
Cromwell absolute, acts vigorously,	713
Respect for him abroad,	713
His death, Sept. 3,	714
His character,	714
Quiet accession of Richard Cromwell,	716
His character,	716
He offends the Godly Party,	716
1659 He calls a Parliament, Jan. 27,	717
In which the Republicans predominate,	717
No business is done,	717
Displeasure of the army,	717
Parliament dissolved, April 22,	717
The army re-establishes the Rump, May 9,	718
The Rump tries to rule the army,	718
Richard retires,	718
Quarrels of the army and the Rump,	719

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1660 Monk marches to London,	719
Demands a Free Parliament,	720
It proves Royalist,	720
Monk invites Charles to return,	720
Charles received joyfully, except by the army,	721

THE RESTORATION. TRANSITION TO CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY.

CHARLES II. 1660-1685.

	722
The work of the Convention Parliament,	723
The Amnesty,	723
The settlement of property, of the Church, of the Revenue,	726
Its work done, Charles dissolves it,	726
1661 New Parliament violently Royalist,	726
The Corporation Act,	727
Trial of Lambert and Vane,	727
The Act of Uniformity,	728
Similar reaction in Scotland,	728
Treason of Lauderdale and Sharp,	728
Episcopalian Church established,	729
Execution of Argyle, Johnstone, and Guthrie,	729
1662 Episcopal Ordination Act,	729
The Scotch Mile Act,	730
Character of Clarendon's government,	730
Charles's character,	731
1663 His Catholic tendencies checked by the Commons,	732
1664 Conventicle Act,	732
1665 Conduct of the Nonconformists during the Plague,	732
The Five Mile Act,	733
Opposition to Clarendon,	733
Causes of discontent,	733
His foreign policy the pretext for attack,	734
The ambitious views of Louis XIV.,	734
Frighten the Dutch into negotiations,	735
War between England and Holland,	735
Dutch victory in the Downs,	736
1667 Louis deserts the Dutch,	736
And pensions Charles,	736
The Dutch in the Medway,	736
Peace between Holland, France and England,	736
Discontent increases,	736

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1667 In Scotland against religious oppression,	737
In England against the wickedness of the Court,	737
The maladministration of Government,	737
Misappropriation of public money,	737
And the conduct of the Courtiers at the Fire of London,	738
Duke of Buckingham persuades Charles to dismiss Clarendon,	738
1668 The Cabal Ministry,	739
Temporary change of policy,	740
The Triple Alliance,	740
Charles's real designs, absolutism, a standing army, and the establishment of Roman Catholicism, by the help of Louis,	741
1670 Secret Treaty with France,	742
1671 Finding Parliament obstructive, he insults and prorogues it,	743
Money obtained by a national bankruptcy,	743
1672 War declared against Holland,	743
The Dutch victorious,	744
1673 Declaration of Indulgence,	744
Parliament compels Charles to withdraw it,	745
And passes the Test Act,	745
Causing the Cabal Ministry to resign,	745
1674 And makes Peace with Holland,	745
Danby's Ministry,	745
Apparent inconsistency of his Administration,	745
Difficulties of the Opposition and of Louis,	746
1675 Charles attempts arbitrary rule,	747
Parliament wishes to check Louis,	747
Louis bribes Charles to prorogue Parliament, Nov. 22,	747
1677 Parliament re-assembling demands war with France,	748
Louis again secures a prerogation,	748
1678 Mary marries the Prince of Orange,	748
Charles, in revenge for Louis' anger at this, summons Parliament,	748
Louis intrigues with the Opposition,	748
And reveals the secret Treaty between Charles and himself,	749
Consequent anger against Danby,	750
The country being excited by the Popish Plot,	750
Parliament dissolved to save Danby, Dec. 30,	752
1679 The New Parliament sentences Danby to the Tower,	752
Brings in the Exclusion Bill,	752
Temple's scheme of government fails in practice,	753
Parliament dissolved, July,	753
After carrying the Habeas Corpus Act,	753
Popish Plot trials continue,	754

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1679 Popularity of the Duke of Monmouth,	754
Oppressions in Scotland fail to subdue the Covenanters,	754
They murder Archbishop Sharp,	755
Monmouth defeats them at Bothwell Bridge,	755
Duke of York subdues them by torture,	756
Enthusiasm for Monmouth,	756
1680 Reaction in favour of the Duke of York,	756
1681 Parliament meets, Oct. 28,	757
The Commons pass the Exclusion Bill,	757
The Lords throw it out,	757
Parliament dissolved, Jan. 18,	757
New Parliament at Oxford, March 21,	757
Refuses any compromise, and is dissolved at once, March 27,	758
Charles's vengeance,	758
Confiscation of the Charters,	758
Despair and fury of the Whigs,	758
1683 Rye-House Plot,	759
Charles becomes absolute,	759
1684 Duke of York opposed only by Halifax,	759
1685 Death of Charles, Feb. 8,	760

JAMES II. 1685-1688.

Rochester supersedes Halifax,	761
James collects customs without Parliament,	762
Receives money unwillingly from Louis,	762
Cruel punishment of Oates and Baxter,	763
Persecution of the Covenanters by Claverhouse,	764
First Parliament, Tory, May 22,	764
It grants Revenue for life,	764
Insurrection of Monmouth and Argyle,	764
Argyle's expedition—his execution, June 30,	765
Monmouth's expedition,	766
Battle of Sedgmoor, July 6,	767
Execution of Monmouth, July 15,	767
Cruelties of Kirke and Jeffreys,	768
Climax of James's power,	768
He breaks the Test Act,	768
Wishes to increase the army,	769
Opposition in both Lords and Commons,	769
James alienates the Church,	769
Parties at the Court,	769
Triumph of Sunderland and the extreme Catholic party,	770
The King's dispensing power asserted,	771

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1685 Upheld by the Judges,	771
Used to give benefices to Catholics,	771
1686 High Commission Court established,	771
Permanent army at Hounslow,	772
Similar action in Scotland,	772
And in Ireland,	772
James favours the Irish Catholics,	774
1687 Tyrconnel supersedes Clarendon,	774
1688 Rochester is dismissed,	774
Declaration of Indulgence,	774
The Whigs apply to William of Orange,	775
James's schemes continue,	775
Further aggressions of the Court of High Commission,	775
Schemes for a Catholic successor,	776
James's vain attempt to secure a favourable Parliament,	776
He orders Declaration of Indulgence to be read in the Churches,	777
Seven Bishops petition against it,	777
They are sent to the Tower,	778
Trial and acquittal of the Bishops,	778
Invitation to William of Orange,	779
William's difficulties,	779
Removed by the folly of his enemies,	780
He prepares for his descent on England,	782
James obstinately refuses to take warning,	782
William issues his Declaration,	783
James, convinced, makes concessions,	783
William lands at Torbay,	784
Advances to Exeter,	784
Churchill's treason at Salisbury,	784
James sends Commissioners to treat,	785
Meanwhile determines to fly,	785
His flight, Dec. 11,	786
Position of the Tories,	786
The Peers assume the Government,	786
William approaches London,	787
James returns,	787
He finally escapes to France,	787
William's difficult position,	787
1689 He decides for a Convention,	788
Three ways of arranging the succession,	788
The Commons declare the Throne vacant,	788
A compromise decided on,	789

CONTENTS

STATE OF SOCIETY. 1660-1688.

	PAGE
General Character of the Period,	790
Material condition of the people,	793
Agriculture,	793
Manufactures,	794
Trade,	797
Characteristics of the various classes,	800

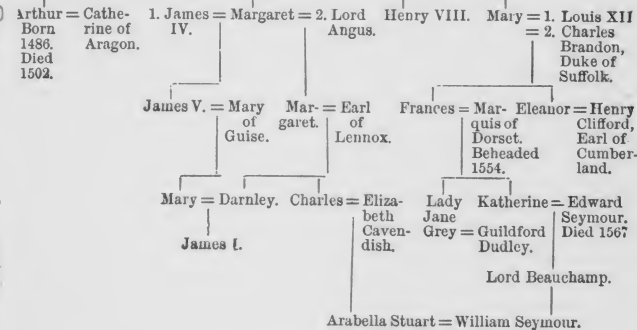

LIST OF MAPS.

1. EUROPE,	At end of Book
2. ENGLAND AND WALES,	" "
3. SCOTLAND,	" "
4. IRELAND,	" "

HENRY VII.

1485-1509.

Born 1456 = Elizabeth of York.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James III., 1460. James IV., 1488.	Charles VIII., 1483. Louis XII., 1498.	Frederick III., 1440. Maximilian I., 1493.	Ferdinand II., 1479

POPES.—Innocent VIII., 1484. Alexander VI., 1492. Pius III., 1503. Julius II., 1503.

Archbishops.
Thomas Bouchier, 1454.
John Morton, 1486.
Henry Dean, 1501.
William Warham, 1503.

Chancellors.
John Alcock, 1485.
Cardinal Morton, 1487.
Henry Dean, 1500.
William Warham, 1502.

A NEW line was thus raised to the throne of England. It was only indirectly that the new King represented the House of Lancaster. On his father's side he was sprung from the second marriage of the wife of Henry V., on his mother's side from the illegitimate family of John of Gaunt, which had been expressly excluded from the throne. ¹ In the lack of any other leader, however, he had been accepted as head of the Lancas-

Character of the reign, that of an usurper.

¹ The exception does not occur in the patent of Legitimation in the Rolls of Parliament, but is added in the patent confirming the grant to John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, 1407.

trians, but it was really a coalition between the Yorkists and Lancastrians which secured him his elevation. Richard had so shocked the feelings even of his own party, that they had been willing, as we have seen, to waive their old antipathies, and to assist Henry, provided always that he married the Princess Elizabeth of York. The new King therefore found some difficulty in stating on what grounds he claimed the throne. Lancastrian in feeling, but not purely Lancastrian in blood, and dependent upon the support of Yorkists, he could allege no hereditary claim,—to allege conquest, which seemed the other alternative, could not but be irritating to a proud nation like the English. Nor indeed would it have represented the fact. It would have been ridiculous to allege that the kingdom had been conquered at the battle of Bosworth, when the advantage had been secured chiefly by the accidental death of his rival. In fact, as he himself knew, he was accepted by the nation because they were wearied out of bloodshed, and because there seemed some chance that the great national feud might be healed by his accession. He consequently had himself declared King by the Parliament, which, though it was in fact subservient to the ruling power, retained much of the authority derived from its former greatness, and still presumably expressed the national wishes. The example thus set by Henry was followed by his successors, who, arbitrary though they were, preferred to give to their usurpations the sanction of what still professed to be the representation of the nation. None the less was his reign the reign of an usurper, the reign of one anxious to establish his dynasty, and working for that end without much regard for the national honour. It is plain, however, that he understood well the nature of the crisis, and the opportunity which was offered him for establishing a strong monarchy upon the ruins of the old nobility of England, which had been almost exterminated during the late wars. We find him therefore determined and cruel in the suppression and punishment of all insurrections on the part of any who could be dangerous to his dynasty;—avaricious and grasping, even violently and illegally so when he found himself strong enough, not merely for the sake of the money, though probably he liked that well enough, but because he knew what strength lay in the possession of large treasures, and because he saw that it might free him from the necessity of frequent Parliaments;—determined to maintain order, and for that purpose, and as an additional support to the central authority, establishing his Court of the Star Chamber. In his relations with foreign countries, we see him risking little for mere honour, but securing some solid advantages by those forms of intrigue which, arising in Italy, were gradually growing into that art of diplomacy which is so distinguishing a mark of modern European history; while his domestic policy was directed chiefly to depress still further the already broken nobility, while surrounding himself with new-made men who depended for their importance on Court favour.

His reign is in fact the completion of an entire change in the character of the monarchy which was begun by Edward IV. The constitutional growth of the nation, which had been advancing with rapid strides since the time of Edward I., was checked. In the place of national or feudal monarchy there had arisen a monarchy personal and nearly absolute; and many of the abuses of royalty already removed (such as the exaggerated power of the Privy Council and the use of arbitrary taxation under the form of benevolences) began to reappear. At the close of the Wars of the Roses there was no class of sufficient importance to withstand the power of royalty; the intermediate classes had disappeared. The King stood face to face with the commonalty; and that commonalty was not yet sufficiently powerful to act as a check upon its rival. The constitutional growth of England had depended upon the union of all classes, Church, Barons, and Commons. But the Wars of the Roses had destroyed the old nobility. That great war had been in its character a faction fight among the nobles themselves; it had scarcely touched the bulk of the nation. The processes of law went on as usual; industry continued, trade improved, wealth increased. But the two great factions mutually destroyed each other; at the close of that war there were scarcely any of the great families left. The Church had been unaffected by the war. Its wealth was untouched. But by the signs of the coming Reformation given by Wicliffe and his followers, and by the threatening attitude more than once assumed by the Commons, it had been completely terrified. To uphold its position it was ready to cling to any support. The strongest support was the Crown. All its influence was therefore withdrawn from the nation, and thrown on the side of the King; and from among its numbers, till the time of Cromwell and the Reformation, the ablest ministers of the new monarchy were drawn. It might be supposed, that with the undoubted growth in wealth and importance of the gentry and higher commons, that class would have been in a position to act the part which the baronial party had hitherto taken. But several causes prevented the House of Commons

Change in the character of the monarchy.

from acting with independence. In the reign of Henry VI. the franchise had been narrowed. Till that time all freeholders had had the right of voting. The right was then confined to freeholders with the qualification of forty shillings. This at once brought the representation under the influence of the greater landowners and of the Crown. For party purposes this influence had been unscrupulously used. The representation was constantly tampered with. It is thus we find again and again the Parliament ready to subserve the objects of the party, and, instead of acting independently, merely sanctioning and registering the will of those who were at the moment masters of the Government. It was not until the time of the Puritans, until England had again felt under Elizabeth the impulse of national feeling, that the gentry found themselves sufficiently strong to step forward into the place left vacant by the destruction of the baronage. This new position they asserted in the reign of Charles I., and in the beginning of the Long Parliament, and finally made good in the Revolution of 1688. Thus, in the general depression of all classes, the monarchy was enabled to assume that personal character which it wore during the reigns of the Tudor Kings.

The first acts of Henry's reign were directed against the Yorkists.

Measures for the repression of the Yorkists.

Edward, the Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, was imprisoned in the Tower, and all grants of Crown lands made since 1454 were recalled,—these of course having been chiefly given to followers of the House of York. Nor was Henry's dislike for the excluded House groundless. In 1486 there was an unsuccessful rising under Lord Lovel and the Staffords, and the following year took place the great imposture of Lambert Simnel. This young man, trained no doubt by some one of more influence behind the scenes, took advantage of the popularity which Richard, the great Duke of York, had secured for himself and his family during his government in Ireland. Personating the young Earl of Warwick, he betook himself to Dublin, where he gained the complete support of the Earl of Kildare, the Lord Deputy. Being joined by Lord Lovel, by the Earl of Lincoln, himself connected with the royal family, and by an army of 2000 men from Flanders under Martin Schwartz, he landed in Lancashire, and pushing forwards across England towards Newark, fell in with the King's forces at Stoke in Nottinghamshire (June 10), where his troops were entirely routed. Lincoln, Martin Schwartz, and others, lost their lives in the battle. Lord Lovel escaped. His body was discovered some centuries later in a secret chamber of one of his

Lambert Simnel.
1487.

residences, where he had apparently taken refuge and been forgotten. Simnel became a servant in the royal household.

Alarmed perhaps by this sign of activity on the part of the Yorkists, Henry at length suffered Elizabeth of York to be crowned. It would seem from his delay that he was especially desirous of not in any sense reigning in right of his wife. But while thus in some degree softening the Yorkist opposition, he used the most stringent means to repress the party, and a Bill of Attainder was passed, including almost every important man who had been engaged in Simnel's insurrection. Moreover, to prevent the illegal habit of maintenance, which rendered unexpected insurrections very easy by placing a band of liveried adherents at once at the disposal of any discontented lord, a special court was established (subsequently known as the Court of the Star Chamber), having for its object the suppression of this institution, and which, consisting as it did of some of the chief members of the Council, strengthened by the addition of the judges, was enabled to reach those powerful nobles whom the weaker arm of the regular Law Courts might have been unable to touch. It is plain that the establishment of such a Court, though perhaps necessary for the maintenance of order, considerably increased the power of the central authority.

The expedients of the defeated party were however by no means exhausted. Claimants to the throne were so numerous that the explosion of one imposture only made way for another. In the beginning of the year 1492, a person, Perkin Warbeck acknowledged in France, 1492. purporting to be the younger of the Princes popularly reported to have been slain in the Tower, made his appearance in Ireland, where he gained, as Simnel had done, considerable support. But on this occasion there was no premature action. He withdrew from Ireland, and sought refuge with the King of France, who acknowledged him as the heir to the English throne. Charles VIII. was at that time at war with Henry. It had been a principal object of his policy to unite Brittany with France. Already, in 1487, he had assaulted that country, and Henry had been called upon to give assistance to the friends who had sheltered him in his exile. Assistance was promised, and money was raised, but the money was kept, and the assistance never given. The same trick had been played in 1489, when Henry had promised his assistance to Anne of Brittany, whose father, Francis, the Duke who had protected Henry, was now dead. This time the army was sent, but with instructions not to fight. Disgust at this double dealing produced an insurrection in the North of England, in which the Earl of Northumberland, who had collected the money, lost his life. Neither such lukewarm assistance as Henry's, nor the more earnest efforts of Maximilian, King of the Romans, who was a suitor for her hand, could save Anne, who, in the year 1491, accepted the hand of Charles, and united Brittany to the French monarchy. This afforded Henry a fresh opportunity for raising a subsidy, to wreak his vengeance, as he said, on the French King. But the vengeance came to nothing; for, though a fine army crossed the Channel, it had not been there a week before a treaty with Charles was made. As might have been expected from the character of the King, this arrangement, known as the Treaty of Estaples (Aug. 1492), related chiefly to money, Charles binding himself to pay Henry £149,000. Henry's counsellors and advisers did not come out of the negotiation empty handed. One consequence of this treaty was the removal of the pretender Warbeck from the French Court.

He thence betook himself to the Court of Burgundy, in Burgundy. and placed himself under the protection of Margaret, Edward IV.'s sister, who, as Dowager, held her dower lands in complete independence. By her he was fully acknowledged, and by her influence the King of the Romans (Maximilian), his son Philip the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Saxony, the Kings of Denmark and Scotland, sent him ambassadors. Nor was he without powerful support in England. In 1494 several Lords were arrested on the charge of high treason and executed, among them Sir William Stanley (January 1495), one of the family who had secured the throne for Henry; his great wealth escheated to the Crown. In 1496, Henry's diplomatic skill succeeded in removing the pretender from Burgundy. But meanwhile he had made an unsuccessful descent upon the coast of Kent, when 169 prisoners were taken, and all hanged,—an instance both of Henry's determination to show no mercy to the Yorkists and of the little value in which human life was held, in consequence, partly no doubt, of the barbarous bloodshed of the last century. The treaty which expelled Perkin Warbeck from Burgundy was called "The Great Intercourse." For the last several years both countries had been suffering from the interruption of the commercial intercourse between England and the Netherlands. The present treaty was a broad and wise commercial arrangement, stipulating a reciprocal liberty of trading "in all commodities to each other's ports without pass or license," and mutual assistance and support in all commercial matters, such as the suppression of piracy and privateering. It marks an era in the history of international relations.

From Flanders, Perkin Warbeck, still hovering round England, took refuge with the King of Scotland, whose reception of him was more practical and chivalrous than that of any of his earlier protectors. He did not hesitate to give him his in Scotland. 1496. kinswoman Lady Katherine Gordon in marriage, and before winter declared war in his behalf with the King of England. The proclamation of Warbeck, however, in which he spoke of Henry as "Henry Tyddor, the false usurper," and explained his escape from the Tower, met with no response, and after wasting some districts in the North of England, the army withdrew. But Henry could not let such an opportunity slip. He at once demanded a large sum from his Parliament. It was not raised without difficulty. The Cornish men rose against it, elected as their leaders one Hammock, an attorney, and Joseph a blacksmith. They afterwards, on advancing to Wells, obtained the assistance of Lord Audley, who put himself at their head, and under his command pushed on to London, and were not checked till they suffered a complete defeat on Blackheath. The leaders were at once executed, but the bulk of the insurgents made their way back to Cornwall. To this discontented neighbourhood Warbeck, who had found it necessary to leave Scotland, betook himself. With a small following he landed at Whitsand Bay, and leaving his wife at St. Michael's Mount, found himself before Exeter at the head of Warbeck lands in Cornwall. 1497. 6000 men. His assaults upon that city failed, and one of his counsellors, who may well be suspected of being Henry's spy, deserted him. Bacon, in his history of the reign, speaks contemptuously of those who remained as "Sterne, a bankrupt mercer, Hulton, a tailor, and Astley, a scrivener." Desertions appear to have become frequent; and though a considerable force still kept together, their leader's courage forsook him, and he fled by night and took sanctuary in the Abbey of Beaulieu. He was there, in January 1498, surrounded, and having received a promise that his life should be spared, he left the sanctuary in a forlorn and comfortless plight. Without foreign assistance he had ceased to be an object of terror. He was allowed to move freely about London, but on attempting to escape, was placed in the Tower, after having read in public a full confession of his imposture. In this document he declared himself to be the son of John Osbeck, comptroller of the town of Tournay, and asserts that, while travelling as a servant, the people of Cork insisted on his being a Plantagenet. This would seem at all events to prove a very strong resemblance to that family, while the length of time during which he played his part, without, it is asserted, committing a single error, prevents an absolute dispersion of the mystery which hangs over him; for although careful inquiries were made, and witness taken to prove his base birth, they were so entirely in the hands of Henry's agents, that their depositions cannot be taken for is executed.

1499.

more than an ex parte statement. In November 1499, Perkin and the young Earl of Warwick, whom he had met in the Tower, were both executed. The charges against them were that they had attempted to escape, and some witness, which looks like a forgery, was advanced to prove their treasonable intentions. It is possible that Warwick may have listened to the suggestions of Warbeck. It is certain that the Yorkist feeling was not dead, for another spurious Earl of Warwick had just been suppressed and executed, and it is possible that at the bottom of this execution lay the intrigues of Ferdinand of Spain, with whom Henry was now negotiating a marriage for his eldest son, and who might not unreasonably object to contracting his daughter to a Prince whose claim was insecure, and who might easily by a turn in the wheel of Fortune be an exile and a wanderer.

Having thus rid himself of the last dangerous pretender of the House of York, Henry found his position secure. He was enabled to spend the remaining ten years of his reign in completing those lines of policy the foundations of which he had been laying during the seven years of discomfort which Warbeck had caused him. At home he had in a great degree completed the work of establishing the royal power. The large subsidies which he had collected during the war with France, and again in James's attack on England, had been used but sparingly. His household was so economically managed that he lived within the income which Parliament had granted him for the purpose of keeping it up. His yearly expenses were somewhat over £12,000, the grant was £13,000. He thus found himself in a position to act without frequent recourse to Parliament, which met but three times in the last ten years of his reign.

Ireland, which had twice shown its devotion to the House of York, had been brought into comparative order by Sir Edward Poynings, acting as a deputy for Henry's second son, afterwards Henry VIII., at that time a child of four years of age. The Earl of Kildare had been apprehended and sent to England, and the Irish Parliament had passed the statute known as Poynings' Law, by which the country was much more closely connected with England. It was enacted that in future no Parliament should be held without Ireland pacified.

1495

the King being officially informed of it; and that no Acts should be introduced without having previously received the approbation and license of the King under the Great Seal. After the passing of this Act a conciliatory policy was adopted, Kildare liberated and restored to his position, and the quiet of the country for the time secured.

The influence of the great nobles of the Yorkist party had received heavy blows in the unsuccessful rebellions of the reign; while to judge by the story of the heavy fines exacted from the Earl of Oxford for receiving the King attended by a crowd of liveried servants, even the Lancastrians were not exempt from the severe enactments against maintenance, nor free from that legal tyranny which Henry, in common with most rising despots, employed as the chief instrument to secure his power.

Secure at home, he now sought to complete his alliances with foreign countries. The idea of a marriage which might ultimately bring Scotland and England under one crown was a traditional one with English politicians. In the earlier part of his reign, Scotland had been in the hands of James III., a man, unlike the uncultivated nobility around him, a favourer of artists and architects, but a poor soldier, and with a leaning towards the English alliance. His rough nobility could not put up with such crimes. They set up against him the claims of his young son, who was afterwards James IV.: the rival factions met at Sauchie Burn; and the King, as he fled from the battle, was thrown from his horse, and murdered at Beaton Mill, whither he had been taken after his fall. Thus placed upon the throne by the anti-English party, James IV. was not likely to maintain his father's policy. None the less did Henry continue negotiations; and, in 1495, he had urged upon the new King a marriage with his daughter Margaret. The opportunity afforded by the arrival of Warbeck was not neglected by James; but, after two destructive incursions into the Northern counties, he had been induced, chiefly by the intervention of the Spanish ambassador, to get rid of Warbeck, and to enter into a seven years' truce with England. The Spanish influence was sufficiently strong to carry the negotiations to a conclusion, and, in 1502, perpetual peace was established, and all the arrangements for the marriage completed. A year and a half afterwards the Princess went to Scotland, and the match was consummated.

Foreign policy.

Marriage of
James IV. with Margaret.

It was a change in the position of Europe which had induced the Spanish government to use its friendly influence on behalf of Henry. The recovery of France after the

Influence of Spain.

English invasions, and the rapid consolidation of the monarchy, had made it an object of dread to other nations. Henry was therefore inclined in the earlier part of his reign, as we have seen, to oppose it. At the same time he could not enter frankly into alliance with Burgundy, where his antagonists the Yorkists had met with their chief support. The lukewarm and inefficient policy of his earlier years was the consequence. But the invasion of Naples (a country on which Aragon had just claims) by Charles VIII. had produced in an especial manner hostility between France and Spain; and Ferdinand had determined to form a combination to check the further advance of the threatening power. In fact, the lengthened rivalry between France and the Austro-Spanish house was just beginning. His plans embraced a close union with the Burgundian house, friendship with England, and the withdrawal of Scotland from her old alliance with France. A sure ground for a more determined line of foreign policy was thus laid for Henry. By allying himself with Ferdinand, he assured himself against the danger of further support of the Yorkist interest on the part of Burgundy. For by the marriage of Ferdinand's daughter Joanna with the Archduke Philip, Maximilian's son, Spain and Burgundy had become closely united. When therefore Ferdinand, in pursuance of his own plans, proposed a marriage between his daughter Catherine and the Prince of Wales, Henry received the offer gladly. The negotiations for this marriage continued from 1496 till its completion in 1501. The dowry of the Princess was to be 200,000 crowns. One half of this was paid, when, early in 1502, Prince Arthur died. Ferdinand thus ran the risk of losing the friendship of England, and through England that of Scotland. He at once suggested the marriage of Catherine with Prince Henry, who succeeded his brother as Prince of Wales. The necessary dispensations were procured, but each of the crafty and avaricious monarchs thought it well to have a means of exerting some pressure upon his fellow; while Henry could threaten to forbid the match, Ferdinand could refuse to pay the remaining part of the dowry. Thus the marriage remained unfinished till the death of the King.

The death of Henry's wife in 1503 gave him fresh opportunities for strengthening his position in Europe and drawing closer his connection with the Austro-Spanish house. He first sought the hand of the Dowager Queen of Naples, but speedily transferred his suit to Margaret of Savoy, the sister of Philip the Fair, Duke of Burgundy, the husband of Joanna of Castile. An additional advantage in connection with this marriage was to be the surrender of Edmund de la Pole, head of the Yorkists, at that time a refugee in Flanders, to which Henry compelled Philip to consent during an enforced delay in England, whither he had been driven by a storm. He further proposed a match between his daughter Mary and Charles, the child of Philip and Joanna, who was afterwards the great Charles V. In his desire for immediate gain he overreached himself. Isabella of Castile was dead, and Ferdinand had assumed the regency of that country for his daughter Joanna and grandson Charles, Philip, Duke of Burgundy, having meanwhile died. Eager to secure the immediate enjoyment of that kingdom, Henry threw up all chance of his marriage with Savoy, and of the future grandeur of his daughter Mary, and himself sought the hand of the widow Joanna, although she was imbecile and totally unfit to be married.¹ Nor was it till after a year, during which the weakness of her mind increased, that he could be induced to believe that his suit was hopeless. He died before any matrimonial plan could be perfected.

Marriage of Prince Arthur.

His last years were marked in England by a rapacious use of the means the law put in his hands. His agents, the chief of whom were Empson and Dudley, at once filled the royal coffers, and extended the royal authority, by the revival of obsolete penal statutes, and by an unjust employment of the royal right of escheat. When a state escheated to the Crown inquiry was made as to the facts before a jury. By a judicious selection, and the bribing of jurymen, the escheaters were generally able to make out a case in favour of the Crown. It was therefore with a feeling of relief that England heard of Henry's death; although it cannot be denied that his sagacity, his economy, and even the less amiable qualities of pitilessness and love of authority, had secured for England that rest from internal dissension which was so much required, had placed the country in a good position with regard to Europe, and set it upon that natural road of progress which the new birth of freedom and industry in the century that was passing away had rendered necessary. Feudalism had come to its last days, the spirit of industry and commercial enterprise was rising, a new nobility of statesmen had sprung into existence. It remained for his son to complete the destruction of the second great phenomenon of the middle ages—the Church.

¹ This seems so inconsistent with his usual prudence, that, as Ranke suggests, his request for the hand of Joanna may have been only intended as a means to check the urgent demands of the Spanish Court for the completion of the marriage between Catherine and the Prince of Wales, which Henry had no wish to see consummated.

Political schemes of matrimony.

Exactions of his later years.

His death.
Retrospect of his work.

HENRY VIII.

1509—1547.

Born 1491 = 1. Catherine of Aragon, 1509.

Mary.

= 2. Anne Boleyn, 1533.

Elizabeth.

= 3. Jane Seymour, 1536.

Edward VI.

= 4. Anne of Cleves, 1540.

= 5. Catherine Howard, 1540.

= 6. Catherine Parr, 1543.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
James IV., 1488.	Louis XII., 1498.	Maximilian I., 1493.	Ferdinand, 1479.
James V., 1513.	Francis I., 1515.	Charles V., 1519.	Charles V., 1516.
Mary, 1542.

POPEs.—Julius II., 1503. Leo X., 1513. Adrian VI., 1522. Clement VII., 1523. Paul III., 1534.

Archbishops.
William Warham, 1503.
Thomas Cranmer, 1533.

Chancellors.
William Warham, 1502.
Cardinal Wolsey, 1515.
Sir Thomas More, 1529.
Sir Thomas Audley, 1532.
Thomas Wriothesley, 1544.

HENRY VIII. had some peculiar advantages in his favour. He in a certain sense represented the two Houses whose rivalry had so long disturbed the peace of England, for, although the actual connection of Henry VII. with the Lancastrian princes was but slight, he had been acknowledged as head of the party, while Elizabeth was the accepted heir of the House of York. His personal gifts were not slight; even ten years later the Venetian Ambassador thinks him "as handsome as Nature could form him," and mentions that he was an excellent musician and composer, an admirable horseman and wrestler, and possessed of Junction of the Houses of York and Lancaster.

1509]

HENRY'S CHARACTER

367

a good knowledge of French, Latin and Spanish. His success in athletic sports was very great, and the same writer tells us how he would weary ten horses in a day's hunting, and how people came to see him for the sake of his beauty, while playing bowls. Besides these outward graces, he was possessed of considerable knowledge of theology, to which his father had trained him before he was heir-apparent to the throne—a pursuit which, though perhaps of no great worth in itself, at all events tended to the training of his intellect. He accepted as his counsellors those whom he already found in that position. Archbishop Warham was his Chancellor, and Bishop Fox his Secretary; Surrey, with Shrewsbury, Somerset and Poynings, were all members of what may be termed his ministry.

His first step was to complete his marriage with Catherine of Aragon. For six years the dispensation necessary to allow him to marry his brother's widow had been in England, but the marriage had been postponed, partly from a superstitious dread on the part of Henry VII., who conceived that Heaven had declared itself against the union,¹ and partly from money difficulties. It is perhaps worth noticing, in relation to the subsequent question of the divorce, that the young Queen, at this her second marriage, was dressed in white, with unadorned hair, as though a maiden, and not as a widow.

The accession of a popular monarch of necessity brought some popular measures in its train, and not long after his marriage Henry ordered the prosecution of his father's chief extortioners, Empson and Dudley. Although the use they made of legal quibbles deserves no less severe a name than extortion, it was found impossible to form of any number of instances of such extortions a capital charge, and recourse was therefore had to a trumped up story of a threatened conspiracy for carrying off the King. On this charge they both suffered death. This trial gives an early instance of the way justice was administered throughout this reign. Both these criminals were attainted in the Parliament, attacked that is by Bill, and not by process of law. They had however both been convicted in the law courts before the Bill of Attainder was passed. Indeed few of those who fell under suspicion, or were brought to trial during this reign, escaped unconvicted. This was owing probably to the necessary subserviency of a nobility, resting upon the Crown, and to the pressure which Henry VII.'s

His first measures. Prosecution of Empson and Dudley.

¹ This feeling arose from the untimely death of some of his children.

Council Court, and Henry VIII.'s Council, or, as it is often called, Star-Chamber, could bring to bear upon too honest juries.

The King having won popularity by these three acts,—the retention of the better members of his father's Council, the completion of his marriage with Catherine, and the punishment of the most hated of his father's financial agents,—found himself in a position to follow

Henry engages in European politics.
1511.

his personal inclination, and to plunge into the difficult intricacies of European politics, and a European war.

Italy was the point where at this time the interests of politicians centred. Louis XII. had followed the example of his predecessor, and had sought to win glory in that country which Comines calls the burialplace of the French. Meanwhile, amid the petty states of Italy, the cold consistent policy of the aristocratic Republic of Venice had raised that power to a great pre-eminence. Leaving her home among the islands, she had won considerable territory on the mainland, and had even laid her hand on some portions of the States of the Church. The Papal throne was at that time occupied by Julius II., a man who, if he were not a good Churchman, was at least an ardent Italian, and who, a soldier and a statesman rather than a prelate, was bent upon two great objects—the curtailment of the encroachments of Venice and the expulsion of all foreigners from the Italian peninsula. Under his influence the famous League of Cambrai was set on foot. It included the Emperor, the Kings of France and Spain, the Duke of Burgundy and the Pope, and its avowed object was an assault upon the Venetian power. Against such a league Venice could do but little, and a very few defeats on the mainland convinced her of the wisdom of throwing over all that she possessed in Italy, and of retiring within her ancient limits. Having thus made use of the strength of these foreign countries to rid himself of his domestic enemies, the Pope now aimed at winning his higher object of clearing Italy of the foreigner. For this purpose he picked a quarrel with the King of France by attacking his ally the Duke of Ferrara. Although unable to withstand the French in the field, he yet contrived to show himself so formidable, that Louis, among other efforts for his destruction, summoned a council at Pisa, thus giving Julius an opportunity to raise the cry that the Church itself was threatened, and to establish for his own support a Holy League. Of all the Princes who joined Holy League.

1511.

this League Henry VIII. was probably the most disinterested. Maximilian of Germany was desirous of winning Milan, which the French had occupied (claiming it through Valentine Visconti, the grandmother of Louis XII.). Ferdinand of Spain aimed at Navarre, which was in French hands, while the Pope expected to clear Italy of its barbarian conquerors. Henry alone had no apparent interest in the quarrel. The chivalrous love of glory natural to his age, and to one so personally gifted, combined with a sincere wish to uphold the Papacy, which his early theological training had strengthened, were the chief motives for his adhesion to the League. But there was also a desire, perhaps as yet undefined, of preserving the balance of power. This notion—the creation of Italian statesmanship—had begun to spread among European statesmen, and, with its varied consequences of good and evil, has held its place among them till the present time. It is interesting to observe, however, that there was a sharp discussion in the King's Council as to the wisdom of the war; a considerable number of the King's advisers urging, as they might urge now, that if aggrandizement was to be sought, Providence had marked out the way for us, namely the sea. This difference of opinion, as to whether England should aim at European connections, or confine itself to the natural development of its advantages as an island, will be found henceforward at the bottom of all party differences with regard to its foreign policy.

In the following year, the operations of the League were begun. An English army was despatched to co-operate with Ferdinand in the South of France, while the war was carried on with vigour by the Papal and Spanish armies in Italy. The English, who were under the Marquis of Dorset, found themselves used as a cat's-paw by the Spanish King, who objected—and perhaps by strict military rules he was right—to any advance beyond the frontier till Navarre had been secured. When this had been done, wholly to the advantage of Ferdinand, the English army, weary of waiting, had become disorganized. The garlic and the hot wine of the Peninsula had attacked its health, and Dorset, in dudgeon, brought back his men to England, to Henry's grievous disappointment. Nor were our maritime efforts much more successful. An indecisive battle was fought off the coast of Brittany, where, though the great French ship the "Cordelier" of Brest was burnt, the "Regent," the largest British ship, perished with it, while the French fleet made good its retreat into Brest. In Italy, where, under the fiery guidance of the young Gaston de Foix, they had at first carried all before them, before the year was over the French had been entirely worsted. A victory they had won at Ravenna had cost them dear; they had there lost their intrepid commander, and had since that time been continu-

English army in South of France.
1512.

ally driven backward before the Swiss in the Pope's pay, till Julius could boast that he had indeed freed Italy from the foreigner. He died, however, early the following year, and was succeeded by Leo X., a man of literary and artistic tastes, and of a more pacific disposition. The strength of the coalition was thus somewhat relaxed, but Henry refused to think of peace, and arranged a combined attack with Maximilian, to be directed on this occasion along the usual line of assault from Flanders. The King, with Lords Shrewsbury and Herbert for his generals, crossed the sea with 25,000 men. Maximilian met him with a considerable body of horse, and refusing all command, flattered him by an offer to serve under him as a volunteer. His wisdom and experience were very necessary to the young English King. The combined army formed the siege of Terouenne. Once it was revictualled by a gallant dash of 800 men, each carrying across his saddle a sack of powder and a piece of bacon. They threw their burdens down at the gate, and made good their retreat through the English. A second great attempt was made to victual and relieve it. Maximilian, with his cavalry, moved forward to check the advancing enemy, while the main army was formed in support. The French soldiery, veterans from Italy, were seized with one of those panics to which the soldiers of that nation seem subject, and ten thousand of them fled headlong before the advance of a very inferior body of the allies, while their officers, striving to rally them, were taken prisoners. This curious panic the French christened "the Battle of the Spurs." This victory brought with it the fall of Terouenne, and subsequently the English captured the important town of Tournay.

While the English King was before Terouenne, he had received an embassy from the King of Scotland, James IV., who, it will be remembered, was his brother-in-law. French intrigues, and the long-standing alliance between the nations, had induced James to entertain the idea of a breach with England. Causes of complaint were not wanting. There was a legacy due from Henry VII.; Sir Robert Ker, the Scotch Warden of the Marches, had been killed by a Heron of Ford, and the murderer found refuge in England; Andrew Barton, who, licensed with letters of marque against the Portuguese in revenge for the death of his father, had extended his reprisals to general piracy, had been captured and slain by Lord Thomas and Sir Edward Howard, and the Scotch King demanded justice for the death of his captain. To these questions, which had been long unsettled, an answer was now imperiously de-

The English
attack France
by Flanders.
1513.

Battle of Spurs.
Aug. 16.

Difficulties with
Scotland.

manded. Henry replied with scorn, and the Scotch King declared war. The safety of England had been intrusted to the Earl of Surrey, who, when James crossed the border, was lying at Pontefract. Without delay, he pushed forward northward, and challenging James to meet him on the Friday next following, came up with him when strongly posted on the hill of invaded.

England
Aug. 1513.

Flodden, with one flank covered by the river Till, the other by an impassable morass, and his front rendered impregnable by the massing of his artillery. Ashamed, after his challenge, to avoid the combat, Surrey moved suddenly northward, as though bound for Scotland, but soon marching round to the left, he crossed the Till near its junction with the Tweed, and thus turned James's position. The Scots were thus compelled to fight. On the English right, the

PER. MON.

b

sons of Surrey with difficulty held their own. In the centre, where Battle of Flodden.
 Sept. 9.
 Surrey himself was assaulted by the Scotch King and his choicest troops, the battle inclined against the English; but upon the English left the Highlanders were swept away by the archers, and Stanley, who had the command in that wing, fell on the rear of the successful Scotch centre, and determined the fortune of the day. The slaughter of the Scotch was enormous, and among the number of the slain was James himself, with all his chief nobility.

During the last year (1513) the war had thus gone decidedly against Louis XII. and his allies, and renewed incursions upon the French coast induced him to think of accommodation. Nor was the time unfavourable. The warrior Pope Julius had been succeeded by Leo X., a man of intrigue and of the arts of peace, while Ferdinand had already secured in Navarre the object for which he joined the League. Louis found no difficulty in appeasing Leo when he withdrew his countenance from the Bentivoglii, who were the Pope's chief enemies, and broke up the schismatic council which had been called at Pisa. Ferdinand, satisfied with his gains, had already concluded a truce. Henry had hoped that Maximilian would still stand by him, but the offer of Milan, as a dowry to Renée, the daughter of Louis, upon her marriage with Charles of Spain, Maximilian's grandson and heir, gave Maximilian what he entered the League to win, and—never very rich—he was willing enough to withdraw from the struggle.

Thus left to himself, Henry thought it well to make as good a bargain as he could, and consented to a peace in exchange for large payments of money (amounting to 100,000 crowns), which represented certain sums already due from former treaties, and ratified it by giving Louis his sister Mary in marriage.
 In fact, as far as his political object was concerned, he had succeeded.
 France, checked in Italy, no longer for the time threatened the European balance.

Scotland, Henry's sole remaining enemy, was in no plight to continue the war. In the hope of pacifying the English, the Queen-Dowager, Margaret, Henry's sister, who in some degree represented the English interest in that country, was made regent. She seems, however, to have had the same turn for marrying as her brother, and on allying herself with the Earl of Angus, head of the Douglasses, became so unpopular, that the French party, who still kept up their intrigues with France, contrived that the regency should be taken from her, and given to the Duke of Albany (1515).¹ This Prince came over from France, where he was naturalized, and succeeded in getting the late King's children into his hands.

 Margaret sought refuge in England, where, after a time, Angus, who had been kidnapped and carried to France, joined her. They thus supplied Henry with an instrument by which he could carry on his intrigues in Scotland. The ill-fated marriage, which led to the misfortunes of Mary Queen of Scots, was the union of the two families of Margaret by her respective husbands, James and Angus.²

This attempt of the French to re-establish that influence in Scotland which the policy both of Henry and his father had been directed to destroy, naturally attracted the attention of Henry, and was made a cause of complaint at the French Court, with which, though the treaty still existed, there had already ceased to be cordiality. The gay and beautiful young English Princess had led her husband, always a valetudinarian, to change his habit of life. His dinner-hour had been moved from eight to twelve in the morning; his bed-time, usually six, had been sometimes advanced even till midnight. His health yielded to this change of life, and he died three months after his marriage. With him passed away the real strength of the treaty. His widow almost immediately married Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, the King's favourite companion and her own old lover, braving the royal anger, which seems on this occasion to have been slight, and afterwards founding a family with some claim to the throne.

The new King of France, Francis I.,³ who at his accession had been

French Interference in Scotland.

Death of Louis
 XII. weakens
 the treaty between the nations.

¹ John, Duke of Albany, Admiral of France, was the son of Robert, Duke of Albany, the younger brother of James III., who had retired to France to escape from his brother, whom he had been opposing, in the year 1479. He was welcomed and assisted by Louis XI.

² Mary was daughter of James V., Margaret's son by James IV. Darnley was son of Earl of Lennox, by Margaret Douglas, daughter of Margaret by Angus.

³ Charles V., 1504.

Count of Angoulême, a descendant of the younger son of Louis of Orleans, assassinated in 1407, as Louis XII. had been a descendant of the elder son, was a knight of that new chivalrous school which had taken the place of the real chivalry of the earlier middle ages, and which, while it inculcated the love of adventure and recklessness of its predecessor, did not exclude the slyness and self-seeking of Italian diplomacy. It seemed to him, therefore, as only consistent with his knighthood to reconquer the Milanese from Maximilian Sforza; so he assembled an army secretly at Lyons, without much scruple as to the means he employed for raising the requisite money, turned the position of the Swiss (at that time the most dreaded mercenaries in Europe), who were then lying at Susa, and poured his army by more southern passes into the plains of Piedmont. The Swiss had fallen back to cover Milan, but were defeated at the battle of Marignano (Sept. 13, 1515), which Trivulzio,¹ the veteran commander of the French army, spoke of as "the battle of the Giants," after which Milan was at once occupied by the French. This sudden restitution of French influence in Italy excited the attention of all Europe, yet Henry did not think that the capture of the Milanese alone compromised the relations of the European powers sufficiently to authorize him in plunging heartily into a war. He therefore contented himself with subsidizing the Emperor and the Swiss, and refrained from active participation in the war, although great efforts were made to secure his assistance. To gain the support of Wolsey, who had now become Henry's chief adviser, the Pope raised him to the rank of Cardinal; while, in the following year, Maximilian is said to have made a most extraordinary proposition. He offered to resign the Empire in favour of Henry, and, if the authorities are to be believed, made every arrangement for his coronation, and for a subsequent joint attack upon France. The wisdom of Henry and his advisers rejected this proposal, and Francis, having secured his object, was willing to make peace. A threatened advance of the Turks gave the required opportunity. This people, under Selim, had conquered Egypt and Syria, and was threatening Europe. Under cover of a peace for the purpose of opposing the Mahomedans,

¹ Gian Giacomo Trivulzio, a Milanese noble attached to the interests of France, and a marshal of that kingdom. He died in 1518 in disgrace, pleading in vain that he had fought eighteen battles for Francis I. and his predecessors. His tomb bears the inscription, "J. J. Trivultius, Antonii filius qui nunquam quiescit—face."

in the year 1518 a confederacy was made between England, France and Spain, by which they bound themselves to mutual support against any aggressor, though the aggressor were one of themselves; and thus the long and costly wars which had followed the League of Cambrai were closed by a treaty which left Europe nearly in the same position as before they began.

Peace, and confederacy between England, France, Spain, 1518.

While these wars had been occupying the attention of Europe, the position of chief adviser to the Crown in England had fallen to Thomas Wolsey. Of no high extraction, this able and ambitious man had sought to rise through the Church, which held out hopes of success even to the lowest born. He was educated at Oxford, became a Fellow of Magdalen, tutor to the children of the Marquis of Dorset, incumbent of Lymington, and in the earlier part of the century was made chaplain to Henry VII. Early introduced to public life by the Bishop of Winchester, he was employed, and did good service, in the negotiations which Henry entered upon with regard to a second marriage. He was rewarded with the Deanery of Lincoln, and his ability being appreciated by Henry VIII., he was shortly sworn of the Privy Council. The management of the war had fallen chiefly into his hands, and his rise became exceedingly rapid. On the capture of Tournay, he received the bishopric of that city. In 1514 he was made Archbishop of York, and in the following year, when Warham, the aged Archbishop of Canterbury, withdrew from the chancellorship on occasion of some difference in the Council, the vacant office was given to Wolsey. In 1515, Leo attempted to secure his services by making him a Cardinal, and the following year he reached the summit of ecclesiastical ambition, short of the Papacy itself, by being appointed Legate, with full powers, in England. This list of offices does not exhibit all his sources of wealth. He was in receipt of yearly payments both from Francis and from Charles of Spain. He held also the Bishopric of Bath, which he afterwards changed for the richer one of Durham.

Wolsey.

Made Legate.

It seems probable that this statesman had acquired his influence over Henry partly by similarity of tastes, and partly by industriously sparing him trouble. His great ability and untiring energy enabled him to do all that was necessary for the government of the country, freeing Henry from the restraint which the Privy Council might have exercised upon his actions, and leaving him at leisure to indulge himself in those splendid amusements and pageantries in which he found his chief delight during the earlier part of his reign. Having once secured his position, however, Wolsey was by no means a minister without a policy. Of all classes in England the Church had been the least weakened by the long civil wars. The house of Lancaster had always favoured its interests, and during the reign of Henry VII. the chief offices in the ministry had been confided to Churchmen, who were the best educated men in England, and the instruments best fitted for carrying on the pacific policy of the King. To uphold this supremacy of the Church was Wolsey's primary object. It was for this that he lent himself to an ostentatious display of wealth and authority which would have been almost ridiculous had it had no object. His biographer is very full of his vast household of five hundred dependants, of his silver pillars and silver crosses; and an absurd description is given, on excellent authority, of how, when the Pope sent him his Cardinal's hat packed in the wallet of his ordinary courier, Wolsey provided the man with robes of rich material, and sent him back to Dover, to bring the hat up with all due ceremony, while trains of knights and bishops were sent to meet and welcome it. But he saw more clearly than most men the approach of the struggle which was to convulse Europe for the next hundred years. He was besides far too great a lover of justice and far too good a governor to wish to tolerate the abominable abuses which found their home in the monasteries. He was therefore bent upon forestalling the coming storm; but his desire was that the reform should be from within, and not from without the Church. To carry out these reforms was the main wish of his life, and it was to enable him to do so that he hazarded the breach of the well-known statute of Præmunire, and accepted the legatine authority which could alone give him power to act with effect against the monasteries, which were independent of the bishops. But besides being a Churchman, Wolsey was essentially an Englishman, and some of the apparent inconsistencies in his policy can be explained by the conflict of these interests. He was also undoubtedly ambitious, and eagerly sought the Papacy. But it is not improbable that his chief object in this pursuit too was the hope of carrying out on a grander scale the reforms which he had planned in England. Where the interests of the Church were not touched, his views, like those of most able governors who feel themselves superior to the men around them, were very arbitrary; and he lent himself willingly to the views of Henry on this point, like him detesting disorder and anarchy, and like him thinking that the best form of government was that under which the ignorant should be coerced for their own advantage. Such a man was inevitably opposed to the interests of the nobles, whose party was represented in the Council by the Duke of Norfolk. Equally inevitably would he be disliked by the commonalty, and the literature of the time is full of the sharpest satires directed against him. The strength of his position was the favour of the King and the success of his policy. Should either of these fail his fall was inevitable. He had now entered fully upon an arbitrary career. From the year 1515 to 1523 no Parliament was called. The money which was constantly wanted for the wars was collected by forced loans and benevolences.

His means of securing his power.

His policy.

Arbitrary rule.

It was under the guidance of this minister that England entered into the new phase of European politics which followed upon the death of Maximilian in the year 1519. Ferdinand of Spain had died three years before, and had been succeeded in that country by his grandson Charles. This young prince, the son of the Archduke Philip, was thus already in possession of Spain and of the Netherlands, with some sort of hereditary claim to be elected Emperor of Germany. But Francis I. did not desire so powerful a rival, and determined to dispute with him the imperial crown. Henry, somewhat puffed up by the offer Maximilian had made him a few years previously, determined that he too would enter the lists, although there was probably never the remotest chance of his success. When the election came on, finding the success of his own employer impossible, the English ambassador threw the weight of his influence wholly into the German side of the balance, and Charles was elected Emperor; and thus Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, and the Empire were all in the hands of one prince. This contest somewhat slackened the ties of friendship between Henry and Francis; while, on the other hand, the help he had received led Charles to hope that he might secure the alliance of Henry. The friendship of England had become of paramount importance to these rival claimants for the supremacy of Europe; and as it was not yet apparently firmly secured by either of them, Francis determined, if possible, to attach 1519.

Death of Maximilian.

Henry a candidate for the Empire.
Charles V.
elected.

English alliance sought by both Charles and Francis.

it to himself. He demanded therefore a personal meeting with Henry, in accordance with a clause in the treaty of 1518. This proposition ripened in 1520 into the magnificent meeting of the Field of the Cloth of Gold. The two Kings, vain of their persons and their acquirements, permitted and encouraged the most lavish expense on the part of their followers, and Francis had reason to believe that he had gained the friendship of Henry. But Wolsey's interest was already pledged. Just before Henry left England for his meeting with Francis, it had been contrived that Charles should forestall him, and have a private meeting at Canterbury. Nor was this all. No sooner were the festivities in the plain of Ardres over, than Henry visited his nephew Charles at Gravelines, and returned with him to Calais.

Field of Cloth
of Gold.
1520.

Henry prefers alliance with Charles.

There the outlines of a great alliance were sketched, destined to bear fruit afterwards. In this matter Wolsey had completely succeeded in his schemes. It was to the interest of Charles, and not that of Francis, that England found itself pledged. Nor was an opportunity long wanting to prove this. The rivalry of Francis and the Emperor soon led to a breach of the peace between them, and Francis, taking advantage of the disaffection of parts of Spain, pushed his army across the Pyrenees. At once, in virtue of the great treaty of 1518, it became Henry's duty to side with the aggrieved party. To settle which that might be a court of arbitration was established at Calais, where Wolsey, with great pomp, examined into the quarrel with apparent fairness. He took an opportunity, however, of visiting the Emperor at Bruges, and, almost immediately after, his judgment was pronounced against the French, and Henry found himself, as he had intended, bound to help the Emperor.

It was Wolsey's belief in the superior efficacy of the support which the Emperor appears to have distinctly promised him at Bruges, in the event of a new election to the Papacy, to that of Francis, which induced him to attach himself so definitely to the Emperor's interests. But he could have had no difficulty in persuading Henry, jealous of the French King's fame as knight and gentleman, or the people whose woollen trade depended in a very large degree on their friendship with Flanders, to prefer an alliance with Charles. The Emperor was to marry the Princess Mary, and the two nations were to make common cause against Francis. In all directions the new allies were successful. Even the Milanese was won from the French, while Parma and Placentia fell before the Papal troops. The Pope lived just long enough to see the success of his schemes, and died, it is said, from a fever produced by excessive joy. Wolsey saw the object of his ambition within his reach; but in the conclave, as neither he nor his rival, the Cardinal de Medici, had an overwhelming majority, the parties united to elect a third candidate, and Adrian of Utrecht, Charles's tutor, a learned and studious man, was raised to the Papal chair.

To paralyse the strength of England, Francis, who, on Venice joining the confederacy against him, found himself absolutely alone, attempted to excite disaffection in Ireland and Scotland. In Ireland, where disaffection was chronic, and where the insurrection was to depend on a French army which never arrived, no great change was effected. In Scotland, since Albany's retirement in 1516, and the return of Angus and the Queen, there had been a stormy period, chiefly occupied by the feuds of the Douglasses and Hamiltons. Angus had, however, on the whole, kept his leading position. To destroy his influence, which was favourable to England, the French King induced Albany to return with a large army and threaten the Scotch borders. He was, however, hoodwinked by Lord Dacre, the English Warden, who, though he had scarcely any troops at his disposal, so imposed upon the invaders by the high tone which he assumed, that they were glad to accept a month's armistice at the hands of a man who was entirely in their power. An invasion, repeated in the following year, was defeated by the Earl of Surrey without any severe fighting. "Undoubtedly," writes the commander, "there was never man departed with more shame or more fear than the Duke has done to-day." It was Albany's last appearance in Scotland. Unable to secure the regency, he retired from the country, where Angus ultimately succeeded, with the assistance of Henry, in establishing himself as Regent. The consequence was a peace of eighteen years between the countries.

Francis tries to excite Ireland and
Scotland.
1522.

Albany being worsted, peace for eighteen years is made 1523.

In both 1522 and 1523, under the command respectively of Surrey and of Suffolk, expeditions had been undertaken by the English in conjunction with the Imperialist forces. Suffolk's expedition reached as far as Mondidier, and it was expected that the combined armies would press on to the capital; for an opening had offered by which Henry thought it not improbable that

Expeditions
against France.

he might succeed in making good the old English claims upon France. Francis had quarrelled with the Constable of Bourbon, the most important of his subjects, who had declared his intention of seating Henry on the throne, and believed it certain that a large number of the French would join him. About the same time (September 1523) Adrian VI. died, and it seemed as if the plans both of Wolsey and Henry would at length be realized. But the discovery of his treachery compelled Bourbon to take to flight, and it was alone, without any of the party he had expected to assist him, that he fled from the French Court and took service under Charles. At the same time the election to the Papacy had not been managed as Wolsey had hoped. Julius de Medici, Clement VII., had been elected, and Wolsey, enraged at the disappointment of his hopes, grew suddenly lukewarm in the war. The English troops, already weakened by sickness, withdrew from Mondidier, and were disbanded; nor did England during the next year take any active part in the war. Wolsey, indeed, in his disappointment, entered into relations with the Court of France, and a peace between the countries was virtually established. Meanwhile, even the withdrawal of the English failed to check the course of French disaster. Although the army entered the Milanese territory, it could not succeed in holding its ground beyond the Ticino. The following year (1524) brought upon it the whole forces of the Imperialists. It was defeated near Romagnano, where Bayard lost his life. It was compelled to evacuate Italy, and the triumphant Constable, with his fellow-commander Pescara, pushed into France as far as Marseilles. To revenge this insult, Francis again, for the third time, poured his army over Mont Cenis. Again was Milan captured. The new Pope, Clement VII., even sided with him, and in October the siege of Pavia was formed. To relieve it, early in the following year the united armies of Pescara and Bourbon marched from Lodi. The battle fought before its walls was a decisive one. The defeat of the French was signal, their career in Italy was for a time closed. Francis himself fell into the hands of the conquerors.

Francis defeated at Pavia. 1525.

This victory was the signal for a complete reversal in the state of politics in Europe, and brought to light the change in Wolsey's views which had followed the election of Pope Clement. In London it was at first hailed with unqualified joy, and Henry thought for a moment that the hour had come for him to re-vindicate the English claims to the French crown, so much so that he wrote to Charles by the hand of Wolsey, and proposed a scheme for the invasion of France, of which the crown was to fall to him, and to pass afterwards by means of his daughter and heiress Mary, betrothed to the Emperor, to Charles V. himself, or his descendants, who would thus become monarchs of the whole of Europe. But such a total subversion of the European balance did not suit Charles, who was also induced by other causes to hold aloof from too close an alliance with England. Several incidents had produced a coldness between him and his uncle. He found that his betrothed bride, Mary, had been offered to more than one crowned head besides himself, while her youth, for she was only ten years of age, rendered the whole scheme distant and problematical. By some awkward mistake his ambassador's letters had been opened in England. He knew the French envoy to be constantly resident there. Moreover he felt himself strong enough to do without Henry's help. He therefore entirely declined the English proposal. On the other hand, Henry, when once his plans were coldly received, saw more than one reason for changing his alliance. He was in want of money; an alliance with France held out hopes of a goodly sum. According to his theory of the balance of power, it was time to check the overwhelming superiority of the Empire. Perhaps, more than all, he had Wolsey at his elbow, whose views, since his own rejection for the Papacy (on the death of Adrian, when Clement VII. was elected), and since the alliance of the Papacy with France, had undergone considerable change. It was ambition, partly personal, partly of a nobler sort and aiming at the reform of Christendom, which had rendered Wolsey so anxious for the Papacy. Though, as far as he was concerned, that hope was gone, he was still true to the cause of the Church, and when, in the years following the battle of Pavia, he saw the Imperial arms turned against Rome, till in the year 1527 the sacred city itself was stormed and sacked by the German and Lutheran landsknechts of Bourbon, it was difficult not to believe that the cause of Charles was the cause of the enemies of the Church; and that to join with Francis in upholding the Pope was the right policy for the true Catholic. With this mistaken view England entered into a close alliance with Francis, but it was not till the year 1528 that war was declared against Charles.

Sack of Rome. 1527.

Consequent change of English policy. Alliance with France.

Events had taken place in that period which were to revolutionize England. In carrying on negotiations with France one means of uniting the kingdoms which had been suggested was a marriage between the royal houses. The Princess Mary, it was thought, might marry one of the sons of the French King. This treaty was set on Legitimacy of Henry's marriage with Catherine

questioned.

foot at the close of 1526, and early in its progress the Bishop of Tarbès had raised a question as to the Princess's legitimacy. From the first Henry had not much liked the marriage with Catherine. It was only at the urgent desire of his councillors, and after his father's death, that he consented to marry her. Nor had the marriage been a very successful one. Several children had been born, but one only, the Princess Mary, had lived; and probably the domestic relations between the King and Queen were not of the happiest. The continuation of the dynasty was naturally one of Henry's chief wishes, and to the councillors by whom he was surrounded, who had found their safety and greatness in the support of the reigning line, and who longed before all things for a permanent rest for England after the troubles of the late wars, it was a matter of the last importance that the succession should, if possible, be undisputed. But had the King died without male issue, there was a cloud of pretenders who could hardly have settled their respective claims without an appeal to the sword. Henry had, indeed, rid himself of two of them. Richard de la Pole, surnamed the White Rose, had died at Pavia. His brother had been beheaded by Henry. Buckingham had also suffered death in 1521, charged with some apparently slight matters, intercourse with astrologers, or hasty words, which may have covered some deeper plan. But in the place of Pole the head of the true Plantagenets was now the Countess of Salisbury, the sister of the Earl of Warwick, who had been put to death by Henry VII.; and Buckingham had bequeathed his claims to the Duke of Norfolk with his daughter. The Marquis of Exeter might raise claims to the throne as the grandson of Edward IV; the Duke of Suffolk was Henry's own brother-in-law, while the King of Scotland was the son of Henry's sister. Reasons of state, therefore, combined with Henry's own wishes to excite in his mind a conscientious scruple as to the legitimacy of a marriage, the dissolution of which might give him at once a more agreeable wife and an heir to his throne. Nor were reasons of foreign policy wanting. In an age when marriage was so constantly the tie of national connection, Catherine, whose marriage with Henry had at first been the pledge of the alliance with Spain, stood in Wolsey's way now that he was bent upon using all his efforts against the Emperor. Those therefore who were desirous for the sake of the succession that

The state of
the succession.

a divorce should take place, found a willing assistant in the minister. For Wolsey thought he saw in the King's wish for a divorce a means of carrying out his own policy; not only would it enable him to break more thoroughly with the Emperor, but it exactly suited his views with regard to England.

Disaffection towards the Church of Rome had been of long standing in England. The reckless use of the power which the weakness of John had placed in the Pope's hand had early excited the anger of the English. Wicliffe's reform had been only the greatest of several efforts in the same direction, and, though his doctrinal reform had been premature, the laity had shown every disposition to appropriate his feelings of dislike to the hierarchy; and motions were even made in Parliament for the confiscation of Church property for national purposes. The Lancastrian princes had been throughout consistent supporters of the Papacy. Some writers even assert that Henry V.'s expedition was undertaken for the purpose of diverting popular attention to other objects. The Wars of the Roses had stopped all thoughts of reform, and, as we have seen, the Church was never so prominent as in the reign of Henry VII., and in the first years of his successor.

Progress of the Reformation
in Europe.

Nevertheless, the undercurrent of lay feeling never ceased to flow. The same causes had been more or less extant throughout Europe. Encroachments on the temporal authority of princes, zeal in demanding dues, combined with laxity of morals, and the change which had come over the Papacy, as the head of the Catholic Church degraded himself by degrees to the position of an intriguing Italian prince, had shaken the hold of Rome upon men's minds. The great schism had afforded opportunity for the Church to declare its independence, and the supremacy of councils over the Pope. The skill of the Roman Pontiffs had rendered the declaration nugatory, but the idea was still prevalent in Europe. The Council of Pisa had been but an effort to carry it into effect; and the general spirit of opposition to the Papacy had lately found expression throughout the whole North of Europe. It was in 1517 that Tetzl, a Dominican Friar, was appointed under the Elector of Mayence to sell indulgences through Saxony. The object for which the money was raised was the completion of St. Peter's at Rome. At that time, Luther, a young Augustinian, was Professor at the Elector of Saxony's new University of Wittenberg. Filled with anger at this crying abuse, he drew up ninety-five theses on the nature of indulgences, and fixed them on the great door of the Church of Wittenberg. The controversy at once became bitter. Luther was defended by Frederick of Saxony, who valued him highly, and could ill spare him from his University. The circumstances of Germany, more especially the unfortunate connection between lay and spiritual jurisdiction in the persons of the great ecclesiastical Electors, tended to dispose men's minds to the new doctrines. The invention of printing, and the revival of Greek literature, which had doubtless fostered among the Humanists, as they were called, or followers of humane letters, a certain freedom of thought, were also favourable to it. It became imperative for the Pope, not without some tincture of humanism himself, to pronounce upon the matter, and, in 1520, Leo X. published a bull against Luther by name, pronouncing him excommunicated if he did not retract in six days. Luther assembled the inhabitants of Wittenberg, and burnt the bull outside the walls. In 1521, at the Diet of Worms, efforts were made to move Luther to retract, but they were vain. He was ordered to quit the city, with a three weeks' safe conduct, and on his way home was captured by the order of his friend the Elector of Saxony, and detained for his own security in the Wartburg. Since then his views, or those like them, had been constantly spreading. Zwinglius had established the reform in Switzerland, and Munzer, carrying Protestant doctrines to their extreme political consequences, had excited the Thuringian peasants to a terrible outbreak.

It is not to be supposed that such a movement would have been kindly looked on by either Henry or Wolsey. Henry had himself written against Luther, and received from the Pope the title of Defender of the Faith. With Wolsey the preservation of the old religion became the chief object to which his policy was directed. Conscious of the abuses, of which the English Church was full, he saw that there was no hope of withstanding the flood of the Reformation without internal reform. Twice in the previous reign something had been done in the way of inspecting the monasteries, but on neither occasion effectually. It was to secure power for the more effectual carrying out of this object that he had sought the legatine authority. He had even suppressed a certain number of the smaller monasteries, employing their revenues for his great Cardinal's College at Oxford, and his school at Ipswich; and the prosecution of these reforms was very near his heart. When his credit was leaving him, he expressed his willingness to retire from the world, if only he could see the manners and customs of the country reformed.¹ Again it was with the intention policy.

Wolsey's

¹ Legrand, vol. iii. p. 165.

of upholding the Papacy that he had changed the whole policy of England, and was now working as hard and as anxiously to unite France, England and the Pope, as he had been seven years before to unite England and Germany. He thought an opportunity had arisen to attach Henry for ever to the Papal See by the strongest ties of gratitude. He never for a moment dreamed that the Pope would refuse a divorce. He seems almost to have pledged himself to Henry that it should be secured. But he was treading on dangerous ground, and indeed his sagacity was on this occasion misled. He could not think of Charles, the sacker of Rome, the gaoler of the Pope, in any other light than as the enemy of the Church. He did not recollect the effect that so present a terror might have upon the Pope's conduct. But the Pope was in fact scarcely a free agent. The French influence in Italy was absolutely gone;¹ and Charles bravely upheld the cause of his aunt Catherine. The Pope, in spite of his dangerous position, had gone so far as to send Cardinal Campeggio to open in company with Wolsey a commission of inquiry into the King's marriage with Catherine. He had promised that the commission should not be revoked, but that sentence should be pronounced. The timely discovery of a paper, probably forged, which seemed exactly to suit and make good a supposed flaw in the dispensation of Pope Julius, which had been made the legal ground on which the divorce was to rest, saved the Pope from the completion of his promise. The cause was summoned back to Rome, and Campeggio returned from England, leaving the question unsettled.

Favours the idea of a divorce.

Indeed, before this final step was taken, Wolsey had discovered his error. For him the divorce meant a marriage alliance with the French. But the King's mind had already turned in quite a different direction. The object of his attachment was Anne Boleyn, one of the Queen's maids of honour. She had gone to the Court of France with Mary, Henry's sister, and had remained there with different Princesses till after the battle of Pavia. Her beauty, and her French airs and graces, made her the reigning belle of Henry's Court. Now the family of this lady, whose grandfather had been a rich citizen of London, had since been closely connected with the Howards, who, as the head of the lay nobility of England, looked with hatred at the powerful position which Wolsey had won. The triumph of Anne Boleyn would in

Its failure causes Wolsey's fall.
1529.

¹ The French General Lautrec had indeed again attempted to secure Naples, but his army had faded away before the malaria and plague.

fact have been the complete victory of Wolsey's rivals in the Council; it was impossible that he could desire such a step. The departure of Campeggio was the signal for Wolsey's fall. Danger was closing him in on all sides. His plan had crumbled in his hand; it had given an opening for his lay opponents in the Council; he had failed to please the King; and he had no popularity on which to fall back. His government indeed could scarcely have failed to make him unpopular.

It had been a time of almost incessant war, and war invariably means heavy taxes. But in this case the taxes had not even been legal. From the year 1515 to the year 1523 no Parliament was called. Between 1523 and 1528 there had again been no Parliament. During the whole of that time, with the exception of the year 1523, money had been collected by means of forced loans and benevolences; and an idea may be gained of how these impositions were managed by what took place in 1522. In that year an invasion of France was contemplated, and money had to be raised. Commissioners were sent to find out the annual rent of all lands and houses, and the value of all moveables. From London £20,000 was exacted as a temporary loan, and the citizens were afterwards required to certify on oath the real value of their property. This sort of inquisition was most distasteful to mercantile men, who urged that their credit was often better than their capital, and Wolsey consented to take their returns secretly. The obnoxious character of this tax was somewhat lessened by the promise that the proceeds, which amounted to about a tenth from the laity and a taxation.

His heavy

fourth from the clergy, should be paid from the next subsidy granted by Parliament.¹ The difficulty found in collecting it rendered a Parliament necessary the following year. Sir Thomas More was elected Speaker. Wolsey demanded in the House no less than a fifth part of every man's goods and lands, setting the value at £800,000. The discussions which followed show at once the great ignorance which existed as to the real condition of England, and the courage which marked even then the behaviour of the Commons with regard to their privileges; while at the same time we see how Government influence was brought to bear, and how little of real independence existed. It was held that there were forty thousand parishes in England, but in reality there were not fifteen thousand. The Cardinal was therefore urged to diminish his demands. He would not yield, and tried to overawe the House with all his ecclesiastical pomp. "It should not in my mind," said the Speaker, "be amisse to receave him with all his pompe, his maces, his pillers, his poleaxes, his crosse, his belt, and the great seale too."¹ His attempt was unsuccessful. After much argument, Wolsey was surprised at receiving no answer, and was met by the assertion that, according to their ancient liberties, they were not bound to give an answer; and More, on his knees, explained and proved to him that he had better withdraw. An eyewitness says that after this it was debated for sixteen days together. The resistance was so great that the House was like to be dissevered. "Thus hanging this matter, yesterday the more part being the King's servants, gentlemen, were there assembled; and so they being the more part, willed and gave two shillings of the pound of goods and lands. . . . I have heard no man in my life that can remember that ever there was given to any one of the King's ancestors half so much at one grant. . . . I beseech Almighty God it may be well and peaceably levied, and surely paid unto the King's Grace without grudge."² The mention here of the compact body of nominees and place-holders voting according to order goes far to explain the harmony which generally existed during the reign between the Parliament and the King.

¹ Hall's Chronicle, ed. 1809, p. 645.

Though this tax was collected with great strictness, and fell upon every person taking even weekly wages to the amount of twenty shillings a year, there does not seem to have been any formidable opposition; but such was not the case when, two years afterwards, an attempt was made to raise money without the consent of Parliament. The battle of Pavia had just been fought, and the opportunity seemed open to re-establish the obsolete claims of England upon France. For this purpose large sums were necessary, but both Wolsey and the King after their last experience shrunk from calling a Parliament. An illegal subsidy of a sixth was therefore demanded; but "the people sore grudgeth and murmureth," said the Archbishop of Canterbury, "and speaketh cursedly among themselves, saying they shall never have rest of payments as long as some liveth. . . . They fear not to speak that they be continually beguiled, and no promises kept unto them." The people in Suffolk "began to rage and assemble themselves in companies."³ The Duke of Suffolk was for strong measures; but finding the gentry unwilling to assist him, he had to call in the assistance of Norfolk, who entered into intercourse with the insurgents, whose leader answered him: "Sith you ask who is our captain, forsooth his name is Poverty; he and his cousin Necesssity have brought us to this doing." He then explained how the heavy tax, by depriving the wealthy men of their capital, had really fallen upon the artisans. Their complaints were so reasonable, that the Duke procured a relaxation of the tax. Henry threw the whole blame on Wolsey, and pleaded ignorance of its severity. The money was raised by way of benevolence.

¹ More's Life of Sir Thomas More, c. xi. pp. 51, 52.

² Ellis's Letters, 1st Series, vol. i. p. 221.

³ Hall.

It was natural that such arbitrary dealing as this should render Wolsey very unpopular. His sudden change of policy in 1525, when he seemed to be throwing over the Emperor, and destroying the market for English woollens in Flanders, and to be connecting the country with its natural enemy the French, increased his unpopularity. But not only was he unpopular; there was, as we have seen, a strong lay party in the Council strongly opposed to him. Thus, when the failure of his policy with regard to the divorce drew the King's displeasure upon him, when in fact, for almost the first time in his reign, Henry VIII. began to look seriously at what was going on around him, there was no lack of advisers to point out the shortcomings of the great minister; and when it was determined that he should be removed from his position, something analogous to a great change of ministry at present took place, only that the fall of the defeated minister was greater, the subversion of his policy and plans more complete. In fact, the turning-point of the reign was reached. Henry awoke to the fact that he need no longer trust to the Church for his counsellors, and fell back on the support of the nobility, who had been hitherto almost excluded from power.

Thus when, in 1529, on the 17th of October, Wolsey surrendered the Great Seal, Norfolk rose for a time to the position of Prime Minister, and set on foot what may be considered as a national and English policy. The Parliament was at once called, and attempts were made in it to bring the conduct of Wolsey under the head of high treason. Stripped of all his wealth, dependent for the little that he had on the bounty of Henry, Wolsey found among his servants Thomas Cromwell, who, as a member of the Lower House, was both able and willing to defend him. The charge of treason, resting entirely upon ecclesiastical assumptions, fell to the ground; but the Statute of Præmunire, to which Wolsey had made himself obnoxious by receiving the legatine authority, was allowed to have its course, and all his property was forfeited to the Crown.¹ The efforts of Cromwell were not unrewarded. Henry appreciated his honest ability, and at once took him into his service: and during the seven years that followed—the most momentous in some respects of English history—whatever office he may happen to have held, he was always the representative of Government in the Lower House of Parliament, the leader and moving spirit of that body which was to establish the ecclesiastical freedom of the country.

¹ Wolsey subsequently withdrew to his Archbishopric, where his liberality and good administration were rendering him popular, when the charge of treason was again suddenly renewed, he was summoned to London, and died on the journey.

Wolsey's efforts at staving off the Reformation had done nothing but render its advance more certain. The deep dissatisfaction with the Church, which had long been smouldering in England, broke forth. Its voice was no longer checked by the royal authority. But the royal authority had of late been the only support on which the Church could rely. In dread of threatened attacks from the nation, it had voluntarily allied itself closely with the Crown. When that support failed it, its power was gone. The King having now objects of his own which rendered him the friend of all who would assault the Church, allowed the national feeling free course. He even put himself at the head of the national party, who desired first the retrenchment of the power of the national Church, and, secondly, the independence of the country in matters ecclesiastical of the supremacy of the Roman See. The problem as yet had assumed but these two sides. A change of doctrine was hardly thought of. As was natural, it was the reform of the national Church, the abuses of which touched more nearly every man's life and home, which first occupied the attention of the Commons. At the very beginning of their session they presented a petition, in which, after complaining of the spread of heresy, they traced it to the errors of the Church, which they proceeded to denounce at length. Their chief complaints were directed against the independent legislation claimed by the Convocation, the number of officers, and the exorbitant fees of the ecclesiastical courts, the refusal of the Sacrament till certain sums had been first paid, the extravagant probate duties, the granting of benefices to children unfit to hold them, illegal imprisonment by bishops, and other irregularities. Upon this petition were based statutes, originating from Sir Thomas More, who had succeeded Wolsey as Chancellor, against excessive probate duties and mortuaries (or fees upon burial), against the clergy following any trade except their own, and to enforce residence and forbid pluralities. There was much opposition in the House of Lords, the Bishops being very loth to consent, but at length, after many discussions between committees of the two Houses, the King intervened, and insisted on the passing of the Bill. After this triumph, which, though it left the great question of the freedom of ecclesiastical jurisdiction unsettled,

Rise of Cromwell.

The Reformation
in England.

yet struck a heavy blow at the ill-gotten wealth and irregular habits of the clergy, Parliament separated (December 1529).

Meanwhile the question of the divorce had entered a new phase. No longer content with resting his claims on a technical irregularity in Pope Julius's dispensation, Henry now questioned the right of that Pope to give a dispensation at all between such near relatives. It is said to have been Thomas Cranmer who suggested this point, and who thus attracted to himself the attention and favour of the King. The advantage to be gained by this new question was, that it would of necessity, inasmuch as it had reference to his own power, pass out of the Pope's hands into that of a council. Henry was thus appealing to the world against the Pope's hesitation, and this line of conduct was continued,—again it is believed at Cranmer's suggestion,—when it was determined to collect the opinions of all the universities of Europe. This process was carried out with abundance of bribery and intimidation on the side both of the English King and of the Emperor, who was now his open opponent. It resulted in an uncertain decision, about half the universities giving their opinion in Henry's favour. Curiously enough the Lutherans, who might have been expected to support him—recollecting perhaps his early feats of theology,—gave their opinions against him.

Before the Parliament again met, in January 1531, Convocation was informed that, by acknowledging the legatine authority of Wolsey, the whole clergy had laid itself open to the penalties of Præmunire, and that consequently all their property was at the King's disposal. From this awkward position they were offered, however, an opportunity of extricating themselves. As, no doubt, Wolsey's tyranny had been unpopular with the clergy, it must have seemed to them very hard that they should be involved in his ruin; and that so sharp a blow could be struck shows the great want of sympathy which existed between the clergy and the laity. So palpable an act of oppression could scarcely have been tolerated had it not been popular. The alternative offered to the clergy was a payment of £118,000,—a vast sum if we remember that we may safely multiply the money of that day by ten to bring it to its present value. Nor was this all. In the preamble of the Bill by which the subsidy was to be granted, they were obliged to give the King the title of Head of the Church; not that Henry had as yet determined to break with Rome, but that, as head of the national party, he was determined that the civil power should be superior to the ecclesiastical.

Question of the divorce
renewed.

Attack on the Church in Convocation.

The Parliament, which had held its second session in the beginning of the year 1531, had done little beyond strengthening the King's hands in his struggle with the clergy. It was prorogued with a speech from Sir Thomas More, declaring the opinions of the universities with regard to Henry's divorce. This ^{and in} Parliament seems to have been the first time that he brought the matter before Parliament, but he now thought it well to set himself right in the eyes of the people, especially as the nation was in great excitement, and the clergy everywhere uttering the strongest denunciations against his conduct. The Nun of Kent, of whom more will be said afterwards, had already begun her prophetic impostures, and the superstitious feelings of the whole people were deeply moved. The separation of the King and Catherine gave a centre round which these vague feelings could collect, and a dangerous discontented party began to be formed. Early the following year (1532) the Parliament, in their third session, continued their war with the clergy. Benefit of clergy had come to be an intolerable nuisance. Any one who could read was held by that talent to have proved his connection with the clergy, and could be withdrawn from the hand of justice, to be treated with ridiculous leniency by the ecclesiastical courts; so that, as the Act to limit it asserts, "continually, manifest thieves and murderers, found guilty by good and substantial inquests, . . . were speedily and hastily delivered and set at large by the ministers of the ordinaries, for corruption and lucre." An Act was passed forbidding any one under the degree of subdeacon to plead the privilege of his clergy if proved guilty of felony. The Court of Arches was also reformed. The Mortmain Act had forbidden corporations to hold property left to them by will. But this prohibition had been constantly evaded; testators had left property to support a priest to pray for their souls in perpetuity. This evasion, by which property had passed, though indirectly, into the hands of the Church, was now checked, and no will of this description was to hold good for more than twenty years, which was supposed to be long enough for the purpose.

While these reforms of the national Church were being carried out, that Church itself set on foot the second stage of reform by an attack upon the power of Rome. However much the clergy may have pillaged the laity, and however much they may have derived assistance in so doing from their connection with Rome, they had themselves, as the natural and submissive subjects of the Pope, been unmercifully pillaged in their turn. They now suggested the abolition of annates, the payment, that is,

The Church becomes national.

of the first year's income of benefice or see to Rome. This would have cut off a large source of income from the Pope. Less hasty than the clergy, the Commons passed a Bill for the abolition of annates, but only conditionally. It was held in terrorem over the Pope. The clergy went a step further. They at length surrendered that independent position for which they had struggled from the time of Anselm, and acknowledged that they could not legislate without the consent of Parliament. Thus, though without any direct assumption of the name, Henry had become Head of the Church. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction and ecclesiastical legislation were both subordinated to the temporal power, and the Church, although retaining the Catholic doctrine, had become a national or Anglican Church. Unable to see such a change without protesting, Sir Thomas More resigned the chancellorship, and was followed out of office by Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, who very shortly afterwards died. His office was given to Cranmer.

But although the King had not completed the Annates Act, nor determined to proceed to extremities with Rome, he had been taking steps which rendered the final breach inevitable. On Queen Catherine's withdrawal, and indeed before, he had openly entertained Anne Boleyn in his palace; and now he was determined that she should be accepted into the circle of crowned heads. He wished to show the Pope, too, that his views were shared by the French King, and that he did not stand alone. A pompous meeting was therefore arranged to take place at Calais, to which Henry was to take Anne Boleyn with all the state of a Queen, and where they were to be met and entertained, not by Francis alone, but by his sister, the Queen of Navarre, for the express purpose apparently of showing that the relation between him and Anne Boleyn was recognized. The meeting took place, but without such effects as Henry had desired and

Marriage with
Anne Boleyn.

expected; for Francis was persuaded, after all, to side with the Pope, and Henry found himself unsupported in his quarrel. He resolved, however, that he would no longer be cajoled, and, in January 1533, was secretly married to Anne Boleyn. This act was followed by the publication on the church doors of Flanders of a threat of excommunication from the Pope. In presence of this threat, and having now completed his marriage, the King could do nothing but proceed to the completion of his business. In the next session of Parliament an Act, called the Act of Appeals, was passed, declaring the sufficiency of the English Church to settle its own spiritual questions, and

Separation from Rome.

forbidding all appeal, in spite of spiritual penalties, to any court higher than the Archbishop's. This was intended chiefly to bar Queen Catherine's appeal from her English judges to the Court of Rome. The King acted upon it at once. Cranmer was authorized to proceed with the divorce. He held a Court at Dunstable, whither the Queen refused to go, denying the jurisdiction of the Court. Therefore the sentence of divorce was passed against her, as being contumacious, and the new Queen was admitted publicly to her royal rights by a splendid ceremony in London. Queen Catherine's conduct was throughout vigorous and noble, mingled with, perhaps, a little too much of passion. To Cranmer and to some counsellors, who were sent to tell her that she must relinquish the title of Queen, she showed herself firm and queen-like, refusing in any way to acknowledge a verdict which would not only rob her of the character of wife, but render her child illegitimate. It was not to be supposed that the Pope and Emperor would accept Cranmer's sentence. The divorce was at once declared illegal. This consistent opposition to the royal will produced fresh measures against the Pope in Parliament (1534). The Annates Bill was declared completed. All other forms of tribute to Rome were abolished; the election of Bishops was arranged without the interference of the Pope; and, finally, if he did not consent to the King's wishes within three months, the whole of his authority was transferred to the Crown.

But Cromwell, who was the leading spirit in all those measures, and who was hurrying both King and Parliament faster probably than they knew or wished, had not produced these sweeping changes without causing much dissatisfaction. Queen Catherine had become a centre round which all reactionary elements gathered, and these elements were very powerful. There was still Catholic and dynastic opposition. a strong party connected with the royal House of York, consisting of Nevilles, Courtenays, and the descendants of the Duke of Clarence, who were not without hopes of undermining the vigorous usurper; while in all directions the Church was willing, by fair means and foul, to excite and forward any plans which should check the career of its heretical conqueror. The dangerous uneasiness which pervaded England was disclosed to Cromwell by means of innumerable spies, with whom he had flooded the country; and suspicions of even more than general uneasiness were excited, and began to point towards the Nun of Kent as the centre of a reactionary movement. This woman had been a servant in the family of a Kentish clergyman, in the neighbourhood of Addington. She had been subject to epileptic fits; and having been well taught in the rudiments of religion, during her paroxysms gave utterance to many moral observations. Such utterances could not come from the Devil; her fits must be connected with Divine agency. She was admitted to her master's table. Other churchmen were called to examine and approve of the miracle. They proceeded to turn it to their own advantage. Her natural fits ceased, but she was able to counterfeit them, and, carefully instructed beforehand by her spiritual guides, issued her prophecies during her hours of sham inspiration. These prophecies were collected in a book. Her fame was spread in all directions. As her words were all directed towards supporting the old Church, they were readily received by its well-wishers, and many names of great weight were numbered among her believers. She corresponded with Catherine and with the Emperor, and became, in fact, a dangerous power in England. It was thought necessary to apprehend her. She had prophesied the death of the King, and had declared him to be in the condition of rejected Saul. It was so plain that, although there was no overt act of treason, the tendency of all this was treasonable, and if treasonable, the ramifications of the treason were so wide, that Cromwell and the Council were thoroughly alarmed. The Nun and her accomplices were executed; the Nevilles and the Countess of Salisbury were examined, but though they appeared to be slightly implicated with the Nun, they were left uninjured for the present. Sir Thomas More and Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who were known to be friends of the old state of affairs, were also declared guilty of the misprision of treason. More, upon apologizing, was pardoned, but Fisher, obstinately refusing to do so, was attainted and imprisoned.

The Nun
of Kent.

The fear which these disclosures had excited, and the hopes evidently existing in the Yorkist party, rendered the security of the succession of paramount importance; and as Anne Boleyn had lately given birth to a daughter (afterwards Queen Elizabeth), it was determined that the succession should be established by Parliament. An Act was therefore introduced (called the Succession Act), which declared the marriage with Catherine absolutely invalid, and the second marriage "true, sincere and perfect," and settled the succession upon the fruit of the second marriage. Whoever did anything to the prejudice of the Queen's marriage should be held guilty of high treason; whoever spoke against it of misprision of treason. The Act, once passed, became an instrument for testing the loyalty of the nation. Commissioners were authorized to administer, at the pleasure of the King, an oath to accept and support the new statute,—a step rendered the more necessary as the Pope had at length given sentence in favour of Catherine, and in consequence Henry had been excommunicated, and the execution of the excommunication had been placed in the hand of the Emperor. The peril of the King would be great if this foreign assault was supported by domestic treason. Among others More and Fisher were called upon to accept the oath. The statute they could accept; they were willing to promise to be true to the children of Anne Boleyn, but to the preamble declaring the nullity of the first marriage, and consequently denying the Papal authority, they had conscientious objections. Cranmer pleaded that they should be allowed to swear to the statute only, but Henry and Cromwell were inexorable, and they were sent to the Tower (April 15, 1534).

The Act of Succession.

Imprisonment
of More and Fisher.

Immediately after this the conditional abolition of the Papal authority was made absolute, and the King assumed the title of Head of the Church. It was not, however, enough merely to assume this title. Danger from the reactionists at home and abroad was becoming so pressing that some means of repression was necessary. The Act of Supremacy was therefore passed, which conferred upon the King the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, coupled with another which rendered it high treason to question that title. This tyrannical Bill was worked in a tyrannical manner. No overt act was necessary; the refusal to answer questions when officially examined was held to be sufficient. The state of affairs was no doubt revolutionary; the Government was trying to carry out its reforms in the teeth of an unwilling nation, and there was danger of its whole work being undone; the House of Commons consisted too, no doubt, largely of place-men and followers of the Court; still, bearing all this in mind, it is difficult to understand how any Parliament could be brought to sanction so inquisitorial an Act. Its fruits were speedily apparent. The Monks of the Charterhouse, led by their prior, Houghton, when asked by their penitents in confession, declared their continued adherence to the Papal supremacy. They were selected as an example. The prior and many others of the monks were examined before the Council, charged upon the evidence there collected before an ordinary jury, and, as was the invariable consequence in this reign, convicted. Their society was entirely taken up, the greater part of its members

Act of Supremacy.

Consequent
persecutions.

perishing either on the scaffold or in prison. The next victims were still more important. Fisher and More had been in prison since they declined to swear to the Act of Succession. They were now required to accept the still more stringent Supremacy Act. The new Pope, Paul III., had sent Fisher in his prison the Cardinal's hat. This aroused the King's anger more particularly against him. He was at once brought to trial, and, declining to submit, was condemned and executed. Sir Thomas More's trial and execution followed immediately after. He was charged principally upon letters written to Fisher, and upon some conversations in which Rich, the Solicitor-General, had meanly engaged him. He refused in any way to move from his position; displayed during his trial much calmness and humour. When told, as a special instance of the King's mercy, that the coarser part of punishment for treason would be omitted: "God forbid," he answered, "that the King should show any more such mercy to any of my friends, and God bless all my posterity from such pardons." The short remainder of his life was marked by a pathetic meeting with his daughter, Margaret Roper, as he returned from his trial, and enlivened by a mixture of grave resignation and quiet humour almost as pathetic. In obedience to the King's commands, he abstained from speaking much on the scaffold. But even at the last moment, as he passed through the crowd, with his long beard, his lean, pale face, and carrying in his hand a red cross, he could not keep himself from his jest. "See me safe up," he said to the Governor of the Tower, as the scaffold ladder tottered, "in my coming down I can shift for myself." And even as his head was on the block, he moved aside his beard, muttering, "Pity that should be cut; that has not committed treason."

The Bull of deposition.
1536.

The death of a man so high in rank, and so well known for his learning, excited the anger of all Europe. Even Francis of France wrote a remonstrance to Henry. By the Pope the execution was answered by the publication of a Bull of deposition, bringing to its full completion the separation which had been working itself out for the last seven years.

The last session of the seven years' Parliament had now arrived, and Cromwell, who had been its moving spirit, and had reached the position of the King's Vicegerent in all ecclesiastical matters, passed on to the completion of his work. He determined to strike a blow at what was at once the weakest and most dangerous part of the organization of the Church. While the monasteries were only too open to attack on the score of morality, they supplied most of those preachers and confessors whose denunciations in the confessional excited and kept alive opposition to the new measures. In 1535, a commission had been issued to visit the lesser monasteries.

There can be no doubt that the three Doctors, Legh, Le ton and Aprice, carried out their duties very effectively, very coarsely, and probably with a considerable amount of prejudice. It is, however, equally certain that there was an immense quantity of wickedness and immorality prevalent in the lesser monastic establishments which were free from the influence of public opinion. In the preceding reign visitations had been more than once attempted, and Walsey had risked the consequences of Præmunire chiefly for the purpose of being in a position to reform the monasteries effectively. The authority placed in the hands of the commissioners on the present occasion was almost boundless. They discharged from their vows all the young monks and nuns, and, after making searching inquiries into the condition of the community, laid down a few simple strict reforms which were to be maintained; as, for instance, that the common table should be kept up; that the inmates should be instructed in the rule under which they were living; that valiant beggars should not be supported, and so on. In 1536, their report was ready. It was destroyed in the reign of Queen Mary, so that its exact particulars are not known; but it declared the existence of such wickedness in two-thirds of the monasteries and abbeys in England, that, after some debate, it seemed hopeless that a sufficient reform should be introduced, and the Act for the dissolution of the smaller houses was passed. The property of all monasteries having incomes of less than £200 a year passed to the Crown. The monks were either pensioned off or distributed among the greater monasteries.

Having performed this work, the Parliament was dissolved. In its seven years of activity it had worked out a complete revolution. The whole position of the Church with regard to the laity was changed. Neither in its capacity of national Church, nor as a branch of the great Roman organization, could it longer tyrannize over men's minds and bodies. The Parliament had begun by laying hands on the unjustifiable extortions of the national Church. It had subordinated it to the royal authority, and, carried onward by the King's quarrel with the Roman See, it had withdrawn England from what was in fact a foreign thralldom, and had consummated its work by the destruction of that idle and debauched population which, by means of preaching and the confessional, had become, to the disgust of all right thinking men, the chief spiritual guides of the nation. The power which had been withdrawn from the Church was now centred in the Crown. The absolute position of the monarch was thus completed. The work begun by Edward IV. and carried on by Henry VII. was brought to consummation. The unity of the nation was perfected, and in both temporal and ecclesiastical matters its authority was vested in the Crown. Although Henry had not intended any doctrinal changes, and though none had as yet been authoritatively made, the spirit of the Reformation, by the very necessity of the position of the kingdom, had begun to act in England. Engaged in a similar work, though in a different direction, Henry had been driven more or less into intercourse with the Protestant Princes of Germany; and many of the more learned men of the time, numbering among them a considerable portion of the new Bishops, were strongly tinctured with German learning and with German Protestantism. Though the Reformation in England had been legal and political, while that of Germany was popular and conscientious, both had been compelled to find their standing ground in the authority of the Bible, as contrasted with the authority of the Pope. The approximation between the two was intended to be forwarded by a convocation held in 1536, in which, with the approbation of the King, ten articles were accepted, some of which were drawn directly from the Augsburg Confession,¹ and which declared that the Bible and the three Creeds were the sole authority in matters of faith, and that three Sacraments only were necessary. At the same time the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments were ordered to be learnt in English.

It was not long before another Parliament was called, whose sad duty it was to ratify the judgment which had been passed upon that Queen whose interest had been so indissolubly connected with the growth of the Reformation in the preceding Parliament. Queen Catherine died on the 29th of January, and Anne Boleyn's triumph appeared complete. In the following month Queen Anne was disappointed in her expectations of a son. This may well have increased a coolness which seems to have been growing up between her and her husband for nearly a year. However this may be, in April a Committee of the Privy Council was examining carefully, but with perfect secrecy, some stories which seemed to implicate the Queen; and before the close of the month, Brereton, a gentleman of the household, and Mark Smeton, a musician, had been apprehended. The public explosion of the storm took place at Greenwich on the 1st of May, where the Court was holding its customary holiday. Lord Rochford, the Queen's brother, and Sir Henry Norris, who were both afterwards executed, were among the tilers. The King rose suddenly and broke up the sports. There is a popular story, which relates that Anne dropped a handkerchief which was caught by Norris, an action which roused the King's anger.

New Parliament.
1536.

¹ The profession of faith of the Protestant Lutheran Church, presented to Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg, June 1530.

Trial and execution of Anne Boleyn.

However this may be, the King took Norris with him to London, and on the following day the Queen was apprehended, as was also Sir Francis Weston. On examination, Smeton confessed to adultery, Norris was inveigled into a confession which he afterwards withdrew. Meanwhile, the Queen was taken to her own lodgings in the Tower, where she consistently maintained her innocence, although much distressed and indeed hysterical. Lady Boleyn, her aunt, whom she disliked, and a Mistress Cousins were put in the room with her, and reported every word she said. If their reports were true, she confessed in conversation to certain flirtations with all of the accused gentlemen, with the exception of her brother, but probably to such flirtations only as might be expected from a lively young woman of French education at a not over-refined court. From her prison the Queen wrote a most touching letter to the King, declaring her perfect loyalty, but at the same time she says, "I never at any time so far forgot myself in my exaltation or received queenship but that I always looked for an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your Grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to withdraw that fancy to another object."¹ She also demanded a fair trial, pointing out that, if condemned, Henry would be free to follow "his affection already settled on that party for whose sake she was now as she was, whose name," she continues, "I could somewhere since have pointed unto, your Grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein." A trial was granted her in the completest form, but held within the Tower. The commoners were tried by a commission, among whom were Norfolk, Suffolk, the Earl of Wiltshire, the Queen's father, Cromwell, and all the judges. Grand juries, consisting apparently of respectable men, found true bills both at Westminster and at Deptford. The indictment, for there was much more than hearsay evidence, accurately laid down the dates and circumstances of the crimes. Of course the commoners were found guilty. Indeed, the trial by the petty jury was in this reign little more than a form. The Queen and Lord Rochfort were tried by twenty-six Peers, presided over by the Duke of Norfolk. They were both found guilty. The Queen was sentenced to be beheaded or burnt at the King's pleasure. Before she was executed, she had to undergo a final trial before Cranmer, and was by him declared divorced, apparently on the ground of a pre-contract which she is said to have mentioned to Cranmer in confession. The Earl of Northumberland, who is usually said to be the person with whom she was contracted, absolutely denied it. As her execution for high treason depended for its legality on her being the King's wife, and if she were not so became a mere act of revenge, it is probable that she made the confession hoping to avoid death. The history altogether is a difficult one, for it is hard to conceive that any counsellors, some of whom were of the highest position and renown, could have stooped so low as to forge the whole story. If this supposition can be held, the blame must probably fall on the King and on Cromwell, whose character in all parts of his life seems to have been that of an extremely faithful and extremely unscrupulous servant. Granted the creation of the story, the constant subserviency of Council, courtiers, and jurymen in this reign would explain its further progress.

¹ The authenticity of this letter is not quite certain.

Anne might well write that she could perhaps point unto a new object of the King's love. She died on the 19th of May, on the 20th the King married Jane Seymour, and the Parliament which met on the 8th of June—apparently for the express purpose of making a new law of succession—proceeded to do its work. "The King was conscious," said Audley, the Chancellor, "that he was obnoxious to infirmities, and even death itself," and that therefore it was desirable to arrange the succession. The offspring of Catherine had been already declared illegitimate; those of Queen Anne were henceforward to be so too. It was therefore enacted that an oath should be taken to uphold in the succession the offspring of the King's present marriage; to assert the lawfulness of the former marriages was high treason. At the same time, considering the uncertainty of issue, the King was allowed to name his successor by will—another of those extraordinary acts of servility to the Crown which makes this reign so remarkable. The immediate object was to enable the King to nominate his illegitimate son, the Duke of Richmond; a youth, as we may gather from Surrey's poems,¹ of great promise, and of whom the King was exceedingly fond. He, however, died almost immediately.

¹ "Prisoned in Windsor, he recounteth his pleasure there passed."—Earl of Surrey's Poems, p. 17

This bill completed the triumph of Henry's policy in England itself. He was now unquestioned head of Church and State. He was largely enriched by the property of the suppressed ^{Henry's dangerous position.} monasteries; allowed to name his successor, he was sure of being able to perpetuate in some way or other his dynasty; and he had gathered round him a circle of new men of undoubted ability, bound to himself by all ties of interest as well as gratitude. But this hour of triumph was in fact the hour of danger. The stirring events which had taken place in England had had their effect throughout Europe. With Francis I. Henry had continued to keep up as firm a connection as was possible with a king whose policy was so unfixed and selfish. But there was hanging over England the standing threat of an invasion by the Emperor, who, naturally attached to the interests of his aunt, Queen Catherine, had now become the champion of Christendom against the advancing Turks, and would have been glad to have united Europe in an assault upon heresy. Any attack from this quarter would have been ten times more dangerous if seconded by domestic insurrection, and in the winter of 1535-6 the peril of Henry's position was considerable. But the dissatisfaction which was widely spread in England, and the hopes of any descendants of the House of York, who after the late Act must have felt themselves excluded from all chance of regular succession, displayed themselves, fortunately for Henry, in disjointed outbreaks, which he could successfully combat.

The first which he had to meet was in Ireland, where Richard, Duke of York, had left behind him a most favourable impression, and where both the pretended Princes of his house had ^{Insurrection in Ireland.} in the last reign met with support. The condition of the country was then, as has so frequently been the case, a disgrace to the English Government. The children of the Norman conquerors had by a most unusual degeneration assimilated themselves to the conquered people. The English Pale, as that part was called where the King's writ ran, and which had originally been fenced off, as it were, by a string of strongholds, instead of including, as was once the case, a strip of some fifty or sixty miles in breadth from Dundalk to Waterford, was reduced to a tract about twenty miles wide, terminating on the coast just below the Wicklow mountains. Beyond these narrow limits, in spite of the frequently repeated efforts of the English Government, the Norman-English settlers had rapidly degenerated, had assumed the dress and wild disorderly manners of the native Irish, and were governed by the unwritten Irish laws known as the Brehon Laws. These, like other semi-barbarous laws, among other things allowed the commutation of murder for money payments. Naturally, districts where they prevailed were in a most disorderly condition. The most important of the great Norman nobles, who ruled beyond the Pale over great clans of degenerate Englishry, were the two great branches of the Fitzgeralds, headed by the Earl of Desmond in the South, and the Earl of Kildare nearer the English Pale; the De Burghs, who had even given up their noble Norman name, and now called themselves Burkes, in Galway and the West; and the Butlers, headed by Ormond, in the neighbourhood of Tipperary and Carlow. The native Irish, who after the Conquest had been driven to the hills, had during the Wars of the Roses found means again to push themselves forward, and O'Neills, O'Connors, O'Donnells, and O'Briens were pressing close up to the limits of the Pale. The whole of the English-Irish and Irish part of the country was a scene of the wildest anarchy. "There be sixty counties inhabited by the King's Irish enemies, where reigneth more than sixty chief captains, whereof some calleth themselves kings, some kings' peers in their language, some princes, some dukes, that liveth only by the sword, and obeyeth to no temporal person save only to himself that is strong. . . . Also, in every of the said regions there be divers petty captains, and every one of them maketh war and peace for himself without license of his chief captain, . . . and there be thirty of the English noble folk that followeth the same order, and keepeth the same rule."¹

It is plain that to keep such a nation in order a very strong hand and an efficient standing army would be necessary, and it was a constant question with the English Government whether money enough could be spared for the purpose. Now and then, when things got very bad indeed, an efficient deputy was sent over, but usually a plan preferred was to attempt to govern this mass of disorder by the influence of some great Irish chief, who might be presumed to forget his disloyalty when acting as the King's viceroy. The office of Deputy had become almost hereditary in the hands of the Earls of Kildare. They were indeed almost the only chiefs in a position to occupy the office. Their rivals, the Butlers, might have been expected to have had the better claim, as they were the consistent friends of the English, and had constantly tried to check the advancing tide of barbarism, but the districts occupied by their clan were cut off from Dublin by the territory of their enemy, the Fitzgeralds, and the Earls of Kildare contrived to make their tenure of the viceroyalty impossible by immediately organizing a revolt on their appointment. This policy they carried out indeed whenever anybody but themselves received the office. This audacity gained its object. Though they joined both the great Yorkist insurrections in the preceding reign,—though they were more than once summoned to England for their conduct, they invariably returned with renewed power and increased influence.

¹ Report of 1515, quoted in Froude.

In 1520 the confusion had been at its height. Lord Surrey was sent over, and Kildare summoned to England. Surrey, hampered by temporizing policy, was ordered to try and bring the people to reason. But as usual his presence was a signal for universal outbreak. He urged the King to stricter measures, stating that with an army of 6000 men he could complete the work of conquest, but that that must be backed up by a large immigration of English colonists; if this was not allowed him, he begged to be recalled. He was recalled, and before three years were over, after an interlude of insurrection because Ormond was made Deputy, Kildare was reinstated in all his old offices. The wars in which England was engaged, at first with France and afterwards with the Empire, afforded opportunities for fresh treasons. His relative of the other branch, the Earl of Desmond, intrigued both with Francis and with Charles, and Kildare used his power to remove all the military stores and artillery from Dublin Castle to his own castle at Maynooth. Again was Kildare summoned to London. Again there was a fierce insurrection; Sir William Skeffington acted as adviser to the young Duke of Richmond, who was sent over as Viceroy, but he had been directed to act only on the approbation of the Earl of Kildare, who was thus again restored to power. There were left, however, Archbishop Allen, and another Allen, Master of the Rolls, clear-sighted statesmen, who were attached to the English interest.

The completion of the divorce had, as has been already mentioned, placed in the hands of Charles V. the duty of carrying out the Papal excommunication. An invasion of England had become by no means improbable. Again did the Fitzgeralds open an intrigue with him. The danger was too great to be overlooked. Kildare was summoned again to London, had the audacity to go, and was at once thrown into the Tower; but he still found means to instruct his son, Lord Thomas, whom he had left as Deputy, to carry out his old tactics. He rode in arms to the Council, renounced his allegiance, and called upon the country to rise. Dublin Castle was besieged by his followers, and Archbishop Allen murdered in his presence, as he sought to cross to England.

Skeffington was intrusted with the duty of re-establishing the King's authority. But he was old and slow; and had it not been for Ormond the English dominion would have been lost. Ormond held the Fitzgeralds in check till, in October, Skeffington reached Dublin. But his conduct even then was slow and dilatory. No great blow was struck. His army began to lose discipline, and it almost seemed as if the old weak system was to be pursued. At length, however, the Deputy was stirred to action, and in the beginning of 1535 Maynooth Castle was taken. Of thirty-seven prisoners, twenty-six were at once hanged. The effect of this vigorous action, which was called the "Pardon of Maynooth," was instantaneous. The rebellion was in fact at an end. But Lord Thomas Fitzgerald still refused to surrender, and held out in O'Connor's castle, in King's County. Lord Leonard Grey, who had come to take the command of the army, contrived an interview with him, and he surrendered. It is not clear how far he was allured by promises. At all events he surrendered, and was treated as though he had given himself up unconditionally. He was kept some short time in prison, and in the following year (1536) was hanged with five of his uncles at Tyburn.

With the death of Catherine some of the dangers which threatened England disappeared. It was no longer impossible that insurrection in the North. Charles should be reconciled to his uncle. As the year therefore passed, the chances of an insurrection in England became less, and the real opportunity for successful action on the part of the reactionary party was gone. But, perhaps because they felt that time was thus passing away, or because accidental circumstances led the way to an outbreak, the discontented party, before the year was out, were in arms throughout the whole North of England. Nor did this party consist of one class alone. For one reason or another, nearly every nobleman of distinction, and nearly every Northern peasant, alike joined in the movement. The causes which touched the interests of so many different classes were of course various. There was indeed one tie which united them all. All, gentle and simple, were alike deeply attached to the Roman Church, and saw with detestation the beginning of the Reformation in the late Ten Articles, and the havoc which Cromwell and his agents were making among the monasteries. In fact, the coarseness with which the reforms were carried out were very revolting. Stories were current of how the visitors' followers had ridden from abbey to abbey clad in the sacred vestments of the priesthood, how the church plate had been hammered into dagger hilts. The Church had been always more powerful in the North, and the dislike to the reforms was proportionately violent. But, apart from this general conservative feeling, each class had a special grievance of its own. The clergy, it is needless to mention—they were exasperated to the last degree.

The nobles—always a wilder and more independent race than those of the South—saw with disgust the upstart Crom- Discontent of the nobles. well the chief adviser of the Crown. They had borne the tyranny of Wolsey, but in Wolsey they could at least reverence the Prince of the Church. They had even triumphed over Wolsey, and had probably believed that the older nobility would have regained some of their ancient influence. They had been disappointed. Cromwell, a man of absolutely unknown origin, and with something at least of the downright roughness of a self-made man, was carrying all before him. The gentry, besides that they were largely connected with the superior clergy, and suffered with their suffering, were at the present smarting under a change in the law, which deprived them of the power of providing for their younger children. By the common law it was not allowed to leave landed property otherwise than to the eldest son or representative. To evade this it had been customary to employ what are called uses:—that is, property was left to the eldest son, saddled with the duty of paying a portion, or sometimes the whole, of the rent to the use of the younger son. A long continuance of this practice had produced inextricable confusion. There were frequently uses on uses, till at length it was often difficult to say to whom the property really belonged. This difficulty had been met by the "Statute of Uses" in the preceding year, by which the holder of the use was declared to be the owner of the property, and for his benefit a Parliamentary title was created. At the same time, to prevent a repetition of the difficulty, uses were forbidden. Till, therefore, the law was altered a few years afterwards, the old common law held good, and, uses being impossible, gentry with much land and little money were deprived of all power of helping their younger children.

The lower orders were suffering principally from a change in the condition of agriculture in England, for which the Government could not be held responsible. There was a strong tendency Discontent of the poor. to convert arable land into pasture. Complaints on this head are constant. Mercantile men also had begun to find that possession of land gave them influence irrespective of birth. Bringing the mercantile spirit with them to the country, they had worked their properties to the best advantage, regardless of the feelings of their tenants and labourers. The consequence was, that where in the old days there had been thriving villages, there were now in many instances barren sheep-walks, supporting only two or three men. The rest of the old inhabitants, uprooted from their connection with the soil, thronged the towns, or of necessity became dependent upon charity. They were suffering very deeply, and as usual attributed their sufferings to their governors.

The insurrection broke out in Lincolnshire, at Louth. Thither Heneage, one of the clerical commissioners, and the Bishop of Lincoln's chancellor were going on their business on the 1st of October. It was rumoured that they intended to rob the treasury of the church. A crowd collected under the leading of a man who called himself Captain Cobler. The church was locked and guarded, the great cross fetched out by way of standard, and the whole township marched to raise the neighbouring towns and villages. The insurrection in Lincoln was essentially a popular one. It was on compulsion that the gentry joined it. There was a strong party for murdering them. They were in fact besieged by the populace in the Close at Lincoln, and quickly threw their weight upon the side of the Government. At Lincoln, during this quarrel between gentry and people, was a young lawyer, Robert Aske, who had been stopped by the insurgents, as he said, returning to his work in London. However this may be, he at once imbibed the spirit of the insurrection, and hurried off into Yorkshire, where he had interest, and where a rebellion of quite a different sort from that in Lincoln was quickly organized. The Lincolnshire rebels never came to open fighting. They sent a petition to the King from Horncastle, begging that religious houses should be restored, the late subsidy remitted, the "Statute of Uses" be repealed, the villein blood removed from the Privy Council, and the heretic bishops deprived.

The arrival of troops under Sir John Russell and the Duke of Suffolk was sufficient to cool the rebel ardour, and though they watched his progress sulkily, they did not absolutely oppose him. The ringleaders were given up and the insurrection dissolved. Suffolk had brought with him the King's very firm answer to their petition: "How presumptuous," he says, "are ye, the rude commons of one shire, and that one of the most brute and beastly of the whole realm and of least experience, to take upon you, contrary to God's law and man's law, to rule your Prince, whom ye are bound to obey and serve." He refused every request.

It was the duty of the great nobles in each county, under such circumstances, to call out the military force of the county to repress the insurrection. Lord Hussey, in Lincolnshire, had timorously held aloof and left the country. Lord Shrewsbury had gallantly taken his position at Nottingham. In Yorkshire this duty would have devolved on Lord Darcy of Templehurst, an old and tried soldier of both the late and the present King. His sympathies were, however, wholly with the movement, and, though Henry wrote to him to urge him to instant action, he threw himself with only twelve followers into Pontefract Castle, and there awaited the arrival of the rebels. These had rendezvoused on Weighton Common, and having elected Aske general, and having despatched a force to Hull, moved towards York. On the way they were joined by the Percies, with the exception of the Earl of Northumberland himself. York surrendered to them. They then advanced to Pontefract, which was unable to hold out against them, and Lord Darcy and the Archbishop of York speedily took the oath which was exacted of all whom the rebels met in their march. Lord Darcy henceforward became the leader of the movement, second only to Aske. Of opposition in the North there was scarcely any. Hull was taken, and the army of insurgents, kept under rigid discipline, moved onwards till they reached the river Don. Their army consisted of 30,000 men, "as tall men, well-horsed and well-appointed, as any men could be;" and they had with them all the nobility and gentry of the North. At Doncaster they found themselves face to face with Shrewsbury and Norfolk, well chosen agents for the purpose the Government had in view; for the rebels, claiming to uphold the rights of the old nobility and the old Church, here found themselves opposed by two nobles of the oldest blood and the strongest Catholic convictions in England. The rebels determined to treat, principally on the recommendation of Aske, who seems to have been really patriotic, and to have wished to avoid civil war. It was agreed that a conference should be held upon the bridge of Doncaster, and there a petition was intrusted to Sir Robert Bowes and Sir Ralph Elleskar to carry to the King, Norfolk agreeing to accompany them. Meanwhile, the rebel forces were disbanded. The King contrived to win over these emissaries to his party, but Aske continued his organizations; and when no satisfactory answer had been given by the close of November, he recalled his army to his standards, and again advanced to the Don. At Norfolk's earnest intercession the King at last agreed, against his own judgment, to grant a general pardon, and to call a Parliament, to be held almost immediately, at York. A conference between Norfolk and Aske was held at Doncaster, and Aske on his knees accepted the conditions, and threw aside the badge of the five wounds of Christ which had been assumed by the rebels. It seems certain that the rebels at the time believed that the whole of their petitions had been granted. It is possible that Norfolk, who had much sympathy with them, held out larger promises than Henry intended. The King's views at all events were not what the rebels supposed. He at once proceeded to organize the North, to establish fortified posts, and secure the ordnance stores. Norfolk was sent to Pontefract to make preparations for the coming Parliament. All this looked very unlike a favourable answer to the insurgents' petition. Still more were they disappointed when they found that, instead of a general amnesty, each individual had to petition for his own pardon, and received it only in exchange for the oath of allegiance. There was much natural disappointment and smouldering discontent. A man of little influence, called Sir Francis Bigod, contrived a disorderly rising in opposition to the old chiefs. This afforded opportunity for Norfolk to establish martial law, and seventy-four persons were hanged. Perhaps some new treasonable correspondence was discovered, and perhaps the opportunity for vengeance had now arrived, but without any very clear renewal of their offences, the three leaders of the old insurrection—Aske, Darcy, and Constable—were arrested (March). Discontented words could no doubt be proved against them, and on this the charges against them were chiefly based. They were all condemned and executed, as were also many others of the prominent gentry of the North. Nineteen of the Lincolnshire rebels were executed (July 1537). Of the three leaders, by far the most interesting is Aske. His popularity and influence were enormous, his power of organization seems to have been great, and there is visible in his whole career a genuine desire for the objects of the insurrection, apart from his own aggrandizement, which, coupled with his marked moderation and uprightness, renders him a very remarkable character.

The Pilgrimage of Grace, as the Northern insurrection was called, and its consequences, had not been over for three months when the event occurred which was to complete the edifice of Henry's success, to set at rest the vexed question of the succession, and enable his projects to be perpetuated. On October 12th, the Queen Jane gave birth to a son; but with this piece of good fortune was linked a great grief. Ten days after the birth of the prince, the Queen died. She had not been dead a day before the Privy Council begged the King to proceed to a new marriage, a request to which he yielded. "His tender zeal," says Cromwell, "to his subjects hath already overcome his Grace's disposition."

Birth of
Edward VI.

The birth of an heir, by apparently excluding all hopes of a natural succession to the throne on the part of any remnants of the family of York, seems to have excited them to more immediate action. There was a large family connection in the West of England, at the head of which was the Marquis of Exeter, the head of the Courtenays, and the grandson of Edward IV.

Lady Salisbury, the daughter of the Duke of Clarence, and mother of Lord Montague and of Reginald Pole, who was constantly intriguing on the Continent in Papal interests, was closely allied to the Marquis; while, on the other hand, she was closely connected with the Nevilles, the family of the great Earl of Warwick. Exeter, though he had joined in the suppression of the Northern insurrection, was a bitter enemy of Cromwell's, and that minister, when he found some traces of intercourse between the Marquis and Reginald Pole, was not slack in pursuing the clue. It seems that in Cornwall, at St. Kevern's, a banner had been ordered bearing the suspicious emblem of the wounds of Christ. The name of the Marquis was connected with this affair. It seemed to be intended to declare Exeter heir-apparent to the throne. There was another brother of the Pole family called Sir Geoffrey. Frightened at the turn affairs were taking, and implicated himself in whatever conspiracy there was, he denounced his brother and friends. On his witness, the Marquis of Exeter, Lord Montague, Sir Edward Neville, and Sir Nicholas Carew, Master of the Horse, were apprehended, and, after examination by the Council, executed for treason. In every instance the charge was based solely upon language used. Anything more different from the usual requirements for a charge of treason can hardly be conceived. Lady Salisbury was for the present spared. This closed the treasonable efforts of this reign. The King, aided by the secret system of Cromwell, had proved too much for all conspirators, and there remained scarcely any one of sufficient importance to threaten the succession of his son.

Almost contemporaneously with the Ten Articles, which animosity to the Papacy and political necessity had induced Henry to publish in 1536, each church had been supplied with a copy of the English Bible, a step indeed almost necessary when the Bible was regarded as the rule of faith. Up to this time the publication of English Bibles had been carefully forbidden. In 1526 Tyndale had completed the translation of the New Testament, which had been rapidly distributed in England among that class of which the Reformation had begun to take hold. Since that time the whole Bible had been translated and published. The Bishops were much set against it, but the King told them they had better make a more perfect translation themselves. In vain did Cranmer try to get this plan carried out, he ultimately had to employ Miles Coverdale to correct and arrange Tyndale's work, and a translation was published by authority. It was this edition which was ordered to be used in churches. Tyndale, whose work was the basis of our present magnificent translation, fell a victim to his religion, and was burnt at Augsburg, at the demand of the English Government.

The dissolution of the greater abbeys and monasteries had at length followed that of the lesser. Although confessedly not in the immoral condition of the smaller suppressed monasteries, there could not but be, inasmuch as they were strongholds of the old religion, much irritation amongst their inmates; while it was thus desirable that they should be destroyed, they were not open to the same violent attacks as the lesser monasteries had been. But it was found possible

Reformation
continued.

Its very moderate
character.

Dissolution of the greater monasteries.

to put such pressure upon them as to produce voluntary surrenders, which increased extraordinarily in number now that the insurrections had failed, and the Government found itself stronger. In 1536-37 there were but 3 such surrenders; in the following year 24; in the next 174; in the next 76. The great popular relics and shrines were also destroyed. It was the usual habit to give to each abbot and monk of a surrendered house a certain income. These, however, were very far from absorbing the whole income of the abbey. The residue passed into the hands of the Crown. The work was completed in the Parliament of 1539, by an Act confirming the surrenders up to that time, and allowing the King to extend the Act to all monasteries yet remaining. Large property thus passed into the hands of the King, who issued a noble project for the employment of it for great ecclesiastical and educational objects. No less than twenty-one new bishoprics were to be founded, with cathedrals and chapters. They dwindled practically, however, to six, and the wealth was employed in the King's wars, and in his extravagant household, and the lands given or sold at low rates to the new rising nobility.

Though Cromwell and Cranmer had been thus far successful, they were now to meet with a severe check. The chief life and vigour of the Reformation resided undoubtedly in the poorer educated classes. It was among them that the Bible had met with its ready sale, and it was the exception for men of the wealthier classes to be otherwise than complacent in their religion. It was not therefore to be expected that the growth of the new religion should be free from eccentricities and coarseness. The disclosure of priestly deceptions, and the claim to a perpetual miraculous power in the Church, might easily excite derision, which would again easily sink to ribaldry. There were indeed frequent exhibitions of such a temper. The Sacrament was laughed at, and scurrilous jests made upon it and upon other parts of the old organization. This disorder was very repugnant to the King's disposition. Indeed, yielding to the pressure of circumstances, he had allowed the Reformers to go further than he really approved. The separation from the Church of Rome, the absorption by the Crown of the powers of the Papacy, the unity of authority over both Church and State centred in himself, had been his objects. In doctrinal matters he clung to the Church of which he had once been the champion. He had gained his objects because he had the feeling of the nation with him. In his eagerness he had even countenanced some steps of doctrinal reform. But circumstances had changed; he was, in the first place, no longer in danger from Charles;

The Reformation checked.

and secondly, the national feeling was no longer unanimous; thus much he had learnt from the Pilgrimage of Grace, and to that portion of the nation which desired no change belonged almost all the nobility. Without detriment to his position he could follow his natural inclinations. He listened therefore to the advice of the reactionary party, of which Norfolk was the head. They were full of bitterness against the upstart Cromwell, and longed to overthrow him as they had overthrown Wolsey. The first step in their triumph was the Bill of the Six Articles, carried in the Parliament of 1539. These laid down and fenced round with extraordinary severity the chief points of the Catholic religion at that time questioned by the Protestants. The Bill enacted, first, "that the natural body and blood of Jesus Christ were present in the Blessed Sacrament," and that "after consecration there remained no substance of bread and wine, nor any other but the substance of Christ;" whoever, by word or writing, denied this Article was a heretic, and to be burned. Secondly, the Communion in both kinds was not necessary, both body and blood being present in each element; thirdly, priests might not marry; fourthly, vows of chastity by man or woman ought to be observed; fifthly, private masses ought to be continued; sixthly, auricular confession must be retained. Whoever wrote or spoke against these five Articles, on the first offence his property was forfeited; on the second offence he was a felon, and was to be put to death. Under this "whip with six strings" the kingdom continued for the rest of the reign. The Bishops at first made wild work with it. Five hundred persons are said to have been arrested in a fortnight; the King had twice to interfere and grant pardons. It is believed that only twenty-eight persons actually suffered death under it.

All this time, almost two years, the King had remained unmarried, and each party was eager to secure for a representative of its own interests the position of Queen. Cromwell's eager spirit of party got the better of his prudence, secured the triumph of his rivals, and was the cause of his own destruction. He had been intrusted with the duty of seeking a new consort for the King. Approaches towards friendship with the Emperor had been made for some time previously; the first lady thought of was the Duchess of Milan, his niece; but when a treaty was concluded at Nice between Charles and Francis, with the approbation of the Pope, in which Henry was not mentioned, this scheme was broken up once for all. Room was thus left for Cromwell to carry out his own wishes by connecting Henry with the Protestant Princes of Germany. He pitched upon the daughter of the Duke of Cleves, and, though warned of her want of beauty, he wilfully deceived the King upon that point, and went so far as to employ Holbein to paint a falsely flattering picture. The marriage was arranged, and the Princess brought with great pomp to England. Her homely German habits somewhat scandalized the admiral who was bringing her over, when she insisted on his bringing some friends with him to dine with her. "She much wished," she said, "to see how Englishman ate." She was brought to Rochester on New Year's Eve. The King, who had heard much praise of her beauty, and wished to do something lover-like, came there incognito with his Master of the Horse to see her. Sir Anthony Browne went to warn her that the King would visit her. He was never, he said, "more dismayed in his life" than when he saw her. The King followed close upon him. He was so shocked with her appearance that he could not bring himself to remain with her more than twenty minutes, and forgot to take the present he had prepared for her out of his pocket. It is true that there were some drawbacks to intimacy, as neither knew a word of the other's language. Henry was much hurt at the trick, for he considered it nothing else, that Cromwell had played upon him. He felt sure that he could never bring himself to live comfortably with his wife, and he at once tried all methods of getting rid of her. He listened with eagerness to a whisper of a pre-engagement, but her assertions on this head rendered that plea hopeless. He did not venture to repudiate her at once, and it was this which rendered Cromwell's share in the affair so odious to him. It would not do to offend the Protestant Germans, and throw them into the arms of Charles. He therefore, full of anger, consented to the completion of the marriage.

Cromwell took his opportunity and set on foot a treaty with the Elector of Saxony, the Duke of Cleves, and the Landgrave of Hesse. He asked Francis to join it, which would have rendered it too strong for the Emperor. Francis disclosed the plan to Charles, who thus became still more hostile, and being acquainted with the plans of England, could tamper with and withdraw from the treaty the German Princes. Cromwell's plan, for which he had risked Henry's displeasure, fell to pieces, and Henry was uselessly linked to his ugly wife. The minister's position was one of great difficulty. In his reforming career he had quarrelled hopelessly with the Peers; a new and self-made man, he had lorded over them without restraint. He was somewhat ostentatious of his 1540.

Marriage with
Anne of Cleves.

Consequent fall of Cromwell.

wealth, and was brusque and rude in his manner of dealing with them. His preponderance had become almost unbearable. His religious tendencies were well known. The passing of the Bill of the Six Articles was a distinct triumph over him. It was easy to make the King believe that in spite of it he would move forward in his old direction. Henry's jealousy was always easily stirred, and when, as now, he was thoroughly irritated with his minister on other grounds, it was probably enough to hint that he was inclined to be a rebel against the royal authority. The conspiracy answered. Cromwell was arrested at the very Council table. He was charged with taking upon himself to set at liberty people convicted of treason, with having issued commissions on his own authority, and as a heretic with having dispersed heretical books, with having released heretics from prison, with having supported them by force, and with having rebuked their accusers; with having despised the nobles, and made a fortune by bribes. In his present temper these were just the charges to irritate Henry. Usurpation of his authority, and an attempt to override his laws of heresy, could not fail to rouse his anger. Cromwell was not brought to trial, but was condemned by a Bill of Attainder, and executed. It is very probable that the charges against him were true, and that he had in some instances exceeded his power. Still there is something exceedingly base in the manner in which Henry, as soon as Cromwell's plans ceased to please him, lent his ear to the first whispers of the reactionary party that he had trenched on the prerogative, and suffered to be destroyed by legal niceties a man who had served him as few kings are served, and with the general tenor of whose government and opinions he must have been perfectly acquainted.

Before Cromwell had died, a divorce had been contrived from the obnoxious Anne of Cleves, who had been quite satisfied with a handsome pension; and the triumph of the party opposed to Cromwell was completed when the King married immediately Catherine Howard, the daughter of Lord Edmund Howard, and niece of the Duke of Norfolk.

The history of the remaining years of the reign turns chiefly upon the affairs of Scotland. The struggle which had succeeded the battle of Flodden, in which the parties of France and of England had alternately risen to influence, had closed in the year 1525 in a compromise, by which the government of Scotland was placed in the hands of a Council of Eight. In this both

Marriage with
Catherine
Howard.
Triumph of the reactionary
party.

Affairs in
Scotland.

parties were represented. Under these circumstances, Henry had brought forward a proposition which he had much at heart for the union of the two crowns—a marriage between the young King James and one of the English Princesses. Anarchy, however, shortly regained its sway. Angus, at the head of the English party, contrived to keep some appearance of power; but in the year 1528 he was overpowered and driven into exile. Under the care of his immoral mother, the King had been taught to regard the English party as his enemies, and attached himself to the Papacy. He had besides the usual prejudices of Scotchmen against England. Henry used all his influence to win him to his views. He promised even to create him Duke of York, and put him in the line of inheritance, but the influence of the clergy was too strong, and in 1537 he united himself with the enemies of England by marrying Magdalen de Valois, and accepting from the Pope a consecrated hat and sword as the champion of orthodoxy. His wife did not live long, but in June 1538 the French influence received fresh strength when James married as a second wife Mary, daughter of the Duke of Guise, and widow of the Duke of Longueville. Her influence was rendered still stronger by the command gained over the King by David Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews. Henceforward Scotland could be reckoned only among the enemies of Henry. His final effort at reconciliation produced a promise of a personal meeting to be held at York, whither the King journeyed with his young wife in 1540. Beaton had influence enough to make James break his promise and absent himself from the meeting. Henry returned home angry and bent on war.

The news that met him on his return was not likely to cheer him. The ill fortune which accompanied all his efforts at matrimony had again pursued him. During his absence the Council had been examining certain charges against his young Queen, whose company he had been thoroughly enjoying during his Northern journey. There seems no doubt that before her marriage she had misconducted herself grossly, and that even during the late progress, Denham, one of her former lovers, had been in her household, and by the connivance of Lady Rochfort had been admitted to her room. Both the Queen and Lady Rochfort were executed. Parliament passed a stringent Act making it high treason for any lady whom the King sought to marry to hide from his knowledge any questionable circumstances in her past life, and the King secured domestic peace by marrying Catherine Parr, widow of Lord Latimer.

Execution of Catherine
Howard.
1542.

Marriage of Catherine Parr.
1543.

Henry was not wrong in supposing that a war with Scotland was imminent. It was a necessary consequence of the state of affairs in Europe, where the rivalry between Francis and Charles was again to involve England in its complications. Francis was now in close alliance with the Pope, who had quarrelled with Charles, and had allied himself, to the horror of Christendom, with the Turks. As such conduct would naturally incline England to join the opposite party, and ally itself to Germany, Francis continued energetically the traditionary policy of friendship with Scotland, hoping thus to keep Henry in check. In October the Scotch began a war, and at Halidon Rig captured Sir Robert Bowes, who commanded on the English frontier. A war on a larger scale at once followed. The Duke of Norfolk marched across the Tweed, ravaging in the usual manner, and James assembled his nobles to meet him. But he was unable to induce them to follow him; the affection he had shown for the Church, his attachment to favourites, and the banishment of the Douglasses had made him unpopular among the nobility. A second army, collected by Church influence, marched into Cumberland. At first no leader was appointed; but on reaching England Oliver Sinclair, a personal favourite of the King's, was raised to the command over the head of all the nobles present. Anarchy and mismanagement were the consequence. An

Battle of Solway Moss.
Nov. 25, 1542.

attack from a few hundred borderers was thought to be an assault from Norfolk's army, which was in fact thirty miles distant, and the whole expedition took to flight and was utterly ruined in Solway Moss, which has given its name to this flight. The loss was very great, and the disgrace affected James so much that he died, leaving behind him his wife, who had just presented him with a daughter—the well-known Mary Stuart. Scotland was once again plunged into anarchy. Cardinal Beaton, anxious to preserve the power he had exerted over the late King, had contrived to get from him on his deathbed, perhaps even after his death, a paper declaring himself Regent. But the forgery was too palpable, and the Earl of Arran succeeded in obtaining the regency, and in throwing Beaton into prison. The possession of a certain number of noble prisoners from the flight of Solway, and this apparent change in the government of Scotland, encouraged Henry again to hope for the peaceable union of the two crowns. He liberated his prisoners on condition that they should support his interests, and he had thus a permanent party in Scotland. For three-quarters of a year (Dec. 1542—Sept. 1543) perpetual intrigues were carried on. For a time Arran seemed inclined towards the Reformation and against the clerical party, but Beaton was so much the abler man of the two, that by persuasion, or by threats of ecclesiastical censure, he at last completely mastered Arran. He got possession of the Queen; he drew assistance from France, although the French fleet was speedily defeated; he seems to have played upon the national prejudices even of the returned prisoners; till at last, although a Parliament had already accepted Henry's terms, all hope of a peaceful solution of the question ceased, the rival parties were reconciled, the infant Queen was crowned, and Scotland was united in its enmity to England.

Triumph of the anti-English
party.

Meanwhile, England had no longer been able to keep clear of European difficulties. Henry was, in fact, urgent that Charles V., who had now quarrelled with the Pope, should follow his example, and declare the supremacy of the civil power, and should join with him in demanding a free council to settle religious difficulties. He, moreover, was determined not to be excluded from any general effort which might be necessary to beat back the advancing Turks. Being thus joined by similarity of interests, he formed an alliance with the Empire, and as a matter of course found himself at war with France. It was agreed between the two powers that they would invade France jointly the following year—the one from the Upper Rhine, the other from Calais. Their armies were to meet at Paris. This expedition was to take place in June.

War with
France.

In the interval Henry took the opportunity of carrying on war against Scotland. An English fleet was sent to Leith, carrying with it an army of 10,000 men under Lord Hertford, the brother of Jane Seymour, whilst 4000 horse marched from Berwick, but not before the King had been informed of and given his approbation to an easier method of bringing the Scotch to reason. An offer was made, which the King approved, by Sir James Kirkaldy, Norman Leslie, and others to assassinate Cardinal Beaton. The conspirators were even promised money. They were unable to act immediately, and Hertford's invasion took place. Leith and Edinburgh were taken and sacked. Both the towns were partially burnt (May 5, 1544), and the country for seven miles round laid waste. Hertford and his army passed over to Calais for the French expedition; but the war, with all the horrors which at that time attended border warfare, continued, and Scotland was mercilessly ravaged.

In spite of Henry's representations, urging the inexpediency of a general advance on Paris, the programme arranged the preceding year was carried out by Charles, who marched forward beyond the Marne. Henry meanwhile contented himself with an attack upon Boulogne, which did not surrender before September. During the whole of this invasion emissaries from the French Court had been pressing both the Emperor and Henry to accept separate terms of peace, and now that Charles had somewhat imprudently pressed beyond a safe distance from his base of operations, and found himself unsupported by the English army, he no longer refused them. He sent indeed to consult Henry previously, but probably with no intention of taking a refusal; and on the 19th of September a separate peace was signed at Cr py.

Peace of Cr py.
1544.

The English were indignant at being thus, as they considered it, deserted, and it was so necessary for England to uphold her position in Europe, and not to show a weak front to the Roman Catholic powers, that it was determined, come what would, to continue the war single-handed. Charles refused in any way to assist them, in spite of the previous treaty. The reason for Charles's withdrawal was soon evident when the Council of Trent was called (1545), at which he had promised to be present, and from which he hoped for that settlement of Christendom which was his chief political object. If any general measure was to be taken, it would not do for the two great Catholic powers of Europe to be at war. Between England and France the war continued, and also between England and Scotland. One little success at Ancrum Moor was all of which the Scotch could boast. Men of all parties had joined on that occasion, alarmed by the reports of an intended annexation of Scotland. But though Hertford was sent to the borders, and the usual ruthless war was carried on, Henry's

England alone
in Europe.

hands were too full for any such project. England stood alone in Europe. It had quarrelled with the Emperor, and France intended to revenge its losses of the preceding year by an invasion. Large preparations for the defence of England were made. Troops were raised and distributed through the country to the number of 120,000, and a fleet, under Lord Lisle, took up its position at Portsmouth. The French actually landed in the Isle of Wight; skirmishes were fought in the island, but it was thought imprudent to attack Portsmouth, and, after some indecisive actions, the plague attacked the French ships, and they were obliged to return to France.

Peace of Boulogne.
June 1546.

Their efforts to retake Boulogne were not more successful. In the beginning of 1546 Surrey indeed was defeated in the neighbourhood of that town; but Hertford, who superseded him, soon set matters right, and a peace was made. France bound itself to pay two millions of crowns, being debts due to England, within the next eight years, a pension to the King for life of 100,000 crowns, and 50,000 as a perpetual pension to England. Boulogne was to be left in English hands as security for the payment of these sums. Scotland was included in the peace. In that country the French and Papal party had been quite triumphant, when suddenly they were deprived of their leader by the assassination of Cardinal Beaton in his castle of St. Andrews. The castle was entered by Norman Leslie and others of the Protestant party, who had long since plotted his death, and who were roused to energy by the persecution and execution of Wishart the Reformer.

The end of the reign was close at hand. Ever since the reaction which had produced the Act of the Six Articles, there had been a silent struggle going on. Both parties had been afraid to declare themselves openly, but twice the Anglicans, with Gardiner at their head, had tried to ruin Cranmer, and twice the King had saved him. Henry had lost something of his old vigour. The redundant strength of his youth had changed to unwieldy bulk. He is said to have required machines to move his limbs; he suffered constantly from a very painful ulcer in his leg. It was plain that he could not last much longer. In such a condition it was natural that he should no longer wish for innovation, but that at the same time he should surround himself with those trusty friends whose fortunes he had made, and who understood and shared his views. Thus, while the reactionary party seemed to be keeping things in their own hands, it was really the new men who were trusted, and who exerted the chief influence on the King's actions. Even in religious matters they were able to do something. A Liturgy, consisting of the Litany, Creed, the Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and Morning and Evening Service, was ordered to be read in English in place of the Breviary. The dissolution of ecclesiastical foundations was completed by the destruction of the Chantries. They were not powerful enough, however, to prevent persecution. The Queen was certainly on their side, and the influence she had gained over Henry by her faithful care of him rendered any attack upon her hopeless. Anne Askew, however, a lady of her household, was accused and found guilty of questioning the Real Presence in the Sacrament. Wriothesley, the Chancellor, himself is said to have assisted in the application of torture to wring from her the names of others who shared her views. His efforts

Strife of parties at the close of the reign.

were vain. She refused to speak, and died with perfect constancy at the stake, in the presence of her triumphant enemies.

But while on ecclesiastical questions parties were thus tolerably balanced, the real struggle was carried on in the King's Council, where each party strove to strengthen itself in expectation of the speedy death of Henry, with the view of securing the upper hand during the inevitable minority of his son. As was natural, it was the young King's uncle, the Earl of Hertford, who took the lead of the new and reforming party, and his influence, backed by that of the Queen, seems to have been gradually on the increase. It was he who had led the victorious army into Scotland; it was he who had been brought thence to complete the operations before Boulogne, where Surrey had committed some blunders. The Howards, on their side, had evidently their intrigues also. During the late war Norfolk had been in close intercourse with the French ambassador, and now, with the view apparently of raising claims to the regency or to the guardianship of the young King, Surrey assumed a change in his coat of arms which implied a close connection with royalty. His rival was strong enough to make the jealous King regard this as a threatened act of treason; and Surrey and his father, in the beginning of December 1546, were suddenly apprehended upon a charge of treason. The usual useless formalities were gone through. Surrey was tried by jury, and on the 19th of January beheaded. The 28th was to have seen the execution of Henry's old servant the Duke of Norfolk, but early that morning the King died, and the members of the Council thought it more prudent not to commit themselves to so important an act as the execution of the Duke till the tendency of the new reign should be more clearly determined.

Historians have differed much in their estimate of the deceased King. The brutal, selfish, and licentious tyrant of one General character of the reign. has been the wise and energetic and paternal ruler of the other. His character has been represented, and like other great men's characters will always be represented, in accordance with the general views of the writer. While the lover of liberty will shrink with horror from acts of violence, and a constant effort at a personal monopoly of power, which are visible in every line of his history, the lover of order will point with pride to the iron hand which compelled the most refractory to obedience, which suppressed anarchy and rebellion, and held the jarring elements of the revolutionary period in subjection.

Final triumph of Hertford.

The King dies.
1547.

In his first youth Henry was undoubtedly a most highly-gifted and popular King, with beauty, strength, intelligence and education beyond most of those who surrounded him. In the first period of his reign, when his exuberant manhood found exercise in European wars, he raised England from the position of a third-rate power, which it had held during his father's reign, when Spanish influence was predominant, to that of a nation which could bid defiance to either of the great powers of Europe, and in some sort hold the balance between them. It was the pre-eminent administrative ability of Wolsey, coupled with the undoubted excellence of the English as soldiers, which enabled him to produce this great change. The question of the divorce and the fall of his first great minister awoke him from dreams of personal or national aggrandisement, and called his attention to the deeper movements which were agitating Europe. From that time till the end of his reign, however much he may have employed able ministers and made use of their ability, it was himself who was the true governor of the kingdom, and it is impossible to deny that he managed the government with great capacity. The secret of his success was the tact with which he at once perceived the national feeling. Absolute though he was, it is plain that on more than one occasion he yielded to the national will, and thus in a time of revolutionary excitement, in the midst of insurrections, dynastic, social and religious, he was enabled to pursue a distinct line of policy, and to prevent either party from becoming absolutely predominant. And when we read the history of the two next reigns, during which the rulers became partisans rather than the representatives of the national will, we become conscious of the great talent which guided the nation with comparative safety through so difficult a crisis. At the same time there can be no question as to the tyrannical character of his government; it is under him that the personal rule reached its full development. In him were centred all the forces of the Government. And when we add to this the undoubted coarseness and cruelty of his character, his extraordinary indelicacy with regard to women and to the relation of marriage, and the craving, which all personal governors must have, for a successor to carry on their plans, we understand how a reign which, in many respects, may be regarded as the most glorious of our history has become in the eyes of more modern civilization a period merely detestable for its cruelty, licentiousness and want of liberty.

EDWARD VI.

1547—1553.

Born 1537.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.
Mary, 1542.

France.
Henry II., 1547.

Germany and Spain.
Charles V., 1519.

POPES.—Paul III., 1534. Julius III., 1550.

Archbishop.
Thomas Cranmer, 1533

Chancellors.
Sir William Paulet, 1547.
Richard Rich, 1547.
Thomas Goodrich, 1552.

HENRY'S wishes for a successor had been partially fulfilled, and the nation, which had been taught to rest absolutely on the will and guidance of its head, found itself nominally governed by a child of tender years, and really in the hands of a body of unprincipled statesmen, such as are the constant product of personal government,—men of great ability, but trained in habits of dependence and with no higher moral aim than their own aggrandisement. There was one exception to this general censure :—the Earl of Hertford was a patriot, but was without that statesmanlike balance which was so striking a characteristic of Henry. He had espoused one side in the great conflict, could see no excellence in any other, and that side was the revolutionary and innovating one. He panted for the opportunity of carrying out his reforms. In the gallery outside the room where the King was still lying dead, he induced Paget, the ablest of the late King's servants, to support him in a scheme for setting aside the King's will. Paget

Regency of Somerset.
1547.

1547]

REGENCY OF SOMERSET

423

warned him of his danger, but consented to help him. Henry had hoped, by a judicious selection from the rival parties, to have surrounded his son with a neutral Council, who would have carried on his own views till Edward came of age. He had left the crown by will, as he was authorized to do by an Act of Parliament ; and in accordance with this personal view of the royal power, the Council of Sixteen¹ were called executors. There was a second Council of Twelve, who could be summoned on any emergency. Although with the Norfolks the party of the old nobility had for the time fallen, and the executors were all new men, on religious matters they were not unanimous ; and Wriothesley, the Chancellor, a vehement Anglo-Catholic, headed the opposition to Lord Hertford. In his hurry to secure leisure for political struggles, he appointed a commission under the Great Seal to transact his judicial business. His opponents at once took advantage of his error. It was held illegal to use the Great Seal for this purpose, and Wriothesley was removed from office. The triumph of Hertford, now become Duke of Somerset, was complete. He was raised not only to the Presidency of the Executive Council, but to the Protectorship of England, and the executors in time were merged in the General Council.

Before this they had made Somerset's brother Lord Seymour of Sudeley, Lord Parr, Marquis of Northampton, Lisle (Dudley), Earl of Warwick, and Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton.

It was no easy place which Somerset was called to fill. He had to continue Henry's policy in various directions, but Henry, as has been said, was his own minister, and the faults of this great centralization of powers in himself were now apparent. It was almost impossible for one plunged suddenly into the midst of so many lines of policy to grasp or carry out the late King's intentions. The main questions to be at once considered were the relations between England and Scotland, between England and France, between England and the German Protestants, between the reactionary Roman or Anglo-Catholics and the constantly increasing party of reform, between the poorer classes and their wealthy superiors, and, lastly, the financial difficulties which the late wars and the great rise in prices had introduced. To every one of these, at one and the same time, did Somerset address himself. Full of revolutionary energy, full of

He attempts everything at once.

¹ Cranmer, Wriothesley, Lord St. John (Paulet), Lord Russell, Earl of Hertford, Viscount Lisle, Bishop of Durham, Anthony Browne, William Paget, North, Montague, Denny and Herbert.

schemes of universal philanthropy, and with a confident and overweening reliance upon his own ability to carry out his good intentions, nothing seemed too difficult for him. The golden age was to begin. Gentleness, and quick justice, and popular liberality were to take the place of the stern repressive rule of the last reign.

At once the Reformation began to be pushed forward—no longer in a restrained or temperate manner, but with destructive violence. Images of saints were pulled down in the churches, whitewash covered their painted walls. Ridley preached violent sermons at Paul's Cross. A general injunction was ordered for the purification of churches. Picture and window and statue were alike forbidden. A royal commission was issued to see that the directions of the late reign were fully carried out, and the English Liturgy used. The Book of Homilies was issued under Cranmer's directions, and many old customs and holydays were to be suppressed.

The writer of the Grey Friars' Chronicle mentions with bitterness these destructive measures; he says:—"Item, also at that same time was pullyd downe thorrow all the kynges domynyon in every churche alle Roddes with alle images, and every precher preached in their sermons agayne alle images. . . . Also this same time was moche spekyng agayne the sacrament of the auter, that some callyd it Jacke of the boxe, with divers other shamfulle names. . . . And at this tyme was moche prechyng agayne the masse. And the sacrament of the auter pullyd downe in dyvers placys thorrow the realme. Item, after Ester beganne the servis in Ynglyche at Powles . . . and also in dyvers other pariche churches. . . . Item, also this yere was Barkynge chappylle at the Towre hylle pullyd downe, and sent Martyns at the chambulles end, sent Nicolas in the chambulles, and sent Ewyns, and within the gatte of Newgate those were put unto the churche that some tyme was the Gray Freres; and also Strand churche also pullyd downe to make the protector Duke of Somerset's place larger."

But though the Protector thus carried on the Reformation in England, he was unable to throw himself into the European war on the Protestant side. The opening of the Council of Trent had been shortly followed by the breaking out of a religious war in Germany. Henry VIII. had made offers of assistance to the Protestant Princes, but his offers had been declined; and subsequent events having given a more political character to the war, he had been disinclined to mix in it. On his death the Government was again pressed to give assistance to the Protestants; but however much Somerset may have desired it, he thought himself compelled to limit his assistance to a small sum of money. The relations both with France and Scotland were too threatening to admit of any more efficacious help. The battle of Muhlberg terminated for the present all hopes of Protestant success in Germany.

The arms which might have averted this disaster were turned against Scotland. Henry's plans had always tended towards a peaceful solution of the question between the two countries, but even he, in the later years of his reign, had been reduced to employ force. The death of Cardinal Beaton had, however, for a time recalled to life the English and Reforming party. If the castle of St. Andrews could be succoured, and Norman Leslie and his friends saved, there seemed yet a chance of their party gaining the upper hand. But Somerset allowed assistance to come to the Catholics from France, and the castle of St. Andrews fell. The friends of England were thus taught that they could put no great reliance upon Somerset. The impatience of his character indeed rendered him unfit for the tedious processes of party intrigue. He determined at once to cut the knot; the Scotch should be compelled to carry out what their Parliament had once promised. An army was collected at Berwick, with all necessary supplies. A fleet was to follow it round the coast as it marched upon Edinburgh. If the fall of St. Andrews had weakened the confidence of the Protestants, the threat of invasion united as usual all parties in Scotland, and war from henceforth was alone to be expected. The Protector marched rapidly northward.

He neglected the fortresses on the way, and pushed straight on to the Frith of Forth. The Scotch were collected in great numbers near Musselburgh, and when the English came upon them, they occupied a position of great strength on the westward bank of the little river Esk. On their left was the sea, on the right an impassable morass, while in front a river ran in a deep bed, which could be crossed by cavalry at one bridge only. The Scots committed an error which had more than once proved ruinous to them. Strong in numbers, they believed that the English would refuse the fight and try to escape them. To prevent this, they deserted their unassailable position. Somerset's advance from the hills of Falside and Carberry, where he had been encamped, towards Inveresk church, which partially commanded the Scotch

The Reformation.

War with Scotland.

Battle of Pinkie, Sept. 10, 1547.

position, seems to have been mistaken for an attempt to reach the fleet, which was anchored outside Musselburgh. They crossed the river by Musselburgh bridge, passed to the west of Inveresk church, and occupied the back of the hill, between which and the sloping terraces of Falside there was a depression. They also advanced southward, as though to attempt to occupy the end of the ridge which the English were leaving, and thus enclose the English army between themselves and the river. This movement brought on the battle. The charge of the English cavalry upon the advancing right wing of the Scotch was repelled by the pikemen. But they were unable to follow up their success, and covering his movement with his artillery, Somerset brought the whole of his army upon the Scotch, somewhat disordered by their change of position, and shaken by the discharge of archers, musketry and artillery. Their broken troops were charged by the English cavalry, and the battle became a rout. But little quarter was given, and the slaughter was enormous. 1500 prisoners were taken; 10,000 men are said to have been slain. The loss of the English was only a few hundreds. This battle of Pinkie, which was the last before the junction of the thrones, marked as it was by needless cruelty, completed the alienation of the Scotch, and the marriage question was settled once for all by the young Queen Mary being sent to France, where, in the August of 1548, she was solemnly contracted to the Dauphin, afterwards Francis II.

Having thus triumphantly ruined Henry's plan with regard to Scotland, Somerset found it necessary to take in hand ^{War with} the English difficulties with France. Henry had left ^{France.} England at peace with that country. The Peace of Boulogne had been a satisfactory and honourable one, and as long as Francis I. lived, the relations between the countries were fairly cordial. But only three months after Henry's death, Francis died also (March 22, 1547), and his son, Henry II., who had always been the leader of the anti-English party, came to the throne. It was by French troops that St. Andrews had been taken. In the following year, a French army was sent to assist the conquered Scotch. Boulogne, which was to be held by the English for eight years, was threatened, and finally, in the year 1548, constant skirmishing around Boulogne and upon the sea produced all the circumstances of war, although no war was declared. This uneasy condition continued for more than a year. The English were perpetually worsted, and lost fort after fort of the defences which surrounded Boulogne, till at length (1549) the Protector was obliged to declare war, so that here too he had failed in perpetuating Henry's policy.

Meanwhile, the visitors under the new ecclesiastical commission had been going on with their work in England. They had met with no great opposition from the people, but had come in ^{Reversal of the} contact with both Bonner and Gardiner, both of whom ^{arbitrary policy} were imprisoned. His chief opponents being thus removed, Somerset was able on his return to England to carry through Parliament a Bill which swept away all treasons created since 25 Edward III., thus completely reversing Henry's home policy. This Bill repealed the Acts of Richard II., Henry V., and Henry VIII., against the Lollards; the Act of the Six Articles, and those depending on it; the Act of the thirty-fifth year of his reign, prohibiting the reading of the English Scriptures in churches and to the poor, and all other Acts or sentences regarding doctrine or religion. It repealed also statutes passed in Henry VIII.'s reign, making new felonies, and those giving the authority of law to the King's proclamation.¹ To the treasons of the statute of Edward were added two—a proved public attack in words three times repeated against the King's supremacy, and a similar attack in writing, printing, or by overt act. It was added that two witnesses were necessary in cases of treason. The preamble to this statute explains exceedingly well the change of plan which Somerset advocated. It acknowledges the occasional necessity of severity, "but," it continues, "as in tempest or winter one course and garment is convenient, in calm or warm weather a more liberal case or lighter garment both may and ought to be followed and used, so we have seen divers strait and sore laws made in one Parliament, in a more calm and quiet reign of another Prince repealed and taken away, the which most high clemency and royal example of his Majesty's most noble progenitors, the King's Highness, of his tender and godly nature most given to mercy and love of his subjects willing to follow, . . . and minding further to provoke his said subjects with great indulgency and clemency, showed on his Highness' behalf to more love and kindness toward his Majesty, and upon trust that they will not abuse the same, but rather be encouraged thereby more faithfully and with more diligence and care for his Majesty to serve His Highness now in this his tender age, is contented and pleased that the severity of certain laws be mitigated and remitted." At the same time that this Act was passed, all the remaining property of ecclesiastical corporations was intrusted to the Crown, with the exception of the Universities, Winchester, Eton, St. George's, Windsor, and the Cathedral Chapters, and the collation to bishoprics was placed entirely in the King's hands. Together with this completion of the work of the Reformation was passed a Bill which was intended to put a finishing stroke to the legislation of the last reign with regard to vagrants and able-bodied paupers. The Government had not yet been brought to understand that men cannot be forced to work unless there is work to give them, and that natural laws were in operation which, till fresh sources of industry were opened, could not but throw large masses of unemployed labour upon the market. It was now ordered that any determinately idle and able-bodied vagrant might be adjudged by two magistrates to any one wanting him as a slave, branded with the letter V, and to be kept in slavery for two years. If he refused still to work, he might be made a slave for life, or finally punished as a felon. Two years later, it was found necessary to repeal this severe Act.

¹ 5 Rich. II., stat. 1. c. 6; 2 Hen. V., c. 7; 25 Hen. VIII., c. 14; 31 Hen. VIII., c. 14; 34 Hen. VIII., c. 1.

Vagrant Act.

¹ 31 Hen. VIII., c. 8. 35 Hen. VIII., c. 23.

Now that they had gained the upper hand, the Protestants pushed their advantage vigorously, and their teachers spread through England, preaching with rude and destructive vehemence against the doctrines of the Roman Church, which were still cherished by the mass of the people, who saw too these noisy innovators supported by those who were laying their hand right and left on the property of the old Church, and treating with scorn all that had been held holy. Somerset himself was seen appropriating mass after mass of ecclesiastical property, and thinking it no harm to pull down parish churches and chapels to supply room and material for his new palace of Somerset House.

The social difficulty which the last Parliament had tried to deal with, and the unrestrained triumph of the reforming party, produced two insurrections, which were the immediate precursors to the fall of the Protector. Before they broke out it is necessary to mention a fresh difficulty which he found upon his hands. His brother, Lord Seymour of Sudeley, a man of violent temper and ambition, aspired to some share in the Protector's influence, and felt injured that, contrary to the usual precedent in such cases, both the Protectorship of the kingdom and the personal guardianship of the King should be in one man's hands. He sought to strengthen his position by marriage; the Council refused him the Princess Elizabeth, but he succeeded in marrying Catherine Parr, only two months after King Henry's death. He obtained also the guardianship of both Elizabeth and Lady Jane Grey, the daughter of the Marchioness of Dorset, niece of Henry VIII. His conduct in other respects was lawless and threatening. He rejected, although High Admiral, the command of the fleet on the occasion of the late Scotch war. He had secret correspondence with the pirates in the Channel, for whose advantage he purchased the Scilly Isles, as a convenient place of refuge. He obtained from Sir William Sharrington, master of the mint at Bristol, money for his purposes; he even established two cannon foundries. He won over several Lords to his interest, and on the death of his wife again sought the hand of the Princess Elizabeth. Everything went to show that he conceived the idea of supplanting his brother. It seems that he intrusted some of his plans to Southampton (Wriothesley), supposing that he was still Somerset's enemy. From him information reached Religious differences.

Consequent insurrections.

Treason of Lord Seymour of Sudeley.

the Protector, who had no choice but to arrest Lord Seymour. A Bill of Attainder was brought in against him, and although no opportunity was allowed him of speaking in his own defence, he was declared guilty and executed.

The next session of the Parliament was principally devoted to religious questions. A complete English Service Book was approved, in which the critical doctrine of the Lord's Supper was left uncertain; fasting was continued, but chiefly on the ground of its advantage to the fisheries; and the first Act of Uniformity was passed. Somerset probably believed that this and his other reforming measures were acceptable to the people, and would tend to bring in that reign of peace and charity which he desired. For the same reason he turned a willing ear to the complaints of the lower orders.

The changes in agriculture had thrown adrift great numbers of the labouring class. The same spirit which had made the landlords decrease their arable land urged them to pursue a new method of obtaining pasture. The unenclosed common lands of England were very large, and much of the livelihood of the labourers was derived from them. These were now taken in and enclosed by the neighbouring landlords, and the labourer's livelihood was thus cut off at both ends; he could neither find work, nor were his common rights respected. There was naturally much discontent, more especially as prices were rising under the influence of the restricted supply of corn and the depreciation of the coinage. The country was full of poverty and vagrancy and crime. Acts of violence occurred, and the destruction of enclosures became frequent. Instead of repressing them sharply, as would have been done in the last reign, Somerset, with his liberal tendencies, sympathized with the offenders. Laws had been made during the last two reigns to keep in check the growing evils of which the poor complained, and Somerset now issued a commission to see that those laws were carried out; and at the same time, thinking that the poor received scanty justice from the existing Law Courts, he established a private Court of Requests, through which they might have immediate access to him, and by means of which he did not scruple to set aside the process of law. The ills complained of and the object of the commission are well shown in a charge of Mr. Hales, one of the commissioners:—"There have been many good laws made for the maintenance of houses and husbandry and tillage, as in the fourth year of Henry VII., and in the seventh year of the reign of the King's Majesty's father, that no man should keep upon his own lands or farms, or upon his farms only, above the number of 2000 sheep; and in the same year, that no man should have or occupy more than two houses of husbandry in one town, parish, or hamlet. . . . Yet, because the same laws were not reverently obeyed and obediently observed, we see they do little or no good. Towns, villages, and parishes do daily decay in great numbers; houses of husbandry and poor men's habitations be utterly destroyed everywhere, and in no small number. Husbandry and tillage, which is the very paunch of the Commonwealth, that is that that nourisheth the whole body of the realm, greatly abated, and finally the King's subjects wonderfully diminished; and albeit the commission extendeth to five principal points, that is for the decay of towns, villages, houses of husbandry, converting arable ground into pasture, the multitude of sheep, the heaping together of farms, the not keeping hospitality in households on the sites of the monasteries and religious houses which were dissolved by statutes made in the twenty-seventh year of the King's Majesty that dead is, and occupying of tillage on the demesnes of the same monasteries, yet doth altogether shoot but at one mark, and prick but at one prick, that is to remove the self-love that is in many men, to take away the inordinate desire of riches wherewith many be cumbered. . . . And to plant brotherly love among us, to increase love and godly charity among us, and make us know and remember that we all, poor and rich, noble and ignoble, gentlemen and husbandmen, and all other of whatsoever estate they be, be but members of one body mystical of our Saviour Christ, and of the body of the realm."

Popular tendencies of Somerset.

Such a commission, however noble in its intention, could not fail to raise feelings akin to socialism in the minds of the poor, and call into existence hopes which could hardly be realized. The fruit of Somerset's revolutionary and meddling disposition was now ripe. In all directions he had exhibited a feverish activity; in all directions too he had shown a sympathy with the lower orders, and with the ultra-Protestants, quite at variance with the tradition of Henry VIII.'s masterful government; and Paget, the wisest statesman of the time, who had throughout supported Somerset, could with justice write to him in such terms as these—"What seeth your Grace over the King's subjects out of all discipline, out of obedience, caring neither for Protector nor King, and much less for any other mean officer? And what is the cause? Your own lenity, your softness, your opinion to be good to the poor. . . . By and by the commons must be pleased; you must take pity upon the poor men's children and of the conversation and stay of this realm: and put no more so many irons in the fire at once as you have had within this twelvemonth. War with Scotland, with France, though it be not so termed: commissions out for this matter: new laws for this, proclamation for another: one on another's neck so thick that they be not set by among the people."¹ Paget wrote these words upon the receipt of the news that the rebellion had broken out in the West. Discontent there assumed the form of opposition to the introduction of the new Revolutionary

outbreaks
in the West.

Service Book required by the Act of Uniformity. The Liturgy was read for the first time on Whitsunday, the 1st of June. On Whit-Monday the villagers of Sampford Courtenay insisted upon the priest's resuming his old dress and reading Mass in Latin. The insurrection soon spread through Cornwall and Devonshire, and broke out at St. Mary's Clyst, near Exeter. Lord Russell was appointed to suppress the movement, but, previous to his arrival, Sir Peter Carew took some unsuccessful steps in the same direction which seemed rather to augment the flame. The demands of the Western insurgents, which were put forward in a very imperious form, asked for the restoration of the Mass and of the Six Articles, the re-establishment of images, and the abolition of the English Liturgy. They named as their leaders Humphrey Arundel, and Boyer, the Mayor of Bodmin.

In the same letter which has before been quoted, Paget urged on the Lord Protector a vigorous line of action. He begged him to act in unison with the Council, to summon his German auxiliaries from Calais, and to use all his exertions to nip the insurrection in the bud, and afterwards execute vigorous justice in every rebellious county. But affairs were now complicated by insurrections in various parts of England, and especially one in the Eastern Counties, which, under the command of Robert Ket of Wymondham, a tanner, was assuming a formidable aspect. The causes of complaint here, however, were not religious but social. With these, as we have seen, Somerset sympathized. He was therefore in a dilemma, feeling it wrong to act with vigour against the Eastern rebels, and being unable to repress those of the West without losing his popularity. His action was therefore vacillating. Fresh commissions and lukewarm proclamations were issued; but with regard to the East he distinctly asserted that reformation should begin with the gentlemen, and not with the commonalty. The Council took the matter into its own hands. Russell, being at length re-enforced by Lord Grey from Oxfordshire, advanced to relieve Exeter, which was besieged by the rebels. A battle was fought at St. Mary's Clyst, where, after a fierce fight, the insurgents were defeated. This victory was followed up, and on the 6th of August Exeter was relieved. There was a rally of the rebels at Sampford Courtenay, where they were finally dispersed. Martial law was declared in Devonshire and Cornwall, and the rebellious counties punished with great severity. Meanwhile the Norfolk insurgents directed their attention chiefly to the destruction of enclosures. An army of 16,000 of them took up their position on Mousehold Hill, near Norwich, where Ket held a daily court of justice, in which obnoxious gentlemen were tried. Property, which was largely seized, was brought into a common stock for the use of the camp. In an oak upon the hill, called the Oak of Reformation, a pulpit was erected, where the neighbouring clergy came and preached, and the Mayor of Norwich, either voluntarily or by compulsion, sat as fellow-judge with Ket. Order and discipline were well preserved in the rebel host. A herald was sent to them with a free pardon, but Ket rejected it as unnecessary. The herald tried to arrest him, and in the consequent uproar the town of Norwich was seized by the rebels. Again Somerset's gentleness had suffered the rebellion to gain head, and the Council insisted upon sharper measures. Lord Northampton was sent against them. He was admitted into Norwich by the citizens, but a second time the rebels stormed the town, and Northampton had to fly. Some proportion of the mercenary troops of the Protector had been proceeding ^{Warwick} northward to carry on the Scotch war. They were ^{suppresses it.} commanded by the Earl of Warwick, the son of the extortioner Dudley, and who, as Lord Lisle, had distinguished himself both as soldier and admiral. To him was intrusted the duty of repairing Northampton's disaster. He again offered the insurgents a pardon. Their mistrust again induced them to decline it. They had some temporary success against Warwick, but ultimately descending from their camp on Mousehold Hill, they took up a position in the open fields, where they were entirely routed, with the loss of between three and four thousand of their number. A few of them were afterwards hanged on the Oak of Reformation, and their leaders, Ket and his brother, being executed, the rebellion was at an end.

In the East.

¹ Styrpe's Memorials, Repository of Originals, Letter III.

But though peace was thus re-established in England, Boulogne was still threatened. Negotiations with the Emperor, who it was hoped might assist in withstanding the French, came to nothing, and it seemed as if the town must shortly fall. The outlying forts around it were taken one after the other, and at last formal war was declared against France (September 1549).

Somerset's government had thus been everywhere unsuccessful. He owed his position of Protector to the choice of the Council only. He was in fact in some degree their representative. Not unreasonably, then, they thought it necessary to resume the power they had delegated, which had been so unsuccessfully used. Warwick, returning to London from his triumphant suppression of the rebellion, where his vigorous action, as well as that of Russell in the West, had been rather opposed than seconded by the Protector, became a most important person among those members of the Council who planned Warwick and the Council try to resume their authority.

the removal of Somerset. The Protector was informed of the feeling against him, and determined to struggle for his power. He declared the London Council treasonable, persuaded the King there was a plot against him, and called upon the nation to rise to defend the Crown. This was a virtual declaration of war between himself and the Council. It was soon plain that Somerset by hasty action had put himself in the wrong. One after another of his friends joined the London Council. Smith and Paget, who remained with him, were chiefly occupied in restraining his violence. He hurried the King to Windsor, to the great injury it was thought of his health; but finding that his measures were counteracted by his rivals, that Herbert and Russell, with the armies of the West, were siding with his enemies, and influenced by his prudent friends Paget and Cranmer, he at length made his submission and acknowledged the authority of the Council. The victorious party at once betook themselves to Windsor, and put themselves into communication with the King.

Fall of Somerset.

The schism which divided the Council was thus healed, and they could again act with unquestioned authority. Toward the fallen Protector and his friends they acted leniently. Sir Thomas Smith was expelled the Council, and Somerset was sent to the Tower, where, however, he stayed but a short time, being released in February 1550, while three months afterwards most of his property was restored to him.

The fall of Somerset might very naturally have been followed by a complete change of policy, as the charge against him was the want of success of his administration. Southampton had been prominent among his enemies, and for a moment the reactionary party thought that their time was come. But Warwick was all-powerful in the Council, and he saw plainly that any reaction which should recall to influence the old nobility would be fatal to him. He therefore put himself into the hands of the Reformers, hurrying onwards even faster than Somerset had done.

Warwick continues the headlong policy of Somerset.

Before he could proceed to any improvement on the state of affairs in England, it was necessary to complete the war with France. It was impossible to act vigorously while the constant drain on the resources of the nation caused by the war continued. How much the state of England wanted reform is shown by a few words of Paget's: "We must acknowledge what we cannot deny—the evil condition of our estate at home. . . . Ill money, whereby outward things be dearer, idleness among the people, the great courages, dispositions to imagine and invent novelties, devises to amend this and this, and a hundred mischiefs which make my heart sorry to mark—these be the fruits of war." With such a feeling among the negotiators, no great difficulty could arise with regard to terms. The French felt their superiority and pressed it; the English could but yield. The pension promised to Henry was refused. Boulogne was to be given up within six weeks, and in exchange the French were to pay four hundred thousand crowns. The large sum due from France to England was to be remitted, so that the four hundred thousand crowns was in fact all that remained of Henry VIII.'s conquest.

Loss of Boulogne.

Freed from the war with France, the Council had an opportunity of repairing some of Somerset's faults. He had indeed left them plenty to do. His revolutionary tendencies in all directions had produced a state of feeling which had become evident in the late rebellions. His conduct had been the more injudicious because he was acting during a minority, and the King on his coming of age might undo all that was done, and might reasonably have expected to have received his kingdom on the whole in the same position in which his father had left it. The Council plunged into the same revolutionary course, with this difference, that Somerset's errors had arisen from an over-estimate of his own ability, but were the fruit of high and noble feelings and aspirations; while Warwick, and his friends in the Council, the unscrupulous instruments of the late King, left without his restraining hand, were hypocrites in religion, had no object but their own aggrandizement, and in foreign policy thought only of tiding over the difficulty of the moment, and of sustaining as far as possible the balance of power.

Want of principle in the Council.

Latimer, in 1550, when preaching before the King, had accused the

FEB. MON.

f

King's officers of bribery. Bribes were given to have accounts passed : —“What needeth a bribe giving except the bills be false ? . . . And here now I speak to you my master-minters, augmentationiers, receivers, surveyors, auditors, . . . ye are known well enough what ye were before ye came to your offices, what lands ye had then and what ye have purchased since, and what building ye make daily. Well, I pray ye, so build that the King's workmen may be paid. They make their moans that they can get no money, and poor labourers, gun-makers, powder-makers, bow-makers, arrow-makers, smiths, carpenters, soldiers, and other crafts cry out for their dues. It seems illfavouredly that ye should have enough wherewith to build superfluously and the King lack to pay his poor labourers.”

To peculation, injustice, and the misgovernment of wholly selfish rulers, was added as a fresh cause of confusion the real difficulty of the currency. Already, towards the close of the last

The currency.

reign, Henry in his want of money had had recourse to the expedient of depreciating the coinage. He had gained by this means £50,000. The expedient had been largely followed during the present reign. The numerous plans which Somerset had constantly kept on hand at the same time had been very expensive, and the debasement of the coinage was an easy source of wealth. As a natural consequence, private individuals had secured such of the coinage as was good, to be either sold abroad or re-introduced in a debased state. Sharrington, master of the Bristol mint, and the friend of Lord Seymour of Sudeley, confessed to having made a profit of £4000 by the issue of testons or bad shillings. On the suppression of the rebellions of 1549, and the fall of Somerset, Warwick, Herbert, Paget, and in fact most of the Lords of the Council, were allowed to reimburse themselves for the money they had spent in the suppression of the rebellions by coining large quantities of silver. Herbert's gain alone was £6709, 19s. The whole sum of base coinage thus introduced into circulation was more than £150,000. The evil went on ; vast quantities of plate, especially from the churches, was turned into base money. The natural effects followed ; the good money and the gold left the country ; the rate of exchange constantly fell. Attempts to introduce a purer coinage in smaller-sized pieces failed, as these did but disclose the real amount of depreciation which the coinage had undergone. Prices rose enormously. “If we in England should coin in six years to come so much white money as we have in six years past, of the value now going, the plentifulness of the money and the baseness thereof together should bring our Commonwealth to that pass, that if you should give a poor man three shillings a day for his day's labour, yet you should scarce pay him such a hire as he might live thereof—which God defend should come to pass.” So high did the prices rise that violent attempts were made to fix a tariff. The outcry was too great, and the project was dropped. But at last the disorder and inconvenience reached such a pitch that the Council were driven to the necessity of reforming the coinage (Aug. 1551). The quantity of base money afloat and the lack of finances prevented an honest exchange of good money for bad. It was determined “to call down the money,” that is, to make the real and nominal value of it agree. On the whole, the amount of depreciation was about fifty per cent. The shilling was therefore to be called down to sixpence, to the loss of every individual in the country of half the value of his money. This great reduction was done at two steps. The Council, knowing the coming change of value, did not scruple to take advantage of the interval between the two to throw another £120,000 worth, with no less than three-quarters alloy, into the country. The process was not fully completed, for though good money was issued in exchange for bad, the return of the bad money to the Mint was not compulsory. There was, of course, still room for unlimited counterfeiting, and after all the prices fell but little.

As far as the Reformation was concerned, measures became more and more extreme. Gardiner and Bonner were both detained in prison, and Heath, Bishop of Worcester, joined them there. Somerset, who had regained some influence, exerted himself on Gardiner's behalf, but in vain. The new appointments were all Protestants. Ridley was made Bishop of London ; Ponet, a man of immoral life, succeeded Gardiner at Winchester ; and Hooper, after many scruples as to the legality of wearing Bishop's robes, was induced to accept the See of Gloucester. Acts were passed against images and paintings, statues and figures were to be removed from churches, and all service books except the Prayer Book to be destroyed. Along with other church property, many of the endowments at the Universities were seized, and lay proprietors appointed to livings without reference to their Bishops. However excellent in principle these changes may have been, the effect upon the morality of the country was disastrous. As we have already seen, the covetousness of the gentry was a marked characteristic of the time. The removal of religious restraints did not tend to lessen it. The destruction of the ecclesiastical courts and their discipline gave opportunity for much unbridled license. Licentiousness, murders and divorces are said to have been much increased. From the Universities the want of funds drove many of the poorer scholars, while among the wealthier young men who remained, the rapid destruction of objects which they had hitherto respected aroused the feeling of general irreverence. Parodies of the Mass, desecrations of the Sacrament, and the strongest language against the Catholics became common. Throughout the country the duties of the clergy were neglected. Lay patrons appointed themselves or some of their servants to livings. Even Bishops became large pluralists, absorbing the revenues of the parishes, and supplying the duties by means of some underpaid and ignorant monk or curate.

Rapid and disorderly advance of the Reformation.

At last the Council, in their zeal, determined to attack the Princess Mary. The step was a hazardous one; all the interests of the reactionary party, smarting under their wrongs, and tracing all the anarchy of the kingdom to the Reformers, were centred in her. The English relations with Germany rendered the time particularly critical. Ever since the spread of the Reformation, a General Council had been looked to as the solution of the religious difficulty. The Emperor's constant rivalry with France, by making him afraid to quarrel with his Protestant subjects, had long postponed it. The Peace of Cr  py afforded the desired opportunity. The Pope wished the Council to be held in Italy. The Emperor knew that, unless held in Germany, his Lutheran subjects would not submit to its decisions. Paul III. seized the opportunity which the Peace of Cr  py afforded, and called the Council at Trent (1545), thus keeping it in Italy, while he nominally gratified the Emperor's desire by placing it in the limits of the German Empire. Charles could not reject the Council, but he expected and prepared for a religious war. Nor were his expectations deceived. In the summer of 1546, the Princes of the League of Smalkald, the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse, appeared at the head of an army far superior to the Emperor's. He contrived to detach Maurice of Saxony from the Protestant cause; and though the Pope was indignant at this step, which deprived the war of its religious character and rendered it political, the Emperor justified it by the destruction of the Protestant army at M  hlberg in 1547, and the capture of both the Elector and the Landgrave. Thus, master of the situation, he summoned a Diet at Augsburg, and, in anger at the Pope's refusal to restore to its meeting-place at Trent the Council which had removed to Bologna, he established a compromise called the Interim. By this, Catholic doctrine was in the main restored, but certain points were left open till the Council, freed from the Pope's influence, should settle them. These were the restitution of Church property, the marriage of the clergy, and Communion in both kinds. This compromise was not well received on either side, and the free towns of Germany, especially Magdeburg, held out against it. But the death of the energetic Paul III. in 1550, and the election in his place, under the title of Julius III., of Cardinal del Monti, a very weak prelate, still further increased Charles's power, and rendered the suppression of the Protestants in Germany and a Holy War against England very probable.

This was the time selected by the Council for their insults to the Princess Mary. They insisted upon her giving up the use of the Mass. This she refused entirely to do, and placed herself under the protection of Charles. He took up her cause with warmth, and war seemed inevitable. But the completeness of his triumph, which induced him to issue persecuting laws of the most stringent description against the Protestants of the Low Countries, and to form a plan for rendering the Empire hereditary, excited the jealousy of France. In that country the party of the Guises, which made the re-establishment of the Catholic Church its chief object, was very hostile to England. But Henry II. and Montmorency, his minister, now adopted the policy of Francis; and the English Lords of the Council contrived to make an alliance with France, with the stipulation for the marriage of Edward with a French Princess. With France as his enemy, again allied with the Turks, Charles found all his old difficulties arising round him; and when, seizing the opportunity, Maurice of Saxony deserted his cause, and marched with the troops of Protestant Germany so rapidly upon Innsbruck as nearly to capture the Emperor, danger from the side of Germany was removed. The Treaty of Passau, in 1552, completed Charles's discomfiture. After that he no longer attempted to struggle against the Reformation. The Confession of Augsburg was acknowledged, and the Landgrave and the Elector were freed.

It was, however, by no means the fault of the Council that the invasion of England did not take place. They had done their best to produce it by attacking the Princess Mary, just when Charles's power was greatest. It was thus plain that the government of the Council had been no improvement upon that of Somerset, that, on the contrary, their plans had been as unsuccessful, their dishonesty and peculation far greater,

III-timed attack on Princess
Mary.

European affairs prevent the interference of Charles.

Failure of the policy of the Council.
Somerset regains
influence.

their revolutionary tendencies still more marked, and their personal character and behaviour such that, in the place of popular love, they had won universal execration. Somerset had been gradually regaining influence, and was now thinking of re-establishing his former authority. The part he had been taking lately had been conciliatory. He had been supporting Gardiner's demand for liberation. He had united himself with the Arundels, and had held somewhat aloof from the chief Reformers. His plans were betrayed and much exaggerated by Sir Thomas Palmer, who gave a false account of a plot to kill Warwick and Northampton at a banquet. The King, who was much in Warwick's power, inclined to support him because of his affected religious zeal. In October, the chiefs of Warwick's party were all raised in the peerage. He himself became Duke of Northumberland, Paulet, Earl of Wiltshire, became Marquis of Winchester, Sir William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, and Lord Dorset Duke of Suffolk. Somerset at once suspected that he had been betrayed; unable to gain certain information on this head, he ventured to a meeting of the Privy Council. He was apprehended and sent to the Tower, with his wife, the Arundels, Paget, and others. He was accused of aiming at the life of Northumberland, and of having collected men for the purpose—this would have been treasonable by an Act of 3 & 4 Edward VI.,—also with having devised the death of the Lords of the Council, having intended to raise the City against them, and with having purposed to resist his arrest. On these three heads he was charged with felony. To intentions of overthrowing Northumberland he confessed. The charge of treason therefore was withdrawn. As the Tower axe was carried out of Westminster Hall, the vast sympathizing multitude believed that he was acquitted, and were wild with joy. The charges of felony, however, were pressed, and on them he was found guilty and condemned to death. The anger of the people was very great, and great precautions had to be taken to secure quiet at his execution. On the 22nd of January he was beheaded, dying calmly and nobly. The love of the people for him was very great, and those who were nearest the scaffold thrust eagerly forward to dip their handkerchiefs in his blood. The House of Commons, too, showed its disapprobation of the manner in which the trial had been conducted by enacting that no person should be convicted of treason except by the testimony of two witnesses, who were to be produced at the trial. For this act of independence Parliament was dissolved, and a new and carefully chosen one substituted. Somers-set's death still further increased the hatred with which Warwick was regarded, and added fresh strength to that reaction which was so soon to get an opportunity of showing itself.

His death
1552.

For the time, however, Northumberland thought himself all-powerful. Allied with France, sure that the Emperor could do him no injury, freed from his rival in the Council, he seemed to see his way even to higher things. It was possible that he might secure his influence for ever by a change in the late King's will. For Edward's health was now failing. He had always been of weakly constitution; the precocity of his mind, and the share in difficult public affairs which he had had to take, had not tended to strengthen him. His flight with Somerset to Windsor is said to have still further injured his lungs; it was now plain that he could not live long. On Henry VIII.'s death, of the direct descendants of Henry VII. there were three branches extant: (1) the children of Henry VIII., Edward, Mary and Elizabeth; (2) the descendants of his sister Margaret; (3) the descendants of his second sister Mary, who had married Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and had two daughters, Francis and Eleanor, the former of whom had married the Marquis of Dorset, now Duke of Suffolk, and had three daughters, the eldest of whom was Lady Jane Grey.¹ By Henry's will the Crown was to devolve, first, on his son Edward; second, upon his own heir, if he had any, by Catherine Parr or other Queen; third, on Mary; fourth, on Elizabeth; fifth, on the heirs of Lady Francis; sixth, on the heirs of Lady Eleanor;—the Scotch line being passed over entirely. Northumberland married his fourth son, Lord Guildford Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey; to the son of Herbert Lord Pembroke, her sister, Lady Catherine Grey, was betrothed. He contrived to persuade Edward, no doubt under pretext of upholding Protestantism, that he too had a right to devise the Crown, and in so doing to pass over his sisters Mary and Elizabeth, whose legitimacy had never been publicly declared, and to substitute the next heir in his father's will, Lady Jane Grey. The will, as it exists, is full of alterations and erasures. Edward's original plan was apparently to leave his kingdom to the male heirs springing from the late marriages or to his own, for he did not at first know that he was dying. This was afterwards changed so as to leave the kingdom to Lady Jane herself. Northumberland felt that his safety depended on carrying through this plan, and thus postponing the ascendancy of the reactionary party. As he was master of the resources of the country, and as he had the King in his power, he was enabled to insist upon the judges drawing out letters patent such as he desired, and on having the Great Seal attached. He was also able, either by fear or persuasion, to secure the signature of a large number of very important men—the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, peers and ministers, judges and merchants. Many of them signed unwillingly and under protest, and Cranmer was only induced to do so by the personal entreaty of the King. Mary heard of the plot against her, and communicated her situation to the Emperor; while the King sank rapidly, not without some natural suspicions of foul play, and Northumberland made rapid preparations for establishing the change of dynasty by force of arms. On the 6th of July the young King died.

Warwick, triumphant, aims at changing the succession.

¹ See page 355.

*The King's
death.*

Although Edward's reign had been a long minority, it is not to be supposed that the lofty views of royalty which the two preceding Kings had introduced had in any way suffered. Somerset, popular though he was, had regarded himself as the representative of the Crown, and one prime cause of his fall was the absorption of all power into his own hands, and his disregard of the power of the Council. The young Edward always spoke and wrote as though his idea of royalty was as complete and as high as that of his father. All ecclesiastical changes in the reign had been carried out by lay authority. The complete supremacy and unity of the State lay at the bottom of all the transactions of the reign. But this centralized power had been employed, not as in the reign of Henry VIII. in harmony with the general wishes of the nation, but to the furtherance of the view of one section of the people only. Calvinistic doctrines had assumed the place of the earlier and more orthodox creeds. Forty-two Articles, entirely in that direction, had been promulgated; the English Liturgy had been revised and altered in a Calvinistic sense; the Bishops who had clung to the older doctrines had been removed and imprisoned, and their places occupied by Calvinists; and England had become a refuge for the persecuted Reformers of other lands, who crowded to the country for security. But now the circumstances of the succession were producing a crisis. If Northumberland's plan was allowed to succeed, the triumph of the Reforming party was secured. There was no longer any hope for those who still inclined towards the old doctrine. But with the bulk of the nation, especially with the nobility and members of the Council, the political change wrought by Henry VIII. was the real point of interest; there was no wish for a further advance in the reformation of doctrine. The general desire of the people was to restore as far as possible the state of affairs during the later years of Henry. The chance of attaining this end seemed to depend on the preservation on the throne of his legitimate descendants. To this must be added the constant preference which the English have shown for a regular succession, and a natural dislike that the will of the King, unauthorized by Parliament, should set aside a settlement which had the sanction of the national representation. The project of Northumberland then was beset with difficulties, and if carried out would have been forced upon an unwilling nation.

MARY.

1553—1558.

Born 1515 = Philip II.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Germany.	Spain.
Mary, 1542.	Henry II., 1547.	Charles V., 1519.	Charles V., 1516. Philip II., 1556.

POPES.—Julius III., 1550. Marcellus II., 1555. Paul IV., 1555.

Archbishops.	Chancellors.
Thomas Craumer, 1533. Reginald Pole, 1556.	Stephen Gardiner, 1553. Nicholas Heath, 1556.

IN order to secure the completion of his plot, Northumberland kept the King's death a secret for some days. It was of paramount importance to him that Mary should be in his power, and soldiers were at once sent to Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, where she then was, to bring her to London. But her secret friends had given her instant information of the King's death, and she had taken flight and ridden to Keninghall on the Waveney. This castle belonged to the Howards, among whom she was in safety, while its proximity to the sea offered her an easy means of escape to the dominions of her cousin, Charles V., should flight be necessary. Meanwhile Lady Jane Grey was called before the Council at Sion House, and was there told that Edward was dead, and that she was appointed to succeed him. Young as she was, she had acquired an unusual amount of learning—Greek, Latin and Hebrew were among her accomplishments. Her letters show a remarkable degree of sense, and give us a picture of a gentle, thoughtful, pure and pious nature. To such a character the sudden news was a great shock. Understanding, however, that her right was a true one, she bravely and calmly accepted the position. She was proclaimed in London on the 10th of July, but the people could not hide from themselves that she was a creature of Northumberland's, whose real plan was to take advantage of the doubt as to whether a female sovereign was allowed in England, and get his son Lord Guildford Dudley crowned and made King. The hatred of the people for this nobleman was intense. His high-handed proceedings and absolute want of success had together secured him perfect unpopularity. People loved to speak of him as "the rugged bear," in allusion to his armorial bearings. The proclamation was therefore heard in silence, and the audience thought what an apprentice, Gilbert Potter, was brave enough to say: "Lady Mary has the better title;"—the pillory was his reward.

1553]

LADY JANE GREY

445

A force under the Earl of Warwick, Northumberland's eldest son, and another of the Dudleys, had been sent to fetch the Princess Mary, and a fleet was despatched to watch for her upon the coast. She had written to the Lords of the Council claiming the Crown, and had been told in reply to submit and behave as a good subject. Such was, however, by no means her temper. From Keninghall she moved to Framlingham, another stronghold of the Howards, and there began to gather round her the members of the older nobility, and those gentlemen whose Catholic tendencies had kept them in disgrace during the last reign. Lord Bath and Lord Sussex had joined her, Lord Mordaunt and Lord Wharton had sent their sons, and Lord Derby, the most powerful of the old Lords, had risen for her in Cheshire. Even Carew had proclaimed her in Devonshire. Warwick's attempt to seize Mary was quite unsuccessful; his own men declared against him.

It was plain that the opposition to Queen Jane would be a very strong one. In fact the heart of the nation was with Mary. Not caring for subtleties of ecclesiastical law, the nation recognized in her a true descendant of Henry VIII., and, sick of the anarchical and revolutionary government of Northumberland and his colleagues, longed for the order which would restore England to its proper condition—the only hope of which seemed to lie in a reaction. Hatred of Northumberland, and a preference for more national and patriotic views than his, had sown dissension in the Council itself; Winchester and Arundel were the secret friends of Mary. And thus, when it became necessary to collect troops to be sent into Norfolk to remedy Warwick's want of success, and when at the Queen's entreaty, Suffolk, her father, was left at home, and the troops were entrusted to Northumberland in person, Winchester and Arundel took care that they should consist largely of their own retainers, who had received orders to turn traitors. The Duke secured a commission under the Great Seal to authorize his proceedings, and set out to meet his army at Newmarket. But his army refused to fight against Queen Mary, and he had to fall back to Cambridge. The fleet, too, had declared for her on the coast, and most of the Council¹ who were left in London, finding means to slip from the Tower where they had met, but where they felt under restraint, proclaimed Mary Queen. This act was received with demonstrations of delight, very different from the silence which had greeted Queen Jane's proclamation.

The nation rallies round Mary.

Northumberland falls in Norfolk.

Paget and Arundel were at once despatched to make submission to Mary, and Arundel passed on to Cambridge, and there apprehended Northumberland, who humbly prayed him to be "good to him for the love of God, and to consider that he had done nothing but by the will of the Council."

Mary thus found herself Queen, contrary to the expectations even of her own friends at the Spanish Embassy. But the Queen's own views went much beyond those of the majority of her supporters. She looked not only to a restoration of the system of her father, but to a complete reconciliation with the Roman Church. Her position did not allow her at once to proceed to this extremity. The introduction of Bonner to the Council, and the appointment of Gardiner to the office of Chancellor, had indeed secured her strong partisans in the Government, but she could not yet dispense with that lay and national party which had raised her to the throne, while even Renard, the Ambassador of Charles, at whose advice she was forced to act, for political reasons employed himself in restraining her ardour. The political situation of Europe was critical, the rivalry between Charles and France was again at its height, and on the death of Edward there appeared a chance that England might be secured by one side or the other. Mary naturally inclined towards Charles, while Northumberland was so closely connected with the Court of France, that he had sent for help to that country to establish Lady Jane Grey. England was in fact at present the stake for which the two parties were playing. The ambassadors of the rival powers, Renard and Noailles, were therefore of great importance and the centres of all intrigue.

Now, to Simon Renard the restoration of England to Roman Catholicism was of secondary importance, except so far as it tended to throw the country upon the Spanish side of the great European contest. At the same time he was conscious that the nation as a whole did not desire reunion with Rome, especially as reconciliation probably implied repentance, and repentance restitution, and the restitution of the abbey lands was scarcely to be thought of. Any measure tending in that direction seemed for the time impossible. But while for these reasons the ambassador checked the Queen's eagerness, he was constantly urging her to severity to secure her position, which was so necessary for Charles's interests. The traitors who had tried to displace her should be executed at once, and with them all those whose claims were likely to be inconvenient—the Lady Jane, Lord Guildford Dudley, and even the Princess Elizabeth.

¹ Winchester, Arundel, Pembroke, Shrewsbury, Bedford, Cheyne, Paget, Mason, and Petre.

Though Renard's lukewarmness and political advice prevented Mary from at once restoring England to the Papacy, she proceeded rapidly to restore the old Church within the limits of her kingdom. She replaced the Bishops who had been deprived in the last reign, and sanctioned the restoration of the Mass—a measure which, except in the large towns, met with willing acceptance. The Protestant preachers and the foreign Protestants of note who were resident in England were either driven from the country by strong hints as to the danger of remaining, or summoned to London and imprisoned. Among these were Cranmer and Latimer, both of whom refused to leave the country. In August she went a step further, and although the law authorizing it had not been repealed,¹ refused to recognize the marriage of the clergy. A commission, consisting of Bonner, Gardiner, Day and Tunstall, proceeded to purify the bench of married Bishops. By this means, or on charges of treason, ten Bishops were got rid of.

Gradual restoration of the Roman Church.

The ease with which these changes were completed was perhaps partly due to the contemptible conduct of Northumberland. With the closest of his friends, his son the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Northampton, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gaseses and Sir Thomas Palmer, he was tried and convicted of high treason, and on the 22d of August Gates and Palmer were executed. Northumberland's meanness followed him to his death. The day before his execution he and the other prisoners consented to hear Mass, and some of the more important citizens were summoned to see the edifying spectacle. The execution had been expected on that day, "and the headsman was ready, when suddenly they were commanded to depart. At the same time after, was sent for my Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and chiefest of the crafts of London and divers of the Council, and there was said Mass before the Duke and the rest of the prisoners." Nor was this recantation enough. It had to be repeated, perhaps under false hopes of pardon, on the scaffold itself, where the apostate declared himself to have been in reality always a Catholic. Thus, with a lie upon his lips, he passed from the world, perhaps the worst and most simply selfish statesman who had ever ruled England.

¹ Mary's excuse for such illegal action was the position which she held that the Acts passed during the minority of Edward were void.

But while Renard advised Mary as a politician, her conscience was assailed by the repeated instances of Cardinal Pole, son of Margaret Plantagenet, the Duke of Clarence's daughter. He had been abroad when Henry VIII. abolished the authority of the Pope in England, and, refusing to return when summoned, had been proclaimed a traitor and attainted. Since that time he had devoted himself wholly to the interests of the Roman See. The conspiracy of his brothers in England (in 1538) had destroyed any hopes of his return. He had been one of the Presidents of the Council of Trent, and had incessantly planned and intrigued with all his energy for the restoration of the Papal authority in England. On the accession of Mary he seemed on the point of seeing his hopes realized, and, wholly regardless of the political crisis, constantly insisted upon the immediate reconciliation of the kingdom with Rome. But the Emperor could not afford to risk his influence in England, or to suffer his plans to be destroyed by the inconsiderate haste of the eager Churchman. Much against his will, Pole was compelled to postpone his triumph, while Charles tried more politic measures to attach England to himself. With this object Renard had been instructed to suggest to Mary that Philip, Charles's heir, would be a desirable match for her. The suggestion had been so well received that the Queen was herself willing for a time to lay some restraint upon her religious zeal. The ambassador had shown her Philip's portrait, and her solitary and forlorn heart had been seized with an overpowering passion for him, so that before everything, before even the re-establishment of orthodoxy, she desired this marriage to be arranged. Anything which could in any way prevent it was studiously to be avoided. As Pole's return and the accompanying restitution of the Abbey lands would be most distasteful to her subjects, and risk the failure of the marriage she had so much at heart, the Queen felt that it must be for the present postponed. Still the reconciliation was postponed only; every care was taken to render it at some future time possible and easy. She cleared the way for Pole's future reception by getting her first Parliament, which assembled for a brief session early in October, to pass an Act repealing all treasons except those mentioned in the Statute of Edward III. (exempting from it however all who had been arrested before the end of the preceding month), and offences falling within the case of Præmunire. More than this she could not venture to do. She was obliged to allow the Parliament during its second session, later in the year, to declare her legitimate, thus acknowledging the competency of previous Parliaments which had declared the contrary. She even suffered the same Parliament to restore the Church to the position it had occupied on her father's death, and to accept the title of Supreme Head of the Church, though she evidently thus trenched upon the prerogative of the Roman See.

Proposed marriage with Philip.

Extreme care was indeed necessary to avoid all fresh causes of unpopularity, for the idea of the Spanish marriage, implying as it did a close connection with the Roman Catholic powers of Europe, and the probability that it would draw England into the whirlpool of rivalry between France and Spain, had excited great anger. The Commons petitioned the Queen strongly against it, but were met with a peremptory rebuff. Her conduct to her sister also gave deep offence. The Act which had declared her legitimate had not removed the stain of illegitimacy from Elizabeth. Mary had still further shown her feelings by refusing to acknowledge Elizabeth as her heir. Lady Lennox, the daughter of Margaret of Scotland, had even been allowed to take precedence of her. The Protestants, and a large proportion of the national party, thought they saw in these two things—the marriage and her treatment of the Princess—a threat of a reactionary policy so violent as to be intolerable. They determined to take arms. The conclusion of the treaty of marriage and the arrival of Count Egmont, who was to represent the Spanish Prince at the forthcoming marriage ceremony, brought matters to a crisis. There was to be a concerted rising in Devonshire, on the borders of Wales, in the Midland counties, and in Kent. The management of these was intrusted to Sir Peter Carew, Sir James Crofts, Suffolk and Wyatt respectively. Courtenay and Elizabeth were, if possible, to be married and placed upon the throne. This young man, son of the Marquis of Exeter beheaded in the Pole conspiracy in 1539, had since that time been a prisoner in the Tower, and was thus, as was natural, ignorant of the ways of the world, and ill-fitted for a conspirator. He was in fact a silly, vain lad, who by his folly allowed Gardiner to Unpopularity of the marriage.

Consequent risings in different parts of the country. 1554.

obtain full information of the plot. Carew, summoned to London, was driven to a premature rising, and upon his immediate failure was compelled to fly to France. This drove Wyatt into arms, while Suffolk hurried off to raise the Midland counties (Jan. 1554). He could there do little more than issue proclamations in Leicester and several other places against the Spanish marriage. He found but little sympathy, and, being compelled to hide, sought safety in a hollow oak in his own park at Astley, where he was betrayed by his keeper. Wyatt meanwhile had advanced towards Rochester, having with him a considerable body of the men of Kent. He procured cannon from the Queen's ships in the river, and was ready with a fairly equipped army before any troops had been sent against him. Indeed the Council threw great obstacles in the Queen's way, having but little favour themselves for the Spanish marriage. Five hundred Londoners were however placed under the command of Norfolk, and marched towards Rochester. The Duke, persuaded by the treacherous advice of Sir George Hopper, advanced directly upon Wyatt. In presence of the insurgents the Londoners immediately changed sides, with their commander, Brett, at their head. Thus supplied with cannon, Wyatt advanced to Dartford with a considerable force, trusting chiefly to the disaffection in London, a proof of which he had so lately seen. The crisis was becoming very dangerous. Even Renard began to think that the marriage must Courage of the Queen.

be given up. But the energy of the Tudor Queen rose with the difficulty. She contrived to gain some time by a futile negotiation with Wyatt. In his answer he demanded the custody of the Queen's person and the Tower of London. Armed with these arrogant demands, the Queen threw herself upon the good feeling of the Londoners. She rode in person to Guildhall, and there addressed them in a spirit-stirring speech, declaring that she would never marry except with leave of Parliament. Her bravery won the hearts of her audience. 25,000 men were enrolled the next day (Feb. 3), and before Wyatt reached London Bridge the City was prepared, under the command of the Admiral Lord William Howard, and the bridge impassable. Wyatt's opportunity was gone. Had Suffolk been able to second him things might still have gone well, but he was already a captive. To reach London Wyatt had now to go up the river as far as Kingston, to bring his troops across in boats. Time, which was enabling the Queen's party to strengthen and organize their defence, had already begun to thin his ranks. With such forces as he had he marched along what is now Piccadilly, coming down the river from Kingston. Delays occurred upon the way, and his army was broken and worn out as it approached Hyde Park Corner. It was there cut in half by a charge of cavalry. Wyatt continued to advance with the leading portion; the other half dispersed. He went down in front of St. James's Palace, and so on to Charing Cross. The guard, with whom was Courtenay, broke and fled, and Whitehall, where the Queen was watching the fortunes of the day, was in great danger. Wyatt however passed on up the Strand; the troops opened to let him pass, and he reached Ludgate. This was the end of his march. His troops were scattered and had fallen from him, and he found himself with twenty-four men only. He fought back as far as Temple Bar, but there surrendered to Sir Maurice Berkeley, and his insurrection was at an end (Feb. 3).

The failure of Wyatt's insurrection sealed the fate of the prisoners in the Tower. The Queen had hitherto been mercifully inclined; she was now ready to listen to the constant advice of Gardiner and of Renard, and to rid herself of her late rival, perhaps even of her sister Elizabeth. On the 12th of February Lord Guildford Dudley was executed on Tower Hill. His young wife saw him led forth, and saw his remains brought back, and then went calmly out to suffer death herself upon the scaffold on the green within the Tower. She said briefly that she had been wrong in taking the Crown, but was guiltless in intention, and then with perfect calmness got ready for the fatal stroke. Fakenham, the Queen's confessor, had been in vain trying to shake her Protestant faith. She was even able to write a beautiful letter to strengthen her father, and thus, at the age of seventeen, passed away—a remarkable instance of precocious talent wedded to a most pure and high-minded disposition. "On that same day was made," says a contemporary diarist, "at every gate in London a new pair of gallows—two pair in Cheapside, two pair in Fleet Street, one pair in Holborn," and so on; and he continues his catalogue of the numbers hanged on each, in all some forty-eight. Stowe says that eighty were hanged in London, and twenty-two in Kent. On the 23rd the Duke of Suffolk suffered.

Thus, then, the Queen's rivals, the Greys, were disposed of, and Gardiner believed that her sister, her more formidable rival, was also within her grasp. A copy of a letter of hers had been found among some treasonable correspondence with France, and it was hoped that Wyatt might be induced by torture to implicate her in some way or other in the conspiracy. When, just before the insurrection, she had been sent for to London, she had

Execution of
Lady Jane Grey
and others.
Feb. 12.

Imprisonment
of Princess
Elizabeth.

pleaded ill-health. She was now peremptorily ordered to appear there, and ill as she was, she was brought by Lord William Howard, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, to London by easy journeys. But although every measure was taken to induce Wyatt to accuse her, and although some little evidence was gained, the Court could not venture beyond sending her to the Tower; and even in doing this, Gardiner was strongly opposed by Paget, Sussex, Hastings and others. They knew what was likely to be the end of such a committal. But Elizabeth formed a sort of centre round which was gathered the liberal part of the nation. The same division of parties as existed in England generally, existed also in the Council, and the best statesmen in that body—Paget, Sussex, Lord William Howard, Winchester, and Hastings—although Catholics, and so far reactionary as to wish to undo the revolutionary measures of the last reign, were yet in distinct opposition to Gardiner, who, with Petre, Rochester, and others, was desirous not only of establishing the Roman Catholic religion, but of establishing it by means of persecution. The moderate party, and among them chiefly Lord William Howard, whose influence as Admiral was very great, rendered it impossible to persecute Elizabeth further. The judges, too, declared that there was no case against her, and thus, in spite of the protests of Gardiner and of Renard, she was at length allowed to retire to Woodstock.

As Wyatt's witness was no longer of use, he was executed, denying with his last breath any accusation he might have made against the Princess. The liberal party of the Council were not alone in thinking that vengeance had gone far enough. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, the next of the prisoners to be tried, was, after a brilliant defence of himself, acquitted. The jury which acquitted him was at once imprisoned, but the Court had learnt the lesson intended, and the remaining important prisoners escaped with their lives.

The failure of Wyatt's insurrection against the Spanish marriage of course removed all opposition to it, and in the second Parliament of the reign, which was summoned in April, the Bill necessary for the marriage was passed. Gardiner's next step, however, met with less success. He insisted upon introducing three Bills for the persecution of heretics. These were defeated with great difficulty by Paget in the Upper House, and the dispute between the different sections of the Council ran so high that an outbreak seemed imminent. Mary's mind had meanwhile begun to be shaken by the wild craving which possessed her for a marriage with Philip. Renard had but to threaten that the Prince would not come, to obtain anything he desired. At last, however (in July), with great precautions against danger from the unruly populace, Philip actually came,—to find a wife much older than himself, without charm of any kind, whose importunate love was soon to become most irksome to him.

Second Parliament authorizes the Spanish marriage.

The first of the Queen's desires was for a time fulfilled; the second, for the restoration of the Papal power in England, was yet incomplete. Charles's opposition to Pole's return was withdrawn now that his influence in England appeared to be secured by his son's marriage; and the Queen, after a lavish expenditure of money among the chief statesmen opposed to her wishes, found it possible to advance towards the completion of her great hope. The Pope was induced so far to relax his claims as to give Pole full power to make what terms he could; and a new Parliament, elected expressly for the occasion, not without a plentiful exertion of Court influence,¹ was summoned in November. Pole's attainder was at once repealed, and the Legate, though at first in the character only of ambassador, ventured to England. At Rochester, however, he was informed that he might assume his Legatine authority, and his barge swept up (Nov. 24) with the full tide to Whitehall, with the silver cross displayed at its bow. He was received with every sign of extravagant welcome by the King and Queen. Four days afterwards, both the Houses of Parliament were summoned to Whitehall to hear an address from the Legate. In this he pointed out the merciful dealings of God with the nation in giving it a faithful Queen, and marrying her to a faithful King. He explained that he regarded himself as holding the keys—keys which could admit men to Heaven, and desired the nation to consider whether it would make use of them or not. When the House met after this address, it accepted the reconciliation offered, with one dissentient voice. On St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) the Houses assembled again at Whitehall, and received upon their knees absolution from the Legate. They then passed enthusiastically to the chapel in the palace, and joined in a Te Deum. The reconciliation, however, was after all a compromise. The possession of property of all sorts was held to rest on the statutes of the realm, and could be called in question only in lay courts,² and any one who should on any pretence of spiritual jurisdiction molest the holders of such land was to undergo the indefinite danger of the Præmunire. Every precaution was taken to exclude Philip as far as possible from exercising the royal power; he was declared Regent only till his child, who was now surely expected, should be of age, and only as long as he continued in the realm. With this limited success the Court party was forced to be contented.

In spite of difficulties, England accepts the Papal absolution.

¹ Influential persons were required to try and secure the election of "such as were catholic, wise, grave and Catholic sort, such as indeed meant the true honour of God."

² 1 & 2 Philip and Mary, ch. viii.

But the restored power of the Church at once made itself felt. The persecuting statutes of Henry IV. and Henry V., which had been previously rejected, were now re-enacted; and Gardiner, backed by the power of the Legate, and acting in accordance with the law, could at once proceed to the violent measures for which he was anxious. Pole issued orders for the reception of confessions and the issue of absolutions. Of these a register was to be kept, which virtually amounted to a black-book of heretics. On the very day of the appearance of these orders, Gardiner, Bonner, Tunstall, and other Bishops, were at work at St. Mary Overy's. Hooper and Rogers were their first victims. They were ordered to submit, and upon declining, were condemned to death. On the 4th of February, Rogers—parting as he went with his wife and nine children, and received with cheers of approbation by the onlookers—was led to the fire at Smithfield. The same night Hooper was taken to Gloucester, where his liberality had much endeared him, and suffered there. The same day and the day before, died Rowland Taylor and Laurence Sandars. This triumph of clerical revenge was very far from what the people had desired. The popular excitement did not escape the Spanish Ambassador, and, impressing Philip with the political necessities of his position, he compelled him, by the mouth of his chaplain, Alfonso a Castro, to denounce the persecution and disclaim all share in it. The effect, indeed, was such upon the people generally that a revolution seemed imminent, and Philip himself was thinking of throwing up the game and leaving the country. He was persuaded to remain till the succession had been arranged, and to bring about, if possible, a marriage between Elizabeth and Philibert of Savoy, who was wholly in the Spanish interest. The persecution, meanwhile, checked for a short time by Alfonso's sermon, was speedily renewed. Early in March, eight more victims were burnt; in all, sixteen before the end of April. The Queen was then preparing seriously for her confinement. She gave back to the Pope such abbey lands as she possessed to make her peace with God, and retired to Hampton Court, while priests and bishops sang prayers about the statutes re-enacted and put in force.

Persecuting
Jan. 1555.

London streets.¹ Circulars even were written announcing the happy event. But the happy event did not come. Yet much hung on it;—in England the peaceful acceptance of Spanish influence, and abroad that consequent preponderance of the Imperial power which would produce European peace, which would in its turn enable Philip and Mary to carry out their Catholic views in England. All this was dependent upon the birth of an heir to the throne. But the child did not come; and almost worse than that, two Popes died within a few weeks of each other, and in May, Marcellus was succeeded, under the title of Paul IV., by Cardinal Caraffa, the deadly enemy of Pole, and the close friend of the French. Conscience-stricken for her too great leniency, Mary issued a letter exciting the Bishops to greater energy. Fifty new victims were the consequence. The effect was not what the Queen hoped; and the Spaniards, throwing up all hope that Philip would rule England as Regent to his son, threw the whole of their influence into the intended match between Elizabeth and Philibert, hoping thereby at least to secure a secondary interest in affairs. Philip found it no longer necessary to remain with his unloved wife. He was wanted too elsewhere; and in August he left England—having taken the opportunity of setting himself right with the Princess—
Philip leaves England.

The Queen is disappointed of an heir.

and went to receive the dominion which his great father, Charles V., was now abdicating. It is uncertain what his plans with regard to England were, but there is some evidence to show that arms were to establish that Spanish influence which had not come through his marriage. His departure left the Queen miserable, and almost mad. She roamed wildly about her palace, and sat grovelling on the floor in the twilight, with her knees drawn up to her face. She betook herself to the gloomy satisfaction of religious persecution, and in the three dioceses of Canterbury, Rochester and London there was but little cessation of sacrifices at the stake. Among others Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer, imprisoned since the beginning of the reign, were now to be dealt with. Commissioners were sent to Oxford to try them. There was this difficulty in the way of Cranmer's condemnation, that he had received the pall from the Pope. He refused, too, to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the commissioners, asserting that the Papal authority was forbidden by old English law. At the close of the proceedings, he was cited to appear at

Renewed persecution. Trial and death of Ridley and Latimer.
Sept. 7.

¹ These exhibitions were not without their drawbacks. On one occasion Machyn tells how a "frantyk man cam and hangyd about a preest vj podynges."—MACHYN, p. 65.

Rome within eighty days, and then recommitted to his prison. A few days after, Ridley and Latimer were also tried in the Divinity Schools at Oxford. Latimer exhibited the quaint simplicity which marked his character. The old man appeared, leaning on his staff, in a threadbare gown of Bristol frieze; a handkerchief and night-cap were upon his head, and over those a burgher's cap, with broad ear-flaps. To his leathern waistband hung his Bible, and his spectacles hung by a string about his neck. The test question was applied to him with regard to the Sacrament. He could but simply answer that bread was bread, and wine was wine. Both he and Ridley were condemned to death. On the 16th of October they were brought out—passing the prison where Cranmer was still living—to the stake erected at the bottom of St. Giles's; Ridley, neatly and trimly clothed like a gentleman, with a furred black gown, and furred tippet around his neck, and Latimer, quaint as ever, clothed beneath his cloak with a new shroud. They were chained back to back to the same stake—a friend hung powder round the neck of each; the faggots were lighted. "Play the man Master Ridley," said Latimer, "we shall this day light such a candle in England as by the grace of God shall never be put out." The death of Latimer was almost instantaneous. His companion lingered longer; but at length some friend stirred the faggots at his feet, the flames shot up and caught the powder, and he died. The less-known martyrs suffered even more terribly; some at least were starved to death in the prison where they were confined.

The Archbishop's fate was rapidly approaching; but he outlived his unrelenting enemy, Gardiner, who died almost immediately after the meeting of Parliament in October—a Parliament which would only grant a subsidy under the pledge that none of it should go to Philip, and which, though it allowed the Queen to divest herself of the first-fruits, refused to suffer them to be paid to the Pope. A Parliament so little obsequious to the Crown was speedily dissolved. In December Cranmer's cause had been tried at Rome, and sentence had been passed against him in his enforced absence. In February 1556 he was degraded from his office by Thirlby and Bonner, who were intrusted with the completion of the sentence. His life was spared a little, and he was induced to write several letters of submission and humiliating confession. This was held to be a deathblow to the cause of the Reformation, and it was thought that, as that blow had been struck, there was no further object in sparing Cranmer's life. But the persecutors outwitted themselves.

Confession and
death of Cranmer.
March 21.

On the 21st of March he was to be executed, and to put the final stroke to his humiliation by a great public confession. It was rainy, and the sermon and recantation were held in St. Mary's Church. Cole, the Provost of Eton, preached to him, or rather on him, and concluded by an appeal to him to fulfil his promise, and to declare his confession of faith. The Archbishop knelt in prayer, addressed a few words of wise advice against the sins of the time; and then, to the astonishment of his hearers, when he passed to his confession of faith, declared that the letters which he had lately written were contrary to his true belief, vowed that the hand that had written them should first be burned, and closed by saying, "As for the Pope, I utterly refuse him as Christ's enemy, and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine; and as for the Sacrament, I believe as I have taught in my book against the Bishop of Winchester." He was hustled off to the stake and burnt, fulfilling his promise that his right hand should be the first to feel the fire.

Three days before this execution, a number of young gentlemen were carried to the Tower, among them John Throgmorton and Sir Harry Peckham; and a few days after a proclamation appeared declaring Sir Harry Dudley, Christopher Aston, the two Tremaynes, and divers others, traitors. The feelings of the nation had been deeply stirred by the cruelty of the persecutions. Among younger men especially were found many who saw in the present reaction a death-blow to all their noblest hopes and aspirations. The younger part of England believed even then in progress, and regarded Elizabeth—child of the Protestant upstart Anne Boleyn—as its representative. Their plans had ripened during the session of Parliament; and now, when the time for their fulfilment was close at hand, were suddenly exploded. Sir Harry Dudley, one of the Duke of Northumberland's family, appears to have been at the bottom of the plot, and it is his name that it generally bears. In its details the scheme of Dudley and his young friends—for nearly all of them were young—was very like Wyatt's and the Duke of Suffolk's. The hope of its success rested chiefly on assistance from France. In Paris Throgmorton had been intriguing, and thither Sir Harry Dudley himself went to intrigue. French ships, armed by means of French money, and manned by discontented Englishmen, who were now very plentiful in France, were to seize the Isle of Wight, which Uvedale, the Captain of the island, had arranged to surrender to them. Thence Portsmouth was to be attacked, and secured without bloodshed, for there was a friendly party within. The possession of this port was to secure the insurrection of conspiracy.

The Dudley
April 3.

the whole South-east of England. Meanwhile troops from Wales and the West were to march towards the capital. The balance between Spain and France on the Continent was at this time so uncertain, that Henry II. of France was not inclined either strongly to assist or wholly to discourage the conspirators. A midnight meeting was held in Paris, and assistance promised them. But this was too ostentatious a manner of conspiring not to reach the ears of Wotton, the English Ambassador; information was at once sent to England. An intended robbery of the Treasury, to the amount of £50,000, which was to supply the fund for the expedition, was also betrayed. The effect was the immediate apprehension of such of the chiefs of the conspiracy as were to be found in England, while the rest were proclaimed traitors. No mercy was shown to the offenders; neither rack nor gallows was spared, but, though some of the conspirators turned King's evidence, Throgmorton, whose knowledge was the most extensive, bore bravely up against the torture.

This conspiracy was followed by an increased vigour of persecution.

Renewed
persecution.

The diary of Machyn, a citizen of London, is little else than a dismal list of poor wretches brought to the stake, or criminals hanged wholesale; for the restoration of Church discipline seems to have had no effect upon the morals of the country. The Government had fallen into the hands of a few of the Queen's particular friends—as Rochester, Englefield and Jernyngham. The Lords of the Council, and real statesmen of England, held aloof from the wretched tyranny. The exiled gentlemen sought refuge in France, and were there welcomed by the King, from whom the complaints of Mary could obtain nothing but the most transparently false disavowal of all intentions to assist them. The very ships which were said to be sent to suppress the rovers—for the exiles had

Many young Englishmen fly to France.

taken to privateering—really acted as their consorts. They preyed chiefly on the trade of Spain, between which power and France war was again imminent, and whose interests were identical with Mary's. These young gentlemen had a sort of chivalrous worship of the Princess Elizabeth. On her the eyes of the younger and more stirring part of the people had been fixed throughout the reign, and now, amid the general wretchedness, all parties, except the extreme Catholics, fixed their hopes on her. The younger men conspired, and lost the national confidence by seeking the aid of France; the wise old statesmen, who saw in her something of her father's love of order, were content to wait till a few years should of necessity close the Queen's life, for her health was quite broken; she was a prey to the dropsy, and the absence of her husband tended to increase her misery.

The French support of the English exiles was not wholly politic. For some little time there had been a truce between the French nation and Spain. But Caraffa, Paul IV., was French in all his views; he was anxious too to expel the Spaniards from Naples, and was constantly urging Henry II. to break the truce. He had now induced him to do so, and it would have been prudent to have allowed the English to hold aloof from the war, as was their anxious wish. Henry's injudicious support of the exiles did for Philip what he never could have done for himself. The Spanish King had brought himself to revisit the country and the wife he detested, for the purpose of embroiling England in his continental quarrels. This was contrary to the treaty of marriage between himself and Mary, and his visit had proved useless. But the assistance given by Henry to a wild expedition to the North of England headed by Sir Thomas Stafford, the grandson of the Duke of Buckingham whom Henry VIII. had beheaded, forced the nation into war. Stafford landed with thirty Englishmen and one Frenchman at Scarborough, but was France supports them.

1557.

Consequent war.

shortly taken prisoner, with the whole of his followers, who, with the exception of one, were put to death. War with France was declared. As this war was chiefly in the Pope's interests, the bulk of the French army was poured into Italy under the Duke of Guise. It was there destroyed by disease, and the Pope had to make his submission to Alva, Philip's lieutenant. But the absence of the French army in the South had given Philip an opportunity, of which he had taken advantage, of striking a blow from the Netherlands. His army, under Philibert of Savoy, had advanced to St. Quentin, the garrison of which was reinforced by Coligny, who then took the command. To relieve his nephew, and to save a city which barred the road to Paris, Montmorency collected what troops he could, and hurried northward. These troops consisted mainly of the reserves of the country, nobles and their feudal followers. The French suffered a disastrous defeat. Their loss was 4000 killed; and the Constable, Montmorency himself, and many other of the chief nobles of France were among the prisoners. The English were not present, though arriving on the ground soon enough to have a share in the ruthless pillage of the town. The Duke of Guise, irritated at his want of success in Italy, thought to gratify the French people and establish his popularity by winning back Calais, the

Battle of
St. Quentin.
Aug. 10, 1557.

defences of which had been much neglected, and which the French nation ardently desired to possess. The last reign had been one of great extravagance and waste, and Northumberland and his Council, in the midst of the financial pressure which was always

Loss of Calais.

weighing upon them in England, had neglected the supplies and the fortifications of Calais. Mary's reign had been less wasteful, but, as has been seen, she had felt it her duty to divest the Crown of a large portion of its revenue and to restore it to the Church. She too had therefore been obliged to be penurious. The Calais Pale comprised three forts—Calais itself, and the two outlying forts, Guisnes and Hammes. Of these, Guisnes was about three miles from Calais, connected by a line of fortresses; Hammes lay between the two. In these three places there were about sixteen or seventeen hundred men. Grey had a thousand of these at Guisnes, while Wentworth garrisoned Calais with some five hundred, not nearly enough to man the works thoroughly. The commanders knew well that an attack was intended. They wrote urgent letters to England for assistance, and it was resolved that they were too weak to move out of their strongholds till reinforced. Troops were hurriedly collected, and upon some rumour of the falseness of the previous report, as rapidly disbanded. Meanwhile an army of twenty thousand men was encamped at Boulogne, and thirty or forty vessels, with all the apparatus for a siege, were collected at Ambleteuse. On the 1st of January 1558, Calais, on the land side, was invested. The sea was still open, and the entrance to Calais harbour was covered by a castle on the Rysbank, the end of a line of sand mounds which fronted the sea. The other approaches to the sandhills were covered by a bulwark called the Sandgate and a fort called Newnham bridge. On the 2nd of January an attack on Newnham bridge was repulsed, but the Sandgate was captured. The country should have been put under water, but the sluices were out of order, and would have let the salt into the wells. So Wentworth wrote in haste for more assistance, but before he had well finished his letter the Rysbank was attacked from the sea and captured, and the defence of Calais was virtually over. Guisnes might perhaps have been saved, but extraordinary mismanagement prevented the reinforcements from being embarked. The Queen's ships were unseaworthy, and when a transport fleet was collected a storm scattered it; and when Philip of Spain replaced it with a fleet from the Low Countries, the army in despair had disbanded. So Guisnes went with Calais, and the English hold upon France was destroyed. The loss of Calais was a heavy blow to England and to Mary. The nation was for the moment roused; money was rapidly voted by Parliament or borrowed abroad; but the persecution, which still continued, had shaken the loyalty of England, and the musters which were collected could not be trusted. One brief success was won by the fleet, with which Clinton had a share in securing the victory for Count Egmont at the battle of Gravelines. But the feeling was growing both in France and Spain that it was time, if the march of Protestantism was to be checked, to put an end to their internecine struggle and to join in the suppression of heresy. The death of Charles V., the old enemy of France, rendered this the more easy. To the French indeed, if they could but retain Calais, a peace brought nothing but advantage, and they offered Philip peace almost on his own terms

*Negotiations for a European peace.
Sept. 1558.*

if he would throw over his allies. As he still had hopes of drawing England to his side by means of the friendship of Elizabeth, even if he could not join it to his kingdom by a marriage with that Princess, he refused to desert his allies, and in the midst of the negotiations the death which had been long threatening Mary came. She died on the 14th of November.

Death of Mary.

Three days afterwards she was followed to the grave by Pole, who, by an almost grotesque turn of fate, had been removed from his position as Legate a latere by the present Pope upon a charge of unsoundness of doctrine. Both he and Mary proved their orthodoxy to the end by vigorous persecution.

STATE OF SOCIETY.

1485-1558.

IN order rightly to appreciate Henry VIII.'s character, and to understand the position which he occupies in history, it is necessary to understand also the character of the period in which he lived. His greatness consisted in the manner in which he guided England through a period of revolution, and is enhanced when we contrast his reign with those of his immediate successors, nor is it till his daughter Elizabeth completed his work by following in his footsteps that we again see order re-established in the distracted kingdom. The period was one of revolution. It was revolutionary in all directions—in the constitution of the nation, in the social life of the nation, in the religion of the nation.

Throughout Europe the idea of the royal power had changed. The feudal notion of the king being a suzerain among peers had given place to a more modern conception of royalty, which regarded him as the arbitrary master—in some degree the proprietor—of the nation which he ruled. In England this idea found its complete expression first in Henry VII., whose notions of the royal prerogative were so high that the quaint tale is told of him, that he had his mastiffs killed for venturing to bait their royal master the lion:—"the like he did with an excellent falcon because he feared not hand and hand to match with an eagle, saying it was not meet for any subject to offer such wrong to his lord and superior." Personal government thus became the hereditary view of the Tudor sovereigns. Its establishment implied the destruction of feudalism, and of the power and prestige of the old feudal nobility. This change was much accelerated by the bloodshed of the Wars of the Roses. The heaviest part of the destruction wrought by them had fallen on the nobility. It is plain that, though they had

Revolutionary
character of the period.

Change in the character
of royalty.

assisted in checking the population, they had in so doing so increased the relation of the national resources to the number of its inhabitants, that the comfort and wellbeing of the bulk of the people was rather increased by them than injured, and, as far as the commonalty was concerned, England soon recovered itself. It was not so with the great houses. The diminution which they had undergone is made sufficiently obvious by the list of temporal Peers summoned to Henry VII.'s first Parliament, who were but twenty-seven in number.¹ They were further weakened by Henry's constant policy, which was directed to destroy the influence they gained from their numerous retainers. More than one statute in the reign was directed against the practice of keeping such followers, and Lord Bacon's story of the heavy fine inflicted upon the Earl of Oxford for his too great magnificence and too numerous household when he received the King is well known.

The growth and importance of wealth also tended to the decay of the old principle that gentry depended upon lineage. Of the nobility Sir Thomas Smith, in the reign of Edward VI., says

- ¹ Jasper Tudor, Duke of Bedford, King's uncle; title extinct 1497.
William Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel; title passed to Duke of Norfolk by marriage 1579.
John de Vere, Earl of Oxford; title extinct 1702.
Edmund Grey, Earl of Kent; title extinct 1740.
William Berkeley, Earl of Nottingham; title extinct 1492.
Edward Stafford, Earl of Wiltshire; title extinct in 1499.
Richard Woodville, Earl Rivers; title extinct in 1492.
Thomas Stanley, Earl of Derby.
William Herbert, Earl of Huntingdon; extinct 1486.
Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devon.
Ralph Graystock, Knight; the Barony of Graystock passed to Lord Dacre of Gilsland, and thence to the Howards of Carlisle.
Richard de Beauchamp, Knight; extinct 1508.
George Neville de Bergavenny.
Reginald Gray, Knight; forfeited 1604.

This list does not represent the whole peerage of England. For political reasons some names are absent. For instance, Howard, Lord Surrey, was under attainder, and the Earls of Northumberland are not mentioned.—Dugdale's Summons to Parliament.

- Richard de la Warre, Knight; ancestor of the present Earl Delawarr.
Thomas Lomley de Lomley; ancestor of the present Earl of Scarborough.
John Broke de Cobham, Knight; title extinct 1619.
John Blount de Mountjoy, Knight; title extinct 1681.
John Stourton de Stourton, Knight; ancestor of the present Earl Stourton.
John Sutton de Dudley, Knight; title in abeyance.
John Denham of Caredenham, Knight; title extinct 1502.
John Arundel de Maltravers, Knight, son of the Earl of Arundel; title went to Duke of Norfolk.
Edward Grey, Viscount Lisle; title extinct in 1504.
John Grey de Powys, Knight; extinct in 1552.
Henry Clifford de Clifford, Knight; ancestor of the present house of de Clifford.
John Ratcliffe de Fitzwater; title extinct 1641.
William Beaumont, Viscount Beaumont; title extinct 1507.

that "none was created a baron who could not dispend a thousand pound per annum, or at least a thousand marks." George Neville, Duke of Bedford, was degraded by Parliament in 1477 because he was poor. The performance also of certain offices was held to make a man a gentleman. In the place therefore of the old nobility and gentry of race there arose a nobility dependent on wealth and on the favour of the Court, who became naturally pliant instruments in the hand of the King, to whom they owed their elevation.¹ On reading the list of the executors of King Henry VIII.'s will, it is at once obvious that not one of them is other than a new-made man.

Under these circumstances the change in the balance of the constitution was complete. Unchecked by its natural counterpoise, the nobility, the Crown was in effect absolute, for the Commons, who might have been expected to step into the place which the nobles had vacated, were brought face to face with the power of the Crown, and, deprived of their natural leaders, had not yet found sufficient strength among themselves to make good their position against it. The King indeed thought fit, when a dangerous or difficult step had to be taken, to support his authority by application to the Commons, and would graciously accept their advice when it chimed in with his own wish or was instigated by his own agents; but how completely they accepted their position of inferiority is shown by the statutes declaring the royal proclamations to have the power of laws,² and giving the King the right of nominating his successor by will.³

This change in the character of the nobility necessitated a change in the character of the army. It was no longer the connection between tenant and feudal chief which compelled men to take the field. For defensive purposes the whole nation was regarded as one great army. To each class and rank was appointed its proper equipment, which every individual had to keep up at his own expense; and this militia was placed under the command of the most prominent noble or nobles in the county, who, as lord-lieutenants, were the representatives of the royal power there, and whose duty it was to collect and organize the armed men of their

¹ "And if any knight should have acquired sufficient number of these fees to be able to keep up a great establishment, he may get himself created an earl by the King. Howbeit the present King Henry makes but few."—Italian Relation, p. 33.

² Thomas, Lord Wriothesley; William, Lord St. John; John Russell, Lord Russell; Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford; John Dudley, Viscount Lisle; Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of Durham; William Paget, Anthony Browne, Edward North, Edward Montague, Anthony Denny and William Herbert.

³ 31 Hen. VIII.

⁴ 35 Hen. VIII. c. 1.

district. For foreign war the troops were raised by voluntary enlistment, receiving regular pay and rations during their service.¹ These enlistments were generally made through the medium of some nobleman or gentleman, with whom the King entered into a contract. Thus, in 1492, Henry VII. contracted with George, Earl of Kent, to provide "vj. men of arms, his owne person comprised in the same, every one of them having with him his custrell and his page; with xvj. demi-launces, xvj. archers on horsbak, and lx. archers on fote, of good and hable persons for the warre, horsed, armed, garnished and arrayed sufficiently in all peces and in every thing as after the custume of warre ought to appertayne."² It was in accordance with this view of England as an armed nation that laws were made regulating the price of bows, encouraging the importation of bow staves, and insisting upon the substitution of archery for other less useful sports. The distance even at which the butts should be placed was a matter for legislation. Two hundred and twenty yards was the minimum allowed for public practice. In spite of such enactments, however, archery gradually declined, as Latimer tells us:—"Men of England in times past, when they would exercise themselves, for we must needs have some recreation, our bodies cannot endure without some exercise—they were wont to go abroad in the fields a shooting, but now it is turned to glossing and gulling within the house. . . . Charge them upon their allegiance that this singular benefit of God may be practised, and that it be not turned to glossing and bowling within the towns, for they be negligent in executing these laws of shooting."³ In the place of archery arose the use of firearms. This seems to have necessitated the creation of something like a standing army. There were mercenaries constantly kept at Calais, and the Protector Somerset employed a body of musketeers.⁴ At the time of the insurrection in Norfolk and Devonshire, when the state of affairs was critical, and the Government were in need of every man they could get, these troops were brought over and employed against the rebels in pursuance of the advice of Paget.⁵ The feeling against the use of mercenaries in civil contests was very strong, and those who fell into the hands of the insurgents met with no quarter:—"abhorred of our party," says Hooker, who was present, "they were nothing favoured of the other."

¹ 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9.

² See also 7 Hen. VII. c. 1.

³ Sixth Sermon before Edward VI.

⁴ "They were assaulted with good courage, on the one side by our footmen, on the other by the Italian harquebutters."—Despatch of Russell, quoted by Froude.

⁵ "Send for your Allemayn horsemen." Paget to Protector, Strype's Mem. vol. iv

Pursuit of wealth. Such a change in the principle which linked the various parts of society together as that which is implied in a change from feudalism to personal government, could not take place without affecting materially the social life of the nation. It has been said that it was no longer race, but wealth, which made the gentleman. The pursuit of wealth therefore became a much greater object than it had hitherto been, and the enjoyment and exhibition of wealth were carried much farther. The Court set the example of this display. Giustiniani, the Venetian Ambassador, in the earlier part of Henry VIII.'s reign, describes in glowing terms the splendour of the young King. He speaks of him as revelling in his conscious strength and beauty and wealth.

But the greater nobility by no means fell behind their master. The magnificence of their dress was an object of wonder to foreigners. Indeed constant sumptuary laws were made to restrain the love of dress which was at that time rife in England. Shakspeare tells us of the vast expenditure in dress at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. The Duke of Buckingham wore at the marriage of Prince Arthur, in 1501, a gown "wrought of needlework and set upon cloth of tissue furred with sables, the which gown was valued at £1500"—at least £15,000, of our money. Sir Nicholas Vaux wore "a gown of purple velvet, pight with pieces of gold so thick and massy that it was valued in gold beside the silk and fur at £1000; and a collar of Esses, which weighed, as the goldsmiths reported, 800 lbs. worth of nobles."¹ Their wealth, and indeed that of the whole richer the English. part of the nation, is shown in the vast profusion of their households. The necessity for an immense quantity of food was indeed characteristic of the whole people. "I have it on the best information," says the author of the "Italian Relation," "that when the war is raging most furiously they will seek for good eating and their other comforts, without thinking what harm may befall them." An idea of the magnificence of a great establishment may be gained from the entry on the Feast of the Epiphany, 1508, in the household book of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham. On that day there were fed at dinner and supper together 459 persons, and the provision would seem to have consisted of 678 loaves, 66 quarts of wine, 259 flagons of ale (each flagon containing four quarts), 36 rounds of beef, 12 carcasses of mutton, 2 calves, 4 pigs, 5 salt fishes and a salt sturgeon, 3 swans, ¹ Stowe's Annals.

Ostentation of

6 geese, 10 capons, 1 lamb, 2 peacocks, 2 herons, 22 rabbits, 18 chickens, 16 woodcocks, 9 mallards, 23 widgeons, 18 teals, 20 snipes, 9 dozen of great birds, 6 dozen of little birds, 3 dozen larks, 9 quails—in all 343 birds. At such feasts there was an astonishing display of plate, which was indeed very characteristic of the English at that time. "There is no small innkeeper, however poor and humble he may be, who does not serve his table with silver dishes and drinking-cups; and no one who has not in his house silver plate to the amount of at least 100 pounds sterling is considered by the English to be a person of any consequence."¹ When Cardinal Wolsey, in 1528, entertained the French Ambassadors at Hampton Court, "there were two banquetting-rooms, in each of which a cupboard extended the whole length of the apartment, filled to the top with plate. And every guest-chamber had a basin and ewer of silver, and a great livery pot of silver, and some gilt; yea, and some chambers had two livery pots, with wine and beer, a silver candlestick, having in it two sizes; yet the cupboards in the banquetting-room were never once touched."² The richer English were also profuse in many other articles of luxury; carpets, tapestries, and silks, they were very fond of;³ and, if we may judge from the inventory of Wolsey's goods, they were in the habit of purchasing large quantities, which they kept in store. This profusion of plate and of articles of luxury, especially in connection with the existing poverty, of which more will be said hereafter, was caused principally by wealth having increased beyond the means of its employment, and by the natural channels for its employment being closed by mistaken legislative enactments. Trade had not yet been much developed, and all export of the precious metals was strictly forbidden, under that mistaken view, which lasted some centuries longer, that the wealth of a nation consisted in the amount of bullion existing in it, and that it could be secured only by the exports being larger than the imports. Thus, while trade at home was limited, there was no means of employing superfluous money in foreign countries. A still further check was given to the employment of wealth by the laws which forbade usury,⁴ and by the view that the taking of interest was a sort of moral crime. There

¹ Italian Relation of England, p. 29.

² Stowe's Annals.

³ Perlin, Description d'Angleterre (1552), p. 11: "Les Anglois se servent fort des tapisseries, des toiles pinctes, qui sont bien faistes, auxquelles y a force et magnifiques roses, couronnées ou il y a fleurs de Liz et Lions, car en peu de maisons vous pouvez entrer que vous ne trouviez cest tapisseries."

⁴ 11 Hen. VII. c. 8.

was no alternative therefore but to hoard wealth, and this explains the lavish expenditure which so astonished the foreign visitor.

Nor was wealth confined to the upper classes. In the earlier part of the time of the Tudors there must have been great comfort of a somewhat rough sort amongst all classes. Prices were very low. Even so late as 1508, half-a-crown appears to have been the price of a calf, little more than a shilling purchased a carcase of mutton, and a round of beef could be bought for ninepence.¹ The Duke of Northumberland's house-book gives the price of sheep at twenty-pence apiece, lean beeves eight shillings apiece; and twopence was the allowed price for a lean capon, threepence or fourpence for a pig. All sorts of food were cheap in proportion. It must not be supposed that this cheapness was accompanied by a proportionate lowness of wages. In a Statute of the year 1494,² to settle the amount of labourers' work and wages, with the object no doubt of keeping wages down—for this was the tendency of all legislation at that time—the skilled artificer is allowed fivepence-farthing a day, and the unskilled labourer from threepence to threepence-halfpenny. Two years afterwards this Act was repealed, and wages probably rose a little; sixpence being the regular soldier's pay, which may be supposed to be about the same as that of the artificer. The purchasing power of money was about twelve times what it is now, which would make the ordinary wages thirty-six shillings a week. Such was the comfortable condition of the English at the beginning of the period occupied by the reigns of the Tudors, and before the end of Elizabeth's reign the same general prosperity, or something comparable to it, appears to have again existed. The intervening time was a period of great difficulty and wretchedness. The old state of society was breaking up and seeking new forms. All the conditions of life were undergoing a change, which might almost be called a revolution; and as always Accompanying happens under such circumstances, this change was poverty. accompanied with great suffering. In Henry VII.'s reign, and throughout those of his two successors, the crying evil of English society was vagabondage and pauperism. Repeated statutes³ were made to restrain this evil, each one more severe than the last, till the

¹ Duke of Buckingham's household-book.

² 11 Hen. VII. c. 22.

³ 22 Hen. VIII. c. 12: "If any do beg without license, he shall be whipped, or else set in the stocks for three days and three nights, with bread and water only." 27 Hen. VIII. c. 15: "Every sturdy vagabond to be kept in continual labour. . . . A valiant beggar shall at the first time be whipped, . . . and if he continue his rogish life, he shall have the upper part of the gristle of his right ear cut off, and if he be found after that wandering in idleness, etc., he shall be adjudged and executed as a felon."

severity culminated in Somerset's Statute,¹ reducing able-bodied vagabonds to slavery. As a natural concomitant of vagabondage, came a great amount of crimes of violence and theft. No severity was sufficient to check them. In Henry VII.'s reign, the Venetian narrator observes that it is very easy to get a man apprehended Consequent crime. in England: "Such severe measures against criminals ought to keep the English in check, but for all this there is no country in the world where there are so many thieves and robbers in it as in England;" and again, "People are taken up every day by dozens, like birds in a covey, and especially in London; yet for all this they never cease to rob and murder in the streets:" while Perlin, writing of the beginning of Mary's reign, remarks that the justice in England is very cruel, that a man who would in France be whipped would in England be condemned to death; "in truth, there are but two sorts of punishments, to wit, to be hanged or to be beheaded, and thus evildoers gain as much by doing little evil as great;" and yet he speaks of them as a most turbulent and deceitful people.

There were many causes at work which tended to produce this deplorable state of things. The spirit of feudalism had been giving place to the mercantile spirit of modern times. Edward IV. had himself engaged largely in Causes of poverty and crime. mercantile speculations. Henry VII. had not thought it undignified to belong to the corporation of Taylors, henceforward called Merchant Taylors. In his reign, a commercial treaty, called the Great Intercourse, had been made between England and the Low Countries. The discoveries of Columbus, Vasco di Gama, Sebastian Cabot, and others, had increased the spirit of adventure, and opened new fields of traffic, although they were as yet but little used. The spirit of enterprise had, however, taken hold of the traders of London, of whom it is said that "they are so diligent in mercantile pursuits that they do not fear to make contracts on usury."² They had thus accumulated considerable wealth, and wealth was now, as feudal influence gave way to that of money, the road to gentility and importance. But that importance was not yet separable from Mercantile landowners. the possession of land. Men of wealth, therefore, tried to acquire land, and the destruction of the nobility during the Wars of the Roses, together with the very numerous forfeitures which attended them, had thrown the land of England largely into new hands, and often into those of the wealthy middle class. The tone of the whole age was likewise very mercenary;¹ and the new possessors of land, whether mercantile or of the new Court nobility, no longer felt the same interest as their predecessors in the number and wellbeing of their tenants. A numerous following of feudal tenants was no longer an object, but the power of wealth was every day increasing. In the eyes of the new holders the land was to be treated like any other investment, so as to produce the best return.

¹ 1 Ed. VI. c. 3.

² It. Rel. p. 23.

With the exception perhaps of tin, the greatest and most lucrative trade of England was wool. It paid better to feed sheep than to plough the land. It was no doubt better political economy, and in the long run more advantageous to England, thus to employ the land. But at the time the injury inflicted on the poor was very great. Tenants and labourers were driven from their farms and cottages, and the land given up to pasture,² so that a couple of men could manage a whole farm which had once supported its full supply of ploughmen, labourers, and the like. "For whereas," says Latimer, "have been a great many householders and inhabitants, there is now but a shepherd and his dog."³ This change affected two classes of men, the yeoman farmers and the labourers. Proprietors found no difficulty in taking pasture farms into their own hands, and added farm to farm. Statutes were made to restrain this practice, but were constantly broken, and the quantity of sheep held in single men's hands became so enormous, that they too had to be restricted by statute.⁴ The yeoman farmer thus found himself ousted from his tenancy. The labourer suffered still more. The complete separation from the land which was and still is the marked characteristic of the English labourer, enabled his master to turn him from his employment without difficulty. As the greed for pasture-land increased, his case became still worse. Much of his subsistence was drawn from his rights over common land. His

Diminution of agricultural labour.

¹ "Having no hope of their paternal inheritance, they all become so greedy of gain, that they feel no shame in asking, almost for the love of God, the smallest sum of money, and to this it may be attributed that there is no injury that can be committed against the lower orders which may not be atoned for by money."—It. Rel. p. 26. See also the description of the mercenary marriages contracted by the English.

² "This town [Bittesby] is long since depopulated, not one house remaining, and converted into sheep pastures."

"Stornesworth hath been an ancient town, but now altogether decayed and converted into sheep pastures."—BURTON'S Leicestershire.

³ First Sermon, before Ed. VI.

⁴ 25 Hen. VIII. c. 13: "No man to have above two thousand sheep." The Italian Relation mentions as many as twenty thousand.

richer neighbours began to enclose this land, and throw it into pasture.¹ His means of subsistence was thus cut off in both directions. He was deprived of his employment, and he lost his private means of life. It was this enclosing of common lands which was the great grievance of the Eastern rebels, and which formed the topic of some of Latimer's most vigorous sermons: "But let the preacher preach till his tongue be worn to the stumps, nothing is amended. We have good statutes made for the Commonwealth, as touching commoners and encloses, many meetings and sessions, but in the end of the matter there cometh nothing forth;"² and Somerset's sympathy with the complaints of those who had lost their common rights, and the commission he issued to inquire into enclosures, have been already mentioned as the causes of his fall. In time the increasing manufactures and other forms of commerce absorbed these hands, and the improvement of agriculture restored the proper balance between arable and pasture. But while the process was going on, as in the case of all economic changes, the suffering was great. To these causes of pauperism must be added the number of discharged retainers whom the decrease of feudal military households threw upon the world, and after the destruction of the monasteries, the discharged monks and numerous agricultural servants of the abbey.

Decrease of dependants.

The stringent laws directed against vagabonds were useless. There was for the time a real want of work. Sir Thomas More saw this, and writes, "They be cast into prison as vagabonds, because they go about and work not whom no man will set at work, though they never so willingly proffer themselves thereto."³ That such a mass of unemployed workmen should take to crimes and violence was but natural, more especially as during much of the period any church afforded sanctuary for the evildoer for forty days, besides the great licensed sanctuaries.⁴

To add to the misery of the people, there was an extremely rapid rise in prices. The chief cause of this was perhaps the depreciation of the coinage. The natural rise in the value of commodities in comparison

¹ "This lordship hath been long enclosed, affording large sheep-walks."—BURTON'S Leicestershire.

² First Sermon, before Ed. VI.

³ Utopia.

⁴ "Loke me now, how few sanctuarie men there be, whom any favourable necessitie compelled to go thither, and then see what a rabble of thieves, murderers, and malicious haynous traitors there be commonly therein."—MORE'S Life of Edward V.

After the Reformation sanctuaries fell into disrepute, but continued to exist. In 1697, an Act was passed for the suppression of the most notorious, and they were finally abolished in the reign of George I., when the Sanctuary of St. Peter's, Westminster, was pulled down. This, and that of St. Martin le Grand, were the two principal in London.

with silver, caused by the introduction of precious metals from America. But besides that, it may be traced to the depreciation of the coinage which was going on during the latter years of Henry VIII. and through most of the reign of Edward. The country was flooded with testons or bad shillings, and private individuals took advantage of the opportunity. Thus Sharington, Master of the Mint at Bristol, coined no less than £12,000 of false money.

Increasing habits of luxury among the wealthy, and that covetousness which has been already mentioned, and which caused a universal raising of the rents, had also much to do with the misery of the people. The Reformation seems to have produced a directly injurious effect upon the morality of the time. Freed from the restraints of the discipline of the Catholic Church, without any very sure belief in the new doctrines, which indeed had been thrust somewhat unceremoniously on the mass of the nation, rich men were inclined to take advantage of the license of the new creeds without accepting their stricter and more spiritual morality. That there was a deterioration is plain:—"In times

Lax morality of Protestantism. past men were full of pity and compassion, but now there is no pity. . . Now charity is waxen cold, none helpeth the scholar nor yet the poor. And in those days what did they when they helped the scholars? marry, they maintained and gave them livings that were very Papists and professed the Pope's doctrine: and now that the knowledge of God's Word is brought to light, now almost no man helpeth to maintain them."¹ And again:—"I full certify you extortioners, violent oppressors, engrossers of tenements and lands, through whose covetousness villages decay and fall down, the King's liege people for lack of sustenance are famished and decayed—they be those which speak against the honour of the King." It was this covetousness and overweening desire for and admiration of wealth which was the crying sin of the time. The honesty even of the Bench was sullied by it:—"The saying is now, that money is heard everywhere; if he be rich he shall soon have an end of his matter."² "Now-a-days the judges be afraid to hear a poor man against the rich: insomuch they will either pronounce against him, or so drive off the poor man's suit, that he shall not be able to go through with it."³ Consequently all proprietors sought to get as much as possible from their land, and the tenant farmers found their rents enormously enhanced. Latimer gives the story of his father's farm, which well shows this increase: "My father was a yeoman and had no lands of his own, only he had a farm of three or four pound by year at the uttermost, and hereupon he tilled so much as kept half a dozen men. He had walk for a hundred sheep; and my mother milked thirty kine. He was able, and did find the King a harness, with himself and his horse, while he came to the place that he should receive the King's wages. I can remember that I buckled his harness when he went into Blackheath field. He kept me to school, or else I had not been able to have preached before the King's Majesty now. He married my sisters with five pound or twenty nobles apiece. . . . He kept hospitality for his poor neighbours, and some alms he gave to the poor. And all this he did off the said farm, where he that now hath it payeth sixteen pounds by year or more, and is not able to do anything for his prince, for himself, nor for his children, or give a cup of drink to the poor." Of course, under such circumstances, the prices of agricultural products rose so that "poor men which live of their labour cannot with the sweat of their face have a living, all kind of victuals is so dear; pigs, geese, chickens, capons, eggs, etc. These things, with others, are so unreasonably enhanced; and I think verily that if it thus continue we shall at length be constrained to pay for a pig a pound."¹

¹ Latimer's Sermon of the Plough.

² Latimer's Second Sermon before the King.

³ Third Sermon before the King.

The same principles which were producing this change in agricultural products were acting on other branches of trade. There too the wholesale dealer was rising, and in both sermons and statutes the evil is pointed out, that poor men should be unable to purchase small quantities, a wholesale seller being able to keep his stock till he could sell advantageously. Efforts were even made to settle compulsory prices, but this was found quite impossible, as was indeed seen by Mason, one of the ablest statesmen of the time, who writes in 1550 to Cecil:—"Never shall you drive Nature to consent that a pennyworth shall be sold for a farthing."

No doubt this growing tendency to wholesale dealing was in accordance with the rules of political economy. The land was more profitably farmed as pasture than as ploughland. The wool which was thus grown gave employment sooner or later to the manufactures, which would absorb the surplus agricultural population, and capital which was before hoarded found a profitable investment in land. So too the wholesale dealer in other goods was enabled to purchase in cheap markets, and to keep his goods till he could sell them well, thus increasing the national wealth and equalizing prices. But the commencement of the system which is now accepted universally, but which then seemed merely the triumph of selfishness, and which could not work fully because attended by many erroneous notions which laid restrictions on the freedom of trade, could not fail to be attended with much misery.

¹ Latimer's First Sermon before Edward VI.

But however great the revolution in the constitution of society and in the economical condition of the kingdom may have been, the Great Revolution, which indeed gives its name to the period, is the change in the position of the Church.

In the reign of Henry VII. a foreigner could say, and probably truly, "the clergy are they who have the supreme sway over the country, both in peace and war."¹ The amount of their property was enormous. The same author states that of 96,230 knights' fees, 28,015 belonged to the Church. The number of monasteries was very great. At the time of the dissolution there were 645, and the revenues which are

Change in the position of the Church.
its greatness under Henry VII.
said to have passed into the hands of the Crown are computed at £1,600,000. In addition to this the Church had the advantage of being almost the sole repository of learning. It is true there were some few exceptions. But so completely was it the case that the mere power of reading was regarded as a proof of being in orders, that a criminal, charged with even the gravest offences, might, if he could read, claim to be removed for trial to the ecclesiastical courts. This privilege they had enjoyed since the twenty-fifth year of Edward III., and it did not receive any check till the year 1487, when it was enacted that no layman should be allowed benefit of clergy more than once. He was branded for the first offence, and on any future conviction was punished as a layman. Their superior education naturally threw the chief offices in the administration of the kingdom into the hands of Churchmen. The most trusted ministers of Henry VII. were Morton, eventually Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox, Bishop of Winchester. Warham, who succeeded Morton, was Chancellor of England; but it was Wolsey, a protégé of Fox, who carried the power of the Church to the highest pitch. Under him it rose to authority and splendour scarcely second to that of the King. Nor was it only by their wealth and learning that Churchmen acquired influence. They had the majority of seats in the Upper House. The decayed state of the temporal peerage has been mentioned. The only class which had not suffered in the civil wars was the clergy. The full number of Bishops (nineteen, and two Archbishops) of course still remained, but besides these, mitred Abbots, to the number of twenty-nine, and two or three Priors,¹ had seats in the Upper House. The number of spiritual Lords was thus nearly double that of the temporal. In addition to this the Church had a very large portion of the justice of the country in its hands. It could, as we have seen, draw from the King's courts into its own jurisdiction all criminals who could read. It had, moreover, a complete arrangement of courts holding jurisdiction over moral offences, and all the apparatus necessary for exacting dues upon many of the common events of life, such as the making and execution of wills and the burial of the dead.

¹ Italian Relation of England, p. 34.

Nor were these privileges used with a sparing hand. There are several statutes limiting the right of clergy, which show distinctly that it had been much abused. They complain that, contrary to promise, no regular agreement had been entered into as to the penalties to be inflicted upon criminals thus taken from the King's justice, and assert that consequently such criminals were constantly discharged by the ordinary, after merely nominal imprisonment, on the payment of bribes; while the first step of what can be spoken of as Reformation was the Act limiting exorbitant fees upon wills, and the abuse of mortuaries, or presents for the dead. It is in fact true that in the domestic government, by means of their majority in the House; in foreign affairs, because they alone were, generally speaking, fitted for diplomacy; even in war, because of their ability as organizers; in every branch of social life by their wealth, their judicial power, their rights with regard to the common and necessary events of life, and most generally by their claim to spiritual dominion by the confessional, penance and absolution, it is true to say that the Churchmen at the close of the fifteenth century were by far the most influential class in the kingdom.

The case was different when, on the passing of the first Act of Uniformity (1548), not only had the management of temporal affairs passed from their hands, but points of doctrine and religious faith were discussed in Parliament and settled by the laity of England. This great change had taken place in the short period which had elapsed since the fall of Wolsey. He had himself been somewhat answerable for it. He was too great and far-seeing a man to admire or tolerate great abuses or great ignorance, and, stickler though he was for the authority of the Church, he did not scruple to form plans of reformation to attempt to improve the general education of the country, or to employ largely able laymen in the service of the State. In fact, the great statesmen who managed the affairs of England, both at home and abroad, till the close of Elizabeth's reign, may be said to have sprung from his school.

¹ The number of Abbots and Priors somewhat varied, but there were never less than twenty-five Abbots and two Priors.

It was impossible that with regard to learning, at all events, the Church should uphold its monopoly. The revival of literature in Europe had been wholly secular. Greek poetry, Greek philosophy, and Greek morality had been regarded as dangerous by the Church, and although there were some eminent exceptions, scholarship had passed chiefly into the hands of the laity, and the Humanists, as they were called, were looked at but coldly by the stricter moralists of the Church. It was not without difficulty that the study of Greek had been admitted at the English Universities. Here again Wolsey had sided with the Reformers. His appreciation of the necessity of learning was great. He founded a school at his native town, Ipswich, and began a gigantic project for the formation of a great College, called the Cardinal's College, at Oxford, of which Christ Church is all that remains, but which would, if it had been completed, have incorporated several other colleges. Upon the suppression of monasteries it was intended that much of their revenue should be given to education; and though Latimer could still complain of the unfitness of the nobility for the duties of statesmen, and of the necessity of employing Churchmen for the purpose, the very fact that he mentions it proves that a change had taken place. The list of the Privy Council in 1552 contains but two clerical names, and the well-known statesmen and diplomatists, such as Paget, Mason, Cheyne, Sadler, Cecil, and others, were all of them laymen of the middle class.¹ The best-known of learning.

Popularization

¹ List of the Privy Council, 1551-2:—

The Archbishop of Canterbury.
The Bishop of Ely—Lord Chancellor.
Lord Winchester—Lord Treasurer.
The Duke of Northumberland—Lord Great Master.
The Lord Russell—Lord Privy Seal.
The Duke of Suffolk.
The Marquess of Northampton—Lord Great Chamberlain.
The Earl of Shrewsbury.
The Earl of Westmoreland.
The Earl of Huntingdon.
The Earl of Pembroke.
The Viscount Hereford.
The Lord Clinton—Lord Admiral.
Thomas Lord D'Arcy—Lord Chamberlain.
The Lord Cobham.

The Lord Rich.
Sir Anthony Winkfield, K.G.—Mr. Comptroller.
Sir Thomas Cheyne, K.C.—Mr. Treasurer.
Mr. Secretary Petre.
Mr. Secretary Cecil.
Sir Philip Hobbey.
Sir Robert Bowes.
Sir John Gage.
Sir John Mason.
Sir Ralph Sadler.
Sir John Baker.
Judge Bromley.
Judge Montague.
Mr. Wotton.
Mr. North.

names, however, among the English scholars, are Sir Thomas More and Roger Ascham. The first of these, a lawyer, and Chancellor of England after the fall of Wolsey, was a man whose probity and high and simple character, joined with his learning, gave him a European reputation. It was chiefly to visit him that Erasmus, the great scholar of the age, came to England, and his death, under the ruthless sentence of Henry VIII., caused a thrill of emotion throughout Europe. His influence upon learning was however chiefly indirect. The whole man is so interesting, his political life so consistent, his character, though instances of religious persecution can be brought against him, on the whole so liberal and generous, the description of his household at Chelsea given us by his son-in-law and by his friend Erasmus so attractive, and his death-scene so dignified and touching, that it is probably as a man rather than as a scholar that he plays so large a part in the memories of Henry VIII.'s reign. Of his works some historical fragments, and his "Utopia," or modern republic, are the only ones much esteemed now. Roger Ascham was a very different man; an amiable and careless scholar, he was at one time Professor of Greek at Cambridge, several times employed as secretary to foreign ambassadors, but is better known as the tutor and Latin Secretary to both the Queens, Mary and Elizabeth. His principal works are "Toxophilus," an essay on shooting, expressly intended to improve English prose, and "The Schoolmaster" which is full of learning and good sense. But more important than any individual scholars to prove the diffusion of learning, are the facts which are known about the education of so many of the prominent people (especially ladies) of that time. The instructions of Thomas Cromwell to the tutor of his son are still extant. They are almost too onerous. The boy is to be trained in physical exercises as well as intellectual, but when occasion occurs, the two are to be combined, and the conversation, even when riding to the meet, is to be adroitly led to classical and instructive subjects. Such over-zealous care did not produce the desired effect, any more than the similar anxiety of Lord Chesterfield; but the fact that a shrewd man like Cromwell insisted upon such a training for his son, speaks largely for the general feeling on the subject. The precocious ability of Edward VI., the classical and other varied attainments of Lady Jane Grey and of Queen Elizabeth, although it is true that these instances are only drawn from the very highest rank, point to the same fact. The establishment of great schools bears even stronger witness in the same direction. By a strange contradiction of circumstances, while the support of learning at the Universities was decreasing, while poor scholars were unable to obtain their usual assistance, and the number of the students was therefore rapidly decreasing, some few individuals began to establish foundation schools. Certain portions of the monastic revenues were devoted to the same purpose; and so much was this the fashion, that the name of Edward VI. is indissolubly connected with our Grammar Schools, though more frequently on account of the grants being completed with his sanction than on account of liberality of his own. Dean Colet's School of St. Paul's, and Christ Church Hospital, in the old Monastery of Grey Friars, are the best known of such establishments.

Against this general diffusion of knowledge it was impossible that the Church should have continued long the hold which superstition gave it upon the multitude. Erasmus describes in his Colloquies, in a thoroughly sceptical spirit, the relics that he saw at Walsingham, when he visited it, accompanied by Aldrich, afterwards Bishop of Carlisle. His disbelief in the authenticity of the relics excited the fury of the official: "What need to ask such questions," he said, "when you have the authenticated inscription?" Erasmus also visited Canterbury, in company with Colet—on this occasion it was the Englishman who was the most sceptical. A dirty rag, said to have belonged to St. Thomas, was offered to him; he, not sufficiently grateful, drew it together with his fingers, not without some expression of disgust, and disdainfully replaced it. He was asked in the neighbourhood to kiss a piece of a shoe with a glass jewel, said to be the shoe of St. Thomas. "What," said he, "do these brutes imagine we must kiss every good man's shoe?" The amount of superstition which had to be overthrown, on the other hand, was very great. England was full of places of pilgrimage, where wonder-working relics were kept and exhibited in the interest of the monks who possessed them.¹ Among the duties of the Commissioners for the dissolution of monasteries, a very important one was the examination of these relics. For instance, we hear at one time of the great wooden Christ, called "Dderfel-Gadern," which was brought from Wales, and burnt under the unfortunate Friar Forest, who was hung in chains above it. At another time, it is a phial of blood in the village of Hales in Worcestershire, the influence of which even Henry VIII. was not able to withstand;¹ or an image of the Virgin in a priory at Cardigan, with a taper which did not waste for nine years, and was then extinguished by a perjurer;² or the Rood at Boxley, which moved its eyes and head, which is the subject of investigation, and of which the imposture is disclosed.

¹ As a single instance, Leyton the Commissioner says of Maiden Bradley: "By this bringar, my servant, I send yowe relyquis, fyrste, two flowres wrappede in white and blake sarcenet that one Christynmas evyn will spring and burgen and bere blossoms, quod expertum esse, saith the prior of Maiden Bradley: ye shall also receive a bage of relyquis, wherein ye shall se straingels thynges, as shall appere by the scripture, as, Godes cote, Oure lades smoke, Parte of Godes supper in cena domini," etc.—WRIGHT'S Suppression of Monasteries, Camden Society, p. 58.

But it was neither in its political nor its learned pre-eminence, nor indeed in the superstitious influence which it exercised, that the great revolution in the Church took place. It was the loss of its wealth and social pre-eminence, by the destruction of the monasteries, which chiefly changed its position. These institutions were at the very summit of their importance. Their splendour rivalled, nay surpassed, that of the greatest nobles. When the Abbot of St. Albans dined, his table was raised fifteen steps above the rest of the hall, and the monks who waited on him sung a hymn at every fifth step. He sat alone in the middle of his table, and guests even of the highest rank were only allowed to sit at the end. Their hospitality was vast also; not only were there daily distributions of fragments to the poor about the gates, but travellers and pilgrims were sure to find a welcome. At St. Thomas's of Canterbury, as at other monasteries, there was a vast hall regularly set and attended every day. They had no difficulty in affording this, for their wealth was enormous. The revenue of the Abbey of Glastonbury is estimated at £3500, or about £35,000 of our money. And this was not quite the richest among them.

It is not probable that in the larger abbeys much disorder reigned beyond what is inseparable from an idle community with considerable wealth at its command and an exemption from the common duties of citizenship. But in the smaller monasteries, where men of lower rank and education constituted the body of monks, and towards which the eye of the public was not often directed, iniquities of the vilest nature were rife. The proof of this is indisputable. Cromwell, no doubt, employed coarse and eager instruments, but the stories given of proved immorality, and of abbots and monks surprised with the evidences of loose life about them, are too circumstantial to be doubted.³ Not only did profound immorality, but also profound ignorance find a home in these smaller societies—ignorance and immorality too which would not be corrected. The Abbot of Warden, in Bedfordshire, gives the following account of his monastery:—"Item, that whereas we by the said injunctions be commanded to have early lecture of divinity, we have none; and when it is read few or none of the monks come to it. Item, I did assign Thomas London to read the divinity lecture, and he indiscreetly did read the books of Eccius Omelies, which books be all carnal and of a brutal understanding. . . . Item, forasmuch as I did perceive ignorance was a great cause why these my brethren were thus far out of good order and in continual unquietness, . . . I caused books of grammar to be bought for each of them, and assigned my brother to instruct them, but there would come none to him but one Richard Baldock and Thomas Clement. Item, they be in number fifteen brethren, and except three of them, none understand nor know their rule, nor the statutes of their religion." The rest of the letter describes a threatened assault upon himself for his attempts at reform, and instances of the grossest immorality.

¹ Seventh Sermon before Edward VI.

² Suppression of Monasteries, p. 188.

³ This is amply proved by the letters in Wright's Suppression of Monasteries. In the same monastery at Maiden Bradley, for instance, Leyton finds "An holy father prior, and hath but vj. children, and but one dowghter mariede yet, of the goodes of the monasterie, trystyng shortly to mary the reste."

The condition of the monasteries had been known for years. Both Warham and Wolsey had inquired into them, and intended to reform them. It may have been his knowledge of this plan of his former master's which suggested to Cromwell's essentially secular mind the idea of at once striking a blow at the Church, removing a real abuse, and replenishing the King's exchequer. It is certain that the idea was acted upon very thoroughly.

In the autumn of 1535 a general visitation of monasteries was ordered, and a commission was appointed for the purpose. Of this commission the most vigorous members appear to have been Legh and Leyton, who went to work at their somewhat disgusting duties as if they found pleasure in them. There were others who were almost as keen in the work. The process of visitation was a vigorous and summary one. All other ecclesiastical authority over the monasteries were removed, and the visitors were practically absolute. "My Lord of Lincoln visited here," says Leyton, "and through his diocese in these parts only to prevent the King's visitation . . . to the derogation of my Lord of Canterbury's power and prerogative metropolitan given him by the King's highness. If he will so suffer his power to be contemned it is pity he should have his mitre." Armed with this authority, the commissioners proceeded at once to the monasteries, called the monks together, and in many instances at all events, told all who wished it they were free to go. Such as left the monastery were supplied with priests' dress, if they were men, or secular dresses, if women. There seem to have been a considerable number who availed themselves of this permission. We find Legh writing to ask Cromwell:—"Also I desire you to send me word what shall be done with these religious persons, which, kneeling on their knees, holding up their hands, instantly with humble petition desire of God, the King, and you, to be dismissed from their religion, saying they live in it contrary to God's law and their conscience."¹ Again, Margaret Vernon, an abbess, writes to ask "what way shall be best for me to take, seeing there shall be none left here but myself and this poor maiden."² When the monastery was thus cleared of its unwilling inhabitants, all the rest were shut up. Such were the injunctions given; there seems to have been some little difference in practice, for we find, among others, Legh complaining that "Mr. Doctor Leyton hath not done the same in places where he hath been, but licensed the heads and masters to go abroad, which I suppose maketh the brethren to grudge the more." This restriction was no doubt very irksome, as was also the closing up of all private entrances to the monasteries, one entrance alone being allowed. When they were thus secured in their houses, evidence was taken of all sorts, inventories of their property made, their accounts and leases carefully examined, and their morality sifted. Evidence of a very poor kind was accepted, and informers were no doubt plentiful. Nor was this all,—the more zealous visitors at all events set to work with a preconceived notion of the guilt of the monks, and as experience strengthened this belief, no denial would avail. At the College of Newark, in Leicester, the monks would not confess—"The abbess here is confederate, we suppose, and nothing will confess. The abbot is an honest man and doth very well, but he hath here the most obstinate and factious canons that ever I knew." And so Dr. Leyton says he will bring against them specific charges, which he confesses he had never heard brought against any of them, but confession of which he hopes to wring from them. If after such examination much was found amiss, whether gross immorality or gross mismanagement, which seems to have been very common, the visitors had power to compel surrender at once.³ The mismanagement is curious, the living being often beyond the income of the monastery, and the lands being let on ridiculous leases. In the Charterhouse, for instance, the yearly revenue of the house is put at £642, 0s. 4d., and the provision for living as amounting to £658, 7s. 4d. "I learn here," says the visitor, "that heretofore, when all victual was at a convenient price, and also when they were fewer persons in number than they now be, the proctor hath accounted for a thousand pounds a year, their rental being but as above, which costly fare, buildings and others, were then borne by the benevolence and charity of the city of London." He also complains that "to the cloistered door there are no less than four-and-twenty keys in four-and-twenty persons' hands; also to the buttery door there be twelve sundry keys in twelve men's hands, wherein seemeth to be small husbandry." The causes on which they insisted on surrenders were sometimes trivial enough. There is an excellent letter from the Abbot of Faversham, urging that his age was no valid reason for surrendering his monastery.

¹ Sup. Mon. xxxvi.

² Sup. Mon., Letter xxii.

³ Thus in Kent the Commissioners report, "We have been at the monasteries of Laydon, Dover and Folkestone, and have taken a clear surrender of every of the same monasteries."

By February 1536 sufficient evidence was collected, and many surrenders and dissolutions already effected. Here and there abbeys were well reported of, though scarcely any by either Legh or Leyton. Thus the Abbot and convent of Ramsay was praised. George Giffard begs that Woolstrobe Abbey may be unsuppressed. The nuns of Polesworth are declared pure, and Latimer entreats for the Priory of Great Malvern. Enough, however, had been collected to show that there was really a vast amount of wickedness in the monasteries, and the King and Parliament being alike interested in the matter, a statute was passed declaring the dissolution of all monasteries under two hundred a year rental, excepting any which the King might except; their property, saving the vested rights of leaseholders, was the King's absolutely. The monks who still wished to keep their orders were drafted into the larger abbeys. There was at once a scramble for the prey. Abbots clamoured to be placed in the list of exceptions. Founders, or founders' kin, begged for their foundations, or that the temporality should be returned to them, or that at least they should have the right of pre-emption. Needy courtiers begged for grants of the confiscated land. Sir Thomas Elliot, a scholar and a diplomatist, begs Cromwell in cringing terms "so to bring me into the King's most noble remembrance, that of his most bounteous liberality it may like his highness to reward me with some convenient portion of the suppressed lands." Humphrey Stafford writes, "And if it would please your mastership to be so good master unto me as to help me to Warspyng Priory, I were and will be whilst I live your bedeman."

But Cromwell saw before him a still larger prey. It did not suit him to proceed so arbitrarily with the larger foundations as he had done with the smaller ones; but their fate was sealed. In the course of the next few years the larger number of them were frightened, or cajoled into voluntary surrender. If voluntary surrender seemed impossible, there was nearly always some cause found to give colour to the deposition of the abbot, and his place was occupied by some one ready to please the King by immediate surrender. The monks of the Charterhouse had been particularly obnoxious to the Crown. Thomas Bedyll, one of the commissioners, after congratulating Cromwell on the death of most of them, begs him to have pity on the Lord Prior of the same, "which is as honest a man as ever was in that habit . . . and now at last, at mine exhortation and instigation, constantly moved and finally persuaded his brethren to surrender their house, lands and goods into the King's hands, and to trust only to his mercy and grace. I beseech you, my Lord, that the said Prior may be so entreated by your help that he be not sorry and repent that he hath feared and followed your sore words and my gentle exhortation made unto him to surrender his said house." The Abbot of St. Alban's was a most obstinate patient: "In all communications and motions made concerning any surrender, he sheweth himself so stiff that, as he saith, he would rather choose to beg his bread all the days of his life than consent to any surrender." Legh and Petre, the commissioners, ask, therefore, whether they shall go on with the process of deprivation, "for manifest dilapidation, making of shifts, etc., which done, the house will be in such debt, that we think no man will take the office of abbot here upon him, except any do it only for that purpose to surrender the same into the King's hands." When the surrenders were made, the houses were treated as at once belonging entirely to the Crown. The prior and the monks were pensioned, but the pensions were very small, and the clear profit to the Crown great. Thus the Abbey of St. Andrew's, Northampton, had an income of about four hundred a year; the prior's and sub-prior's pensions were left "till the Lord Privy Seal's pleasure was known therein." One of the monks, aged thirty-six, was given a small vicarage in Northampton, of the yearly income of seven pounds, which was in the gift of the abbey, and happened to be vacant. Four above the age of forty were given four pounds a year apiece; two about thirty, sixty-six shillings and eightpence each; and three younger than that, fifty-three and fourpence. Thirty-five pounds, therefore, out of the four hundred of income, covered all the pensions except the prior's and sub-prior's. The property belonging to the abbeys was carefully looked into and made to produce its proper rent. At this same abbey of Northampton there was an instance of the absurd way in which it had been before managed. Their income had shrunk considerably, but not in this prior's time: "But surely his predecessors pleased much in odoriferous savours, as it should seem by their converting the rents of their monastery, that were wont to be paid in corn and grain, into gilly-flowers and roses." All the wealth of the property, relics, jewels, etc., were carefully inventoried, and in large part sold, and the houses themselves stripped of their lead and bells and glass, and the very materials sold to the neighbouring gentry, the churches sometimes, but not often, being spared.¹ In 1539 an Act was passed, not for dissolving monasteries—that had been done already—but for vesting their property in the King. The work was then virtually finished, and the Parliament, which had counted in its first session, beginning in April 1539, twenty abbots among its members, began its second session in April 1540 with none. Two or three abbots who remained obstinate, such as Beche of St. John's, Colchester, Coke of Reading, and Whiting of Glastonbury, were entangled in charges of treason and beheaded.

While the Revolution was thus proceeding in all directions, and in all classes of society, the outward appearance of England did not change much. Visitors, both in Henry VII.'s reign and in Elizabeth's, mention the abundance of pasturage, the comparative paucity of agriculture, and the great quantity of open country stocked with game. "Agriculture is not practised in this island beyond what is required for the consumption of the people. . . . This negligence is, however, atoned for by an immense profusion of every comestible animal, such as stags, goats, fallow-deer, hares, rabbits, pigs, and an infinity of oxen, which have much larger horns than ours, which proves the mildness of the climate, as horns cannot bear excessive cold. . . . Common fowls, pea-fowls, partridges, pheasants, and other small birds, abound here above measure."² The roads were set deep between hedges, and Perlin tells us how there were steps up from the deep roads to the fields above through the hedges. The houses of the common people were mostly mud hovels, but we are told in Elizabeth's reign the people in them fared like kings. The thinness of the population was remarkable. The wars at home and abroad of the last century had made

Outward appearance of England.

¹ See Scudamore's accounts in the Suppression of Monasteries.

² Italian Relation.

great havoc among the people; disastrous sweeping diseases, bred probably in part by uncleanness, had still further thinned them. Such as there were dwelt in very scattered hamlets, one of the changes of the period being the rise of large villages and small towns. The decay of towns is one of the most frequent complaints met with in the Statute-Book; though this was partly caused, perhaps, by the general smallness of the population, and by unskilful legislation with regard to trade, it depended more upon the fact that the mercantile proprietors began to attract labourers around their own dwellings. The rules of the guilds and corporations were very oppressive, and workmen sought refuge from them in the villages. There is a striking Act in the twenty-fifth year of Henry VIII., which interdicts under penalties manufacture in hamlets and villages, "because persons inhabiting them both farmed lands and occupied the mysteries of cloth-making, weaving," etc. The efforts of the great towns to retain their monopolies were vigorous. There are many statutes restricting places where certain trades may be carried on. The whole system of trade was indeed one of restriction. Again and again were prices fixed; rules were made insisting upon the authorized examination and marking of goods to secure their purity. The number of apprentices was limited. The jealousy of foreigners was so great that in some of the national branches of trade no foreign apprentices were admitted.¹ The frequent repetition of such statutes marks their futility; in fact here, too, change from the mediæval to the modern state was being effected, and the primary laws of competition and of supply and demand were forcing themselves into notice.

But if other large cities decayed, London continually grew. Its wealth and splendour are admitted on all hands. "In one single street, named the Strand, leading to St. Paul's, there are fifty-two goldsmiths' shops, so rich and full of silver vessels, great and small, that in all the shops in Milan, Rome, Venice and Florence put together, I do not think there are to be found so many or of the magnificence to be seen in London."² The streets were, it is true, built chiefly of timber, or at best of brick, and the paving was intrusted to the individual care of each householder; but the City abounded with every article of luxury as well as with the necessities of life, while through it ran the clear, beautiful Thames, "in which it was truly a beautiful thing to behold one or two thousand tame swans swimming."¹ No doubt much impurity must have found its way into the river, but the art of draining was not as yet well developed, and "crows and ravens croaked at pleasure in the streets, no man regarding the omen." There was even a penalty for destroying them, for they were the scavengers, and kept the streets of the town free from filth. For the same reason kites were tolerated, "which were so tame that they would take from the children's hands bread smeared with butter, Flemish fashion, which their mothers gave them." The common houses in London were gable-ended wooden edifices, each storey jutting over the one beneath it. The lighting was not particularly good. Lanterns were hoisted on the top of Bow steeple that people might find their way with greater security.

¹ The pewterers, for instance.

² Italian Relation.

Building was one of the favourite amusements of the rich in the time of Henry VIII. Wolsey was lavish in his expenditure on this point, indeed dangerously so for his own safety, during his retirement at York; extravagance is one of the charges against him. Hampton Court he built and gave to the King. His palace of York Place, afterwards Whitehall, was magnificent. Somerset was also a great builder, and, as has been said, spared not even churches to supply him with room and material for his new palace.

In such houses as these there was a great display of splendour, especially in times of festivity. Sumptuous masks, strange dressings-up, which appear to us almost childish, and must, one would think, have been very dull, were the delight of the time. The same sort of amusement was carried on out of doors. King Henry and his wife used to go Maying. The King and his archers would be up betimes, and dressed in Lincoln green, go into the woods of Greenwich. The Queen and her maidens, in some rich and peculiar dress, would ride out later in the day and be captured by the gallant outlaws, who feasted them nobly in sham fortresses of bushes. In less distinguished society amusements were of a somewhat more solid description. Then, as now, Englishmen could do nothing without eating. Their meals were large and heavy, and usually, if they had friends with them, taken at taverns. Of wine they drank but little, but they were very fond of beer, and although silent at their meals, found time frequently to pledge their guests. At Court there was a great rage for gambling; the largest disbursements, with the exception of those for jewels, in Henry VIII.'s Household Book are for gambling debts. He seems, indeed, to have had a taste for not the highest company; Domingo, the black, and the gentlemen and grooms of his chamber were his constant associates. Games of chance were well liked, too, by the commonalty, though the King seems to have thought them a royal monopoly, as they are frequently forbidden by statute and proclamation. They were, however, chiefly combined with manly exercise, consisting of tennis, bowls, and games of that sort. In opposition to these the lovers of old-fashion were always vaunting archery and martial exercises; nor, perhaps, were they very wrong; for, though crimes of imposture and fraud were much upon the increase, and went on increasing, crimes of violence, as we have stated, were very common, and the ploughman still ploughed with his sword or bow and buckler lying in the corner of the field.

¹ Italian Relation.

ELIZABETH.

1558—1603.

Born, 1533.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Scotland.	France.	Spain.	Germany.
Mary, 1542.	Henry II., 1547.	Philip II., 1556.	Ferdinand I., 1558.
James VI., 1567.	Francis II., 1559.	Philip III., 1598.	Maximilian II., 1564.
	Charles IX., 1560.		Rodolph II., 1576.
	Henry III., 1574.
	Henry IV., 1589.

POPES.—Paul IV., 1555. Pius IV., 1559. Pius V., 1566. Gregory XIII., 1572. Sixtus V., 1585. Urban VII., 1590. Gregory XIV., 1590. Innocent IX., 1591. Clement VIII., 1592.

Archbishops.

Matthew Parker, 1559.
Edmund Grindal, 1576.
John Whitgift, 1583.

Chancellors.

Sir Nicholas Bacon, 1558.
Sir Thomas Bromley, 1579.
Sir Christopher Hatton, 1587.
Sir John Puckering, 1592.
Sir Thomas Egerton, 1596.

ELIZABETH was at Hatfield when the news of the Queen's death was brought to her. Thither, on the 20th of November, a number of peers and gentlemen collected to acknowledge and congratulate her. She had already been proclaimed in London with the unanimous consent of Lords and Commons, for Parliament was sitting at the time, although dissolved by the late Queen's demise. After the Queen had received the Council at Hatfield, and had implied that no great change was in prospect, Cecil, who had all along acted as her adviser, and had already taken steps to secure her quiet accession, took the oaths as Secretary. She addressed him with solemn words of confidence:—"This judgment I have of you," she said, "that you will not be corrupted with any manner of gifts, and that you will be faithful to the State, and that without respect to my private will you will give me that counsel which you think best." Her confidence was not misplaced. Never had prince a more devoted minister, or one Elizabeth receives the news of Mary's death. Nov. 17, 1558.

Appoints Cecil Secretary.

1558]

POLICY OF THE REIGN

489

more ready to give all for the least possible return, and never has princess wanted a devoted adviser more.

The last reign had done nothing towards raising England to that independent position among European nations which it had lost under the reckless and fatal government of Northumberland. It was held abroad as necessary that the country should be protected by one or other of the great rivals, and add its weight and influence to that of its protector. It was still regarded as the prize and prey of the strongest and most skilful player. The task which Elizabeth and Cecil set themselves was to pick their way so nicely amid the various dangers that beset them, to play off so skilfully the jealousy of the great powers, that England, contradicting all expectations, might in time find itself strong enough to stand alone. The greatness of the Queen and her minister in the first part of her reign is marked by this, that a plan apparently so desperate was successful. To this object the Queen added another, in which she probably sympathized with by far the larger part of the nation. She was desirous to be free from Rome. Cecil, with far broader views and deeper insight into the necessities of the future, went much further, and desired the restitution of Protestantism. It was this double object which, though it seemed at first the great danger of the reign, and though it really gave to the whole of it a character of trouble and indecision, enabled the Queen and Cecil to attain ultimate success. Had there been no obstacle to the friendship with Spain at the beginning of the reign, Elizabeth would in all probability have fallen under its influence; for Philip had been her friend throughout her most difficult times, and, unable to secure any footing for himself in England, was ready to accept his sister-in-law as his representative, nay, even offered to draw tighter the bond which connected them, and to marry her. Had these overtures been accepted, England must have bidden farewell to all hope of an independent position in Europe; and had it not been for the steps towards Protestantism which were taken immediately on her accession, it is probable that this natural friendship would have resulted. These steps however were so opposed to the feelings of Philip, that they compelled him to hold somewhat aloof, although his interest in keeping England from France was too strong to allow him to withdraw his general support from the Queen. Resting upon this support, and strong in the persuasion that nothing but very violent measures would induce Philip to withdraw it, Cecil and the Religious and foreign policy of the reign, under the difficult circumstances of the country.

Based on a knowledge of the jealousy between France and Spain.

Queen could venture some distance along the road to Protestantism, and could bid defiance to the immediate danger which was threatening them from France. On this side the Queen's position was most perilous. The Spanish support of the Protestant Queen inclined the fervid Roman Catholics to look for assistance from the French ; nor, though throughout the last reign it had been constantly friendly to Elizabeth, had this Court any objection to enact the part of protector to the Catholics. The heir of the Scotch branch of the royal family—Mary Queen of Scots, who was recognized by many Catholics as the rightful Queen, and by many more as having a rightful claim to the succession—had married the Dauphin Francis, and this match had excited the hope that Scotland, England and France might one day be joined under one crown, and that this powerful united kingdom, cleaving asunder Spain from its great mercantile dependency the Netherlands, might assume a paramount ascendancy in Europe. It was by the skilful management of the jealousy thus aroused between the two possible supporters of the Catholics of England, that Cecil was enabled to continue in an independent and Protestant career, till events in France removed all danger from thence. England then found itself strong enough to follow the course which European events had been gradually forcing upon it, to let the discontented Catholics fall back upon Spain as their natural support, to break with that country, and bid defiance to the united Catholics of Europe.

To pursue with success such a course, where every step was beset with twofold difficulties, and watched by the jealous eyes of the ablest diplomatists of the Continent, required a firmness of purpose, an adroitness in the employment of means, and a power of dissimulation such as belonged to few statesmen. These qualities were possessed in a remarkable degree by Cecil, and by Walsingham, who upon Cecil's appointment as Treasurer became Secretary of State. Cecil had also a wonderful power of clearly comprehending the state of affairs at any given moment, an almost pedantically methodical habit of balancing the advantage and disadvantage of any line of action, and, what was most important in his situation, a power of tolerating and pleasing one of the most strange and capricious women who ever sat upon a throne.

Elizabeth was gifted with an excellent intellect, which she had cultivated carefully. She spoke several languages fluently, had read a certain quantity of the classics, and was ready with such repartee as might well pass for wit in a Queen.

Threatened
danger from France.

Character of Elizabeth's ministers.

Idiosyncrasies of the Queen.

Nor was her intellect superficial ; she had a very clear insight into the state of affairs around her. But she had two peculiarities which rendered her most difficult to deal with. She had a rooted dislike to making up her mind, and this defect she tried to carry off, or even turn to advantage, by adopting a line of conduct which the tendencies of the age rendered only too common. Craft and intrigue were the characteristics of the public life of the time. Of these Elizabeth had a large share, and was able to cover her vacillation by constant waiting upon the chances of the future, and by a double-faced line of action, supported by a perfect disregard for truth. Her own ministers could never be sure that she was not betraying them. No foreign powers to whom she had promised assistance could be sure that she would not refuse to recognize her promises when the time arrived, and the only way by which Cecil could keep her in the desired path was by suddenly engaging her in some measure from which she could not withdraw. Added to this constitutional vacillation, she possessed two quite different sides to her character. She was at once a prudent and intriguing Queen, and a vain coquettish woman. She was thus always expecting from those who approached her profound respect and admiration, and traded on the immunities of her sex so far as to require great sacrifices to be made for her. She would thus commission her commanders and diplomatists to follow a certain course of action, but expect them, if the expedition failed or the intrigue was discovered, to exonerate her from all blame, and to assert that they had acted on their own authority. Worse than this, although in the main she sought the good of her country and followed the advice, if judiciously administered, of her wisest counsellors, she was constantly surrounded by a second circle of favourite courtiers, on whom she lavished all the lucrative places and monopolies which she had at her disposal, and whose influence, exerted for selfish and unpatriotic ends, increased her own constitutional tendency towards double-dealing. They were, it is true, in nearly every case men of ability, but retained their position by flattery and courtier-like arts, and were allowed to take liberties which in some instances threatened seriously to compromise her character. The Queen's purely feminine and coquettish side rendered it also very difficult to know what she would be inclined to do when suitors came about her ; and as much of the politics of the day depended upon her marriage, there was always this difficult element to take into consideration.

It was this wayward, capricious, vacillating, intriguing, but withal high-intentioned woman that Cecil, and those who thought like him, had to guide. They were by no means always successful. The time arrived when a straightforward adoption of Protestant interests appeared to them the only honourable and politic course. But although, in the long run, they succeeded in forcing Elizabeth into the championship of European Protestantism, they were constantly thwarted by her irresolution and determined preference for double-dealing.

Two questions at once presented themselves for solution—religion, and the cessation of the late disastrous war. Spanish statesmen and the larger number of Englishmen thought that the Queen would be obliged to act as the creature of Philip or be crushed between the power of Spain and France. It was not certain whether a change of religion was possible in the face of such a necessity. But Cecil rightly appreciated the popular feeling. He knew he could rely upon the middle class of England for support in Protestant measures, and felt certain that the nobility would not fail him in measures leading to national independence. Till Parliament could be called, however—and it was to meet in the middle of January 1559—there was an anxious time. Nothing could have been at once more cautious and more determined than the steps which were taken. A few of Mary's most intimate counsellors seem to have left the Council, but many of them were retained, while a few trusty partisans of the Protestant religion were added, including Russell, Earl of Bedford, Parr, Marquis of Northampton, Francis Knowles, and Sir Nicholas Bacon as Chancellor. The Liturgy was so far altered that certain parts of it, including the Gospel and Epistle and the Creed, were allowed to be read in English, as in Henry VIII.'s reign, and the elevation of the Host at Mass was forbidden. But at the same time the tendency on the part of the Ultra-Protestants to forestall their triumph was sharply checked, and unlicensed preaching strictly forbidden. But in secret, a committee of divines, with the knowledge only of Cecil and two or three devoted counsellors, were revising and correcting the English Liturgy of Edward VI., ready for the approaching Parliament.

Even such slight measures as were taken excited the astonishment of the Spanish minister, who thought the Queen was running headlong to destruction, especially when, early in 1559, Philip instructed him to propose formally for the hand of the Queen, and the proposal was rejected. It was plain to Cecil that, happen what would, for the present at all events Philip must stand by England. Churchmen, however, shared so certainly in the belief of the approaching failure of the Queen, that nearly all the Bishops ventured to refuse to crown her. The ceremony was performed by Oglethorpe of Carlisle.

On the 25th of January 1559, Parliament met. Cecil had not reckoned too much on its Protestant character. No doubt, as was usual, it was in some degree a packed Parliament. It at once proceeded to active measures. The first-fruits, which Mary had resigned, were restored to the Crown, and the necessary subsidies granted. The Lower House, headed by the Speaker, then had an audience with the Queen to entreat her to marry. It seemed to everybody the one necessary thing. Had she died, it was almost certain that Henry of France would make good the claim of his daughter-in-law Mary, and England would be annexed to France. They mentioned no particular suitor, for which she thanked them, while on the general question she replied in an ambiguous answer, saying that the kingdom was her husband, and that she hoped to die a Virgin Queen, but that if she married she would choose a husband who would be as careful of the interests of the nation as she was herself. The Commons seem to have regarded this as a favourable answer, and as implying that she would marry a subject. They then proceeded with their religious reform. A Supremacy Act was at once brought forward, by which the Queen was declared Supreme Head of the Church, and all the jurisdiction of the Papal See was done away. But at first there was considerable difficulty in introducing into it any change of dogma. The clergy had declared against all change, and it was thought decent to hold a public disputation on the matter. This was carried on before Sir Nicholas Bacon, the new Lord Keeper, Cecil's brother-in-law, who was appointed Moderator. The arrangements made told considerably in favour of the Protestants, and, on the Catholic champions refusing to continue the argument unless these arrangements were changed, they were declared vanquished, two of them committed to prison, and the rest ordered to absent themselves from the Court. Unopposed by them, the statute at length passed, declaring the Queen Supreme Head of the Church, repealing the Acts of the late reign which had revived the statutes against heresies,¹ and giving the Queen power to appoint commissioners to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction. For the maintenance of the Act, it was ordered that an oath to accept it would be offered to all ecclesiastical persons, all temporal judges and officers, and any one receiving money of the Queen. At the same time it was made punishable to uphold by express word, deed or writing, any foreign authority in the country.

¹ 1 & 2 Philip and Mary, c. vi.

The next measure was the reform of the Liturgy. The Prayer Book which had been prepared in secret was produced and accepted, and the Act of Uniformity ordered that it should be used in every church, and that all persons inhabiting the realm should attend church under a shilling fine. The work of the last reign was thus undone, and England was again and for ever disunited from the Roman Church.

The Queen's courage in refusing Philip, and in pursuing this line of policy so distasteful to him, is the more obvious when we remember that during the same time she was engaged in negotiations in which her chief reliance was on Spanish support. If Spain did not stand her friend, it was impossible for her to hope for the restoration of Calais. In the autumn of the last year, Philip and Henry II., after a fruitless campaign, had both expressed willingness to come to terms, and commissioners had met at Cercamp to discuss the terms of peace. In fact, the condition of their respective dominions¹ led them both to observe that a common danger was threatening them, and that all their efforts would be wanted to suppress the rising Protestants. But although thus pacifically disposed, Philip stood honourably by his allies, and there was every chance of a final breach in the negotiations if Calais was not restored. In fact the Spaniards saw plainly that it was much for their interest that that fortress should be held by the English as a check upon France in the direction of the Netherlands. Henry II., under these circumstances, opened a private negotiation with Elizabeth, by the intervention of the Protestant and anti-Guise party in his Court. He wished the negotiations to be carried on in some private village. This Elizabeth refused, and insisted upon the treaty being publicly made, but did not hide from Philip that she intended for her own safety to make a separate peace. This peace was concluded on the 2nd of April; Calais was left in the hands of France, to be restored in eight years, provided the other articles of the peace were kept; if it was not restored, France was to pay five hundred thousand crowns, and the English claim to the throne to continue good; if the English attacked either France or Scotland, the treaty was void.

Freed from his difficulties with the English, Philip could conclude his peace with France, which was to be strengthened by a marriage

¹ In 1557 persecutions had already begun in France, and after the breaking-up of one Assembly in the Rue St. Jacques, had touched the nobles, while in 1558 public assemblies of five or six thousand had met in the Près-aux-Clercs.

Peace with France, and Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis.

between himself and the French Princess Elizabeth. The treaty, one of the avowed objects of which was the suppression of Protestantism, is called the treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis. At the festivities attending the marriage, Henry II. was killed by Montgomery, a Scotch gentleman, with whom he was tilting. His death put upon the throne Francis II., weak both in body and mind; and party questions in France preventing any rapid action, postponed the steps which might otherwise have been taken in favour of Mary the Scotch Princess, now Queen of France.

Before this, the Oath of Supremacy had been tendered to the clergy. All the Bishops but two had declined to accept it and been driven from their sees, which were given to the most learned of the Protestant divines which could be found—Matthew Parker being selected as Archbishop of Canterbury. The lesser clergy had been less scrupulous; only about eighty are said to have been displaced. So England was still full of an influential class who were secret enemies to the Government.

Elizabeth had thus far carried her point successfully. Thanks to the jealousy of France, she had freed herself from Spain without losing its support, while the change of religion in England had been carried out without difficulty. For some time to come it was France and French influence which was to be her great enemy. This she was now ready to meet. The battle was to be fought in Scotland. It is therefore necessary to observe somewhat closely the political condition of that country.

From the time of the battle of Pinkie, 1547, all hopes of a friendly arrangement with Scotland had been at an end, and the Scotch, in their anger against England, turned to their old alliance with France. In 1550 a peace was made between England and France in which Scotland was included, and the bitter war which had been raging ceased. The French influence was now completely paramount, the young Queen was in France and contracted with the Dauphin, and in the year 1554 Arran was persuaded to resign the regency and his son's claim to the Queen's hand, and Mary of Lorraine, the Queen-Dowager, became Regent. Arran was rewarded for his compliance with the Duchy of Chatelherault. Unable to comprehend the government of a constitutional country, the Regent relied much on Frenchmen, and tried to establish fortresses garrisoned by French in different parts of the country. She attempted also to establish a body-guard as a nucleus for a standing army. All these steps excited the jealousy of the

Death of
Henry II.
July 10, 1559.

General acceptance of the Oath of Supremacy.

State of affairs
in Scotland.

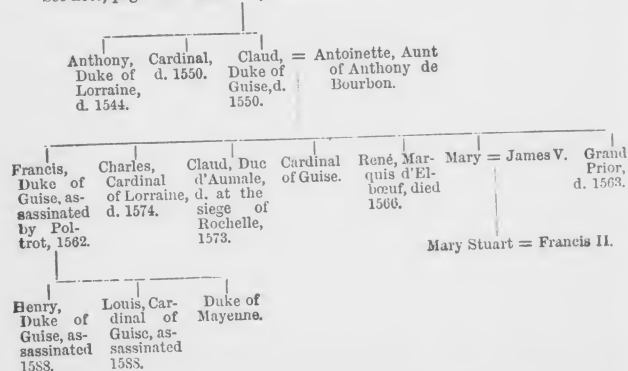

Regency of
Mary of Guise.

Scotch, and tended to make them hate the French as much as they had formerly hated the English. This feeling was further strengthened by the marriage of Mary with the Dauphin, which was completed in April 1558, with secret arrangements that Scotland should become in reality the possession of the House of Valois. Little more than a year completed this work, for on the death of Henry II. (July 1559) the Dauphin became King of France under the title of Francis II., and Mary of Scotland Queen.

The nobles, to whom the power of France had become an object of dread, found support in the growing power of the Reformation. A united opposition was formed. The party opposed to the French and the eager Reformers made common cause. In December 1557 a document was issued known as the First Covenant,¹ and the leaders of the organization took the title of the Lords of the Congregation. An act of religious persecution brought matters to extremities. Walter Mill, an old man of eighty, was burned, and the Protestant party was roused to fury. The Regent at first temporized, and seemed inclined to give way to them, but instructions from her brothers of the House of Guise,² now rapidly rising to the chief authority in France, decided her henceforward to oppose the Reformation with all her power. In pursuance of this policy, and in the spirit of the treaties of 1559, she issued a summons to the preachers of Perth to appear before the Privy Council, for having there introduced the Reformation, and read

Rise of the Lords of the Congregation.

¹ See note, page 534. ² René II., Duke of Lorraine.

the service from Edward VI.'s Prayer Book. The preachers did not appear, and were outlawed; probably they offered to appear, but with so large a multitude behind them that ^{They take arms.} the Regent refused to see them. There was at all events a meeting assembled, at Perth, and there John Knox, who had just arrived from France, preached a stirring sermon. A riot was the consequence, in which some religious houses were sacked. This was the work of rioters and not of Reformers, and the nobility, even the Lords of the Congregation, could not refuse to join the Regent to suppress the riot. Argyle, Lord James Stuart, Lord Semple, and other Protestant leaders, advanced against Perth. A compromise was there effected, by which it was arranged that no French troops should enter the city. The Regent evaded these stipulations, and the Lords of the Congregation who had sided with her took the opportunity of joining their old friends. The Lords of the Congregation took up arms; St. Andrews was taken, Fifeshire cleared of the French, and on the 29th of June Edinburgh was occupied. It was certain that assistance would come from France to the Regent, and for their own safety the Lords of the Congregation were obliged to seek the help of Elizabeth.

It is thus that Scotland becomes of vital importance to English affairs, as affording the ground on which the interests of England and France came into immediate contact. An alliance with the Scotch malcontents was in the last degree necessary to England. ^{They ask help from England.} Elizabeth had of her own accord severed herself from Spanish support. The treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis had even formed a temporary alliance between France and Spain. It was generally expected that the re-establishment of Catholicism in Scotland would be followed by the invasion of England from that country, and the assertion of the right of Mary backed by the whole power of France. The knowledge of this scheme gave significance to the otherwise trifling point that the arms of England were habitually quartered with those of France in all the heraldic decorations of the French Court. But desirable though the alliance was, there were obstacles in the way. Elizabeth hated Knox for a book he had written against the "Regiment of Women," and moreover felt it so necessary to strengthen her possession of the Crown by every available principle, that she was very unwilling to give public countenance to rebels who were calling the Divine right of kings in question. Her Protestant advisers eagerly pressed her to waive her objections, and suggested as a means of removing her scruples that Arran should lay claim to the Scottish throne. With him no longer a rebel, but a pretender with some show of right, it might be possible to treat. They even thought it possible that Elizabeth might marry him, and with that object he came to England. She probably saw the folly and insanity of his character, and would hear no more of such a match.

While Elizabeth was hesitating, the Regent was fortifying Leith, which she made so strong, that although the English Queen at last made a treaty, called the Treaty of Berwick, with the discontented nobles, as represented by the Duke of Chatelherault, "the second person in the kingdom," and although in pursuance of this treaty an English army was sent to assist in the siege, the French garrison were enabled to repel all attacks, till a pacification was arranged between Cecil and Royal Commissioners with France, known as the Treaty of Edinburgh. This was concluded early in July. In June the Regent

*Treaty of Edinburgh.
1560.*

had died. By the Treaty of Edinburgh the French army was to be withdrawn from Scotland, the government during the Queen's absence was to be in the hands of a council of twelve noblemen, the nominees partly of the Queen, partly of the Estates, religious matters were to be settled in Parliament, and it was stipulated that the obnoxious coat of arms should no longer be used. Queen Mary refused to ratify the treaty, in spite of *Protestantism established by the Estates.

Aug. 25, 1560.*

which the Estates assembled at the appointed time and accepted the Confession of Faith, which was the formula of the Genevan Church, repealing all Acts which authorized any other form of worship, and abjuring the authority of the Pope. The celebration of the Mass was rendered a capital offence if repeated three times. Protestantism thus became the national religion.

It was pretty certain that such measures would not be sanctioned in France, where the Guises were now paramount. The conspiracy of Amboise, a plan matured by the Protestants for obtaining possession of the person of the King, had been thwarted by their vigilance, and a series of ruthless executions was breaking the spirit of the Huguenot party. These vindictive punishments were carried out in the name of the King; and Church and King, Protestantism and treason, had come to be regarded as synonymous—a view which, however unjust it may have been, was employed with great effect by the Guise party.

Before the end of the year Queen Mary was a widow, and the power of the Guises broken. This change of circumstances had great influence on the state of affairs in Scotland. Ambassadors were sent to the widowed Queen to urge her return home. Smarting under the slights which Catherine de Medici, the Queen Mother of France, cast upon her, and feeling acutely her loss of position, she agreed to the request. Patriotism had always been the strongest motive of Scotch policy; jealousy of England had thrown the people into the arms of France—jealousy of France had in its turn produced the English alliance and the Treaty of Berwick. The fear of France was now removed, and there again arose a strong desire among the Scotch to be freed from all foreign influence, and to be left to manage their own affairs themselves. Nor was this all. The national party in Scotland, in conjunction with a very considerable portion of the people of England, were desirous that the claims of Mary, as the successor at all events to the English throne, should be admitted. In England her succession would no doubt act more or less as a check to the growth of Protestantism; to a great many people in England this was no objection. On the other hand, it would secure peacefully the great design so continually before the eyes of English statesmen since the time of Edward I., and unite England and Scotland under one crown. Such were the views of Lord James, afterwards Earl of Murray, Prior of St. Andrews, the illegitimate brother of Mary, who had acted consistently with the Congregation during the late disturbances, and who now put himself at the head of the national party. He stipulated that no foreign force should be introduced by the Queen, and that she should not disturb the existing religion. On these conditions the bulk of the people were ready to welcome her. She set sail for her kingdom, but her passage was not unattended with difficulty; for in spite of her pretended friendship for Elizabeth, she still refused to accept the Treaty of Edinburgh, and the English Queen, with great want of generosity, refused her a safe conduct through her dominions. Ships were waiting to prevent her from reaching Scotland: she eluded them, however, and reached that country in safety (Aug. 19, 1561). The singing of psalms to the sound of three-stringed rebecks, although she graciously expressed her pleasure at the serenade, and a violent effort to break into the Chapel of Holyrood and prevent her from hearing Mass—an uproar checked only by the personal authority of Murray—did not give her a pleasant idea of her new subjects, and promised ill for the success of a moderate Reformation.

Immediately after the Treaty of Edinburgh, and before the negotiations for the return of Mary, Elizabeth had let slip an opportunity which might have changed the whole course of her reign. The Estates of Scotland, taking up the idea which had already been comes home, supported by the national party.*

*Queen Mary

PER. MON.

k

suggested, had made a formal request to her to marry the Earl of Arran. This young man, the son of the Duke of Chatelherault, stood nearest to the throne after his father. Could Elizabeth have accepted him, as was the earnest desire of the Protestant statesmen of both parties, it is very probable that the superior claims of the absent Queen, unpopular in the eyes of the Protestants on account of her relationship with the Guises, would have been forgotten, and the peaceful union of the two kingdoms, with a government on a Protestant basis, would have resulted. In himself, however, Arran was a most undesirable husband. The weak, passionate nature of his youth ripened afterwards into madness. It is probable that another reason besides her dislike for the man induced the Queen to reject her

Rise of Dudley,
Earl of Leicester.

counsellors' advice. Lord Robert Dudley, a son of the late Duke of Northumberland, had attracted her attention and won her heart. Both nobles and commons regarded the idea of a marriage of this kind with dislike; but it was unquestionably a much-received opinion that the Queen and Dudley would marry, and Lord Robert prepared the way for his own elevation by intrigues in all directions, in which sometimes the Queen was involved, and by procuring the murder of his wife, the unfortunate Amy Robsart. So eager was he in his ambitious schemes, that he entered into communication with the Spaniards, offering to restore the Catholic religion if they would support him, and asserting that Elizabeth was privy to this scheme. Philip, who all along had expected that sooner or later she would have recourse to his assistance, signified his consent; but the favourite's influence, although it formed a very sufficient bar to the marriage with Arran, was not sufficiently strong to thwart the advice of Cecil. He not only succeeded in avoiding the danger of any approximation to Spain, he even forced England further along the course of reform. He carried out the laws against Roman Catholics more strictly, and persuaded the Queen to refuse admission to a nuncio from the Pope, who was coming to persuade her to send representatives to a General Council, and he induced her to give some assistance to the Protestants in France, who were now in open antagonism to the Government.

In that country events had occurred which at first promised very well for the Protestant cause. After the failure of the conspiracy of Amboise, the Guises had been absolutely masters of the Government, and had succeeded in arresting Anthony of Bourbon, King of Navarre,¹ and the Prince of Condé; Coligny had chivalrously refused to hold aloof from his leaders in danger. They had designed the death of the King of Navarre, as though in a quarrel with the young King. They had arranged everything for the trial and execution of Condé, and the Bourbons and Chatillons (that is, Coligny and his brothers) had seemed hopelessly lost, when the sudden illness of Francis II., speedily followed by his death, had destroyed all their plans. Catherine de Medici, who hated both parties, and wished to see them destroy each other, had obtained the regency from her young son Charles IX. She took for her minister the Chancellor de l'Hôpital, and tried to establish the crown in an independent position by playing one party against the other. The liberation of the Princes of the blood and their union with Catherine, and the tolerant policy of de l'Hôpital, gave for the time an air of success to the Protestants. Cecil entered into negotiations with them; there was even some hope of a restitution of Calais. But the calm was of short duration. Parties were too much in earnest and too exasperated to be managed or caressed into quiet, and the massacre of Vassy (1562), where the people of the Duke of Guise fell upon and killed a party of Protestants at their worship, and the repetition of the massacre elsewhere, roused the Reformers to arms, and began the long war of religion in France. The approach of that war must have been long obvious, and the Guises had obtained support and active assistance from the Spaniards.

Beginning of religious wars
in France.

Should the Guises be successful, a general alliance of the Catholic powers would result. But the separation of those powers was the vital point in Cecil's policy, and the sole hope for the security of England. Should Condé be overthrown, he writes, "Philip and the Guises would become the dictators of Europe, Spain would have Ireland, Mary Queen of Scots would marry Don Carlos, the Council of Trent would pass a general sentence against all Protestants, and the English Catholics, directed and supported from abroad, would rise in universal rebellion." The apparent approach of that danger in-

1

Charles, Duke of Vendôme.
Descended by seven degrees from Louis IX. (1225-1270).
Died 1537.

Charles, Cardinal of Bourbon.
Crowned 1589
as Charles X.
Died 1590.

Louis, Duke
of Condé.
Died 1569.

Anthony de Bourbon = Jeanne d'Albret.
King of Navarre.
Died 1562.

Henry IV., 1589-1610.

duced Cecil and the Queen to listen to the application of Condé, who offered to place Havre and Dieppe in her hands as securities. She accordingly despatched an army to occupy Havre. Although her generals exceeded her orders, which were merely to act on the defensive, and acted energetically for the defence of Rouen, that city fell after a siege, in which the King of Navarre, who had lately joined his old enemies, lost his life. Condé—now become the first Prince of the blood—advanced towards Paris, where Catherine, in the hands of the Guises, but still anxious for the success of an intermediate policy, made another effort at peace. The obstacle was the refusal of Condé to throw over Elizabeth. The negotiations were broken off, and Condé, while hastening back to join the English army, was compelled to fight the battle of Dreux (Dec. 1562), in which, though the cavalry of the Protestants were victorious, the whole fate of the day was in favour of the Catholics. The triumph of their party was brought to an abrupt conclusion when, in March of the following year, the Duke of Guise, while besieging Orleans, was killed by the assassin Poltrot. His death changed the appearance of affairs in France. The family of the Guises disappeared with strange rapidity. The Duke d'Aumale was severely wounded, and the Grand Prior died of an illness caught at the battle of Dreux. The Cardinal of Lorraine was away at the General Council; the Marquis d'Elbœuf was closely besieged by Coligny. Other chiefs, who would naturally have taken the lead, were also out of the political field; Navarre was dead, Condé was a prisoner, the Constable Montmorency, who had been fighting for the Guises, was a prisoner also. For the time Catherine found herself mistress of the position. She was enabled to carry out her policy of toleration; and Condé, aware

Events of the war enable Catherine to bring about the Peace of Amboise.

Disasters of the English at Havre.

of Elizabeth's selfish motive for the detention of Havre, agreed to the dismissal of the foreign allies on both sides, and signed the Peace of Amboise in March 1563. The English in Havre were thus left unsupported. Elizabeth would not accept Condé's offers, but persisted in holding the town, and Condé was obliged to turn against her the army she had originally assisted in raising. The plague broke out in the city, but the defenders still held out bravely. Large reinforcements were sent over only to die, and at last, Warwick, the commander, with his garrison worn out with disease, had to surrender. The returning troops spread the plague throughout England, and the mortality rose in London to 2000 a week. This disaster excited a constant mistrust of the Huguenots in Elizabeth's mind.

While Elizabeth was thus actively, though uselessly, interfering in the politics of France, Mary, under the guidance of Lord James Murray, was apparently intent upon keeping up her good relations with England. She even appeared to favour the national religion, and was induced to accompany Murray in an expedition against Huntly and the Northern Catholics, who were defeated on the Hill of Corrichie, not far from Aberdeen. She sought the advice of Elizabeth with regard to her marriage, implying that she was her natural heiress, and that her matrimonial arrangements were therefore of interest to the English Queen. None the less, she had agents in constant intercourse with the Spanish and with the Guises, and was even thinking of marrying Don Carlos, the son of Philip. Her application to Elizabeth was met by advice it was impossible to follow. To Elizabeth and her counsellors it seemed highly important that Mary should, if possible, be married to an Englishman and a Protestant. To the astonishment of the world, the nobleman recommended to Mary's acceptance was Robert Dudley, with whom the English Queen was believed to be herself deeply in love. To obviate difficulties with regard to rank, she raised him to the Earldom of Leicester. But Mary was not likely to make anything but a royal marriage if she married for political reasons; and as the conference in which her claims had been discussed had just broken up without result, dissimulation was no longer necessary, and determining to make good, not her reversionary, but her present claims, she soon displayed herself in her true colours. If she could not be accepted as successor by fair means, she would so connect herself with the Catholic party in England as to threaten Elizabeth's own throne. The acknowledged representative of this party was the first Prince of the blood in England, Lord Henry Darnley, son of the Earl of Lennox. Margaret Tudor, the elder of Henry VIII.'s sisters, after the death of her first husband, the King of Scotland, had married the Earl of Angus; her daughter by this marriage was the Countess of Lennox, of whom Darnley was the son. Lennox was induced to go to Scotland, and Elizabeth was persuaded to allow him to do so for the purpose of regaining the Lennox property and the reversal of the attainder which rested on him. His son was naturally anxious to join him—the whole being, no doubt, a prearranged scheme, though whether Mary was herself cognizant of it is uncertain. It was plain to all, however, that the young man had caught her fancy; their first meeting in fact settled the question of the Queen's marriage. Darnley rapidly received the Mary's government under Murray's influence.

She demands to be acknowledged successor, and is refused.

titles of Lord of Ardmanach, Earl of Ross, and Duke of Albany, and the marriage was completed on the 29th of July. Marries Darnley. Shortly before this, the reception of Randolph, the English ambassador, was such as to show that the connection between the two courts was broken. In fact, Queen Mary had settled upon her line of action. She had determined to connect herself with the European Catholic league.

In the spring of 1565, Catherine de Medici, and the Duke of Alva on the part of the King of Spain, had met at Bayonne; and although it is not probable that, as was supposed, the massacre of St. Bartholomew was there arranged, or that any distinct written league was made, it is certain that Alva explained the vigorous and bloody policy which he intended to pursue, and that the meeting marks the period when efforts to temporize with Protestantism ceased. Mary was believed to be a party to the league; and whether there were such a league or not, she determined to throw in her lot with the Catholics. Joins the Catholic League. She naturally first turned towards France, but the temporizing policy of Catherine de Medici did not allow her to listen to the application. The close connection between Mary and France was thus broken, and she was henceforward inclined to rely chiefly on Spain. In fact, the danger which threatened England from France had subsided. The vehemence of religious dissensions, and the necessity felt by the Government of keeping either party from gaining the pre-eminence, paralyzed its power of vigorous action. It is with Spain, hitherto her lukewarm supporter, that Elizabeth had now to cope.

But Mary, although without the foreign assistance on which she relied, felt that she was leaning upon all the Catholic powers in Europe. She could therefore afford to act with vigour. The discontented Lords were driven into England, and the progress of the Reformation in Scotland seemed for the present to be suppressed.

Mary's reliance upon the difficulties of Elizabeth's position was well grounded. It seemed as if Cecil's policy had only been attended with success hitherto to meet at length with the more complete downfall. Spain had been braved, and no ill results had followed; a war with France had been entered upon, yet France seemed paralyzed; Protestantism had been re-established, and England had begun to regain her position in Europe. All this success had been due to the jealousy of the Catholic powers; but there was now every reason to believe that their quarrels had been compromised, and that they were ready to act in harmony for the re-establishment of their religion. The danger was aggravated by the existence of a large and powerful body of Catholics, especially in the North, who were all suspected of being in Mary's interest. As long as the Treaty of Edinburgh was unratified (as it still was), Mary was in fact making a claim on the English throne. Under such circumstances, Elizabeth could not wholly break with the Catholic powers by giving assistance to the fugitive Lords. Though it was plain, therefore, on which side her wishes were, yet, in order to contradict the suggestions which the ambassadors of France and Spain were making, that she was assisting the rebels, she granted She repudiates Murray. Murray a public interview, only to rate him soundly for venturing to ask her for assistance in such a cause, and to insist upon an open denial of any encouragement received at her hands. Murray saw the position of affairs, and prudently corroborated Elizabeth's falsehood.

The marriage of Mary with Darnley, though for the time it produced the effects intended, and enabled the Queen to carry out with success the first measures of a Catholic reaction, had in it the seeds of failure. Darnley was childish and petulant, a notoriously loose liver, and at the same time jealous of his wife. His loose tongue could not keep these private squabbles sacred. There was known to be a breach between the King and Queen, and partisans began to gather to one side or the other—"King," Darnley was called by courtesy only, for the way in which Mary was showing her growing dislike for him was by refusing to grant him the crown matrimonial. It was believed that it was the influence of Rizzio which was chiefly instrumental in preventing Darnley from obtaining this object of his wishes. David Rizzio was an Italian adventurer, who had become private secretary to the Queen, and had rendered himself necessary to her by holding as he did all the threads of her correspondence with the Catholic powers abroad. Being engaged too in secret correspondences, he was often in close and intimate private conversation with her. Darnley's jealousy was excited against him; while the hatred of the Protestant party, who regarded him as the chief instrument of the Papal power in Scotland, and detested him for the upstart airs which he seems to have assumed, forgot for a moment their enmity with Darnley, and united in a plot in which Rizzio was to be the victim. Documents of association were drawn up between themselves and Darnley in March 1566, by which they pledged themselves to procure for him the crown matrimonial, and to secure the death of Rizzio; while he was to guarantee the recall of Murray, the restoration of the banished Lords, and the maintenance of the Protestant religion. Meanwhile Mary, unwitting of the danger which threatened her, was preparing a fresh assault upon Murray. The Parliament was summoned chiefly for the purpose of passing a Bill of Attainder against him, and she had by her own personal influence succeeded in procuring the nomination as Lords of the Articles—as the Committee was called which prepared measures for Parliament—of men who would make no scruple in bringing in such a Bill of Attainder. It was necessary that such a step should be forestalled. The Lords of the Articles were nominated on the 7th, and in the evening of the 9th, the Earl of Morton, with a party of Douglasses, quietly surrounded the Palace of Holyrood, while Ruthven, with George Douglas, Ker of Faldonside, and Darnley, went up to the Queen's apartments. She was sitting at supper with Rizzio and the Countess of Argyle, a French physician and other attendants were present. Darnley's duty was to hold the Queen. He drew near her, pretending to caress her—she drew back from his embrace; the stern form of Ruthven, deadly pale from a recent illness, met her eye standing in the doorway, the tapestry of which he had raised.

Quarrels between Mary and Darnley.

Murder of Rizzio.

She sprang up, exclaiming "Judas!" and demanded of Ruthven what he wanted. With bitter words he told her he had come for Rizzio, who had been with her too long already. He pushed the Queen into Darnley's arms, bade the attendants meddle with him at their peril, and calling his comrades to his assistance, dragged Rizzio out of the room and despatched him in the corridor. George Douglas struck the first blow with a dagger he had snatched from Darnley, crying, "This from the King." Bothwell and Huntly, and other friends of the Queen, who were in the palace, came down, astonished at the uproar, and at first seemed inclined to fight; but Ruthven disclosed the second act of the plot, telling them that the banished Earls would be there before morning: and finding themselves outnumbered, they thought it wiser to fly. Mary had been left quite alone in her rooms; none of her ladies were allowed to visit her. In that terrible loneliness she formed her plan of vengeance, and at once proceeded to act upon it. Darnley, weak and lustful, was the merest child in her hands. Before the day was over, she had half won him back by her caresses, had got her ladies restored to her, and sent messages to Bothwell and Huntly. In another day she had got from Darnley all the secrets of the conspiracy, and had persuaded him to fly with her from Holyrood, and take refuge in the castle of Dunbar.

Bothwell and her friends gathered round her, and in a few days

she was able to return to Edinburgh at the head of a considerable army. She was thus strong enough to summon Morton, Ruthven, Lindsay, and others to answer for the murder, but they had already fled to England, and were outlawed. Mary's reconciliation with Darnley was the merest pretence; she loathed him with a great hatred, and they soon came again to quarrelling. Murray, Argyle, and Maitland, not having been present at the murder, were received into favour, and worked for a time with Bothwell and Huntly. This appearance was also fallacious. The Queen had determined upon the destruction of Darnley, and upon the ruin of Murray and his friends, but it was necessary for the time to keep up appearances. The man on whom she really leant was Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, a coarse and brutal Border noble, with an outward polish of manners learnt in France. With this man it was plain that she was falling violently in love. To this passion she had never yet fallen a prey. There was so much of nobleness in her character, that when once seized by it she was capable of any acts of self-denial and devotion. Such passionate love is a bad guide for a queen in such difficult circumstances as hers, and it was upon it that she made shipwreck of her life. There were two obstacles in the way of Bothwell's success in securing Mary for his wife—they were both of them married.

Meanwhile, Mary had a son (June 19, 1566), whose advent had been hailed as a possible means of healing the difficulties of the country. Elizabeth showed her good-will towards him by consenting to act as his godmother, and it was likely that his undisputed succession to the English throne might set that difficult question at rest. The events of his christening were however ominous; Darnley, although in the house, refused to be present, and Bothwell did all the necessary duties. Already such of the nobles engaged in the conspiracy for the death of Rizzio as had been pardoned began to press for the recall of their banished comrades. Their hatred for Darnley, who had betrayed them, and was still instrumental in keeping their friends in banishment, was only equalled by that of the Queen and Bothwell, in whose way he stood. Community of interests drew these strange parties together, and Bothwell at a meeting held at Craigmillar, contrived to get the signatures of Argyle, Huntly, Maitland, and Sir James Balfour to a bond for securing the death of Darnley—"That for sae mickle as it was thought expedient and profitable for the commonweal, by the nobility and lords underwritten, that sic an young fool and proud tyran (as the King) should not bear rule of them—for divers causes, therefore, they had all concluded that he should be put forth by one way or other."

Bothwell

The Bond of Craigmillar.

Such a bond shows how deeply determined the nobles of all parties were to get rid of this treacherous and overweening young man. The rumour of some such plan reached England, and probably reached Darnley himself. It was almost certain that he had some inkling of what was about to happen. The event was not long deferred. About ten months after the death of Rizzio, the King fell ill (January 1567); his disease is said to have been small-pox. As he was recovering Mary affected solicitude for his comfort, and visited him. It was agreed that he should be removed from Glas-

Murder of Darnley.
Feb. 10.

gow, where he was ill, to Craigmillar. This plan was afterwards changed, and Edinburgh was decided upon. Darnley felt a foreboding of his fate. He told Crawford, a follower of his father's, who was visiting him, "Though he liked it not, he would trust himself in her hands though she should cut his throat." Mary wrote that night to Bothwell, describing the scene. When it was arranged that Darnley should be taken to Edinburgh, it was alleged that Holyrood was not healthy for him, and he was to be taken to Kirk-o'-field, as he understood to the palace of the Hamiltons there. But Bothwell had arranged matters better than that. A lone, half-ruinous portion of a destroyed priory had been got ready for him, a room above for himself, and a room downstairs for the Queen. There she visited him, and there as usual she subdued him and made him again in love with her. But one day she suddenly remembered that her servant Bastia (or Sebastian) was going to be married, and that she must grace the festivities with her presence. Singularly, during the visit she had just paid her husband, she twice passed the door of her own room without entering it; had she done so she would have found the bed removed and the room filled with bags of gunpowder: all the previous night Bothwell and his friends had been storing it there. After she had gone, the arrangements were completed, and two of Bothwell's men were left in the house. Perhaps Darnley discovered them and tried to fly with his page, for their bodies were found strangled in a neighbouring orchard, and not among the ruins of the house. Bothwell came down to complete the explosion, but in his hurry seems to have forgotten to replace the bodies. When the train was lighted, he rushed home to bed, and received the news of the disaster with well-feigned astonishment and cries of treason.

Such acting, however, though helped by all the influence of the Queen, did not deceive the nation. Tickets and placards were soon affixed in the night to the walls charging Bothwell and others with the murder. Lennox, the murdered man's father, demanded a speedy inquiry. Such an inquiry, in some form or other, could not be refused, but care might be taken to render it quite nugatory. Bothwell was allowed to remain at large and to enjoy the full favour of the Queen. Edinburgh Castle, commanding the place of trial, was put into his hands, and the town was filled with his followers. The day for the trial was fixed, and that at so short a distance of time that Lennox could have no opportunity of collecting evidence. Such short time as there was he employed in calling together armed followers, for it was evident that no justice could be obtained unless backed by force. A proclamation was then issued forbidding him to appear with more than six followers. Of course he could not thus risk his life among Bothwell's rough Border riders. All efforts had been in vain to procure any postponement of the trial. A messenger from Elizabeth, who brought a letter urging such a course, was kept outside Holyrood Palace, and saw Bothwell ride out in triumph to be tried, kissing his hand to the Queen, whose deep sleep had just before been urged as a reason for her not receiving Elizabeth's letter. The trial was conducted according to regular form. Although Lennox himself was not there, a gentleman of his party represented him, and demanded postponement of the trial for the usual legal period. He was scoffingly told that Lennox had urged a speedy trial, and in the absence of the accuser Bothwell was acquitted.

Very shortly after (April 1567), a Parliament, or something which represented it, was summoned, and the acquittal was ratified. After the close of the Parliament, Bothwell assembled the nobility at a place called Ainslie's Tavern, and there, after a boisterous evening, some eighteen or twenty noblemen were induced to sign a bond recommending the Queen to accept Bothwell for her husband. Though they signed the bond under the pressure of the despotism which Bothwell had in fact established, the idea of the marriage was none the less hateful to them. Probably they all intended to break the bond. It was to avoid such affairs as this, and such doubtful intrigues, which were inevitable in the midst of the suppressed indignation of all classes of the people at the idea of the Bothwell marriage, that Murray had withdrawn to France. It would not do for him to sully his name in the rough and underhand transactions which he saw were imminent, as it was his business to reserve himself till he could appear on the scene as the single, irreproachable representative of a reformed Government.

The hatred with which the match was regarded was known to Bothwell, and in spite of his apparent prosperity, it seemed necessary both to him and Mary to take some instant measure to secure it; besides which, there was some little difficulty in procuring the divorce from his wife, who was a sister of Huntly's. To sweeten what would otherwise have been an intolerable insult to the powerful family of the Gordons, much of the property which had been confiscated after the skirmish of Corrichie was to be restored. Bothwell therefore made a plan, of which Mary was probably cognizant, for carrying off the Queen. She went to see her child, who was in the keeping of the Earl of Mar at Stirling. She probably intended to have got possession of the child, but Mar was conscious that such a step would be most injurious to the cause of the opposition nobles. The Queen was therefore admitted, with only a few attendants. The interview was, according to some stories, an affecting one; according to others, the Queen tried to poison the child with an apple and a sugar-plum, "judged to be very evil compounded." As she returned from Stirling, in company with Huntly, Maitland, and Melville, and a considerable guard, Bothwell, with a force he had collected professedly to ride to the Border, blocked her path close to Edinburgh, at a place now called Fountainbridge, surrounded her escort, and, with every sign of connivance on her part, carried her off to his castle of Dunbar.¹ The great Lords of Scotland—Mar, Morton, Athole, and Argyle—at once determined that, come what would, so scandalous a connection must be put an end to. Either Bothwell carries off the Queen. France or England might be expected to assist them, and they determined on immediate action. Meanwhile, the Queen and Bothwell returned to Edinburgh, and flaunted their loves in the eyes of the populace. Whether the Queen yielded to violence at first, as she represented, or not, it was plain that now, at all events, she was well pleased with her lover. She created him Duke of Orkney, and on the 15th of May married him in the Protestant form, and was so changed by her love, that she suffered all licenses to use the Catholic worship to be recalled, and declared her intention of adhering strictly to the Confession of 1560.

The Lords determined to attack Bothwell, who, to be beforehand with them, ordered his followers to collect upon the Borders. He went down to join them, leaving the Queen at Anger of the nobles.

¹ This fortress had been conferred on Bothwell in 1566.

Borthwick Castle, whither he returned upon finding that his plan had failed. Some of the Lords, hearing where he was, rode down and nearly captured him there. With difficulty he escaped to Dunbar, whither on the following day Mary fled to him in the disguise of a page. All her own wardrobe was wanting, and she borrowed from some attendant a bodice and a little red petticoat reaching only half way down her leg. In this strange dress she issued forth with her husband, who had collected some troops at Dunbar, to meet the rebel Lords. She met them at Carberry Hill, not far from the site of the battle of Pinkie. Some attempts at mediation were made by the French ambassador, but in vain.

Battle of Carberry Hill. June 15.

A single combat between Bothwell and some champion on the other side was imminent, but prevented evidently by the Queen's anxiety. The Lords' ultimatum was the dismissal of Bothwell, and as, after a hot day, his undisciplined army was melting away in search of refreshments or in desertion, and the Lords were seen advancing to execute their threats, Mary yielded at last to necessity, suffered Bothwell to tear himself from her, and gave herself up as prisoner to the Lords. Bothwell fled to Dunbar, and afterwards turned rover in the Northern seas. The poor Queen, in her quaint dress and almost beside herself with anger, was taken into Edinburgh amid the coarse jests of the populace. All night long she was unable to calm herself, and appeared again and again at the window, with torn hair and dishevelled dress, only to encounter the sight of the terrible banner portraying her husband's death, which was erected opposite her window. There was much danger that she would be put to death; but somewhat gentler counsels prevailed, and she was sent prisoner to Lochleven Castle. While there she was persuaded to abdicate in favour of her young son. Murray, who was summoned home from France, was named Regent, and till his arrival the Government was carried on by a Committee of Regency. The Lords, under his able guidance, proceeded quietly in their course, determined, if possible, that neither French nor English should mingle in the present quarrel. Eleven months elapsed, during which Mary's friends somewhat recovered from the blow they had received, and organized plans for her escape. At last, after more than one futile effort, she succeeded in leaving Lochleven Castle by the aid of a page known as the Little Douglas. Lord Seton met her on the shore, and a rapid ride, such as only a woman of her strength could have borne, brought her to Hamilton, where her friends were collected. Murray was at Glasgow, a few miles off, unprepared for an assault. But he succeeded in collecting troops before a blow was struck against him, and as the Queen was advancing to secure Dumbarton Castle, the stronghold on the mouth of the Clyde, he encountered and routed her forces at Langside. She fled to the South of Scotland, and, crossing the Solway, threw herself on the hospitality of England, where she was honourably received by the gentry of the neighbourhood.

Mary is imprisoned in Lochleven, and abdicates.

Mary escapes.

Battle of Langside. Mary seeks refuge in England. May 13, 1568.

The arrival of Mary still further increased the difficulties of Elizabeth. The determination to suppress heresy, arrived at in the year 1565, had shown itself chiefly in the conduct of Spain towards the Netherlands. About the same time as the abdication of Mary, the Duke of Alva had succeeded the Regent, Margaret of Parma, in the government of the Netherlands. He had brought with him a powerful army, which was to reduce that refractory country and root out heresy. Shortly after the death of Charles V., edicts had been issued against the Protestants, authorizing their suppression by illegal military courts. Against these unconstitutional measures the nobles had successfully protested. Philip had withdrawn to Spain, and had left his sister to carry on the government. As far as it was possible, she had carried out the edicts, and crowds of artisans had left the country to settle in England or to join their brethren in France. The stadtholders of the provinces, headed by William of Orange and Counts Egmont and Horn, unable to check the severity of the bishops, but unwilling to rebel, had petitioned Philip to postpone the carrying out of the edicts. The common people could not wholly imitate their moderation; rebellions broke out, which were speedily checked by the stadtholders; but Philip had found the excuse he wanted, and Alva, with an army, was sent to suppress all further signs of discontent with a high hand. Counts Egmont and Horn, though they received him loyally, were imprisoned for having petitioned against the edicts, and shortly afterwards beheaded. William of Orange had taken flight in time, and with some assistance from the Germans, and from his own province of Nassau, began an open war. The opening was disastrous to William; his brother Count Louis was defeated, and his army absolutely destroyed, at the battle of Jemmingen, on July 21, and the rest of the campaign was equally unsuccessful.

The Queen's difficulties were no longer confined to the attacks of the Roman Catholics. The Puritans had sprung into existence as a separate body. When first the Act of Consequent increase of Elizabeth's difficulties, already enhanced by the affairs of the Netherlands.

and by the rise of the Puritans.

Uniformity had been carried out, many of the Roman Catholic priests had accepted it without meaning in any way to be bound by it. A certain number had refused it, and their places had been filled for the most part by clergy who had been in exile during the previous reign, and had learnt abroad the religious views of Calvin. Thus for some years, in two neighbouring parishes, the form of worship might have been very different—the one exhibiting a ritual beyond that which the Church of England allowed, the other using the plain Genevan form of worship. As the Queen felt more firmly fixed upon her throne, she determined to put an end to this variety. Her own view in such matters was very clear. The law of the land prescribed a certain form of worship—to that every good subject must adhere. Her own predilections and those of her Archbishop—Parker—were strongly in favour of the more ritualistic form, and, in 1565, it was determined to insist on the wearing of the surplice and other such matters. Parker and, much against his will, Grindal (Bishop of London) summoned the London clergy, and ordered them to keep the Act of Uniformity strictly. Between thirty and forty,—more than a third of their number, and those the ablest and most active among them—refused to use the surplice, and resigned their cures. Their congregations naturally sided with them, and thus a large body of good Protestants were exasperated and driven into enmity to the Church.

Elizabeth thus found herself with a nobility eager before all things for a successor to the throne, and desirous of an alliance with Spain, with one section of her people estranged by her severe Church discipline, another eager for the restoration of the old worship, and with a victorious army, bent on the extirpation of heresy, in her immediate neighbourhood. One course was suggested, which might have freed her from her difficulties. She was urged to marry the Archduke of Austria. This would have saved her from Spanish enmity; would have encouraged the Catholics in England to wait quietly for a legitimate successor, confident that persecution would be meanwhile impossible; would have gratified the Anglican nobility by carrying out the policy they had always recommended, and would probably have removed that fear of a disputed succession, which was constantly present in men's minds. But she could not bring herself to consent to the match. Her determination not to marry at all, her preference for Leicester, and her dread lest she should be compelled to acknowledge the Papal supremacy, to which, for political reasons, she was obstinately opposed, combined to cause this decision. With it disappeared all immediate hopes of a direct successor. And just at this moment the legitimate heiress appeared in England, ready to become the centre of all intrigues, whether religious or dynastic.

Marriage with the Archduke of Austria seems her best way of escape.

It became imperatively necessary for Elizabeth to make up her mind how she would act to her unwelcome guest. As usual, she preferred an indirect course. If she regarded herself as the champion of Protestantism, the opportunity lay open to her of supporting the rebel Lords, and sending assistance to those Protestant subjects, both of Spain and France, who were struggling against the growing Catholic reaction. But, as the champion of the prerogative of sovereigns, she particularly disliked the idea of supporting subjects against their king; while she by no means wished to enter into a war, which might easily prove disastrous, which could not fail to prove expensive, both against Spain and France. Proud of her own intellect, she thought she could steer among the difficulties which beset her by diplomacy and finesse. She determined, if possible, by destroying Mary's character, to prevent her from receiving either the support of foreign powers or of England; while at the same time she hoped that, if she did not allow Mary's enemies to bring their charges fully home, it would be possible to make some arrangement which should replace her on her throne, an arrangement which would enable her to avoid the distinct nomination of a successor, while it might satisfy the Protestant Lords by establishing some modified form of the Reformation, such as the English Church. It was therefore determined that a conference should be held to inquire into the charges brought against Queen Mary. But as there was a difficulty in establishing any jurisdiction over a Scotch Queen, it was ingeniously determined that the inquiry should be nominally directed to the conduct of the rebel Lords, which would naturally bring out their charges against the Queen.

The Conference was held at York, and there the Regent Murray produced a general reply to the charges against him. Former experience had taught him the danger of relying upon Elizabeth. He thought it probable that Mary would be restored, that if he produced his real charges he would make her his implacable enemy, and that her restoration would prove his ruin. Elizabeth had, in fact, promised to Mary that she would restore her in any case; to Murray, that if the worst charges were proved, she would not restore her. Murray's general answer

She determines on a double policy,

destroying Mary's influence,
but restoring her
to the throne.

Conference of York.
Oct. 4, 1568.

was wholly insufficient. It became necessary for him either to produce proofs of Mary's complicity in the murder of her husband, or to confess the weakness of his position. Those proofs he held in his hand, consisting of letters and sonnets written to Bothwell, and discovered in the Queen's casket. He showed the letters to the Commissioners, demanding a distinct promise, before publicly producing them, that, if their authenticity was accepted, judgment should be given against Queen Mary. Before this promise was given, it reached the ears of Elizabeth that a plan was on foot to marry Queen Mary to the Duke of Norfolk, as the easiest way out of all difficulties. That so important a step should have been thought of without her cognizance excited her anger, and made her determine that the Conference should be held more within the immediate limits of her influence. The inquiry was therefore moved to London. If Mary's influence in England was to be destroyed, it was now necessary to produce publicly the proofs of her guilt. A number of Peers were summoned, and when the Commission reopened, Murray produced the full charges. To the Commission already formed, a number of noblemen, Mary's own especial friends, were added, and to them the letters were exhibited, nor could they refuse to acknowledge them. Queen Mary had meanwhile been clamouring to be heard in person before Elizabeth. But the Lords seemed to have agreed that until the worst of the charges at least were answered, the Queen was not called upon to admit her to her presence. Several forms of trial were offered her. But Elizabeth wrote to her, urging her to make some sort of compromise, to confirm the abdication she had made at Lochleven, and to remain in England as long as she pleased; Murray might continue Regent, and the Prince be brought to England, and educated as the Queen's successor. It seemed as if Mary was driven to extremities. Only by some compromise of this sort could she hope to escape public disgrace. Within a few weeks Elizabeth changed her mind. Events had occurred which had alarmed her. She hushed up the whole charge against Mary, sent Murray back to Scotland, and left the matter wholly unsettled.

It was the danger of a war with Spain which in all probability had changed Elizabeth's views; for while handling one of her difficulties, another had risen to importance. It was Cecil's own action which had hurried on the approach of the danger. While many of the nobility disliked her policy, and believed

The Casket
letters suppressed. Mary's cause left undetermined.
Jan. 1569.

State of parties
in England.

that an alliance with Spain could alone save England, Cecil and his friends, with truer insight, saw that the religious quarrel which lay at the bottom of all present difficulties must sooner or later be fought out, and that it was with Spain that the real struggle would come. He believed England already strong enough openly to defy that country, and wished to put an end to all temporizing, and bring the matter at once to the settlement of war. Causes of quarrel with foreign powers were easy enough to find. The western coasts of England swarmed with privateers. Though the Queen carefully abstained from overt acts of hostility, she yet allowed, and it would appear wished, her enterprising subjects to join indirectly in the efforts of the Protestants. Under the flag of the Prince of Condé, at that time head of the Huguenots of France, and possessed of the Port of La Rochelle, these bold sailors, who were in fact little better than pirates, held themselves at liberty to stop any Catholic ships on the seas, and the sale of their prizes was openly carried on at Plymouth and the western harbours. Chief among these adventurers was Sir John Hawkins. Already he had made successful expeditions, not only in the narrow seas, but in the Spanish West Indies, and had there sold cargoes of slaves, and made large profits, of which the Queen had had her share. He now fitted out a fresh fleet, with the connivance of Elizabeth, who again had her share in the venture, and who lent him one at least of the royal ships. With this he pursued his old course, at first with complete success, but subsequently he was fallen on by a Spanish fleet, and with difficulty brought two of his ships in bad plight to England. The Queen was indignant at her money losses. A considerable sum of money, borrowed in Genoa for the Spanish troops in the Netherlands, had been brought for safety out of the reach of the privateers to England. This was now seized, and as a natural consequence the Spanish authorities laid an embargo on the English ships abroad. It is pretty certain that the Queen meant to take the money, and was wholly in the wrong; but having discovered that it was still the property of the Genoese merchants until delivered, she declared she had only borrowed it, assumed airs of injured innocence, and proceeded to reprisals, seizing all the Spanish ships and merchandise in England.

Although Philip's unwillingness to plunge into war, and his constant dread of France, prevented any immediate hostilities, Cecil's conduct naturally raised the hopes of the Catholics in England. They could not believe that the Spanish King would quietly submit to such insults. They now believed that they might certainly rely upon assistance from Spain, and Philip seems in fact to have now first thought seriously of appearing as the champion of the Scottish Queen. The plan of the extreme Catholics was to marry Mary to Don John of Austria, and re-establish the old religion by Spanish arms.

Cecil tries to draw the Queen into war with Spain.

The more moderate Catholics also, with the connivance and assistance of the Spanish, wished to change completely the character and conduct of the administration, to restore the predominance of the old nobility, to overthrow Cecil, and to establish the succession in the person of Mary, securing her attachment to English interests by a marriage with Norfolk, the head of the English aristocracy. To a considerable number of Protestants also the establishment of the succession was a great object. They saw no alternative but to accept the Queen of Scots as heir to the throne, and believed that her power to do harm would be best destroyed by her marriage with a great English nobleman such as Norfolk. To all these schemes Norfolk seems more or less to have given in his adhesion. To the Catholics, who upheld him, he represented himself as at heart a Catholic; to the Protestants he remained a Protestant. At first, in conjunction with his father-in-law, Lord Arundel, and the Spanish ambassador, he laboured hard at the overthrow of Cecil, intending to apprehend him at the Council Board; but he had not sufficient courage for this bold step. He then treacherously pointed out to the Spanish the means of injuring English trade, hoping to excite discontent among the mercantile classes. But finding that the Spaniards were losing their confidence in so weak a conspirator, and yielding to the arguments of Cecil, he for a time threw himself with apparent heartiness into the Protestant scheme, in which he had the support of most of the Council, and which was carried so far that terms and conditions were discussed with Mary herself on behalf of the Council. But when the plan came at length to Elizabeth's ears, it proved in the last degree distasteful to her, and she let it be understood that her consent to it was not to be hoped for. Thwarted in his scheme for the restoration of the old nobility, and in his project for marrying Queen Mary in the Protestant interest, the Duke fell back upon the more zealous Catholics of the North. The influence of Don Guerau, the Spanish ambassador, had induced this party, who were ready for active insurrection, to wait until the issue of Norfolk's plans for marrying with the Queen's consent should be

Philip begins to adopt Mary's cause.

General feeling in her favour.

Various schemes centring round her marriage with Norfolk.

Norfolk's vacillating conduct.

known. He believed, as was probably the fact, that Norfolk fully intended, when the opportunity arrived, to throw over his Protestant supporters, and re-establish the Catholic religion. It was therefore agreed that the rising should not take place unless the Queen's consent was refused. That refusal had now been given, and the Northern Lords waited anxiously for orders from Norfolk. Conscious that his designs were suspected, Norfolk withdrew from the Court, and fled to his own province in the East of England (Sept. 15). He was thence summoned to London. For a time he made some show of resistance, and refused to obey; but losing heart, he sent word to his Northern allies not to move, was apprehended, and sent to the Tower.

He is arrested.
Oct. 9.

Thus left to themselves, the Northern gentlemen were at first uncertain how to act, but ultimately took arms without Norfolk's assistance, and marched to Tutbury, intending to release Mary, who had been brought thither for greater security from Bolton. Sussex, who was in command at York, could do nothing to check them, but fortunately before they got possession of the Scotch Queen, she was removed out of their reach to Coventry (Nov. 23). Their first blow had thus failed. Troops from the South began to march northward. The insurrection proved a failure, and its chiefs, Lords Northumberland and Westmoreland, the heads of the Percies and Nevilles, were driven to take refuge in Scotland. Upon the lower classes cruel vengeance was taken, 600 or 700 were summarily put to death. Vengeance then passed to the gentry; some four or five were executed; others, especially those who had no land, from whose death therefore nothing could be gained, were spared.

Northern
insurrection.

The flight of the two Earls into Scotland was the cause of fresh difficulties in that country. The old connection between the rebel Lords had been broken up. Maitland of Lethington, the ablest man among them, was absolutely careless upon religious matters, and desirous only for the political greatness of his country. This he sought to gain by securing the succession to the English crown for a Scotch Prince. Circumstances had now led him to believe that Mary would ultimately make good her claims to the throne of England; he therefore attached himself vigorously to her party, bringing with him many important nobles. Murray, on the other hand, anxious before all things for the establishment of the Reformation, upheld the young King, in whose name he was acting as Regent, and trusted, in spite of the disappointments

Consequent
complications with Scotland.
1570.

he had suffered, in the friendship of Elizabeth. It was already with difficulty that he held his position. To surrender the nobles who had taken refuge in Scotland was to destroy his little remaining popularity. Yet such was the task imposed upon him by Elizabeth. Nor did she send him any assistance for the purpose. Regarding the friendship of England as indispensable, he consented, in spite of the risk it implied, to arrest the Earl of Northumberland and imprison him in Lochleven Castle. But before he could either restore Northumberland or capture Westmoreland, his arch enemies the Hamiltons seized the opportunity of his unpopularity, and assassinated him as he rode through Linlithgow.

Unaided by Elizabeth,
Murray is assassinated.
Jan. 23, 1570.

To follow the intricate history of the next few years, it is necessary to bear in mind Elizabeth's own views upon political and religious questions. It was the force of circumstances, rather than her own inclination, which ultimately drove her into that position as leader of the Protestant party, with which we are in the habit of connecting her name. Though Scotland, Spain, and France were all plunged in religious war, Elizabeth refused to join frankly with the Reformers. Careless of religion herself, freedom of opinion, but conformity of outward observance, was what she desired. She hated rebels and loved constituted authority. Yet her position at home threw her upon the side of the Reformation. In danger of a joint attack from the Catholic Princes, she thought it necessary to seek the safety of her people by fostering every cause of disunion and weakness among her enemies. At the same time, she dreaded to excite their anger, and attempted to keep up friendly relations with them. We therefore find her, in Scotland, in words supporting the young King's party, and occasionally giving them some kind of assistance, and also in communication with the Queen's party, and frequently taking measures for the restoration of the Queen; in Holland, permitting her subjects to send assistance to the rebels, sometimes assisting them herself, and in constant communication with their chiefs, at other times threatening to join with the Spanish Government to suppress them; sometimes in friendly relations with Spain, at other times allowing her subjects to insult it with their piratical expeditions; in France, sometimes giving help and comfort to the Huguenots, at other times forming close relations with the Government, and carrying to the brink of completion negotiations for marriage with the royal house. It was only when this conduct produced its natural effect, when she found herself mistrusted by all parties among her allies, while her overthrow was the constant object of conspirators, that she was compelled at length to assume openly the leadership of the Protestants. At times, when her diplomacy seemed failing, fear of general action against her drove her to the verge of vigorous action; at times the advice of her Protestant counsellors, eager to cut the knot of difficulty which surrounded them, seemed to triumph over her reluctance to decided action, and thus a still further air of vacillation is given to a policy which is of itself difficult to follow.

The death of the Regent Murray gave an opportunity for the display of the Queen's policy. The death of one who was respected by all parties produced a temporary harmony. Had Elizabeth pleased, she might have secured the almost unanimous friendship of the country. All waited to hear what she would do.

Her disastrous double policy
in Scotland.

Had she acknowledged the young King, named him her successor, and properly supported a regent chosen in his name, the Queen's party would have been extinct. But Elizabeth still thought of effecting a compromise and restoring Mary to the throne. She even opened correspondence with Maitland and the Queen's friends. Thus left to themselves, the Scotch parties continued their rivalry, while English influence daily declined, as the King's friends found themselves, as they believed, betrayed by Elizabeth. She was, however, at length compelled to act, for Westmoreland, in concert with the Queen's party, made inroads into Northumberland, and in revenge Sussex three times passed the Border and laid waste the country. She still refused, however, to declare for the King, still threatened the restoration of Mary, and though Lennox was elected Regent, she left Scotland in a state of anarchy.

Sussex's invasion of Scotland had given ground for the interference of France. That country now threatened war, which in the existing condition of England could not but be highly dangerous. The Catholics, though defeated in the late rebellion, were by no means extinguished. The continued presence of Queen Mary in England gave them a constant centre round which to gather, and many who had before held aloof from conscientious grounds now thought themselves free to act; for Pius V. had been persuaded to issue hastily a Bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, which rendered all measures taken against her praiseworthy in the eyes of extreme Catholics. They were disappointed, however, in the

It produces
danger from France as well as from Spain.

Pius V. issues
his Bull of excommunication.
Feb. 25.

effect of the Bull. The Kings of France and Spain forbade it to be published; they could neither afford to break entirely with Elizabeth, nor did they relish encroachments on the part of the spiritual power. In England, after some delay, the Bull was fastened to the Bishop of London's door by a man of the name of Felton (May 15). The Queen felt some alarm. She believed that the union of the Catholic powers, so long dreaded, had at length come. Steps were taken for the defence of the country, and Felton was executed (Aug. 8). Time showed that, abroad at all events, the Bull had little or no effect. But in England disaffection and plotting continued, nor did Elizabeth feel safe from a general attack from the Catholic Princes till a change in the affairs of France placed the Government of that country in moderate hands.

Defeated in the year 1569 at Jarnac and at Montcontour, the Huguenots had lost all influence in the Government, which had remained in the hands of the strong Catholic party. A victory won in Poitou had changed this aspect of affairs. A new treaty had been patched up in August 1570 between the rival religionists, and Catherine and her son Charles seemed to be again inclined to listen to the counsels of the Huguenot leaders. This change of government rendered hostility to Spain certain on the part of France; no united action between the two countries against England was for the time possible. There even seemed to be a prospect of a friendship between France and England.

England saved
by the successes of the Huguenots.

Such a friendship would be advantageous to both countries. Spain was the common enemy of the Huguenot party, now rising to power, and of the English; and the countries, if combined, could make an irresistible attack upon the Netherlands, the weak point of the Spanish monarchy. To England it further offered a freedom from hostile interference on behalf of Mary, or, could a compromise to secure her restoration be effected, a fair certainty that the conditions would be kept, especially if, as was soon proposed, the friendship was further secured by the marriage of Elizabeth to the Duke of Anjou, the French King's brother, to which at first Elizabeth seemed inclined to consent.

Alliance and
marriage with Anjou suggested

The suggestion of this marriage destroyed any confidence Mary may still have felt in French assistance, and threw her still more completely for support upon Spain. It was to that country, therefore, that all the malcontents of England now looked for assistance, and a great conspiracy was set on foot. The King of Spain himself, and his chief adviser Alva, were

Mary and the Catholics turn towards Spain.

still most unwilling to break with Elizabeth. Her friendship with France was, as they well understood, fraught with danger to them, and if the connection between the countries was honest and permanent, would probably cause the loss of the Netherlands. Alva therefore did his best to reconcile himself with Elizabeth. But the Pope, indignant at the reception his Bull of excommunication had met with, and constantly assured by his agents in England of both the sufferings and strength of the Catholic party, was eager for some immediate action in their favour. His chief agent was a banker of the name of Ridolfi, who, though he had mingled in many plots, had been clever enough so to impose upon the ministry, that they were now on the point of employing him to visit foreign courts in their interest. He had thus an opportunity of carrying on his schemes unsuspected. The plot was an almost exact repetition of the old scheme in favour of Norfolk. Again it was intended that the Duke should marry Mary, that he should declare himself a Catholic, that with the aid of a Spanish army the Catholics should make a general rising, dethrone Elizabeth, and restore the old religion, together with the old nobility and policy of the country. Assistance from Spain was absolutely necessary. It was hopeless to secure it without a distinct declaration from Norfolk that he would play the part assigned to him. He had for some time been free from all real restraint; there was therefore no difficulty in negotiating with him; but he shrunk as usual from committing himself. However, when informed that no less than forty English Peers—more, that is, than half their whole number—were in favour of the plan, he consented to write to Philip, and employ Ridolfi as his agent. Thus armed with authority from Norfolk, from the Catholic Peers, and from the Queen of Scots, Ridolfi set out on his journey.

While this dangerous plot was hatching, Elizabeth had been obliged to call a Parliament (April 2, 1571), which she had not done for four years. The House of Commons showed a temper which proved how deep Protestantism had struck its roots into the middle classes, and how out of harmony with the general feeling of the nation were both the intrigues of the Catholic nobles and the half measures and temporizing policy of the Queen and her Council. The attention of the House was directed almost entirely to ecclesiastical matters. Complaints of irregularities in the discipline of the Church, of toleration of Catholic worship, and of the gradual reintroduction of old ecclesiastical abuses, were the chief topics of complaint. It was in vain Elizabeth attempted to check this interference with what she considered her own prerogative. Many Bills of a Puritan tendency were introduced. Some of them—among others one insisting on the acceptance by the clergy of the Thirty-nine Articles, together with some stringent laws rendering it high treason to introduce Bulls, or to admit English subjects to the Church of Rome—became law. Others were allowed to drop either in the House of Lords or for want of the Queen's assent. The most prominent member of the Puritan party was Strickland. He was summoned before the Queen, reprimanded and excluded from the House; but the Queen was compelled to yield, when the Commons asserted their privilege of free speech, and he was reinstated.

Protestant temper of the
Parliament.

While the Parliament was still sitting, Ridolfi had been carrying out his mission in Brussels. Alva, who found him too shallow and talkative to be thoroughly trusted, thought it much better that Elizabeth should be either captured or killed by the Catholics before Spain moved in the matter; but yet alarmed at the friendship between France and England, thought the opportunity was not one to be missed. Ridolfi, at all events, was so pleased with his success, that he despatched a messenger with a favourable report to Norfolk, and to the Bishop of Ross, Queen Mary's agent in England. Cecil, whose spies were everywhere, had the messenger apprehended, and by means of the rack, and information derived from a spy, who pretended to be the wretched man's friend, gained a considerable insight into the conspiracy; though, as the letters were in cipher, and the key was wanting, he was as yet ignorant of the chief people implicated.

Ridolfi plot discovered
May 5.

Meanwhile, the marriage with Anjou, on which to all appearance Elizabeth's safety depended, had come to nothing; as usual, she could not bring herself to accept a husband. The two courts were too much interested in the maintenance of peace to allow an open breach. Religious scruples were asserted on both sides, and in the place of the marriage a league between England and France against Spain was suggested; and, to give a show of sincerity on the part of England, the privateers were directed chiefly against Spanish commerce.

Ridolfi had betaken himself to Madrid. There Alva's plan had chiefly recommended itself. A man had been found who offered to undertake to put Elizabeth out of the way, and orders were sent to Alva to be ready to invade England as soon as that step should be taken. Meanwhile fresh information was reaching Cecil. Sir John

Alva's view of
the Ridolfi plot.

Hawkins had pretended to turn traitor for the sake originally of obtaining the freedom of some of his comrades who were in Spanish prisons. His deceit had been so successful that the Spanish Government began to treat with him to cover the proposed invasion, which thus came at once to Cecil's ears. All this time Norfolk had been unsuspected. The chance discovery of a sum of money which he was remitting to the partisans of Queen Mary in Scotland caused his reapprehension, together with that of his secretaries. Torture wrung from them the key to the cipher which had hitherto been wanting. The missing link in the evidence was thus supplied. The whole secret of the Ridolfi conspiracy was known. Arundel, Norfolk, and Lumley, the chief leaders of it, were arrested, together with the Bishop of Ross, who at last, under fear apparently of torture, made a full confession of the intrigues of the few last years. All those intrigues which had gathered round Norfolk and his marriage with Mary were thus discovered, and the first great plot of the reign was thwarted.

It might have been expected that the discovery of the plot would at once have broken through the diplomatic refinements of Elizabeth's policy, and have forced things into a more natural position. With the treason of the Catholics, the complicity of Mary with their plans, and the connection of Spain with the conspiracy plainly proved, it would have seemed natural that the punishment of the traitors, the death of Mary, and open war with Spain would follow, especially as the treaty with France was still on foot.

The strange web of conflicting interests which surrounded the policy of the time prevented any such effects from arising. For the moment indeed, it seemed as if Elizabeth would pursue a more direct line of conduct. Norfolk was tried for high treason and found guilty; a full account of the evidence against Mary which had hitherto been suppressed was allowed to be published; the Queen wrote to the Earl of Mar, now Regent in the King's name, to assure him of her open assistance; the Spanish ambassador was peremptorily ordered out of England. But there for the time the matter ended. The Duke of Norfolk's execution was postponed from day to day, nor was it till after a strong expression of feeling from the Parliament, which was then again assembled, that Elizabeth was brought to consent to his death. Neither her own obvious danger, nor the petition of the Bishops of England, nor the joint request of the two Houses of Parliament, to be allowed to bring in a Bill of arrested.

Norfolk again
Sept. 5.

Momentary energy of the Queen.

Execution of Norfolk.
June 2.

Attainder, could induce her to act with severity against Mary. In Scotland,—where her double dealing had allowed the Queen's party again to rise, and (in an attempted surprise on Stirling) to put Lennox the Regent to death,—instead of fulfilling her promise to his successor, Mar, she as usual laboured at a compromise, and let matters take their own course. And when it became evident that Alva, disgusted at the discovery of his plans, was turning a deaf ear to the prayers of the refugees, and persuading Philip to bear all insults rather than break with England, all thought of war with Spain was laid aside.

There was one more difficulty to be met. This arose from the Queen's relations with France. At the moment of the discovery of the plot, the French, naturally supposing that Elizabeth would be willing to join with the enemies of Spain, had taken the opportunity of drawing the existing friendship between themselves and England closer. In the place of Anjou it was now suggested that the Queen should marry his younger brother, Alençon, a man not more than half her age; nor did she reject the suggestion, but as usual coquetted with it, acknowledging the wisdom of such a step, but shrinking from carrying it out. Meanwhile, before she had made up her mind, the treaty between the two countries was renewed and strengthened, though not without considerable misgivings of the Queen's honesty on the part of the French. Catherine de Medici and her son Charles were at this time, as has been already mentioned, somewhat under the influence of the Protestant party; Admiral Coligny, the head of that party, being in high favour. The object they aimed at was a joint attack on Spain through the Netherlands; the Protestants, for obvious reasons, desiring to assist the Prince of Orange; Catherine and her son being anxious to add the Netherlands to France. But the supremacy of the Huguenot party was by no means secured. The Guises and the friends of Spain were very powerful, and commanded the mob of Paris. Catherine and the King cared little for either religion, hated the leaders of both parties equally, and attempted to rule by playing them one against the other. The continuance of the Huguenots' supremacy, even their safety, depended on the success of the war they were urging, and that war could only be successful with the assistance of Elizabeth. But Elizabeth was as usual beginning to play false. Feeling safe for the present from France, she was making her peace with Spain, and already, in compliance with the demands of Alva, had driven the diplomacy.

Resumption of

Alençon suggested instead of Anjou as the Queen's husband.

Joint war against Spain in the Netherlands intended.

Dutch privateer Admiral de la Mark from his refuge in England. This act of friendship had not had the effect Alva had expected when urging it. The Netherlands were ripe for revolt, smarting Where, on the taking of Brille, the Protestants were again in insurrection.

under the heavy taxation Alva had laid upon them. De la Mark, grown desperate when deprived of his refuge, sailed up the river Meuse and captured Brille (April 1572) in the name of the Prince of Orange, thus laying the first stone of the Dutch Republic. This beginning was followed by a general insurrection in Holland and Zeeland. Count Louis of Nassau, with the aid of French Protestants, captured Mons. English volunteers flocked across to join the rebel army. The adhesion and assistance of Elizabeth alone was wanted to enable the French to join with effect in the quarrel and drive the

The plan thwarted by Elizabeth's duplicity.

Spaniards from the Netherlands. But Elizabeth, as before mentioned, was already half pledged to Alva, and while the French were urging upon her the necessity of combining with them in vigorous action, they discovered that she was secretly offering to accept Flushing from the rebels, with the intention of surrendering it to the Spaniards. Such an act of duplicity destroyed any confidence in the English Queen. Joint action seemed impossible.

The failure of the English alliance naturally weakened the influence of the Huguenot or war party. Meanwhile the party which was averse to the war was making its influence felt. The Guises were the avowed friends of Spain, and were the favourites of the fanatical population of Paris. Still the King seemed firm in his late resolves. The Admiral Coligny was still his most trusted adviser, and the triumph of the Protestants was looked on as complete, when the friendship between them and the royal house was sealed by the marriage of the young King of Navarre, on whom their hopes were fixed, and Margaret of Valois, the King's sister. It seemed as though the danger of a new civil war was passing away. A reconciliation was made between Coligny and the Duke of Guise. They shook hands in Charles's presence, and the appearance of friendship was assumed. But the reconciliation was hollow. The rival parties were ready on the first opportunity to fly at each other's throats. To Catherine de Medici belongs the guilt of affording them that opportunity. Her views were solely political. She hated the house of Guise and the house of Chatillon equally, as they equally tended to overshadow the influence of the Crown. She thought that a chance now offered of letting them destroy each other. A very little would excite the Huguenots to a fresh outbreak. Counter-acting measures would be forced upon the Catholics. In the midst of the confusion, the power of her own party and of the Crown might be secured. At her instigation, the Duchess of Nemours (the widow of the late Duke of Guise, who had been murdered, it was believed with the connivance of Coligny), together with the present Duke of Guise and the Duke d'Aumale, employed an assassin to shoot the Admiral. The attack was only partially successful. The Protestants, who had collected in crowds at the late marriage, were lulled into security by the King's conduct. Catherine saw that unless some further step was taken, her plan would fail, and there would be no outbreak. In alliance with the chief Catholic Princes, she induced the King to believe that the Huguenots were planning to carry him off, as they had tried to do his predecessor at Amboise, and he gave leave that some of the chief leaders of the party should be killed. The opportunity was accepted by the leaders of the Catholic party: the fanatical and blood-thirsty mob of Paris was let loose, and the fearful massacre of St. Bartholomew was the consequence. For three days the massacre continued. The example was followed in other parts of France, at Orleans, Rouen, Bordeaux, and Toulon, till many thousands of Protestants of all ages had been cruelly murdered.

Fall of Huguenot influence at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Aug. 24, 1572.

The news of the massacre was received with a shout of triumph by the Catholics of Europe. At Rome the Pope gave it his fullest approval; processions were made, and medals struck to honour it. The English Catholic refugees in Holland followed his example. Philip of Spain, as the head of the Catholic party, rejoiced that at last France had ceased to temporize with the Protestants, and, as a politician, saw with pleasure the destruction of the league between France and England, which was so threatening to his power in the Netherlands. In England the news was received with fear and abhorrence. The people were clamorous for reprisals, and demanded at least the death of Queen Mary. Elizabeth again believed, as upon the discovery of the Ridolfi plot, that the conjunction of Catholic Europe against herself, which she had so constantly dreaded, had at last arrived. She made preparations for war, and, though she could not bring herself to listen entirely to the cry of vengeance raised against Mary, she determined to rid herself of her dangerous rival by restoring her as a prisoner to the King's party in Scotland. Mar, the Regent, would have accepted her, but was determined not to be used merely as a cat's-paw, and he therefore demanded the public approval of Elizabeth and the presence of English troops at Mary's execution. Before an answer could be returned, Mar suddenly died, and the regency was forced upon Morton, somewhat against his will, and without any certain guarantee from Elizabeth. He found the terms Mar had suggested scornfully rejected, and thus, deserted by Elizabeth, was plunged again into civil war. Maitland and Grange, and other chiefs of the Queen's party, held the Castle of Edinburgh, without which the possession of the country could not be complete. At length the danger of the extinction of the King's party became so probable that Elizabeth was compelled to take the step she had shrunk from so long. An army was raised, and placed under command of Drury, who advanced to Edinburgh, and bombarded and took the castle (May 27, 1573). Maitland died almost immediately after the capitulation, Kirkaldy of Grange was executed, and for the time the Queen's party was completely destroyed. But this energy, consequent upon the fright excited by the massacre, did not last long. Affairs fell back into the hands of politicians, and the old course of diplomatic double-dealing was continued.

Elizabeth again roused to activity.

She assists the King's party in Scotland.

Her alarm subsides.

It soon became evident that there was in truth no union between the Catholic powers, but, on the contrary, a disposition on the part of both of them to continue or increase their friendship with Elizabeth. The French ambassador was indeed received with all outward marks of displeasure. The Queen and Court were dressed in mourning, and a gloomy, ominous silence reigned. But signs were not wanting that there was no intention of breaking the peace. At the same time, Alva seized the opportunity to try and reunite England and Spain. He felt certain that all confidence in the friendship of France for England must, for the time at all events, have been destroyed, and he urged Philip to regain, if possible, the alliance of England, which could alone enable him to conquer his rebel subjects in the Netherlands. In spite of the earnest entreaties of the English Catholic refugees, Philip was induced to make the required overtures, and to propose a treaty with England, while Alva was so successful with Elizabeth that the English volunteers in Holland were recalled.

Friendship with Spain renewed.

In fact, Elizabeth was still bent on producing, by means of her tortuous diplomacy, a state of affairs in Europe in accordance with her own peculiar views, while, at the same time, she secured her own safety. This she considered threatened by the presence of the Catholic refugees in the Netherlands, and by the supremacy of the Guise party in France.

Her views on the European situation wholly political.

She wanted therefore to induce the Prince of Orange and his party to make peace (especially as they seemed to be worsted), securing only for themselves political liberty and toleration of conscience, but accepting Catholicism. At the same time—in order to compel Philip to enter into any compromise with his rebel subjects, to insist upon the Catholic refugees leaving his dominions, and to relax in some degree in favour of English sailors the strictness of the laws of the Inquisition—it was necessary so far to favour the insurgents as to be able to use them as a standing threat. To gain these ends, she seems even to have been willing to take into consideration her religious position, and to think of again uniting herself with Catholic Europe. In France the same sort of game had to be played; a little assistance was to be given to the Huguenots, friendly relations to be kept up with Catherine de Medici and her son, and by this means the Guises kept out of power.

In both cases her diplomacy was frustrated. She trusted to her management of the political interests of the Princes, and wholly underrated the strength of religious feeling—of Protestantism in Holland, of Catholicism among the populace of Paris and among the nobility of France. In pursuance of the line of policy she had adopted, she gave up all open support of the party of the Prince of Orange, which, left without her assistance, fell into the greatest distress. Having, as he thought, secured the stability of government by his success in war and by the severity of his punishments, Alva had attempted to make the States profitable to Spain by exacting a large and illegal tax. The effect had been a general renewal of hostilities, and Alva, confessing himself unable to complete his work, had asked to be recalled. In 1573, his request had been granted, and Requesens had taken his place. Under his government the Spanish rule appeared to thrive. Prince Louis, and another Prince of the house of Nassau, fell at the battle of Mook Heath (April 14, 1574), and though the defence of Leyden (May 26 to October 3) somewhat re-established the position of the Orange party, Elizabeth could be moved no further than to attempt a mediation, distinctly giving it to be understood that she should insist on the acceptance by the rebels of Roman Catholicism. Her mediation was futile. Both Philip and the Prince of Orange refused such conditions, and it became evident that since the Prince determined to fight the battle out, if assistance could not be obtained from England it must be sought from France. As the acquisition of the sea coast provinces by France would have been a heavy blow to the naval supremacy of England, it could not be allowed to take place. The Queen was therefore thrust back after all into her old position. If Philip would not compromise, she would be compelled in self-defence to assist the rebels. Thus, in January 1576, ambassadors came both from Requesens and from the Prince of

Recall of Alva. Success of Requesens. Nov. 1573.

Her policy drives the Netherlands towards France.

Elizabeth
attempts a compromise,
but fails.

Orange to attempt to settle the Queen's mind in one direction or other. At first she leant towards the rebels. Her best counsellors urged her in that direction. The seizure of an English ship and the imprisonment of its crew by the Inquisition seemed to show how little she had to hope from the friendship of Spain. But, on the other hand, her feelings were all in favour of the Spaniards. She was angry with the obstinacy of the States with regard to their religion. A Parliament had been called in March, and the bold conduct of one of the Puritan leaders, Wentworth, who had complained of the monopolies she had granted, had excited her anger with the Protestants at home. The sudden death of Requesens gave her an excuse for following her own inclination; and St. Aldegonde, the Dutch ambassador, was dismissed in disgrace. She even went so far in her opposition to the States, that open acts of hostility broke out, and it seemed for the time as if the cause of liberty must finally be defeated.

It was probably the course of events in France which had given Elizabeth the courage to follow her own wishes, and to break for the time with the Protestant interest in the Netherlands, with which in fact her own position and the prosperity of the nation were indissolubly connected. After the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Protestants in the west of France had rallied, and secured La Rochelle against the attack of the King's eldest brother, the Duke of Anjou, and had shown themselves so powerful that a new pacification between the religious parties was arranged. This was rendered the more easy, because Catherine and her son Anjou were anxious to be free from difficulties in France to secure the crown of Poland, then vacant. Having found her plan for the destruction of both parties completely thwarted, Catherine had earnestly sought the friendship of Elizabeth, and had still further pressed the marriage between that Queen and the Duke of Alençon. The horror excited by the massacre was too strong to allow cordial relations to be established, but the Courts were externally in friendship. In the spring of the following year (May 1574) Charles IX. died, and Anjou, who was regarded as one of the chief instigators of the massacre, ascended the throne as Henry III. The pacification had been

Events in France leaving her free to act.

badly kept by the Catholics. The accession of the new King gave the Protestants both a reason and an opportunity for fresh precautions. They formed themselves into a sort of independent republic, and established a central council at Millaud, in Rovergue, which should exercise supreme authority over them. Alençon had found his position as heir-presumptive extremely uneasy. He was suspected of intending to join the Huguenots. He was very anxious to conclude his marriage with Elizabeth, but the influence of the Guises, who saw danger both in his marriage and in his Protestant inclinations, was sufficient to induce the King to keep him a prisoner in Paris, where the young King of Navarre was detained in the same way. At length, in 1575, Alençon succeeded in making his escape, and placed himself at the head of the Huguenots, who were prepared for a rising. Condé, one of their leaders, was at Strasburg, threatening to march on Paris, and Casimir, brother of the Elector Palatine, was threatening to join the rebel army of the South with 10,000 Germans. In February 1576, the King of Navarre also contrived to escape, and the two Princes at once applied to Elizabeth for assistance.

Here again, as in her relations with Spain, she pursued a shifting policy. The Huguenots, while in arms, restrained the power of the Guises; but, once victorious, would have made common cause with the Prince of Orange, and the annexation of the Provinces to France would probably have resulted. A little assistance was therefore given them; the suit of Alençon was in some degree favoured; but as their power rose, Elizabeth appeared as mediator. A new pacification was brought about, and edicts of toleration issued. Huguenots were declared equal to Catholics in the eye of the law, and eight towns placed in their hands as a guarantee. Elizabeth believed that now parties in France were so nearly balanced that there was no longer any danger of an alliance with Spain against her on the one hand, or of the annexation of the Netherlands on the other. She held herself free then to act as she pleased with regard to Spain, and, as has been seen, dismissed St. Aldegonde, with an abrupt refusal of all his requests.

She refuses help to the rebels.

For the moment it seemed as if her policy had triumphed. Her conduct with regard to Spain was so friendly as to secure her from danger from Philip. She still professed to approve of the claims of liberty of conscience on the part of the rebels, and threw the blame of the continuation of the war on their religious obstinacy in unessentials; while France, as she thought, was completely neutralized. But her real want

Apparent success, real failure of her plans

of success soon became obvious. In France, the League of the Protestants had been followed by the organization of the Catholic League under the Guises; the King placed himself at its head. The edicts were disregarded; the States-General held at Blois were wholly Catholic; Alençon, a mere adventurer, had changed sides; uniformity of religion was ordered; Condé and Navarre were threatened with the loss of their privileges as Princes; the Protestant leaders were exiled. In exact opposition to Elizabeth's hopes, she found that the weakness of her support had caused the ruin of the Protestant party, and that the Guises were again triumphant. In the Netherlands also a complete change of affairs took place. On the death of Requesens (March 5, 1576), the Spanish soldiery were left unpaid, and broke out into mutiny. Their fierce riots compelled all the States of the Netherlands, both Protestants and Catholics, to unite. The rival parties came to an agreement, and made a treaty at Ghent, demanding the dismissal of foreign troops, and government according to their own laws. Don John of Austria had been appointed to succeed Requesens. He was sent, with the strictest orders from Philip not to interfere with England. But he was ambitious. He could not forget his late successes over the Turks in the cause of Catholic Christianity, nor the project for marrying him with Mary Queen of Scots, which was so favourite a scheme among the English Catholics. He was not admitted to the country till he accepted the Treaty of Ghent (Feb. 17, 1577), and till the Spanish soldiers were sent to Italy. But this was merely a pretence. Don John had determined to attack England, and immediately began to bring the troops back again. The Queen was therefore in just as much danger as she had ever been before. The Guises were in power in France, the Spaniards were threatening her from the Netherlands.

In her fear, as on the two previous occasions of the Ridolfi plot and the massacre of St. Bartholomew, she took a straightforward step. She entered into negotiations with the States. She promised them a supply of money. She even promised them a considerable army under Leicester. But the union among the States was shortlived. To have secured Elizabeth's support they must all have agreed to accept Catholicism. The Maritime Provinces could not bring themselves to the step; while the Catholic Provinces, or Walloons, thought they should be able to gain their object by putting themselves into the hands of Matthias, brother of Rudolph, Emperor of Germany. They thus thought to divide the two branches of the Austrian house, and secure all they wished for—political independence. To Elizabeth this also seemed probable. She was displeased with the obstinacy of the Maritime States; she believed that the arrival of Matthias would check the schemes of Don John, and that she at all events was safe. The entire destruction by that Prince of the insurgent army at Gemblours (Jan. 31, 1578) also tended to make her lukewarm in their cause, and all her promises ended in the loan of a little money, and the endorsement of certain bills by which they raised money, an obligation which she afterwards refused to meet.

Such conduct naturally excited the extremest indignation, the effect of which was very nearly to force her to take the step she most of all hated, and to marry Alençon, now become the Duke of Anjou; for the States, looking for assistance, naturally threw themselves upon France, and Alençon, careless of what cause he supported if only it rendered him independent, raised an army in their favour. The Queen could scarcely hope by any amount of cajolery to win the States back again. If they were to pass into the hands of Alençon, it would be better for her to have some hold upon him also. She therefore pushed her negotiations for marriage with him to the furthest extremes. She brought him over to England, professed to like him, though he was hideous both in person and in character. She risked her popularity in the pursuit of the scheme, for the French marriage was hateful to the people. She even insisted upon the punishment of two honest men, Stubbs and Page, who wrote and sold a strong pamphlet against it. Their real loyalty and the cruelty of the sentence was proved when they left the scaffold, where they had just lost their right hands, crying, "God save Queen Elizabeth." Still she could not venture quite to defy popular feeling; and when, by a small majority, the Council declared itself against the marriage, it was for the time dropped.

The plain issue of the religious struggle which was convulsing Europe had hitherto been constantly clouded by the personal interests of individual Princes. The time was now approaching when the quarrel fell more directly into the hands of the people themselves. By extreme good fortune, Elizabeth had kept the country free from war, and it had become increasingly prosperous. Fugitives from Holland had established manufactures. Agriculture had adapted itself to the new state of society, and those who took no interest in religion or politics were content. But beside this prosperity there had grown up, since the massacre of St. Bartholomew,

The Low Countries, finding no help, apply to Alençon.

To retain her hold on them, she thinks of marrying him. Aug. 1579.

Political causes preventing the action of Princes, the people of Europe begin to act for themselves.

a strong hatred and a strong fear of Papists and their plans. This undercurrent of feeling had made itself visible in the conduct of the swarming privateers of the Western harbours, in the action of Parliament in spite of the repressive measures of the Queen, and but lately in the great expedition of Drake, which had sailed from England with the Queen's full approbation, during the short period of determined action against Spain which followed upon the disclosure of Don John's intentions. The temper of the Catholics was likewise rising, and among them there already existed a religious organization, untrammelled by politics, with the Pope at its head. Supported by the Guises, by the enthusiastic Catholics of France, and by the people of Spain, who saw with dislike the dilatory conduct of their King, they were determined to act with energy. England was to be the object of their assault; and in Ireland, Scotland, and England itself, their influence at once began to be felt, till at length they carried their Princes with them; while the irritation of the Protestants rose to a height which could no longer be restrained, and in their case too their natural leaders were forced to take decided action.

The Covenant signed at Edinburgh, December 8, 1557, was as follows:—

"We, perceiving how Satan, in his members, the Antichrists of our time, cruelly doth rage, seeking to overthrow and to destroy the evangel of Christ and His Congregation, ought, according to our bounden duty, to strive in our Master's cause even unto death, being certain of the victory in Him. The which our duty being well considered, we do promise, before the majesty of God and His Congregation, that we (by His grace) shall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the most blessed Word of God and His Congregation; and shall labour at our possibility to have faithful ministers purely and truly to minister Christ's evangel and sacraments to His people. We shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, the whole Congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, at our whole powers and wearing of our lives, against Satan, and all wicked power that does intend tyranny or trouble against the foresaid Congregation. Unto the which Holy Word and Congregation we do join us, and also do forsake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitious abomination and idolatry thereof; and moreover, this our faithful promise before God, testified to His Congregation, by our subscriptions at these presents"

ELIZABETH

(CONTINUED).

IRELAND. 1558-1584.

IRELAND, always a chief difficulty to the English Government, had become more than ever unmanageable. The establishment of Protestantism in England had added religious hatred to the old national differences which divided the country. Not that the religious revolution had been carried out with at all the same completeness as in England. But the very weakness of the reform had rendered it more irksome. On the accession of Elizabeth, there were scarcely any Protestants in Ireland, nor was it constitutionally necessary that the laws which regulated one nation should regulate the other. Yet political necessity had led to the establishment of the Protestant Church. It was contrary to Elizabeth's plan of government that two external forms of religion should be allowed to exist. The divided allegiance which was the necessary consequence of Papacy under a Protestant government rendered the establishment of Protestantism highly desirable. If it was established, in accordance with the Queen's views it must be universal. Consequently the Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy became law in Ireland. Within the limits of the English Pale, where English law was held to be paramount, recusant Bishops were therefore removed and Protestants appointed; the Church and abbey lands were appropriated; and in the churches there was either Protestant worship, or, as too frequently happened, no worship at all. In other parts of the country Protestantism was only established and upheld, where possible, by force. Eager for money, the Queen farmed instead of colonizing the Church lands. The churches fell into ruins. In a large number of parishes there was no service at all. In still more, some wholly unfit person hurried through some semblance of service in exchange for a wretched pittance from the farmer of the lands. The new Church seemed to justify the worst that could be said of it. Meanwhile the widest connivance was extended to Roman Catholic worship; in every castle and village, and among the mountains, the old Church continued its ministra-tions uninterrupted. The religious zeal of the Irish was thus kept up. The weak and miserable Protestant Church became not undeservedly an object of hatred, and the cause of Catholicism indissolubly connected with that of the nation. The same irritating weakness was visible in the temporal government of the island. Parsimony prevented the maintenance of a firm administration. The English influence was supported by a few scattered garrisons, which were forced to make up for their want of strength by the cruel vigour with which they acted. Thus the opposition of creeds and of nations grew constantly stronger, till the Irish placed their cause in the hands of the Pope and the King of Spain, and the whole country had again piece by piece to be reconquered.

The first insurrection broke out in 1565, among the native Irish of Ulster. It was headed by Shan O'Neil, the eldest of the legitimate children of the late Earl of Tyrone. An illegitimate son of the name of Matthew had been put in his place by the English. Shan O'Neil sought, and in some degree obtained, the favour of the English Queen, but at length broke loose from all engagements with England, and claimed the sovereignty of Ulster, with the regal title of The O'Neil. Elizabeth contrived to raise against him the smaller native chieftains, and a colony of Scotch who had settled in Antrim. With their aid Sir Henry Sidney overran his country, and he was finally murdered by the Scotch. The fall of Shan O'Neil, and the good government of Sir Henry Sidney, seemed to promise a more prosperous time. Tirlough O'Neil, a kinsman of the late head of the clan, promised to assist the English Government, and some of the towns began to show signs of industry.

But the anarchical condition of the whole country, the local disputes among the chieftains, the fierce cruelty with which any act of marauding was chastised by the English garrisons, and the want of any great uniform plan of government, soon put an end to any semblance of peace. Sir Henry Sidney had urged that the province of Munster should be formed into an English presidency, and that it should be governed by English laws; the supremacy of the Earl of Desmond, the head of the Southern Geraldines, being thus destroyed. It was hoped that at the same time the chiefs of the smaller clans might be gradually civilized by being intrusted with positions of authority. Such a plan must have been connected with considerable colonization, and Cecil appears to have gone so far as to have arranged the details, by which colonists would have been intro-

Plans for colonization
of Munster.
1568.

duced upon land already confiscated, without invading anew the rights of any Irish chief. The plan was too expensive to suit the views of Elizabeth, but the idea of colonization was still kept alive. A long standing quarrel between the Butlers of Ormond and the Geraldines of Desmond was occupying the courts of law. Elizabeth insisted, whatever the law might be, that judgment should be given in favour of Ormond, who was a Protestant, and loyal; and to complete the discomfiture of Desmond, he was summoned to London, and arrested to be tried for treason. No severe measures were however taken against him; he was allowed to live at large, but was detained in England. In July 1568, he thought it wiser to submit, and surrendered to the Queen all his lands and property, confessing that they were lawfully hers, and that he would thankfully receive back whatever she liked to give him. This surrender might be brought to include nearly half the province of Munster; and were an investigation into titles instituted and forfeitures pressed, the greater part of the other half might probably have been secured. Upon this, a certain number of Devonshire gentlemen, the same class of adventurers who were the chief supporters of the piracy and privateering which was at that time the fashion in the West of England, offered, if the province was granted to them, to conquer it at their own expense, and hold it of the Queen. This would certainly have led to a war of extermination, and neither Cecil nor the Queen liked openly to sanction such a scheme. It might perhaps have come to something had it not been prematurely exploded. Carew, St. Leger and others, having purchased some obsolete titles to land in Munster, went there with bodies of retainers and forcibly made their claims good.

To touch their property in the land has always been to rouse the fury of the Irish. The knowledge that the idea of colonization was seriously held in England, and the exaggerated notions such knowledge was likely to foster, induced the Earl of Clancarty, and James Fitz-Maurice, brother of the Earl of Desmond, to determine on insurrection and to apply to Spain for help. The insurrection, as usual, assumed the form of murderous onslaughts, met by reprisals of an equally sanguinary nature. The details are almost too horrible to relate. Neither sex nor age were spared by either party. The war was unlike that waged between civilized nations, and resembled the exterminating warfare of the American frontier line. True to her policy of expending as little money as possible, Elizabeth wished at first to employ the Ormonds to suppress their old enemies the Desmonds. But in Munster.

Insurrection
July 1569.

when Ormond heard of the colonization schemes, he too declared that, rather than countenance the destruction of his country, he would join the rebels. Sir Henry Sidney had therefore to give up his plan of conciliation, and with such little means as he had, amounting to about 2000 English soldiers, to march into the disturbed districts, where, by a succession of constant cruel slaughters, he succeeded in restoring some outward semblance of order. Fitz-Maurice, he boasts, was a mere wandering outcast. Connaught was held in order by Sir Edward Felton, while Humphrey Gilbert garrisoned Kilmallock in Munster. But this success was quite transitory, no money came to support Sidney from England. His garrisons, without pay, had to live at free quarters. Mutinous, hated by the people, and living by robbery, they degenerated into bands of brigands. Fitz-Maurice again assumed all his old authority in Munster. Felton could hardly hold his own in Athlone.

Meanwhile the Irish appeal to Spain for assistance had not been answered as they expected. The Pope and Philip were never on very good terms, and the King was forbidden to accept the gift of Ireland which was offered to him except as a fief from the Roman See. Moreover, the change of policy of Mary Queen of Scots, who, it will be remembered, about the year 1570, turned for support from France to Spain, made Philip dislike the idea of separating Ireland from the English dominions. To obtain the friendship of the English Catholics was more important to him than the acquisition of Ireland; and the English Catholics, who fully expected by his aid to succeed in placing Queen Mary on the throne, would scarcely have thanked him for depriving their favourite of a large portion of her dominions. If Spain was to help Ireland, it must be on behalf of the Roman Catholic religion, and not on the national question. The prospect of any help almost disappeared when the discovery of the Ridolfi plot induced Philip to attempt to renew his old friendship with England.

But though thus left to themselves for the present, the hatred which the attempt to change their religion had engendered in the Irish led them to continue their old career of insurrection. Sidney, who disliked his unsatisfactory and cruel work, was recalled (March 1571). Fitz-William, an able soldier, now weakened by age, was left in his place. Starved by the parsimony of the Queen, he could effect but little. The condition of the English grew worse and worse; the Protestant religion again almost disappeared. Once more the English Government determined to despatch a vigorous expedition. Sir John Perrot, with an army, came over (April 1571) to reproduce the cruel scenes of Sidney's march. Again Fitz-Maurice and his comrades were reduced to wander as outcasts on the hills (Nov.). But again the want of support from home rendered all successes useless; Perrot's army mutinied for want of pay. The Queen would give him no help; he was therefore obliged to try gentler measures. Fitz-Maurice was told that on certain terms he might be pardoned. He accepted the conditions. All attempts at the establishment of English law came to an end, and the Irish chiefs again resumed their authority. At the same time (Jan. 1573), though only under the strictest promise to use his best influence to destroy the Roman Catholic religion, Desmond was at length allowed to return from England. Unfortunately, even this arrangement was not honestly carried out; no sooner did the Earl arrive in Dublin than he was again apprehended. He escaped from prison, but held that his second arrest released him from all his engagements, and as the English were too weak to recapture him, he regained in his native province all his former authority.

But although Ireland was thus left for the present in Irish hands, the idea of colonization, which might reclaim the country at little cost to Government, was by no means given up. It was now proposed to make the attempt in Ulster. A colony of the Scotch had there met with some success, and there seemed no reason why the English should fail. A son of Elizabeth's secretary, Sir Thomas Smith, was granted a strip of land near the Giant's Causeway. This fresh attempt, and the excitement produced by the massacre of St. Bartholomew, again roused the Irish to action. The English lost all power in Connaught, and Smith's colonization was an entire failure. The attempt was renewed on a larger and more promising scale by Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex; a large tract of country, called Clandeboy, stretching from Belfast along Lough Neagh and the river Bann to the sea, was granted to him, with full authority (Sept. 1573). He was to conquer the country at his own expense, and after four years' possession to pay a fixed rent to the Treasury. Many gentlemen joined in the venture. As usual, at first all seemed prosperous. Sir Brian O'Neil, the chief of the country, made his submission, and placed his cattle in Essex's hands. It was, however, a mere subterfuge. In a few days he disappeared, driving his own cattle and those of Essex along with him. It was everywhere found that the fair speeches of the inhabitants covered deadly hostility; and as the winter came on, the English

Colonization
of Ulster
by Essex.

were obliged to entrench themselves in Belfast. The troops began to loose heart and desert, the provisions that had been supplied him proved bad and produced illness, and he shortly had to confess that private enterprizes were fruitless, that, unless armed with authority from home, he could do nothing against the difficulties which surrounded him. Surrendering his grant and all hope of civilizing Ireland in his own knight-errant fashion, he accepted the position of Governor of Ulster (May 1574), and in that capacity, with great cruelty, succeeded in establishing the English authority over the O'Neils.

It was always difficult to induce an English gentleman to accept the position of Deputy in Ireland. Not only did the Queen's parsimony go far to entail ruin on those who accepted the office, the blame of failure, which seemed nearly inevitable, was always thrown upon them; the smallness of the means at their disposal, together with the untamed character of the inhabitants, constantly led them to acts of cruelty which were highly repulsive to them. At length, in November 1575, Sir Henry Sidney, who had already been unusually successful there, was persuaded, much against his will, to accept the government. By the Irish he was on the whole liked. His arrival was regarded with pleasure, and during the triumphal progress with which he entered upon his office he everywhere met with much apparent enthusiasm, and received the submission of the more noted chiefs. But he still held to his former view, that the only way to govern Ireland in peace was to establish Presidencies in Munster and Connaught. The absence of James Fitz-Maurice, Desmond's brother, who had been the leader of the late insurrections, gave him, as he thought, a fair opportunity, and he established Drury in Munster and Malby in Connaught as Presidents (December 1576). This measure seemed entirely to contradict the flattering hopes raised on the Deputy's arrival. It seemed that after all, Irish customs and Irish law were to disappear, and the authority of Irish chieftains to be superseded. Nor did the conduct of the Presidents allay this fear. In his first circuit Drury hung about a hundred men, and even then apologized for his moderation.

Thus, rendered suspicious on their tenderest point by the various efforts at colonization, and disappointed in the hopes which the establishment of Desmond in his own dominions and the supposed character of Sidney had raised, the Irish again burst into insurrection. This time it was the Burkes of Connaught who took the first step. They insurrection.

Connaught
Jan. 1577.

speedily learnt that the establishment of the Presidencies was not intended to be a dead letter. The countries of Shan and Ulick Burke, the sons of the Earl of Clanrickard, were mercilessly laid waste. Malby the President wrote: "I marched into their country . . . with determination to consume them with fire and sword, sparing neither old nor young. I burnt all their corn and houses, and committed to the sword all that could be found. This was in Shan Burke's country. Then I burnt Ulick Burke's country in like manner. . . . I went on sparing none that came in my way, which cruelty did so amaze their followers that they could not tell where to bestow themselves. So I left Ulick as little corn and as few houses standing as I had left his brother, and what people was found had as little favour as the other had." Law, upheld by hundreds of executions, insurrections suppressed with such ruthless cruelty as this, could not but excite the bitterest enmity, and when, for the support of the English army, a cess or tax was laid upon the land within the Pale, the gentlemen of that district became little less disaffected than the native or Anglo-Irish. A universal outbreak was scarcely to be avoided.

This general discontent reached its height about the year 1577, at the time when the Queen, believing that a war with Spain would be inevitable, had despatched Drake on his piratical excursion. The Irish malcontents again thought that an opportunity had arrived for interesting Philip in their cause. This they considered would be best done by begging his assistance, when an important insurrection was already on foot. Since friendly relations between Spain and England had been established after the Ridolfi plot, it was to Rome that the malcontents chiefly looked. It was with money and troops supplied by the Pope that they now intended to begin their movement. Sanders, an English refugee priest, and Stukely, who, originally one of the English privateers, had lately been living at Madrid, high in favour with Philip, and constantly urging him to interfere on behalf of Ireland, seemed fitting agents for their purpose. Fitz-Maurice also was abroad. To him and Stukely were intrusted the forces. Sanders was to accompany them as Legate. Stukely's troops were diverted by the King of Portugal to an invasion of Africa, where their leader closed his strange career. Philip, as usual slow to act, gave no immediate assistance. The friendship with England was again patched up; and the expedition was postponed for a year. At last, in May 1579, the success of Drake's voyage became known, the temper of the Spanish

Catholic expedition to Ireland.
1579.

people became violently excited, the Catholics, indignant at Philip's lukewarmness, took matters into their own hand, and a little expedition set sail. Fitz-Maurice, Sanders, and their followers, landed at Dingle, in Kerry. It was supposed that Fitz-Maurice's presence would at once rouse the country to arms, and that Desmond would himself join them. But Desmond was afraid. It was only after his brothers had murdered two English officers at Tralee, an offence which he felt to be unpardonable, that he ventured to declare himself. Then all Kerry and Limerick flew to arms. The insurrection met with no great success. Drury was indeed driven backward to Kilmallock. But Malby, the other President, succeeded in killing Fitz-Maurice, and, seizing the command in Munster, burnt Ashketyn, the stronghold of the Desmonds. Had reinforcements been supplied, he would have been generally successful. But the Queen, taking fright as usual at the expense, counter-ordered the troops. The insurgents were able to take and burn Youghal and to march triumphantly as far as Cork.

At length, thoroughly awake to the danger, Elizabeth intrusted the war to Desmond's old enemy, Ormond. In conjunction with the English, he pushed on, destroying all before him (Jan. 1580). "We passed through the rebel countries," wrote the English commander, "in two companies, consuming with fire all habitations, and executing the people wherever we found them." The two bands subsequently joined. Carrigafoyle, the fort where the few foreigners whom Fitz-Maurice had brought with him had intrenched themselves, was taken, and every man put to death, the castle of Ashketyn itself blown up (April). By the 26th of June 1580, the country, thus ruthlessly destroyed, seemed reduced to peace. Ormond, in one year, is said to have killed 826 malefactors and 4000 other people. Sidney had withdrawn from the island just before the outbreak. His place was now (Aug.) taken by Lord Grey de Wilton, a man of stern Puritanic temper. He came only to find that the insurrection had broken out afresh within the Pale. His opening manoeuvres were disastrous. His troops were entrapped and defeated, with heavy slaughter, at Glen Malure, in the Wicklow Mountains.

Shocked at the expense, at the cruelty, and at the want of complete success which had attended her vigorous efforts, Elizabeth seemed bent on falling back on a policy of conciliation, when the arrival of 800 men, Spaniards and Italians, from Spain, with the connivance at least of Philip, rendered a continuation of the war necessary. The effect of their arrival was to

Insurrection
of Desmond.
Aug.

Arrival of help from Spain.
Sept.

renew the insurrection in all directions, and yet, in fact, Sanders himself, the most sanguine adviser of the rebels, began to see that more effectual help from Spain could alone save them. The new arrivals fortified themselves at Smerwick, in Kerry. But they were unable to move further into the interior, from the utter devastation Ormond had caused in the province. Admiral Winter, with the fleet, closed them in from the sea, while Grey gradually brought his troops round them. A short bombardment reduced the garrison to parley. They were refused all terms, surrendered at discretion, and were every one of them put to death, 600 in all (November). This was a deathblow to the insurrection, though it lingered on amid scenes of cruelty and bloodshed for two years longer. In the Pale, Kildare, the natural leader of the Irish of that district, was apprehended, and his complicity in the insurrection proved. He was sent to England, and died in the Tower. Desmond, the head of the other branch of the Geraldines, after wandering for long an outcast in the forests, was betrayed by those with whom he had taken refuge, and killed as he lay in bed. The death of the old Earl of Clanrickard (Oct. 1583), and the murder of his son Shan by his brother, completed the extinction of the insurgent Burkes. By July 1584 English authority was quite re-established, and Sir John Perrot again took possession of the Government. As far then as Ireland was concerned, the attempt of the Catholics, as distinguished from the Catholic powers, though causing much disaster and bloodshed, had been ultimately foiled.

Destruction of the foreigners at Smerwick.
Suppression of the insurrection.

ELIZABETH

(CONTINUED).

ALMOST at the same time that Sanders had been despatched to Ireland, a young man of the name of Esmé Stuart, Count d'Aubigny, was sent to Scotland. He was a close friend of the Guises, had been trained by them, and was the heir to the Lennox title. His ostensible reason for visiting Scotland was to regain his inheritance. He was in reality an agent of the Guises and of the Catholic party in Europe, and his appearance must be regarded as a second step in the general Catholic conspiracy against Elizabeth. His object was to resuscitate the old French party in Scotland. Should he succeed in restoring the influence of France, it was intended to organize an invasion of England, in which both French and Spanish should take part. The command of the army was to be intrusted to Guise, as the Frenchman least likely to be distasteful to Philip. In the first part of this scheme he was eminently successful. He received the Earldom of Lennox (Feb. 1580), the better to serve his purpose professed to become a Protestant, and speedily ingratiated himself with the King. Though ignorant of the full scope of Lennox's plans, the great credit he had rapidly gained, and his rapid elevation to power, seemed so threatening that Elizabeth attempted again to call into existence the English party she had so foolishly suffered to be destroyed. But she had played fast and loose with her friends too often to be easily trusted. Morton required something more than a mere promise of assistance before he would attempt anything to regain his authority. While the Queen hesitated, the opportunity was gone. Lennox secured the execution of Morton on a charge of complicity in the murder of Darnley, which he could not completely deny. He was condemned and executed. With him the influence of the friends of England entirely disappeared, and in 1581 the Papal party was triumphant.

The second part of the plan which had brought Lennox to Scotland was happily thwarted. Its success depended chiefly upon the assist-

¹ John Stewart, 3rd Earl of Lennox, died 1526.

1581]

JESUIT SCHEMES IN SCOTLAND

545

ance of Philip, and rested on the supposition that, for public objects, he would lay aside his dislike to France. He always disliked war, was very slow in taking action, and had his hands already full. For the royal house of Portugal, having become extinct, he was using all his energies to secure the dominion of the whole Peninsula. It was in vain that the advantages which he might derive from a marriage between James of Scotland and a Spanish Princess were pointed out to him, in vain that it was hinted that the triumph of the Guises might enable them, on the approaching extinction of the house of Valois, to make a partition of France, of which he should himself receive a share. He remained unmoved, and the expedition fell to the ground.

But, though the worst intentions of the conspirators never saw the light, the restored influence of the Catholics in Scotland made itself sufficiently evident to Elizabeth. A plan was now suggested for re-establishing Mary in Scotland, and for making her restoration palatable to those who had hitherto been the King's friends, by associating her son in the Government. Elizabeth met the threatened combination with her usual dexterity. She discovered that James was not really inclined to admit his mother to the Government on these terms; and she opened a separate negotiation with Mary, who offered at length to accept any terms that could be suggested, and even in exchange for her liberty to remain under supervision in England. Elizabeth was thus able to hold the immediate return of the Queen as a threat over James, and to plead James's repugnance as a reason for not completing her treaty with Mary.

But it was after all not her own skill, but a national outbreak, which saved Elizabeth from the effects of the Catholic reaction in Scotland; for a sudden change in the position of affairs there came to her assistance. The conspirators, as usual, had mistaken the feeling of the nobles for that of the nation. Lennox, as a preliminary step in the restoration of Catholicism, determined to render more real the shadow of Episcopacy which still existed in Scotland. The attempt brought him into violent collision with the General Assembly of the Kirk. The appointment of a minister to the vacant See of Glasgow led to the excommunication of the newly-made prelate, and to an uproar in Edinburgh (July 1582) which disclosed how deeply the Protestant feeling was rooted among the people. Taking advantage of this dispute, Lord Gowrie, who had a private quarrel with Lennox, in company with Angus, Lindsay,

Failure of Lennox's plan.

Intended joint rule of Mary and James.

Catholic reaction checked by the popular feelings.

Raid of Ruthven.
Aug. 22

Mar, and others, determined to snatch the Government from Lennox. James was seized at Perth in August 1582, together with James Stuart, Earl of Arran, whose influence over the King was second only to that of Lennox. With the King in their hands, and with the plans of the Jesuits made known by the confession of Arran, the Lords applied to Elizabeth for assistance, and thus the plans of the Catholics with regard to Scotland were for the time thwarted. Elizabeth believed that she had been successful.

Meanwhile the same Catholic conspiracy had been at work in England. It had there naturally assumed a form at once religious and political. The more vehement Catholics had withdrawn from the country, on account of the dangers which there beset them. They had taken refuge in the Low Countries, and there Allen, one of the chief among them, had established a seminary at Douay, for the purpose of keeping up a supply of priests in England. To Douay numbers of young Englishmen from Oxford continually flocked. The establishment had been broken up by Requesens, and removed to Rheims, and a second college of the same description was established at Rome. From these two centres of intrigue numerous enthusiastic young men constantly repaired to England, and in the disguise of laymen carried on their priestly work and attempted to revive the Romanist religion. But abler and better disciplined workmen were now wanted. Allen and his friends therefore opened negotiations with Mercuriano, the head of the Jesuit order, in which many Englishmen had enrolled themselves. In 1580, as part of a great combined Catholic effort, a regular Jesuit mission, under two priests, Campion and Parsons, was despatched to England, to attempt there the same work which had been intrusted to Sanders in Ireland and to D'Aubigny in Scotland. As a preliminary step, one of the great difficulties which had beset the English Catholics was removed by a strange piece of double-dealing. A Bull of excommunication having been issued against Elizabeth, the devout Catholics were compelled to choose between disobedience to the Church and treason to the Queen. The new missionaries were allowed to say that that part of the Bull which pronounced censures upon those who clung to their allegiance applied to heretics only, that Catholics might profess themselves loyal until the time arrived for carrying the Bull into execution; in other words, they were permitted to be traitors at heart while declaring themselves loyal subjects.

This explanation of the Bull was of itself sufficient to justify severity on the part of Government. It was impossible henceforward to separate Roman Catholicism from disloyalty. Proclamations were issued, requiring English parents to summon their children from abroad, and declaring that to harbour Jesuit priests was to support rebels. At the same time, the Queen wrote a spirited address to her people, appealing to their loyalty against her enemies. Walsingham was at last allowed to enter upon a course of severity. Early in December several priests were apprehended and closely examined, torture being occasionally used for the purpose. In view of the danger which these examinations disclosed, stringent measures were taken. Attendance at church was rendered peremptorily necessary. Parliament was summoned in the beginning of 1581, and laws passed against the action of the Jesuits. A Bill was passed rendering it high treason to claim the power of absolving subjects from their allegiance, or to receive any person into the Church of Rome. The concealment of such persons was made misprision of high treason. Private masses were strictly forbidden, and a fine of £20 a month laid upon those who refused to attend the service of the Established Church. The effect of these laws was to draw a sharp line, which had hitherto been avoided, between the Catholic and Protestant populations; and a number of the older Catholics, who were loyal at heart, found themselves implicated against their will in treasonable plots, of which the Spanish ambassador Mendoza, whose protection they were compelled to seek, was the centre.

Had Elizabeth been conscious of the full extent of the plot against her, had she known the intention of the Guises to make a descent upon England in co-operation with Spain, and the many ramifications of the plot in her own country, it is reasonable to suppose that she would have been forced at length to take decided measures. But in ignorance of the abyss opening before her feet, she continued for some time longer her old temporizing policy. Relying upon the friendship of France, she refused to restore the money taken from Spanish ships by Drake, who had just returned from the circumnavigation of the world; she countenanced Don Antonio, who claimed the succession of Portugal in opposition to Philip; she even ventured—in reliance on the necessity under which France lay of seeking her friendship, in presence of the increased power of Spain, which had incorporated Portugal and defeated Don Antonio's French auxiliaries in the Azores—to break off the marriage treaty with Anjou, after carrying it to the verge of completion. To such a point had she carried her favour, that she dismissed the Prince, who had come to England as her suitor, with a kiss, a public pledge, as it were, of her intentions, when he left her to take possession of the Netherlands, which had placed themselves in his hands. She had thus in Scotland refused the friendship both of the Protestant and of the Catholic parties. She had insulted France by the rejection of Alençon. She had thrown away all chance of attaching the Netherlands to her cause. She had almost driven Philip, against his will, to listen to the strong wish of the Spanish nation, and to join the ranks of her enemies.

And all this while, without her knowledge, the most dangerous and complete scheme was on foot for deposing her. This scheme was finally arranged at Paris. King James of Scotland had escaped from his Protestant keepers (July 7, 1583), and had again made an offer of his kingdom as a landing-place for Guise. But the Duke had seen in Lennox's failure a proof of the strength of the Protestant party in that country. His ideas were now directed towards England itself. The Spanish ambassador had assured him that a certain number of the Catholic nobles were only waiting for help from abroad. The Jesuits spoke of the readiness of the people for insurrection. The agents of the Queen of Scots were constantly urging him forward. At a meeting held in Paris, he announced that he was ready, in combination with Duke Albert of Bavaria, and his brother, the Duke of Mayenne, to make the intended descent upon England. But here the strong Spanish leanings of the English Jesuits and English Catholics interfered. They insisted upon the King of Spain taking a prominent part in the movement. After some persuasion, Philip agreed that he would supply some portion of the invading troops. An army, collected in the Netherlands, was to join that of Guise, and under cover of the Spanish fleet to invade the country, when all was ready for their reception. But the fleet, which was a necessary part of the plan, was long in coming. Philip, as usual, was slow in action, and regarded the fullest preparation as necessary for success. By degrees Walsingham's spies began to give him information of the coming danger. A conspiracy for the assassination of the Queen was discovered (November), and, more important still, Thomas Throgmorton, who was thoroughly conversant with all the details of the great conspiracy, was observed frequently leaving the Spanish ambassador's house, and was arrested. His rooms were searched. Lists of the chief Catholic malcontents were discovered, and plans of the harbours best fitted for the landing of a foreign force. His more important papers he contrived to conceal, but he was not proof against the rack, and made a full confession of all that he knew. His confession did not save him; he was executed. But the whole scheme of conspiracy was now before Elizabeth's ministers,

Isolation produced by Elizabeth's policy.

Great general conspiracy against Elizabeth.

Arrest of Throgmorton. Discovery of the plot.

and at last she recognized the full extent of her danger. Some of her Council urged her at once to take a straightforward step, to make common cause with the Protestants of Scotland and the Netherlands, and to bid defiance to Spain. To this honest step she as usual could not bring herself, but strong measures were taken in England. Great numbers of Jesuits and seminary priests were apprehended and executed, suspected magistrates removed, and those Catholic Lords, whose treachery might have been fatal to her, ejected from their places of authority and deprived of influence. Against the Spanish ambassador, too, her action was prompt. Mendoza was summoned before the Council, and ordered at once to leave the country. In vain he alleged his innocence and defied proof; he was obliged to go, and left England, vowing vengeance. The cessation of diplomatic relations between Spain and England rendered war sooner or later inevitable.

Up till this time the Queen's policy, shifty, even treacherous as it had been, had been successful as far as England was concerned. Peace had been preserved, an economical Government had been carried on, and the wellbeing of the people secured. Disaffection had thus been gradually dying away, and the resources of the country to meet the inevitable crisis increasing. One chief means employed by the Queen in securing this happy result had been the position of Mary Queen of Scots. By playing the mother against the son, any active interference on the part of Scotland had been prevented, and the Catholic party in that country neutralized. At the same time the Catholics in England had been divided in their views. The old hereditary Catholics, for the most part loyal to England, were anxious for the restoration of Mary, and that she should be declared the Queen's successor, while the new Catholics, and those who were under Jesuit influence, wished for a more complete revolution, and that Mary, if restored at all, should be Queen only with Spanish assistance, and as the creature of Spain; while dread of Mary's restoration, and the consequent close connection of England and France, had been one of the chief causes which had kept Philip from entering more eagerly into the plans of the Catholics. The course of events was rapidly destroying the importance of Mary's life.

In Scotland, the success of the Protestants had been only temporary. James had made his escape from their hands, and Angus and other of their leaders were in exile in England. At first, as has been mentioned, James had written to place his kingdom at the disposal of the Guises, but before long other influences prevailed. On the flight of Lennox, James's favour had fallen upon Stuart, a man whose views were confined to his own personal advantage; he had contrived to get possession of the property of the Hamiltons, with the title of the Earl of Arran, in the place of the imbecile heir of the Hamilton house, and he had also, on the flight of Angus with the Protestant Lords, obtained the patrimony of the Douglasses. The restoration of Mary and the re-establishment of Protestantism would have been equally distasteful to him. The return of Mary must have brought with it the restoration of the Hamiltons, her most trusted supporters, and would consequently have deprived him of the Hamilton property. The restoration, on the other hand, of the Protestants, would have obliged him to restore to Angus the Douglas property. Understanding Elizabeth's character, he therefore devised a third plan, in which James was ready to join him. He induced the King, ignoring alike the claims of Catholics and Protestants, to assume in Scotland the same position as Elizabeth had assumed in England, and to establish a State church, of which he was the head, with Bishops and the rest of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. This measure was exceedingly pleasing to Elizabeth, and James, whose chief idea was to secure the English succession, when thus brought into friendship with Elizabeth, readily, upon the payment of a very moderate pension, gave up his mother's cause. In extreme anger at this desertion, Mary denounced her false son, and declared Philip of Spain the heir of her claims upon the the English crown. Fear of interference from Scotland being thus removed, and Mary having been clearly implicated in all the late conspiracies, she was removed to stricter confinement in Tutbury Castle, where, after a while, under the care of Sir Anyas Paulet, she was so rigorously watched that all communication with her friends was prevented.

Dismissal of Mendoza. Breach with Spain. Jan. 1584.

Declining importance of Mary.

Deserted by her son.

Removal
to Tutbury.
Jan. 1585.

Meanwhile, the national feeling had been strongly roused by late events. It was plain that the idea of assassinating Elizabeth was very prevalent. It had all along been Alva's view, in which Philip seems to have shared, that a Spanish invasion would succeed best in the confusion that would follow the Queen's death. Somerville had been already executed for attempting it (October 1583), and now a Dr. Parry, instigated by Morgan, Mary's agent in Paris, came over with the same intention (January 1584). Moreover, the death of the Prince of Orange appeared to show a determination on the part of the Catholics to have recourse to assassination as a means to rid themselves of their enemies.

Increased by affairs in Flanders.

The great pacification of Ghent had in it from the first the seeds of weakness. It included the Catholic provinces of the South. Between them and the Protestants of Holland and Zeeland there could be no really cordial union. It was these Catholics who had harboured the futile idea of placing the States in the hands of Matthias of Austria. In that step, with true patriotism, Orange had concurred, rather than break up the union. But on its becoming evident that the Catholic States were ready to make terms with Spain to secure their own religion, he had, in 1579, made a closer union among the States more entirely under his influence, and the Union of Utrecht was formed between Holland, Zeeland, Gueldres, and Friesland, to which subsequently the great cities, Brussels, Antwerp, Bruges, Ypres, and Ghent, gave in their adhesion. Of this union, throwing aside the fiction under which he had hitherto acted as Stadtholder by the royal commission, Orange had assumed the title of Captain-General and Admiral. In September of the following year (1580) he had proceeded a step further. Philip was deposed from his position as Duke of Burgundy, and the independence of the States declared. Having thus broken loose from Spain, the States were compelled to look for another ruler, and had offered that position to the Duke of Anjou, with the title of Duke of Brabant. It was to assume the duties of that office that he had left England, after the Queen's kiss at Greenwich had given him hopes of being her accepted suitor. Being a man wholly unprincipled, desirous only of his own aggrandizement, and jealous of the Prince of Orange, he had betrayed the people he was called upon to govern, and had made an effort to capture with his French troops the chief cities. This attempt, carried out by the favour of the Catholic faction, was made in 1583. In some places it was successful. But in Antwerp, where the Prince in person made the attempt, it signally failed. When his troops entered the town, they found themselves attacked on all sides; 1600 men and more were killed in the streets, and Anjou, with the small remainder, fled in disgrace to France, where he died in the following year. His flight restored Orange to all his old importance, and left him free to carry on the war vigorously with the Prince of Parma, who was in command of the Spanish forces. A price had long been set on his head. Two or three attempts, in one of which he was desperately wounded, had already been made to assassinate him, and at length, in July 1584, Gerard succeeded in deserving the promised reward. Just as Orange was receiving news of Anjou's death, he shot him at his own house at Delft. His death raised the fear of the English that a similar fate awaited Elizabeth, and conscious of the terrible disorder that would arise on the sudden death of the Queen in the existing uncertainty as to the Assassination of the Prince of Orange.

July 9, 1584.

succession, the Council and chief nobles in England drew up a Bond of Association, in which they pledged themselves to prosecute with arms "all who should attempt any act or counsel to the harm of the Queen's person, and to prosecute to the death any pretended successor" in favour of whose title such an attempt should be made. The Association received almost unanimous adhesion; Protestants and Catholics alike joined it; even the Scotch Queen herself signed it. To complete this Association, which in appearance set aside the usual course of law, it was determined to give it the sanction of Parliament, which was summoned for that purpose in November 1584; and with some slight alterations it was incorporated in a Bill, securing the safety of the Queen.

Again, after the breach with Spain, and secure on the side of Scotland, an opportunity was offered to Elizabeth for openly adopting the cause of the Netherlands and the Protestants in France; again the opportunity was allowed to slip, and a fresh course of double-dealing was entered upon. Having lost both Alençon and Orange, the States offered themselves to Elizabeth. Being refused by her, they applied to France. This application, accepted fully, would have brought back the old danger of a junction of France and the Netherlands, which it was supposed that England would not allow. But Elizabeth was now anxious that the war against Spain should be undertaken, not by herself, but by the French. She therefore urged Henry to accept the proposition of the States, while at the same time she contrived to obtain a promise from her partisans among the Netherlands that Brille and Flushing should be given up to her, and managed to introduce such conditions into the offer made to France as should make its acceptance by Henry useless. Her plan was, however, seen through, and defeated. Henry refused the sovereignty of the States (Feb. 1585), while almost at the same time Elizabeth's rejection of the demand for assistance from the Huguenots obliged him to yield to the Guises, and to put himself at the head of the League. While the States were thus left without assistance from either of the great powers, the Prince of Parma was constantly continuing his victorious course, and was using all his efforts at the great siege of Antwerp.

In spite of herself Elizabeth is driven to assist the Netherlands.

In their extremity, the States refused to accept the Queen's late reply as final, and continued their application. To accept and annex the Provinces, to render them part of her dominions, was much too decided a step for Elizabeth to take. But she began to hint that she might either accept the position of Protector, or of friend and auxiliary, if first her position was rendered secure, and the return of the money she expended guaranteed by the possession of certain seaport towns, as Brille, Flushing and Enchuysen. She was hurried forward in this course by the action of Philip, who, aware of the point the negotiations had reached, was at last roused to strike a blow, and suddenly issued an order for detaining all English ships in Spanish harbours, and imprisoning their crews (May 29). This was just one of those blows which make themselves felt most clearly by the people rather than by the Government, and was especially irritating, as the ships had been chiefly sent to supply Spain with corn during a time of scarcity. The popular feeling against Spain, and the wish to engage in the long-threatened war with that country, grew rapidly more vehement. The crisis seemed to be hastening onward. The Queen agreed to accept the Protectorate of the States, promising to make no truce with their joint enemies without consent of the States-General. But her heart failed her, and she preferred finally to assume only the position of a friend. On the 12th of August, a treaty was made to assist in the defence of Antwerp, which shortly afterwards ripened into a more general treaty, in which she pledged herself to keep at her own cost 4000 men till the close of the war, receiving as guarantees the towns of Brille, Flushing and Ramequens.

So eager were the people, and so ready from their constant militia training to take arms, that in a few days 7000 men sailed. Their arrival (Jan. 1586) was too late to save Antwerp, nor did the joy with which they were received by the Netherlands last long. Leicester, an incompetent general, was appointed to command them; no money was sent to support them, and it was with ill-concealed displeasure that the well-appointed troops of the States surrendered the cautionary towns to be garrisoned by the ragged and hungry English regiments. It was not long before it became known that, even when thus at length driven to energetic action, Elizabeth was secretly negotiating with the Spaniards. She meant to use the towns which were in her hands to make herself mistress of the position, and to enable her to treat authoritatively with both parties. It was for this reason that Leicester, and no abler soldier, had been sent in command, and that the English troops were constantly ordered to remain entirely on the defensive. Norris, one of the commanders, was, in fact, severely chidden for acting with some vigour. With this scheme in her mind, the Queen's anger was naturally great when she heard that Leicester, misunderstanding her designs, or wishing to pursue a more honest course, had assumed in her name the government of the States (Feb. 1586). It was in vain that it was urged upon Elizabeth that the States were without government, and that to prevent entire anarchy Leicester's step was necessary. She at first demanded an entire and public renunciation of his governorship; but was at length satisfied with demanding that the States should, as quickly as possible, find means of relieving him of his authority, allowing him only the position of Lieutenant-General to the Queen. At length he seems to have understood her views. He remained inactive, while Parma continued his victorious career. When some little action became necessary to keep up appearances, he attempted to recover Zutphen, a fortress upon the Issel, which had been one of Parma's latest conquests. The town was ill supplied with provisions, and Parma advanced with a convoy to its relief. His army was inferior in numbers to Leicester's. But that general, conceiving that only a small guard would attend the convoy, placed his own forces where they could be of no use, and sent an ambuscade of only 500 men to stop the advance of Parma. After a splendid but ineffectual contest with the Spanish cavalry, it became evident that Parma had his whole army with him. The English troops had to withdraw, and Zutphen was relieved (Oct. 2). The great loss of the English in the battle was Sir Philip Sidney, a man regarded both in England and abroad as the type of what a chivalrous gentleman should be. After this useless display of bravery, Leicester returned to England, leaving the government in the hands of the States, while the English army continued to dwindle, in want of all the necessities which the parsimony or policy of the Queen refused to supply.

She secretly negotiates with the Spaniards.

Drake's energy thwarts her double-dealing.

As usual, the independent energy of her people was thwarting the political activity of the Queen. Drake had sailed with a considerable armament to demand the restoration of the captive sailors. His expedition was not, as regards spoil, so successful as the last. But the appearance of the English commander on the coast of Spain itself, the plunder of the town of Vigo, and the subsequent attack and storm of three strong cities in the West Indies (Sept.-Nov. 1585), St. Iago, St. Domingo, and Carthagena, tended much to raise the opinion of the English power, and rendered negotiations with Spain much more difficult.

Walsingham's spies discover the Babington plot.

While the nation was thus ostensibly at war with Spain, and the Queen secretly negotiating a peace with that country, it had become necessary to discover clearly, before any determined action was taken, what was the real design of the Catholic party in Europe. For this purpose Walsingham had contrived to open a means of communication between Mary Queen of Scots and her foreign adherents. He had removed Mary from the well-guarded castle of Tutbury to the more open manor of Chartley (Sept. 1585). By corrupting the brewer who supplied the household with beer, he induced him to receive Mary's letters, which, before they passed to their several destinations, were opened and read by Walsingham and his agents. Not much certain knowledge with regard to the general action of the party was gained, but a plot came to light directed against the Queen's life. Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of Derbyshire, had been from the first closely attached to the Jesuits. Apparently at the instigation of Ballard, a Jesuit, who had obtained the Papal sanction for the Queen's murder, and had travelled through England in disguise organizing disaffection, Babington and a party of young gentlemen, some of whom were in the household, determined to put the Queen to death. This plan they foolishly made known to Queen Mary. In her answer to Babington, written not in her own hand but by her secretaries, she accepted his offer. "When all is ready," she wrote, "the six gentlemen must be set to work." Sufficient evidence was now collected for Walsingham's purpose. Babington and the chief conspirators were apprehended (August), and an account of the plot published, which roused the popular excitement in the highest degree. It was thought necessary, in order to complete the charge against Mary, that all her papers should be examined. While still in ignorance of the discovery of the plot, she was therefore taken out on a hunting party, suddenly surrounded by troops, and while her two secretaries who were with her were arrested, she hurried herself to the castle of ^{Mary removed to Fotheringay.} Fotheringay. Such proofs as were afforded by her letters, when they were carefully examined, and those which had fallen lately into Walsingham's hands, together with the confessions of her secretaries and of Babington, who with his accomplices had been executed (Sept. 20), were laid before the Peers and Judges in October. By them it was decided that the Queen of Scots must be brought to trial, and a Commission, including all the Peers that could be collected, ^{Her trial Oct. 1586.} was issued, constituting them into a court to sit at Fotheringay and try her. She at first refused to plead; but subsequently made her appearance before the Court under protest, and there denied absolutely all knowledge of Babington, of his letter, and of her answer to it. It was in vain that Babington's letter was produced, and finally her own letter also. The letter, not being in her own writing, she threw the blame of it entirely on her secretaries, and demanded to be confronted with them. The Commission was adjourned for ten days before giving sentence. The two secretaries were again examined; and finally every one of the commissioners, some of whom had hitherto been favourable to her, gave their sentence against her, finding her not only guilty of a knowledge of a general conspiracy, including a Spanish invasion, but also of aiming at the assassination of the Queen. Mary had thus been convicted. It was still to be determined what further step should be taken. The importance of the occasion demanded that Parliament should be summoned. It was opened in the beginning of November, and before long an address determined on, recapitulating the crimes of the Queen and demanding her immediate death. This request was supported by the argument that the Queen of Scots, having joined the Association, had passed her own sentence.

It was no easy matter for Elizabeth to decide on carrying out the request of the Parliament. There is no need to suppose that her hesitation was hypocritical. It is of course impossible to believe that she had any personal tenderness for the Scotch Queen. The correspondence lately laid before her, disclosing as it did Mary's constant enmity to herself, must have removed any such feeling. But to lay hands upon a Queen was to one so tenacious of the royal prerogative as Elizabeth in itself most repugnant; and, as has been already mentioned, though Mary, while she lived, had formed a centre for all Catholic conspiracies, she had yet been very useful in enabling Elizabeth to carry out a policy which depended upon the jealousy of the Catholic powers of Europe. To put her to death was equivalent to joining finally with the Protestant interest, and to challenge at once Scotland, France and Spain. To her Protestant counsellors, on the other hand, it seemed as if the desired moment had arrived. James's late indifference to his mother's cause, his well-known selfishness, and the lukewarmness of his present behaviour, led them to expect little interference at his hands. The state of France rendered it highly improbable that that country would proceed beyond formal protests and intercessions, for the King, a weak and licentious bigot, surrounded by worthless favourites, could scarcely uphold his independence against the League now in close alliance with Spain. To have come prominently forward in the cause of Catholicism would have been to place himself in the hands of Guise, whom he regarded as his worst enemy. It was impossible for him to break with Eng-

The Queen's hesitation and its causes.

Determination of her counsellors and
its causes.

land. It was therefore with Spain alone they would have to deal. That country they did not fear. An open war abroad, and fixed policy at home, was preferable to the constant secret disaffection and shifting diplomacy of late years. To the great bulk of the nation also the execution appeared a necessity. The threat of foreign invasion, the danger of too close a connection with Spain, which was rendered likely by the advance of Philip's personal claims to the throne, had rendered most of the more moderate Catholics loyal. The Queen was very popular. The danger of assassination, which was supposed to hang over her, roused the enthusiasm of the people. The discovery of the underhand working of the extreme Catholics filled the Protestant population with undefined and exaggerated dread. It seemed not improbable that the animosity of parties might produce public disturbances or even civil war.

Much pressure was therefore brought upon the Queen to induce her to consent to Mary's death. She at length listened to the earnest representations of Lord Howard of Effingham, who brought before her the dangerous temper of the nation, and consented to allow the Secretary Davison to bring the warrant. She signed it, and bade him get it sealed at once that she might hear no more of it. At the same time, she expressed her wish that Sir Amyas Paulet and Sir Drew Drury would act on their own authority, and put Mary to death. This was in precise accordance with her old habit of throwing upon her servants the difficult duties she should have done herself. Davison suggested this plan to Paulet, urging his consent as a member of the Association. But the Act incorporating the Association had made the personal instruction of the Queen necessary before private action in her favour could be taken. Paulet therefore refused. Davison, who from the Queen's conduct felt it probable that she would afterwards repudiate him, placed the case before the Council. They determined to take the responsibility upon themselves, and the warrant was issued. Mary, whose life had been one long piece of acting, performed her part to the last with perfect success and dignity. She assumed the character of a martyr, and declared that she died entirely for the sake of her religion, ignoring the many political crimes of which she had been guilty. Her death was as touching as the most complete assumption of innocence could make it. With the grace and tenderness of which she was a perfect mistress, she bade farewell to her friends and attendants, and, mindful of her appearance even to feeling.

The popular

The warrant signed.
Feb. 11.

The Council
act on it.
Feb. 13.

the end, appeared on the scaffold, which was erected in the hall of Fotheringay, in a full costume of scarlet, and with calm dignity received the fatal stroke of the axe.

She left her claim upon the English throne to Philip, who had already determined that upon that ground only would he risk the dangers of an assault upon England. The excitement throughout Europe at her death was great. Abroad, its full meaning as a declaration in favour of Protestantism was fully understood. The Queen, alarmed at what she had done, pursued her usual equivocal course, and expressed the strongest anger both against Davison and Burghley. To such extremes did she carry her anger, that she insisted upon the trial of Davison, and it was found expedient to dismiss him from the public service and condemn him to the payment of a large fine. Such conduct on the part of the Queen, and the excuses which she made to foreign courts, would scarcely have been sufficient to save her from the danger she dreaded, had not the political situation of Europe acted in her favour. Henry III., as we have seen, in his struggle with the Guises could not afford to quarrel with her, and the very step which Queen Mary had taken to secure the intervention of Spain still further weakened the chances of general Catholic action. Philip resolved to prosecute his own claim to the English throne. In so doing, he at once alienated the Scotch King, who regarded the succession as his own, and excited the jealousy of all in France who were not closely bound to the Guise party, and therefore to the Spanish interests. As it was, the excitement caused by Mary's death brought matters abroad to a crisis. The Huguenots again organized themselves in rebellion. The Protestant Princes of Germany joined their League; and while Henry of Navarre raised the South of France, a considerable German army crossed the frontier to co-operate with him. Henry III. was obliged to use some means for the suppression of this insurrection. But his action was so lukewarm that the Catholics declared he had wilfully suffered his sister-in-law to be put to death. Guise, making use of this feeling, was enabled to rouse the organization of the League to fresh vigour.

Though Henry of Navarre won a great victory over the royal troops at Courtras, he suffered the opportunity to slip, while Guise contrived to hamper, and ultimately destroy, the army of the German invaders, and, in spite of the King's prohibition, made his appearance in Paris, where he was received in triumph by the people. An attempt on the part of Henry III to

Mary's death.
Feb. 18, 1587.

The Queen's
anger.

The state of Europe neutralizes the effect of the execution.

Day of the Barricades
in France.
May 12, 1588.

overawe the populace by the introduction of troops, caused a general outbreak of the mob. Barricades sprang up at every street corner. Henry III. was obliged to fly from the city, and Guise and the Catholics were masters of France. But this success, which, had it occurred earlier, might have rendered the Spanish invasion irresistible, did not take place till Philip's great effort had been made and failed.

Ever since Elizabeth had been acting in open hostility to him Philip had been preparing for his enterprise. A great fleet had been gradually formed in Cadiz. Drake had undertaken an expedition against it in April, and his success had necessitated the postponement of the invasion, but even then it was expected to take place at the end of the year 1587. Strangely, throughout these years, Elizabeth was still negotiating with Spain, was still attempting to bring about a peace at the expense of the States of the Netherlands. The Prince of Parma, indeed, who knew better than most men the condition of England, and the amount of preparation which for several years had been carried on there, urged his master even yet to attempt a peaceful solution of the question. But now that the course was clear for his own succession to the country, Philip was obstinately determined to continue his plans. Parma's army was to be joined by a considerable force from Spain, and the seas guarded by the Spanish fleet under Santa Cruz. With this determination fixed in his mind, Philip only negotiated with Elizabeth to gain time. The treaty which was set on foot came to an end. But, as so frequently happened in the affairs of Spain, when the appointed time arrived, the army of invasion was not ready. The death of Santa Cruz was also a cause of delay. A far inferior commander, Medina Sidonia, was appointed in his place, but it was found too late to hazard the invasion till the next year.

The delay was invaluable to England. The English navy was not then, as now, a permanent establishment. There were very few royal ships, merchant vessels being taken up and employed for special service when required. Even such royal ships as there were were seldom put in commission, such was the parsimony of Elizabeth. Moreover, all through the year 1587, the Queen was still determined to believe in the possibility of peace. After Drake's return from Cadiz many of his ships were paid off, and, had the Armada sailed, as intended, that year, England would have been found quite unprepared. Even as it was, the Queen's extreme avarice went near to ruin the country. When all hope of peace had disappeared, provisions

Philip's preparations for invasion.

and ammunition were still dealt out with so sparing a hand, that the crews of the fleet at Plymouth must have been discharged had it not been for the personal exertions of Howard and the Admirals serving under him. The postponement of the expedition gave time to re-establish in some degree the fleet; and the royal ships, supported by numerous merchantmen, and by the vessels of the privateers, who willingly crowded round Drake, their old commander, were stationed in considerable numbers under Lord Howard and Drake himself, at Plymouth, and under Lord Henry Seymour in the Straits. The ships which they had to command were all of them very small; the largest were four or five new royal ships which had lately been added to the navy. For, since the year 1583, careful superintendence had been kept up over the fleet, and one new ship at least each year had been built. The largest ship in the whole fleet, however, the 'Triumph,' was but of one thousand tons. Though thus small, the ships were remarkably efficient; not only were they good sea boats, but Sir John Hawkins, having had the superintendence of the navy, had introduced a new sort of construction. He had lowered the castle-like buildings which had hitherto overloaded both bow and stern, and the vessels built on his plan far more nearly resembled modern vessels than those previously used, and were proportionately more rapid in their sailing.

The delay in the starting of the Armada, which had allowed the English fleet to be collected, had it continued long would have caused its ruin. Want of supplies was rapidly threatening the crews with destruction; and it was with extreme delight that news was received on the 29th of July (according to the present reckoning) that the Armada was entering the Channel. It had set sail in May, had been dispersed by the weather, and again collecting in the Bay of Ferrol, had finally left Spain on the 22nd of July. The vast fleet consisted of six great squadrons—129 ships in all. Of these, 65 were large galleons, 7 of which were larger than the 'Triumph,' and the smallest larger than any English ship, with the exception of the five late additions to the navy. The other vessels were four great galleasses, rowed by 300 slaves each, four large galleys, 56 armed merchantmen, and 20 attendant small vessels. They were manned by 8000 men, and had on board upwards of 19,000 soldiers. It was only by skill that the English fleet, inferior both in size and numbers, could hope to defeat this vast army. This skill they were enabled to use to the full, for the great Spanish ships, carrying but little sail in comparison with their size, were all slow sailers, and very

English
preparations
of defence.

difficult to work to windward. Moreover, their cannon, though superior in number and in size, were badly supplied with ammunition (but fifty rounds of shot for each gun being on board), and were very slowly worked compared to the English cannon; while the crowded state of the lower decks, filled with soldiers, rendered every shot of the English doubly fatal. The contest which ensued was such as was rendered necessary by the peculiarities of the two fleets. It resolved itself into a running fight of many days' duration. The English, afraid of coming to close quarters, made use of their superior skill in manœuvring, and hung upon the rear of the Spanish fleet, approaching boldly to within close cannon shot, sailing to and fro the length of the line, firing upon each vessel as they passed it, while all attempts on the part of the Spaniards to close were at once eluded. Thus harassed with constant loss of men, and of such vessels as accident obliged to fall behind the general mass of the fleet, the Armada passed slowly onwards, daily becoming more and more afraid of their agile enemies, and less hopeful of being able to perform the part assigned them in covering the descent of Parma. At length the Spaniards rested a while in Calais harbour. The English loss had been little or nothing; and by using the ammunition found in vessels which had been captured, and by husbanding the wretched scanty supply furnished by Government, they were still in a position to continue the fight a little longer. But they dreaded lest delay, by obliging them to exhaust their food, should after all be fatal to them. It was necessary to drive the Spaniards again to sea. For this purpose fire-ships were sent into Calais harbour. In dread of this new instrument of offence, the Spaniards slipped their cables and passed onwards towards the Straits, and on the morning of the 8th of August found themselves in scattered confusion off the coast of Holland, opposite Gravelines. They were there attacked by Seymour, Drake, and Winter, all hope of return to Calais was cut off from them, and they were driven slowly towards the coast of Flanders. The fire from the English ships was terrible and well sustained when at short distances. The great Spanish ships, heeling over to the wind, offered an easy aim to the English gunners, while their own shot flew harmlessly over the heads of the Englishmen. Ship after ship sank or fled to the shore. It was only the entire want of ammunition which obliged the English to desist before they completely annihilated the enemy. 4000 men had been lost to the Spaniards. The number of wounded is not known, but as the wooden beams which had been erected to secure the soldiery were torn to splinters by the English shot, it must have been immense. Though

Destruction of the Armada.

still very formidable, the spirits of the Spaniards were broken by their disasters, and Medina Sidonia, giving up all thoughts of either returning to the Channel or of assisting Parma, determined to fly round the north of Scotland, and thus to return to Spain. Though rendered almost useless for offence by want of ammunition, the English ships pursued them till they saw them fairly past the Forth. Then leaving them to the mercy of the weather, which had become tempestuous, they returned to England. It was in wretched plight that they came back. The miserable supplies which Elizabeth had alone allowed to be sent them had produced all sorts of diseases; and thousands of the crew came from their great victory only to die.

If ever a nation was saved by its people in spite of the faults of its Government it was England at this time. While the Queen was treating with Spain, the temper of the nation had risen. In the midst of privation, and wanting in all the necessities of life, the sailors had fought with unflagging energy, with their wages unpaid, with ammunition supplied them with so stingy a hand that each shot sent on board was registered and accounted for, with provisions withheld so that the food of four men had habitually to be divided among six, and that food so bad as in some instances to be really poisonous, without even the hope of prize money, for in their zeal they had refused to take prizes. The enthusiasm had been felt not by the Protestants nor by the lower classes alone. Philip's political blunder in thinking to acquire England for himself had roused the national feeling even of the Catholics, and members of all the older Catholic houses thronged as volunteers to the fleet. While the danger was thus happily averted by the gallantry of the sailors, preparations had been carried on with vigour on shore. For several years, in expectation of what had now happened, the musters of the counties had been regularly drilled. An army of 30,000 was easily raised in the midland counties, and 16,000 had been assembled at Tilbury to defend London. Even at this crisis Elizabeth had shown her usual perverse favouritism, and selected as General-in-chief Leicester, discredited as he was by the incapacity he had shown in the Netherlands. On this occasion, however, he was not found wanting, and vigorously discharged the duties imposed upon him. A few days after the defeat of the Armada, when the Queen held a triumphant review of the troops at Tilbury, a fresh honour was in preparation for him, and he would have been raised to the rank of Lord-Lieutenant of England and Ireland had he not almost immediately died.

The victory a national one.

The fourteen remaining years of Elizabeth's reign differ in interest from those which precede them. Duplicity, the weapon of the weak, was no longer necessary. Yet the policy of Elizabeth in her triumph was little more open or straightforward than in the days of her danger. For ten years the same minister directed it, and the character of the Queen was too strong not to make itself felt under all circumstances. The same want of straightforwardness, the same indecision and penuriousness are obvious in her foreign relations; the same assertion of prerogative at home, the same determination to establish her anomalous Church, and the same tendency towards favouritism.

Characteristics of the rest of the reign.

The new position assumed by England is prominently marked in her dealings with Spain. In spite of the parsimonious hand with which the Queen had supplied her navy, the defeat of the Armada had entailed large expenses. These had at once to be met. The merchants were ordered to subscribe according to their supposed wealth, and privy seals were sent to the Lords-Lieutenant of the counties. In March of the following year, Parliament assembled and granted a liberal supply, but they accompanied the grant with the request that the Queen would no longer await the assaults of Spain, but carry the war into Philip's own country. Though the Commons had been liberal, the Queen asserted her inability to undertake such an expedition. She would give assistance, but her subjects must do the work themselves. On these terms Norris and Drake, with a few Queen's ships and a number of private adventurers, set sail for Spain. This was the first of a series of expeditions which year by year went out from England. The tables were completely turned. The English, who had so long feared invasion, were now invariably the attacking party. Though, with the exception of the attack on Cadiz by Essex in 1596, none of these expeditions produced great results, they taught the English to believe in the weakness of Spain, and removed for ever any dread of that nation. The first expedition was nominally in support of the claims of Don Antonio, the Prior of Crato, to the Portuguese throne. There were no signs of any rising in his favour. The English were unable to conquer Lisbon, and the expedition returned, having on the way out done considerable damage at Corunna, and stormed Vigo on its return.

Increased demands of the people.

Yearly expeditions against Spain.

But the success of these expeditions was the less important, because the battle-ground between the Protestant and Catholic religions had been changed. The destruction of the Armada had in fact definitely settled the claims of Spain upon England, and determined once for all the religion of the latter country. In the Netherlands the division between the Northern and Southern Provinces had become complete. Under the leadership of Prince Maurice of Nassau, the Protestant community had in fact established their independent position. Their fleets were able to attack and defeat the Spaniards upon the sea, and their merchants were already disputing the wealth of the East Indies. There was no chance of their being again subjugated to the Spanish crown; although the war was continued, the real question was fought out. It was thus in France chiefly that the contest between the religions had now to be decided. After the Day of the Barricades, Henry III. was compelled to feign friendship with the Guises. The League was pledged to prevent the accession of a Protestant to the throne, and it was the intention probably of the Duke of Guise himself to receive the crown as a gift from the people upon the approaching extinction of the House of Valois, or even to forestall that crisis by the deposition of Henry. With deep hatred hidden beneath this show of friendship, Henry summoned the States-General at Blois (Dec. 3, 1588), and there caused the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of the same name to be murdered, hoping by that means to destroy the power of the League. The hope was a vain one. Catholic France at once burst into insurrection. Guise's brother, the Duke of Mayenne, took command of the army of the League, and Henry had no resource but to betake himself to the camp of the King of Navarre, who had hitherto been regarded as a rebel. The two Kings advanced to the siege of Paris. While lying before that city, Henry III. was murdered by Jacques Clement (Aug. 1, 1589), a monk inspired by the deadly hatred which the Catholics felt against the King, who seemed thus to have deserted them. The question of the succession to the throne was thus opened. The moment had now arrived for the Guise party to put into execution their plan of seizing the crown. But Mayenne missed the opportunity, and made the mistake of placing the crown on the head of the Cardinal de Bourbon,¹ under the title of Charles X., thus acknowledging the legitimacy of the Bourbon claim, and making the exclusion of Henry of Navarre depend solely on his religion. That Prince at once assumed the title of Henry IV. The position of affairs in France was now strange. The Catholic party had become the upholders of popular rights, the Catholic populace of Paris were even longing for a republic. The Protestants, whose whole system of Church government was republican, were upholding the cause of legitimacy. In this false position of the two parties lay the seeds of a final compromise. Henry of Navarre was exactly the man to render such a compromise possible. Like Elizabeth, he was careless of religion, and a politician. The throne of France and the unity and power of the nation under his rule were the objects of his ambition, and he recognized from the first that the possession of the crown depended on the possession of Paris, the possession of Paris upon his changing his religious creed, and the unity of France politically upon the open toleration of religious diversities. But he also knew that an immediate change of religion would be too obvious a piece of time-serving to answer his purpose. To cover it, time and, if possible, some success in arms were necessary. Issuing, therefore, a most conciliatory proclamation, hinting the possibility of his ultimate conversion, he determined to support the cause of legitimate royalty. In his ambiguous position he required some external help; the similarity of their feelings and circumstances rendered it almost necessary for Elizabeth to assist him, and year by year troops were sent over for the purpose. The success which Henry wanted attended his arms. In 1589, at Arques, near Dieppe, and again at Ivry, in 1590, he was victorious over the Leaguers; while the open intervention of Philip II. in the quarrel, and the suggestion that his own daughter should be raised to the throne of France, brought the national feeling more and more to the side of Henry. Still Paris would not give in. Its faubourgs were taken and pillaged. It bore a siege, in which the people were reduced to the last extremities, and it was rescued only by the advance of the Spaniards from the Netherlands. At last, in 1593, when enough had been done for honour, Henry recognized the necessity of changing his religion. One by one the provinces accepted his authority, and at length, in March 1594, he entered Paris as King. His triumph was followed by an open war with Spain. For three years it lasted, during which, in 1596, the Archduke Albert, who had succeeded Parma in the Netherlands, took possession of Calais, and afterwards of Amiens. Want of money was telling on both sides, and when Henry was able to treat with honour, upon the recapture of Amiens in 1598, peace was at once set on foot, and the Treaty of Vervins concluded, followed by the declaration of the Edict of Nantes, granting toleration to the Protestants.

War of religions transferred to France.

Accession of Henry IV.

¹ See page 501.

Constantly during this period Henry received assistance from Elizabeth, doled out in the old niggardly manner, while haggling bargains were made for the repayment of expenses, and the frank action of the troops was checked by orders confining them to the defensive. But Elizabeth had found her match.

He becomes Catholic.

Final compromise. Treaty of Vervins. Edict of Nantes.

Part played by England in this war.

If she was stingy in granting help, Henry, on his part, was absolutely careless as to the performance of his part of the bargain. He knew, in fact, that Elizabeth could not afford to desert him. The Spanish King was laying claim for his daughter to Brittany as a female fief. That the seaport towns should be in possession of Philip, England could not tolerate; and to support Henry was in fact to carry on war cheaply against Spain. However, though the English troops did occasionally good service, their operations were chiefly confined to Normandy and Brittany. Henry's conversion to Roman Catholicism drew forth a dignified protest from Elizabeth, or rather from Burghley;¹ but there was too much in common, both in the views and interests of the two princes, to allow of a permanent coolness between them. Indeed, the open declaration of war against Spain on the part of Henry in 1595, and the capture of Calais by the Archduke Albert, drove Elizabeth to make a formal treaty of alliance with the French, by which 4000 men (a number afterwards changed to 2000) were to serve in France. Neither party was to make peace without the consent of the other. Henry's ambassadors introduced a skilfully-worded clause which enabled him to evade this condition, and the English Queen's influence, backed by that of the States of the Netherlands, was not sufficient to prevent Henry from concluding peace in the year 1598.

While thus, in her foreign policy, Elizabeth pursued the same half-hearted course as had marked her whole career, at home, freed from the dangers which had hitherto acted as a restraint upon her, she exhibited her old peculiarities still more markedly. The parsimony of which she had always made so great a point, and which had in fact enabled her to gain much popularity by rendering taxes unnecessary, now grew into avarice. Sure of her people, and trusting to her success, her demands from her Parliament became large. Her arbitrary temper, like her love of money, increased from freedom of restraint. Her Parliaments, of which four were summoned after the defeat of the Armada, were treated with but little respect. Elizabeth always had the wisdom to see when it was necessary to yield, and her graceful retreat before the attacks of the Commons on the subject of monopolies will be mentioned in its place. But usually the Parliament was kept most strictly to the discussion of those points for which it had been summoned, and whenever the Puritan party, which grew daily stronger, ventured to touch the immunities or conduct of the clergy, the Queen's vengeance was certain to fall upon the offenders. Thus, in 1593, when one Mr. Maurice brought in a motion for restricting the encroachments of ecclesiastical courts, the Speaker refused to put the question till he had talked the matter over with the Queen. Maurice was taken into custody, and forbidden again to take his seat in Parliament. In fact, her view of the position of the Commons is fairly represented by her answer, when the Speaker of the same Parliament demanded as usual liberty of speech. She replied that liberty they should have, but that the liberty consisted in the privilege of saying Yes and No.

Elizabeth's arbitrary conduct to her Parliament.

¹ Cecil had become Lord Burghley in 1572

But it was in her government of the Church that Elizabeth's arbitrary temper was most shown. From the very first she had been tenacious of her supremacy in matters ^{and in ecclesiastical matters.} ecclesiastical, and had insisted with a high hand upon the maintenance of her peculiar views. On her accession, the Catholics were numerically by far the stronger party in England. But as her circumstances forced her to separate from the Church of Rome, she conceived that a church as nearly resembling the old Church as possible would be the most readily accepted by her people. She wished to be able to say to the Catholic powers that she was no heretic, but in all respects, except the acknowledgment of the Pope's supremacy, a Catholic. Her wisest counsellors saw more clearly that such a half measure would be useless, and that her real support was the earnest zeal of the Puritan minority. In many respects, therefore, the Church became distinctly Protestant. The new Bishops were principally drawn from those who had learnt their Protestantism abroad. The livings made vacant by the Act of Uniformity were filled with Puritan divines. But Elizabeth, unable to sympathise with strong religious conviction, and taking an exclusively political view of the matter, thought it the duty of good subjects to conform to the State Church, and to be satisfied if they were left free to believe as they liked in their own minds. Any attempt to differ externally from the form established by law she regarded with extreme dislike. Her first Archbishop, Parker, entirely sympathized with her, and measures of coercion were very shortly taken against those Puritans who seemed determined to carry out ^{Rise of the Puritans.} their views in opposition to the Act of Uniformity. Thus, as already mentioned, many of the London clergy were suspended in the year 1565, and soon afterwards a Puritan meeting in Plummer's Hall was dissolved, and some of those present imprisoned. Up to this time the points at issue were rather matters of ceremonial, held by scrupulous consciences to involve principles, than any matter of doctrine or even of Church government. But the tendency of the more earnest and thinking Protestants towards Puritanism was constantly on the increase. The middle position occupied by the Church of England gave it of necessity the appearance of a political expedient. Nor did the Queen's language and conduct lead to any other conclusion. She constantly spoke of the Bishops with contempt, threatened to unfrock them at her pleasure, and evidently regarded them as creatures of her will. Their own conduct still further tended to lower the esteem in which they were held. It is evident from the constant complaints of the time that they used their offices very much as a means of making money. Pluralities were abundant, the old exactions of the ecclesiastical courts re-established, and the incomes to the sees forestalled. It does not as yet appear that any distinct assertion of the Divine origin of Episcopacy was made in the English Church. Hooker, whose great book on Ecclesiastical Polity is a defence of the English Church, distinctly rests the authority of the Bishops upon political grounds.

But meanwhile the Puritans, headed by Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, affronted by the persecution brought to bear upon them, and justly indignant at the abuses which existed in the Church, had already raised the claims of Presbyterianism as a Divine institution. Cartwright's "Admonition," published in 1572, contains language which seems to imply that the Church, formed upon a republican model, was superior to the State. The example of a completed Presbytery in Scotland gave evident proof that such a claim was the natural result of the system. The Presbyterian form of Church government had been established in that country in 1592; and by Melville and other leaders of the Kirk the right of interference in political matters, of personal rebuke of the sovereign, and of the exercise of a superior power to that of the temporal monarch, was openly asserted. At the same time the great mass of the Puritans, whatever their theory may have been, accepted the Queen's supremacy, repelled the charge of schism, and acknowledged the lawfulness of continuing in the Established Church.¹ There was indeed an extreme section, known by the name of the Brownists, who became afterwards Independents. All parties seem to have agreed that these men were fair objects of persecution. Many of them were driven from the country, and some of them executed. The republican views held by the advanced Puritans with regard to Church government rendered them particularly distasteful to Elizabeth. During the struggle with the Catholic powers of Europe, she and her ministers were too conscious of the support she derived from them to proceed to extremities. During the archiepiscopacy of Grindal, himself inclined to Puritanism, they enjoyed a period of comparative rest; but upon his death he was succeeded by Whitgift, a man of a very different temper. In 1583, the Court of High Commission attained its full powers. It consisted of 44 members, 12 of whom were Bishops, and was invested with almost unlimited authority on the questions of Church government and discipline. Its proceedings were of a very arbitrary description. A person brought before them was cross-examined with extreme closeness, and compelled to give his answers upon oath, known as the ex officio oath. He was thus, in opposition to the principles of English law, compelled to convict himself. As Elizabeth gradually triumphed over her enemies, she ventured to carry out her own views of uniformity with greater strictness, and Whitgift, backed by the High Commission Court, began a persecution of the Puritans.

¹ Hallam's Const. Hist. i. 213.

But it was not till after the defeat of the Armada that the Church of England asserted its highest pretensions. The support of the Protestants was no longer so necessary. Elizabeth had proved that in times of danger she could rely upon them. They now thwarted her views of her own ecclesiastical supremacy. Moreover, the spirit of the whole Church had become much modified. Forced by the action of Spain to become national, deprived by the death of Queen Mary of the hope of a Catholic successor, the Catholics now in large numbers entered the national Church. Believing in their hearts the old doctrines of Rome, it was natural that they should bring out, as far as possible, whatever remained Catholic, and that was much, in the forms and doctrines of the Church of England. Thus was formed the High Church party, and thus sprang up the idea of the Divine right of Episcopacy, which produced such fatal consequences in subsequent reigns. In her tenderness to her newly-converted subjects, less certain of their continued loyalty than of that of the well-tried Puritan party, the Queen allied herself with the High Church. The growth of this party, and the arbitrary conduct of the High Commission Court and the Bishops, naturally drove the Puritans to more organized opposition. In 1590,

They are persecuted under Whitgift.

The Court of High Commission.

Growth of the High Church party.

under the guidance of Cartwright, associations were formed in different parts of England for the establishment of synods and classes, and all the apparatus of Presbyterianism. Summoned before the High Commission Court, the leaders refused to take the ex officio oath. The case was moved to the Star Chamber. But in spite of the clamours of the Church, the strength of the party was too great to admit of their punishment. They were discharged after having made an apology; the question was taken up in Parliament, but Elizabeth at once interfered, as before related. The war was then carried on in the press. Violent pamphlets were issued against the Church. The most vehement and successful were those signed Martin Mar-Prelate. For long the author evaded all attempts at discovery. A moveable press, from which the pamphlets issued, was shifted from place to place in times of danger. But at last, one Final increase of Puritanism. Penry, a Welshman, was apprehended, tried as the author of the pamphlets, and executed. But no severity, no arbitrary suppression of public opinion, produced the desired effect. The close of the reign saw Puritanism more widely spread, and more eager in opposition than it had ever been before.

Thus, during Burghley's lifetime, the character of the Government, with the exception of such changes as were rendered almost inevitable by the fact that the Queen was now triumphant instead of in danger, continued the same. But it was not without difficulty that this prudent course was adhered to. One by one, shortly after the crisis of 1588, the old ministers, who had created and carried out the cautious policy of the reign, died. Sir Walter Mildmay died in 1589. Early in 1591, Walsingham and Randolph died; in the following year Sir Christopher Hatton, and two years after, Sussex and Lord Grey de Wilton. In their place there arose younger men, eager for a more vigorous exhibition of the strength of England. The chief of these were

Death of the old ministers.
Rise of young men of action. Raleigh and Essex. They both belonged rather to the courtier than to the statesman class, though Raleigh proved by his writings, as well as by his influence in Parliament, that he was not deficient in the qualities of a statesman. He owed his rise to the personal favour of the Queen. He was made Captain of the Guard, and sought to keep himself in favour by joining largely in the adventurous expeditions against the power of Spain, which were of constant occurrence. Thus, in 1592, he set on foot a great expedition, the command of which, however, he ultimately handed over to Sir Martin Frobisher, and in 1596 he sailed to Guiana, and explored

400 miles of the Orinoco. Essex reached a position of much more importance. Very early he was distinguished by the favour of the Queen. Though only just of age at the time Essex. of the Armada, he was made Captain-General of the cavalry, under Leicester, and upon that nobleman's death succeeded to much of his personal influence with Elizabeth. His impetuous character made him despise the cautious policy of Burghley. He was unable to supplant that minister, whose influence was constantly paramount in all matters of real importance; but he hoped, no doubt, to succeed him as chief adviser to the Crown, to the exclusion of Robert Cecil, Burghley's son, who, trained in the prudent diplomacy of his father, became his chief rival. A constant advocate for war, it was with difficulty he could be made to adapt himself to the cautious policy of the Queen. Her favour, however, secured him the highest commands. To him were intrusted the armies sent to support Henry IV. The forced inactivity in which he was kept ill suited his temperament, nor did the Queen like his lengthened absence from her. In the following year he was recalled, without having had any opportunity of distinguishing himself. But some years after, in 1596, his warlike policy, backed as it was by Howard, the Lord-Admiral, was for a moment triumphant. In company with the Admiral he was sent in command of an expedition against Spain. The Spanish fleet was beaten and destroyed in the harbour of Cadiz; Essex rapidly landed his troops and reduced the town. But he was overruled when he wished to advance further into the heart of Spain; and, after two other slight successes, the expedition returned to England. As it was, it inflicted the greatest blow which Philip had yet received, and roused him to adopt a firmer line of action in the following years. On his return, Essex was not received with the enthusiasm he expected. The Cecils charged him with wilful extravagance, a point on which the Queen always felt strongly. For some time he was in disgrace, but ultimately succeeded in establishing his innocence, and was victorious over the Cecils. In the following year he was again sent to Spain, where Philip was preparing to revenge the loss of Cadiz. The weather prevented him from winning any marked success. He reached the Azores, and took several places, but missed the great Plate fleet, which was his special object; on his return, he was again ill received and disgraced. He was filled with anger, too, at events which had taken place during his absence. The Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster, which he had desired for a friend of his own, had been given to his rival, Robert Cecil. The Lord-Admiral had been raised to the rank of Earl of Nottingham, especially for his services at Cadiz, which Essex regarded as his own. This promotion, which gave Howard the precedence, induced Essex to withdraw in anger from the Court, and it was only on being created Earl Marshal, and thus regaining his precedence, that he consented to be appeased and again to appear at Court. It was a temporary alliance with the Cecils which gained him this promotion; his friendship was necessary for them during Robert Cecil's absence from England in the negotiation which preceded the Peace of Vervins, but the truce was of short duration. Their policies were too distinct to admit of cordial friendship, and Essex used all his influence successfully to thwart them in their desire of establishing a peace with Spain. In 1598, his petulance in the Council, when the question of the employment of a deputy for Ireland was brought forward, so roused the anger of the Queen, that she struck him. The quarrel, rather to the surprise of the world, was again made up; but she had become weary of his self-willed ways, and upon the death of Burghley, in 1598, it was to Robert Cecil, and not to him, that the chief power fell.

Meanwhile, in the midst of intrigues for power at home, and of a not very dignified policy abroad, the nation had been sweeping on in a course of ever-increasing triumph. The wealth of the country, fostered by the lengthened freedom from foreign invasion and by the comparative lightness of the taxation, had been constantly on the increase. The decline of Spain, the renewed energy of England in maritime affairs, had opened new markets and increased commerce. The discovery of America had been gradually continued, principally by the efforts to discover the North-Western Passage. Frobisher had reached Labrador, Drake had twice circumnavigated the globe. Raleigh had founded a settlement in America, which, though at first unsuccessful, afterwards became the great province of Virginia. Great trading companies sprang into existence. In 1581, the Turkey Company was incorporated, and before the close of the reign, in 1600, the trade with the East Indies was so great as to authorize the establishment of the first East India Company.

With this great increase of commercial wealth, there sprang up a renewal of the same abuses that marked the reign of Henry VIII. Again land began to fall into the hands of the mercantile class; again arable land was changed into pasture, and small holdings were thrown into large farms. This inevitable change, ultimately perhaps advantageous, was at

He succeeds in continuing war with Spain.

Loses the favour of the Queen.

Triumph of the Cecils.

National greatness.

Continuation of economic changes.

that time looked upon as a great disaster, lessening as it did the yeoman class, in which the strength of England was supposed to reside. The Legislature, as usual, interfered. Acts were passed against the formation of large farms. No cottage was allowed to be built without a plot of four acres attached, while wages, which had begun to be treated as a matter to be settled by the law of supply and demand, were yearly regulated, to suit the varying value of the precious metals. This delicate operation was left in the hands of the county magistrates. Like all other such efforts, these attempts to check the natural growth of society were fruitless. The frequent expeditions threw upon the world a number of disbanded soldiers and sailors, and these, with the day-labourers who could find no work, gave rise to an ever-increasing and dangerous class of vagabonds. It was to meet this growing difficulty that the Parliament of 1597 devoted most of its attention. In the preceding reigns attempts had been made to alleviate the growing poverty by weekly collections in the churches. Authority was given, by a Statute in 1562, to the Bishop to compel the payment of this collection, and to determine the sum paid. This was the first beginning of a compulsory assessment for the relief of the poor. In 1572 a new law was passed, by which vagabonds and rogues were still to be punished with the stocks and otherwise, but at the same time the really indigent were registered, and convenient places established for their habitation, and overseers appointed to find work for those who were not absolutely incapacitated. Two years later, houses of correction, in which this work was exacted, were built. But in 1597, what may be regarded as the first general Poor Law was passed, which was completed in 1601, and continued in force till the new Poor Law (1832). By these laws, which were in spirit the same as the preceding ones, vagabond and sturdy beggars were still whipped and passed from parish to parish; but the assessment for the building of workhouses and the relief of the really destitute, which had hitherto been in the hands of the justices, was now intrusted to parochial officers, the overseers.

Another sign of this transition period was the introduction of greater luxury. Freedom from civil war had rendered the old fortress or castellated mansion useless, and the land was now covered with noble but defenceless mansions, in that style of architecture which is still known as Elizabethan.

As usual, after a period of intense mental and political excitement,

Attempts to check them.

Vagabonds.

The Poor Law.

Growth of luxury.

the literary power of the nation awoke. All the new ideas called into existence by the Renaissance, the Reformation, and Literature. the discovery of the New World, which had hitherto been held in abeyance by the disturbed condition of the country, assumed a form, and found expression in writing. In every sphere of thought the same vitality made itself evident. Four pre-eminent names in different lines of literary activity mark the time—Shakspeare, Spenser, Bacon, and Hooker. In all these four writers we have, in different ways, distinctly marked the influences of the time. The drama, one of the earliest forms in which the Shakspeare. literary spirit of the people showed itself, had long existed in England. But, like other literature, it had fallen much into the hands of the Church. Miracles and moralities, in which either sacred histories were exhibited, or moral lessons inculcated by allegorical personages, had been the chief forms which it had assumed. The essential characteristic of the Renaissance was the return of men's minds from what was spiritual and ideal to what was real. Admiration for the beauties of external form took the place in Art of a love of beauty of sentiment. Raphael and Michael Angelo superseded Fra Angelico, with his stiff and conventional drawings, and beautiful, delicate, sentimental countenances. In the same way, upon the stage, men began to long for vigorous exhibitions of external action and of natural passions, where good and bad played their respective parts. Histories and rough comedies and farces began to take the place of the mystery plays. Unformed at first, these by degrees took shape. Already, at the beginning of the reign, Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, who forms a sort of intermediate link between the time of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth, had written a regular tragedy called "Ferrex and Porrex." Other authors had continued his work, which found its completion however only in Shakspeare, in whose writings all forms of life are shown with marvellous power, and all forms of the drama find their representatives. Deep metaphysical tragedy, regular well-ordered comedy, together with outbursts of the rough fun of the farce, are all to be found in his plays, while his knowledge of the springs of human action, his sympathy with all forms of human feeling, the comparative sobriety with which he clothes even his most passionate characters, satisfied the cravings of an age when, in the midst of strong excitement, Art

Spenser. was beginning to resume its sway. The allegory of Spenser had also been foreshadowed by Lord Buckhurst. In his "Induction to the Mirror of Magistrates" are specimens of powerful imaginative allegory unequalled even by Spenser. But as Shakspeare brought drama to its perfection, so did Spenser allegory. The sensuous sweetness of his verse, the high tone in which his sentiment is pitched, the air of heroic knightly adventure which breathes through his works, are an exact expression of that side of English life which was called into existence by the daring adventures of our seamen, by the quaint and somewhat unreal chivalry of the Court, and by the religious element which was mingled in every question of the time. But if these two great poets represent the return to nature and the rebirth of modern knighthood which had been awakened by the Renaissance, the Reformation, and the dangerous position of a Queen, exciting at once loyalty and chivalry, both the philosophic and political character of the time is fairly represented by the prose writers—Hooker and Bacon.

Hooker. The one undertook the defence of the Church, not upon religious but upon political grounds, and in so doing touched the real spring of modern sovereignty. For this he rests as much as Locke subsequently did upon the ultimate will of the people, and an implied contract between King and people. In Bacon, Bacon. on the other hand, we meet a system fated under one form or another to subvert for ever the philosophy of the Schoolmen. Bacon's system rests upon fact, upon experience, upon inquiry; the system of the older metaphysicians upon authority. And in this difference, in fact, is summed up the whole claim of the Reformers, whether religious or political. Henceforward reasonable and intellectual grounds are in all matters to take the place of mere assertion, however venerable or well supported.

The year 1598 was a very important one both for England and Europe. Importance of the year 1598. Abroad it was marked by the death of Philip II. and the change of policy of Henry IV. This king, finding it impossible to establish his position in opposition to the Catholics, having changed his religion, determined to attempt the difficult part of King of both parties. For this purpose he had first of all secured toleration to his former associates by issuing the Edict of Nantes. He had Abroad. then to play a somewhat double part, which he performed successfully, but which a good deal shook the confidence that England had hitherto placed in him. For England the year was rendered important by the death of Burghley, whose sagacity had so triumphantly carried his mistress through her perilous reign. In England. Death of Burghley. The habit of intrigue which had long been secretly existing in England, now found room to exhibit itself in public. The points at issue were partly ambitious and personal, but partly involved principles. There was a contest for the vacant power, the

Rivalry of Essex and Cecil: their characters.

rival aspirants to which were Burghley's son Robert and the Earl of Essex. No two men could have exhibited a sharper contrast. The one, educated by his father for the express purpose of succeeding him, was like his father in miniature, crafty, observant, cautious, but without his father's breadth of view. He was a type of the statesman class. Essex was a young soldier, impatient of delay, and full of eager action, but hot-tempered and overbearing, a type of that courtier class which had formed an inner circle round the Queen, and had attained their influence, such as it was, by the Queen's partiality rather than by their own wisdom. The Queen was passionately fond of him, and treated him like a spoilt child. Like a spoilt child he acted. When displeased, he rudely turned his back on her, she boxed his ears, and he went home sulkily and took to his bed. The trick of feigned indisposition nearly always brought his fond old mistress round again. He had managed to make enemies on all sides, and had quarrelled with Raleigh and the Howards by attributing lukewarmness to them at the siege of Cadiz in 1596. He thus stood almost alone in the Council.

But besides this personal rivalry there was involved the question of the succession, on which it was not safe to speak to the Queen. There were four possible claimants,¹ all of whom had something to be said for them. There was James of Scotland, the representative of the elder sister of Henry VIII. and the legitimate heir. Secondly, there was Lord Beauchamp, son of Catherine Grey and the Earl of Hertford, the representative of Henry VIII.'s second sister Mary, and heir in accordance with that monarch's will. Thirdly, the supporters of hereditary descent, who at the same time disliked the idea of an alien and a Scotchman, favoured the pretensions of Arabella Stuart, the daughter of the younger brother of Darnley, and like James a direct descendant from Henry's eldest sister, but through her second marriage with Lord Angus. Lastly, the Jesuits and vehement Catholics, with reminiscences of the last reign, desiring connection with Philip II. as head of their religion, were ready to uphold the claims of Isabella the Infanta, a direct descendant of John of Gaunt, who had married Constance, the daughter of Pedro the Cruel. Practically, before the close of the reign, all question as to the succession disappeared, and except the extreme Catholics, who hoped that it might be possible to make good the claims of the Infanta by force of arms, all England was ready to accept James. With him both Cecil and Essex were in correspondence. Their advice was characteristic. Essex urged the assembly of an army on the Borders and a demand of instant recognition as heir. Cecil, who saw how things were tending, recommended silence and delay, assuring James that all parties were gradually inclining in his favour.

¹ See page 355.

Advice of Cecil and Essex to James.

But though at one in their views of the succession, Essex and Cecil were bitter enemies; and an event soon happened which gave the crafty statesman an opportunity of allowing his rival to destroy himself. Affairs in Ireland demanded active interference; throughout the reign there had been much trouble there, and the Queen had somewhat neglected it in her constant attention to English and Continental politics. After the suppression of the revolt of Desmond, O'Neil, who had hitherto been faithful and rewarded with the title of Earl of Tyrone, rose in insurrection. Various governors, left without much assistance from England, had attempted in vain to suppress him, and lately Bagnal had suffered a complete defeat at Blackwater. There were rumours also that Tyrone was expecting assistance from Spain, and it became necessary to act with energy. When the subject was discussed in the Council, Essex found objections to every name mentioned as Deputy, and it was evident to his enemies that he was himself desirous of the place. Conscious of the dangers which attended the position, especially to so aspiring and hot-tempered a man as Essex, his enemies were only too glad to let him go, especially as he was thus removed from the Council. Nor was the Queen, in spite of her fondness for him, blind to his faults. She was therefore glad to get rid of him without inflicting disgrace.

Irish affairs.

Armed with fuller powers than had ever before been intrusted to a viceroy,—the right of pardoning even treason, and of making either peace or war,—and attended by a powerful army, Essex set out for his new destination. His reception by the Irish was enthusiastic, and seems to have overturned his not too well-balanced character. Instead of at once marching in strength to the North, where O'Neil's power was, he wasted his time in an idle parade through Limerick and Kilkenny, and finally, when he found his army dwindling from him, he held a meeting with Tyrone upon the river Brenny, and admitted him to peace on terms that could hardly fail to be distasteful to the English Government. There were indeed some points in them which lead to the belief that he aimed at estab-

Essex goes to Ireland.
Triumph of Cecil.
March 1599.

Conduct of Essex in Ireland.

lishing himself as in some sort independent Governor of Ireland. Tyrone demanded that half the army should consist of Irishmen, that the judges and chief officials should be Irish, that his lands and those of Desmond should be restored, and added the suspicious clause that some great Earl should be sent over to represent the Crown. The whole course of Essex's conduct was such as to draw down upon him a reprimand from the English Council which his hasty temper could ill brook. It is possible that he designed to use his Irish army against his enemies in the Council, but he first determined to make a final trial of that personal influence over the Queen which had so often served him. He hurried across the Channel, and hastened to the Queen's presence, using all the freedom of a favoured lover. All soiled as he was from his long journey, he burst into her room before she was dressed, for her hair was hanging loose about her, and throwing himself upon his knees and kissing her dress, sought to revive her old affection for him. For the moment he was successful. But that wiser and more queenly part of her, which was so frequently opposed to her inclination, rapidly awoke, and no sooner had he left her presence than her anger rose, and she never saw him again.

He was finally, after some questioning, committed to free custody, but his temper could not bear even this moderate restraint. Believing that his disgrace was the work of his private enemies, he was hurried into a violent course of action. He sought partisans among the disaffected of all parties. The penal laws at that time pressed heavily upon the Catholics. An affectation of religion gathered round him the Puritans, and to these he added some of the more violent Catholics, ready to make common cause with any who would oppose the Government. Among the number were some who played a part afterwards in the Gunpowder treason; Tresham, Catesby, and Mounteagle were among his followers. His house was filled with armed men, and the Council at length determined to take action against him. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief-Justice, and other members of the Council, went to his house to inquire into the cause of the assembly. Essex, who seems to have believed that the critical moment had arrived, and that he must either strike at once or be destroyed, led them into an inner chamber and locked them in, and then, with the Earl of Southampton, rode through the streets with swords drawn, attempting to raise the populace. He had expected that a crowd, and many of his own partisans, would have been gathered at Paul's Cross, hearing a sermon. Measures had been taken to prevent the meeting. The attempt to rouse the city was a complete failure. No man stirred on his behalf, and before many hours were over the Council thought it safe to order his apprehension, and set a price upon his head. He was tried by the Peers, on the whole fairly, though the trial was not without those marks of tyranny which characterize the State trials of the period. He was found guilty and beheaded. Essex asserted to the end that he was free from treason to the Queen, and desirous only to save his own life, threatened by the intrigues of Raleigh and Cobham. That he was technically guilty of treason is obvious. On all grounds, it seems probable that he was aiming at playing a part resembling that of the Duke of Guise in France. Against the Queen's person it may well be believed he had no designs, but a complete and violent change of the Government was almost certainly his object. Lord Mountjoy succeeded him in his Irish command. The Spaniards who had been expected arrived, in number about 4000, at Kinsale. Tyrone joined them with 6000 Irish. The united army was defeated, and Tyrone yielded on condition that his life and land should be spared.

His hasty return and disgrace.

His treason. 1601.

The end of Elizabeth's reign is marked by one other characteristic event. Among the unwise exertions of her power of which the Queen had been guilty was the grant of numerous monopolies. The effect of these was to raise the price of the monopolized articles, to the great detriment of her people. The Queen's last Parliament, which assembled in October 1601, complained of this exercise of the prerogative, and an Act was introduced by Lawrence Hyde against them. While the Bill was still pending, a message was brought from the Queen, in which she declared, that as she understood that patents she had granted were grievous to her people, they should be looked to immediately, and none be put into execution but such as should first have a trial according to the law, for the good of the people. This declaration was received with enthusiasm, and a large deputation from the Commons waited to return thanks. She answered them with words full of kindness and dignity, declaring that "she appealed to the judgment of God, but never thought was cherished in her heart that tended not to her people's good." She closed her address, the last she ever uttered to the Commons, with these words: "Though you have had, and may have, many Princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you

Trial and death. Feb. 1601.

Sequel of Irish affairs. Nov. 1602.

Queen's last Parliament. 1601.

Her wise withdrawal of monopolies.

never had, or shall have, any that will be more careful and loving." It was this real sympathy which existed between the Queen and her people, this real desire to reign for their good, and this readiness to acknowledge and retract her errors, when once they were made plain to her, which has covered the multitude of her whimsical oddities and arbitrary exertions of authority, and fixed the love of her so deeply in the heart of the nation, that her reign has ever been looked back to as the most glorious era of England's history.

JAMES I.

1603-1625.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

France.
Henry IV., 1589.
Louis XIII., 1610.

Germany.
Rodolph II., 1576
Matthias, 1612.
Ferdinand II., 1619.

Spain.
Philip III., 1598.
Philip IV., 1621.

POPES.—Clement VIII., 1502. Leo XI., 1605. Paul V., 1605. Gregory XV., 1621.
Urban VIII., 1624.

Archbishops.
John Whitgift, 1583.
Richard Bancroft, 1604
George Abbot, 1611.

Chancellors.
Lord Ellesmere, 1596.
Francis Bacon, 1617.
John Williams, 1621.

THE period which has now been reached is one of marked change. No one can compare the position of Elizabeth with that of one of the earlier Kings of the Hanoverian house, without being struck with the complete alteration that had taken place in the position of royalty. Two classes of men had exercised influence during the reign of the Queen; on the one hand her counsellors, such as Burghley and Walsingham, whose claim to her trust was their fidelity and wisdom, on the other hand the courtiers, such as Essex and Raleigh, whose influence rested upon the personal attachment which the Queen felt for them. But both courtiers and counsellors had found it necessary constantly to earn the Queen's approval; the wisest among them could only get his views put into action by dressing them in a shape which would be

Change in the position of royalty.

agreeable to the Queen. In fact, in all externals she was absolute, and is the central figure of her own reign. With the Hanoverian Kings the very reverse is the case, the position of King and Minister appears to be inverted; it was the King who now found it difficult to get his wishes put into execution, and could only do so by rendering them acceptable to his aristocratic masters.

This change in the condition of the monarchy is the main feature of the time, and was the fruit of two great convulsions, the one popular, and the other aristocratic. The first, as is usual in exhibitions of popular force, rested upon enthusiasm and violence, at once the fruit and parent of rich and pregnant ideas. It was, in its character, destructive. For enthusiasm is in its nature evanescent, and want of material force, of education, and of political practice preclude a popular party from founding institutions and putting the stamp of permanence on their work. The other was aristocratic, and marked by the constructive wisdom which is the characteristic of aristocratic movements. For aristocracies, not fertile in new ideas, are well capable of appropriating and rendering permanent the ideas of others. On many occasions, in English history, the aristocracy has shown itself willing to take the lead in patriotic movements. Indeed, the strength of English liberty depends on the union of classes which has produced it. But in this instance, as in all others, the aristocracy has sought its own ends in its patriotic action. When those ends had been attained it settled back into its natural exclusive conservatism, and became an obstacle at once in the way of the ruler who desired to govern and the people who desired to be free. The interest of the period is centred in tracing the cause and history of these two great convulsions.

But there is something more than the facts to be observed. For political changes are not the products of fortuitous circumstance, but depend upon the growth of ideas. Many causes had led to a complete change in the idea of royalty. The original royal relation of clan or tribal chief had disappeared before the advance of feudalism. The two most prominent ideas of feudalism were the double ownership of land, and the dependence of authority both judicial and executive on the possession of land. In accordance with the first of these, every man knew that, while absolute master of his own property as regards those below him, there was some one above him to whom the land belonged also. Working backwards from the base towards the summit, any one examining this theory would arrive at length at the King, and naturally putting him in the same position with regard to his subjects as that for it.

Two causes

The original idea of a King.

as proprietor of the land.

occupied by any other feudal lord, would regard him as absolute possessor of the land over which he ruled, subject only to some superior authority, if such could be found. There thus arose the notion that the King was the real possessor of the country, and thus, in the time of Henry VIII., the King was allowed to deal with the kingdom by will, exactly as ordinary property was dealt with. This may be called the proprietary idea of sovereignty. But the theory, pushed even beyond the King, gave rise to the mediæval notions of the still higher authority of either Emperor or Pope. Schism, mal-administration, and loss of practical power prevented men from any longer accepting either of these superiors. When the question then was asked, Who then is the superior lord of the King? His Divine right. the only answer that could be given was "God." There thus arose the idea of the Divine right of kings. And these two were the only theories of royalty as yet prevalent.

But reverting to the second feudal notion, the connection of authority with the possession of land, everywhere, in England more especially, judicial and executive authority had been divorced from land, and had been placed in the hands of officials. In many instances those officials were elective. Thus the feudal notion with regard to authority had received a death-blow. Moreover, the agitation of the Reformation had given birth to Presbyterianism, or Church government by the congregation, as contrasted with the government by divinely-ordained priests; and thus even in the sphere of religion the idea of official government had begun to supplant the idea of authority based upon Divine right. There then arose the question, Is not the King after all, instead of being the proprietor, an official? and if an official, whence is his authority derived, if not from the source of all official authority, the people? There thus arose, in the place of territorial royalty, or Divine right royalty, the idea of official royalty depending on the will of the nation, in other words, of constitutional royalty. Such was the view held by the Puritan party, and later on by the Whig party. And most of the events which happened during the reign of the Stuart Kings are closely connected with this change of ideas.

The new King entered upon his kingdom with the fullest idea of his own prerogative and belief in the Divine right of kings. Nothing else could be expected. Elizabeth had, to all appearance, regained, after its temporary relaxation in the reign of her sister, the absolute position of the Tudors. The separation from Rome which had followed her accession had re-established her power over the Church. That authority had been

The idea of official royalty.

James's view of his prerogative.

wielded with determination, and the close of her reign appeared to exhibit her as mistress alike of Church and State. But even in Henry VIII.'s reign signs had been visible that the great personal power of the Crown rested at bottom upon the national approbation. It was because his will was so much in harmony with that of his people that Henry had been allowed to become so entirely its representative. In Elizabeth's reign this connection was even more evident. The ease with which, on several occasions, she yielded to the demands of the Commons showed that she was herself conscious of it. The growth of the Puritan party, and the political ideas indissolubly connected with their religious creed, had given back to the Commons something of their former independence. But the grandeur and success of the reign, the general popularity of the Queen, and the pride which the people, as a whole, felt in her greatness, had veiled the amount of influence which popular feeling had exerted upon her. It was the misappreciation of this power which was the mistake of James and the ruin of his house. Strong in his Divine right, in his evident mastery of both Church and State, he attempted to carry out his views without regard to the people's wishes. The inevitable consequence arose. The Parliament—more freely elected than it had hitherto been, grown more powerful by the increased wealth of the middle classes, and Puritan in its tendencies—found itself opposed instead of being humoured, and began to remember its old greatness. Traditions of its position under the Plantagenets and Lancastrians began to gain ground, and the rival ideas of a King, the official head of a national legislative body, and a King whose Divine right authorized him to pursue an independent course of his own, and to act if he chose even in opposition to the advice of his Parliament, came into inevitable collision. The increased importance of Parliament is visible from the very beginning of the reign. It is no longer the King, but the Parliament, against which the efforts of the Jesuits were directed. But it was not till the line of conduct adopted by James in his foreign policy directly crossed the national wishes that the rising opposition found its first formidable expression in the great Protest of 1622.

The death of Elizabeth was reported at once to James. But he acted in accordance with Cecil's advice, waited until the information was formally sent him by the English Council, and even then showed no unseemly hurry to take possession of his inheritance. There was indeed no danger to be dreaded; Cecil's view proved quite correct. Not only were the people, as a whole, willing to receive their new King, but both extreme parties looked forward with hope to his accession. He had been educated among the Presbyterians, and had often expressed himself as an admirer of the Scotch Kirk; and the Puritans could not know that he was at heart very weary of the meddling dictatorial character of its chief members, and likely to use his new opportunities to oppose them; they hoped from him a relaxation of those restraints which Elizabeth had put upon them. At the same time, his feelings with regard to royalty, and his book entitled "The Basilicon Doron," gave Catholics reason to believe that he would ameliorate the penal laws. It was the disappointment of these hopes which led to the disturbances at the beginning of his reign.

Rising opposition of Parliament.

James well received by Puritans and Catholics. 1603.

At the same time the uncertainty which hung over the probable conduct of the new King again gave opportunity for the intrigues of foreign courts. Again France and Spain entered the lists to secure the friendship of England. Thus, immediately upon his accession, Henry IV. of France despatched his great minister, Sully, to demand a continuance of the friendly relations between France and England, while Spain, in the same way and for the same object, sent over its minister, Artemberg. While Sully was himself in England, his character and address secured the success of his mission. He even induced James to go so far in opposition to the Spanish as secretly to supply the Dutch (still engaged in their war of independence) with money. But when Sully left the country, James's natural inclinations came into play. His great wish was for a general peace; his great principle the supremacy of royalty. He did not see why he should continue the war with Spain; he had little fancy for supporting the cause of rebel subjects. He therefore, in the following year, after some little negotiations, made a treaty with Spain also. Advantage was taken of the eager rivalry of foreign ambassadors at the English Court by those who were displeased with the turn affairs had taken. The enemies of Cecil had hoped much from the change of dynasty, but found their enemy as firmly established and as influential as ever. Raleigh, Cobham and Northumberland entered into correspondence with the French ambassador, and attempted to induce him to assist them in overthrowing their rival, but the French Court, feeling that it was gaining its end by diplomatic means, rejected their overtures. Upon this Northumberland withdrew, but Raleigh and Cobham addressed themselves to Count Artemberg, who, deeply anxious to gain England for the Spanish interests on the Continent, and aware that Cecil inclined towards French and Protestant alliances, listened to their pro-

Both France and Spain seek his alliance.

The Main Plot.

positions. From this correspondence arose what is known as the "Main Plot," the object of which was probably the overthrow of Cecil, perhaps even a more complete revolution, by the establishment of Arabella Stuart¹ on the throne by means of Spanish influence.

There was at the same time a second plot set on foot, known as the "Bye" or Surprise Plot. The chief conspirators were a gentleman called Markham, and George Brooke, Lord Cobham's brother. Their idea, as that of Essex had been, was to join the extreme parties, who had already begun to see that their hopes of favour were likely to be disappointed. They therefore joined with themselves Watson, a Catholic missionary, prominent among the English Roman Catholic party, and Lord Grey, a staunch Puritan. Their project was to surprise and take possession of the King's person, and to win by violence that toleration which they desired. But the combination was ill-cemented; and Watson formed a plan of his own, intending with his Catholics to rescue the King after he had been seized, and thus to win his object from the royal gratitude. He communicated the plan to the Jesuits, who did not approve of it, and informed Cecil.

That minister at once saw the opportunity for destroying his rivals. The presence of Brooke, Cobham's brother, in the lesser plot seemed sufficient ground to connect the two. Raleigh, Cobham and Grey were apprehended. The two plots were artfully mixed by Coke, the Attorney-General, and the conviction of all the leaders, both Commoners and Lords, was secured. Much mystery hangs over the story, caused chiefly by this union of the plots and by the strange conduct of Cobham, a man of extreme weakness, who repeatedly confessed, and as often withdrew his confession. Even on the trial of Raleigh, two letters were produced, in one of which Cobham declared that Raleigh was wholly guiltless, in the other that he was the chief instigator in the business, and the very person who had persuaded Cobham to join it. Whatever the truth may have been, the verdicts were obtained—Watson and another priest were executed; Raleigh imprisoned for many years, and Cobham, Grey, and Markham, by a curious trick of the King, brought each separately to the scaffold, there induced, as usual, to confess, and then withdrawn. Finally, to their great astonishment, they were all three produced simultaneously, and reprieved. The failure of this political intrigue opened the eyes of those Puritans whose hopes had been raised by James's toleration of the Scotch Presbyterians.

Cecil gets rid of his rivals by mixing the plots.

¹ See page 355.

A conference was almost immediately opened between the Puritans and the Bishops at Hampton Court. This conference was held in consequence of a great petition, which had been presented to James during his progress from Scotland, known as the Millenary Petition, so called because it was intended to represent the feelings of a thousand Puritan clergy; it demanded the abolition of those ceremonies which they could not conscientiously accept. These Puritans, it must be remembered, were not Dissenters, but members of the Church of England. But James had now the opportunity of displaying his real feelings on religious matters. Four ministers were called to meet the King and the Bishops and other Church dignitaries. It has been frequently said that this was a very unfair arrangement, throwing the whole weight of authority on one party. It is more just to regard it as the natural and proper way of discussing the petition among the leaders of the Church, a certain number of the petitioners being allowed to be present to support their claims. But though justly formed, it soon became evident that the result was predetermined. Smarting under the restraint which the Church had put upon him in his own country, James was charmed with the obsequiousness of the English Bishops; for in England the Church was before all things a creation of the royalty. He was delighted too with the opportunity of displaying his theological erudition. He threw himself heartily on the side of the High Church party, and condescended to enter personally into the dispute. The English Churchmen were much pleased, and lowered themselves to the basest flattery. The King, they declared, was speaking by the direct inspiration of the Spirit. As a natural consequence, the claims of the petitioners, though they were confined really to slight matters which to us appear almost immaterial, were rejected, and the only upshot of the conference worth mentioning was the project of the Authorized Version of the Bible. The rejection of the claims of the Puritans was followed by an outrageous infraction of law—the imprisonment of ten of those who had presented the petition, the Star Chamber having declared that it tended to sedition and rebellion.

Such conduct showed the fixed intention of the King in Church matters, opened the eyes of the Puritans, and caused a bitter discontent, which speedily found means to show itself in Parliament. Even in Elizabeth's reign the Parliament had been inclined to Puritanism. The love of political liberty in fact went hand in hand with dislike of an arbitrary and ceremonious Church. And the Commons, Conference at Hampton Court. Jan. 1604.

Triumph of the High Church party.

who had ventured, and ventured sometimes successfully, to oppose the great Queen, were not inclined to be submissive to their new Scotch monarch. Nor had he taken steps to conciliate them.

James displeased to his Parliament, March 1604.

In the proclamation by which they had been summoned the King had put his own authority ostentatiously forward, and had seemed to dictate to the electors the sort of members whom they should elect; and immediately upon their assembling a quarrel had arisen upon the point of privilege. A certain Goodwin had been elected for Buckinghamshire; some years previously he had been outlawed; the proclamation had forbidden the election of outlawed men; the King therefore declared the election void, and secured the return of Sir John Fortescue, a member of the Council. The Commons insisted upon their right of inquiring into the election of their own members. The King tried to settle the question by an appeal to the Judges. The Commons refused to listen to such a decision, but, after much controversy, the King so far prevailed as to bring about a Conference between the Parliament and the Judges in his presence. A compromise was hit upon, both elections were declared void, and a new writ issued; the King confessed that the

They insist on their privileges.

House of Commons was "a Court of Record."¹ From this time onward their privilege to decide upon elections has never been questioned. This disastrous opening was followed by a stormy session, in which the grievances of the Commons were fully urged, and which closed by a protest in which they declared the King's miscomprehension of their position. He regarded their privileges, they said, as not of right but of grace, and was inclined to refuse them the position of a Court of Record. In opposition they asserted that their position and privileges were their right and heritage, and that the High Court of Parliament was the supreme Court of the land. While thus defending their privileges, they carried the war into the enemy's country, by still further increasing the severities of the penal laws against the Catholics, to whom, as they thought, the King was inclined to show favour.

To vindicate himself from this charge, James thought it necessary to exact the legal fine of £20 a month from all Catholics, and even to demand the arrears due for the preceding period during which the law had been in abeyance.

To appease them he persecutes the Catholics.

¹ The Superior Courts are Courts of Record, so called because their proceedings are enrolled on parchment. Such records are authoritative and held to prove themselves Courts of Record have further the right to fine for contempt and to examine on oath. County Courts, Hundred Courts, Courts Baron, are not Courts of Record, nor, properly speaking, are the Courts of Equity.

Many Catholics were thus wholly ruined, and the King excited general displeasure by giving these fines as presents to his Scotch friends. At the same time the clergy in ^{New body of Canons.} convocation passed a new body of Canons, laying down rules for the celebration of public worship, and excommunicating all such as should deny the supremacy of the Crown, separate from the Church, or attack the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles. These Canons, though fortified by letters patent under the Great Seal, were held by the Courts of Westminster to be binding on the clergy only. On them they pressed heavily, and a considerable number of the clergy, variously given between the numbers of 50 and 300, found themselves obliged to vacate their livings. The King's conduct had thus disappointed both Puritan and Catholic. He had adopted fully the secular view of the Church, based upon the complete supremacy of the Crown in spiritual matters. The Puritans had found means to express their disappointment by opposition in Parliament; the Catholics, equally disappointed, and harassed by new persecutions, were driven to conspiracy.

The consequence was the Gunpowder Plot, which originated in the mind of Catesby, one of the sufferers by the late enact- ^{Gunpowder Plot. 1604.} ments. He was a gentleman from Ashby St. Legers, who had joined in the treason of Essex, and had subsequently been a member of the Spanish party. When all other hope seemed to have disappeared, he determined to destroy those whom he regarded as the cause of the oppression of the Catholics, hoping, in the confusion thus caused, that the Catholics throughout England would rise. He opened his mind to other kindred spirits—to Winter and Fawkes, who had already acted as agents to the Spanish party, to Wright, an old partisan of Essex, and to Percy, the steward and relative of the Earl of Northumberland, who is said to have had a private cause of anger against the King, because he had failed to keep some engagements he had entered into with him. Catesby got his monstrous plan ratified by the Jesuits, as Garnet, the Provincial of the Jesuits, to whom he applied, declares, not by explaining his own plot, but by substituting a hypothetical case. He obtained leave to take a commission under the Austrian Archdukes,¹ at that time engaged in the war against the Netherlands, and thus got a pretext for raising armed men, and then set about his plan with considerable skill. He engaged an empty house next to the Houses of Parliament. With great labour he and his confederates proceeded to dig through the wall, burying at night in the garden the rubbish made during the day. The work was very laborious, and they were rejoiced to find a vacant cellar immediately under the Parliament House. This they engaged; and hiring a house at Lambeth, there prepared their materials, which they brought across the water, and secreted in the cellar as though it were fuel. They had expected the Parliament to meet in September; it was prorogued till October, and the conspirators dispersed, leaving their mine in the cellar. A few more ardent Catholics were admitted into the secret; among others, Rookwood, a Suffolk man, a breeder of horses, which it was thought would be useful for the insurrection. Fawkes went abroad to enlist soldiers. All was again ready, when they were disappointed by a fresh prorogation.

¹ Archduke Albert, son of Ferdinand I., had married the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, daughter of Philip II.; and they jointly governed the Netherlands under the name of the Archdukes.

Their resources had come to an end, and they were compelled to recruit them by adding to their number two wealthy young men, Digby, and Tresham, a man of somewhat uncertain character, but who, like so many of the other conspirators, had been a partisan of Essex. It was the admission of this last confederate which ruined their plot. It was natural that wholesale destruction of innocent men, as well as those whom they regarded as guilty, should excite qualms in the minds of the conspirators. Some arrangements were certainly made to keep, if possible, the Catholic Peers from Parliament. But this precaution was not enough for Tresham, who was very anxious to save Lord Mounteagle, who had married his sister. His difficulty was how to do this without revealing his associates. The means he took were circuitous. In all probability he discussed the matter with Lord Mounteagle. At all events, that nobleman, contrary to his usual practice, dined and slept one day at a country house belonging to him. There was there brought to him a mysterious letter, warning him to avoid the meeting of Parliament, containing these words, "The danger is over as soon as you shall have burnt this letter." Lord Mounteagle put the letter into the hands of one of his gentlemen to read, and the very next morning this same gentleman told Winter that the letter had been laid

Discovered by
the Council.
1605.

before the Council. It was doubtless the object of Mounteagle and Tresham that the conspirators should take the opportunity to withdraw, and any sign of movement on Cecil's part would probably have had that effect. But Cecil, whose inquiries probably disclosed the complicity of Percy in the plot, and who saw the hold thus given him on his rival, Northumberland, was not likely to fall into such an error. He remained perfectly quiet. On the 1st of November the letter was laid before the King on his return from hunting at Royston, and the enigmatical passage explained.

The news that this consultation had been held, and that the existence of the mine was known, was again conveyed to Winter by Mounteagle's servant. But even this information did not deter him from pursuing his project. Percy, Winter, and Fawkes remained in London to carry their measures to completion. The other conspirators withdrew to Dunchurch, where Sir Everard Digby, under pretext of a great hunting party, had collected a great body of Catholics. On the evening of the 4th, the Lord Chamberlain, with Lord Mounteagle, visited the cellars, there found Fawkes, and remarked on the large stack of fuel. A little after midnight Fawkes, opening the door of the vault, was suddenly seized by a party of soldiers. The news of his apprehension speedily reached his accomplices, who rode off directly to Dunchurch. The hunting party, seeing that the opportunity was gone, dispersed; while the leaders of the plot rode to Holbeach, in Worcestershire, and there, about fifty in number, turned upon their pursuers, for the counties had been raised in pursuit of them. An accidental explosion wounded some of them. Others continued their flight still further, but Catesby, Percy, and the two Wrights were killed; the two Winters, Rookwood, Digby, and some others taken prisoners. Three Jesuits were also apprehended; Garnet being discovered in hiding at Henlip in a secret chamber.

Flight of the conspirators.

The lay prisoners were speedily convicted and executed. The trial of Garnet was more difficult, but his knowledge of the plot was at last proved by a conversation between himself and one of his fellow-prisoners, treacherously devised and overheard. It is probable that he might even then have escaped his fate, had it not been for his open avowal of the lawfulness of equivocation and mental reservation on any point which might criminate himself. This destroyed all credit in his assertions, and took from him all chance of popular sympathy. He was executed, and for long afterwards regarded as a martyr by the English Catholics. Three Lords, whose intended absence from the Parliament was held to imply their knowledge of the Plot, were kept in custody; and Cecil also contrived to rid himself of his opponent Northumberland and to procure his imprisonment for life, though there was little to connect him with the conspiracy except his name. The Catholics reaped the inevitable fruit of an abortive conspiracy; the Parliament which they had intended to destroy not unnaturally devoted its time to a still further increase of the penal statutes. Catholic recusants were

Their capture and execution.

deprived of nearly all their civil rights, heavy fines were levied if their children remained unchristened, and if they absented themselves from church, while if the children were sent abroad to be educated they became incapable of inheriting, and their property passed to the nearest Protestant successor. They were all too, by the mere fact of their being Catholics, excommunicated. At the same time this conspiracy temporarily threw the King decidedly into the Protestant cause in Europe.

All opposition to the accession of James was now over. He was henceforward safely seated on the throne, and able to exhibit himself in all his true colours; and the real point of interest of the reign, the beginning and gradual increase of the opposition to that Divine right of which he was the representative, may now be said to begin. It may be traced primarily, no doubt, to the disappointment caused to the English by the person and character of the King. Much shrewd sense, considerable learning, a good knowledge of the intricacies of European policy, and a by no means unstatesmanlike view of the necessity of European peace, and the means of procuring it, were veiled by faults and weaknesses which completely neutralized them. The old nobility found him reckless in the distribution of favour; soldiers and men of action found him peaceful and careless of the national honour; both Puritans and Catholics found him a narrow-minded persecutor; the House of Commons found him a spendthrift and an arrogant upholder of prerogative; while all respectable men were disgusted at the lavish and gluttonous exhibitions which characterized his Court. In person ungainly, with rolling walk, with a tongue too big for his mouth, of unclean habits (for we are told he never washed his hands), he gave himself up, in his delight of new-found wealth, to a course of half-barbaric pageantry and profusion. His revels were marked by an intemperance in which even his ladies joined. He was for ever tippling, though not often very drunk; and, as he fell into the hands of favourites, had a nauseous habit of "hugging and kissing the dear one" which must have been most offensive to English dignity.

But the opposition to the high prerogative notions rested also upon grounds more real and efficient than mere personal dis-
Consequent opposition. appointment or disgust. The political consequences of James's profusion and his love of favourites were more important than the contempt which they caused. The King was constantly in want of money, and was thus brought frequently into collision with his Parliament; for Cecil and his other ministers, driven to extemity to supply him, and with strong views themselves as to the royal rights, did not shrink from the employment of the most illegal means of filling the Treasury.

Indirectly, in another way, the extravagance of James touched the labouring and unrepresented classes. As was natural, the example of the Court spread to the nobility. The receptions of the King in his progress were extravagant beyond even those of Elizabeth's reign, and the want of money thus engendered carried the nobles forward in the course which has already been mentioned as begun under the Tudors. The enclosure of commons and open grounds was so rife, that in 1607 an insurrection broke out in the midland counties among the peasantry, under the leadership of a man who took the name of Captain Pouch. He was so called from a leathern bag which he carried round his shoulder, and which he declared contained a talisman to secure his success. For some time they took their course unchecked, breaking down park railings and enclosures of commons. At length the gentry armed, and the outbreak was suppressed without much difficulty; and it is to James's credit that he showed some sympathy with the offenders, and though a few were executed, on the whole they were leniently treated. Parliament met for the third time in 1609, when the natural consequences of extravagant government showed themselves, and the battle which was to end only with the Revolution began. The treasury had to be filled, and it was necessary to ask the help of the Commons to fill it; but not before all other methods had been tried. When Cecil became Lord-Cecil's attempts to get money. Treasurer he found the debt amounted to £1,300,000, while there was an annual deficit of upwards of £80,000. He had recourse to all possible means of raising money; he collected loans under privy seals, and going a step further in illegality, he considerably increased the customs. The courts of law had in the case of one Bates decided that the King was able thus to increase the customs; and the judges, Clark and Fleming, in giving judgment in the case, had stated views in favour of very high prerogative. Sustained by this decision, the minister issued, in 1608, a book of rates, by which all the customs were considerably raised. Even these resources proved insufficient, and Cecil found himself obliged to demand a supply of £600,000, and an increase of yearly income amounting to £200,000. On bringing forward this demand, he invited the Commons to state their grievances. They took him at his word. It then became plain, that though the power of the purse supplied them with the opportunity of making known their grievances, though illegal taxation was the most obvious abuse against which to direct their attacks, the leaders of the Parliament did not confine themselves to money questions, but regarded the illegal exactions of imposts merely as one part of a general system, and intended to assault the whole structure of absolute monarchy. The gentry, always conservative in their tendencies, at length felt themselves strong enough to step into the place of the nobility who had in old times guided the constitutional advances of the nation. They were determined, if possible, to bring back the constitution of England to the position it had occupied before circumstances had allowed the Tudors to establish their new and all but absolute monarchy. When called upon to state their grievances, the Parliament complained of the new impositions, as the increased customs were called, of the extra legal authority of the Court of High Commission, and of the Court of Wales—a court which had been created to withdraw the four counties of Hereford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Shropshire from the ordinary jurisdiction of common law, on the plea that they were the Welsh Marches—and lastly, they complained of the free use of royal proclamations, which were held as binding as statutes. The anxiety of the Commons on these points was well grounded. Many signs showed how firmly the idea of absolute Divine monarchy was rooting itself. The language used by the Church with regard to the royal prerogative was full of danger. The ecclesiastical courts used the civil or Roman law, and not the common law of the land. A law dictionary had lately been brought out by an eminent civilian of the name of Cowell, which had stated the claims of the Crown in the broadest and most unqualified form. This book was mentioned in the House and condemned. Cowell suffered a short imprisonment. The monarchical tendencies of the civil lawyers, who wished to put the King into the same position as the Emperor had occupied in the Roman theory of law, were shared by the lawyers of the equity courts, which also used forms of process distinct from those of the common law courts, and claimed their authority as representatives of the old royal Council. As the old Council had been a court of final resort, its authority had been frequently used to establish practical justice where the technical law of the common law courts failed. The Chancellor, the head of the equity courts, had, for instance, taken upon himself the duty of insisting upon the performance of trusts. When property had been left to one man for the benefit of another, the common law recognized the first owner only, who might thus appropriate the property, to the detriment of the man for whose use it was left. In such and similar cases the Chancellor had stepped in to see justice done. This interference with the course of law, an interference resting originally on the authority of the King in Council, gave great umbrage to the common lawyers, while it inclined the equity lawyers to take a high view of the King's power. This may tend to explain the great number of common-law lawyers who gave their very valuable aid to the constitutional opposition of this time.

No redress was obtained to the grievances of the Commons, and the grant of money became a matter of bargain upon another point. Though feudalism as a social institution had disappeared, the feudal tenure of land still existed, still bringing with it its old legal burdens. This the Commons now wished to be absolutely abolished, and were willing to give the King the equivalent for the rights he thus lost. James had a notion that his own respectability and that of the gentry of England depended on this peculiar tenure. He therefore refused to abolish it, but offered to give up the incidents, such as aids, purveyance and wardship, which accompanied it, for an equivalent. After much haggling, the price was settled at £200,000 a year, and Cecil believed that he had gained his object. But during a prorogation the Commons changed their mind, upon reassembling refused to complete the arrangement, and the Parliament was dissolved in anger.

Shortly afterwards Cecil died; it is said that his health was destroyed by his failure. Although an arbitrary and ^{Death of Cecil.} time-serving statesman, he had yet retained some of the ^{1612.} traditions of the great reign of Elizabeth, especially in regard to foreign policy. His influence had been consistently exerted to restrain the King from throwing himself into an alliance with Spain, which, with its magnificent pretensions and absolute monarchy, exercised a strong fascination upon James. Under Cecil's guidance, and in the temporary return to Protestant policy which followed the Gunpowder Plot, England had even played no inconsiderable part in the conclusion of the great twelve years' truce between Spain and her revolted colonies in the year 1609. Again, in the question of the succession of Juliers and Cleves, which was exciting the minds of all European statesmen, England had sided decidedly with the Protestant claimant. Those provinces were claimed by the Princes of Brandenburg and of Neuburg, as well as by both branches of the Saxon house, and, pending a settlement, had been arbitrarily sequestered by the Emperor, and placed in the hand of his relative the Archduke Leopold. Irritated at this stretch of imperial power, the Prince Palatine of Neuburg and the Duke of Brandenburg made common cause, and came to an agreement by which they jointly occupied the disputed territories. The point at issue was generally understood to be not so much the possession of the provinces as the establishment of Austrian and Catholic influence in that part of Germany. Henry IV. and the United Provinces, together with the German Protestant Union, proceeded to arm in defence of the two Princes in possession, and James was induced to join them and despatch 4000 troops to their aid. Just before the execution of the plan, which involved enterprises of much greater moment against the house of Austria, Henry IV. was assassinated by Ravaillac. Nevertheless, as far as Juliers was concerned, the expedition was completed, and the English assisted in establishing the two Protestant Princes in the country.

The last traces of Cecil's policy may be found in the marriages arranged for the Princess Elizabeth and for Henry Prince of Wales. On the death of Henry IV., James was regarded for the time as the head of the party opposed to Austria. He went so far as to enter into close alliance with the German Protestant Union. It was in pursuance of this line of policy that, of the various suitors for the hand of Elizabeth, the one preferred was Frederick V., Elector Palatine, closely connected with the leaders of the Protestants both in Holland and in France. And a further step in the same direction was the intended marriage of Prince Henry with the second daughter of Henry IV. It was apparently intended that she should be brought up a Protestant, but

Death of Prince
Henry.
Nov. 6, 1612.

on the very day that the question of the marriage was to be decided, the young Prince was taken ill with a mortal disease. The gravity and energy of his character, the adventurous and eager spirit which he showed, and the language he was in the habit of holding with regard to his duties as King, led men to believe that he would, had he lived, have rendered his reign stirring and important; it was not unlikely that he would have followed the wishes of the more eager part of the nation, and have plunged vigorously into the Thirty Years' War. It may have been a desire to strengthen his position in England that made James so eager to find marriages for his children. Already, before the French match was proposed, he had been treating both with Spain and Savoy on the same point. Certainly he appears to have been conscious that his claims to the throne were not wholly unquestioned. It is only by this supposition that we can explain the severity of his conduct to the Lady Arabella Stuart. She had secretly married William Seymour, the son of Lord Beauchamp. Both husband and wife were descended from Henry VII. The alliance excited James's jealousy. They were both placed in custody. Arabella Stuart escaped from Highgate in male dress, and got on board a French ship in the river. There she was to have been joined by Seymour, who had escaped from the Tower. The French vessel, however, sailed without him, and was captured off the Nore, and Arabella was confined in the Tower for the rest of her life. She died mad four years afterwards. Seymour escaped to the Continent.

The death of Cecil and of Prince Henry left James more completely at liberty to follow the bent of his own character, and henceforward the Government fell into the hands of worthless favourites. The first of these was Robert Carr, for whom the King acquired a peculiar affection while he was lying wounded from an accident at a tournament. Carr had been his page in Scotland, and the King, feeling a natural interest in him, visited him, and fell in love with his beauty. Carr was skilful enough to take advantage of this affection. "The King," says Harrington in his "Nugæ Antiquæ," "leaneth on his arm, pinches his cheek, and smoothes his ruffled garments;" while the young man "hath changed his tailor entirely many times, and all to please the Prince." Already, before the death of Cecil, the presents he received to win the King's favour had made his fortune. His royal lover had made him Viscount Rochester and Knight of the Garter. The death of Cecil threw open a career for his ambition. The Court was divided between the factions of the young favourite and the two Howards, Earls of Suffolk and Northampton. The distribution of places was left incomplete for a year, but during that time Rochester transacted the whole public business. The feud was at length healed by the marriage of Rochester with Frances Howard, the daughter of Lord Suffolk, till lately Countess of Essex; and upon the death of the other Howard (the Earl of Northampton) Suffolk became Lord Treasurer, while Rochester succeeded him as Chamberlain, with the duties also of Lord Privy Seal.

The marriage, which thus secured the favourite (who had by this time been made Earl of Somerset) his position in the ministry, was the cause of his ruin. All the events that had accompanied that marriage had been mean and scandalous. Frances Howard had been married in her childhood to Lord Essex, and an intrigue had for some time existed between her and Somerset.

Imprisonment
of Arabella Stuart.
1611.

The first
favourite,
Robert Carr.

His marriage and disgrace.

Her father, privy to this intrigue, for the sake of gaining the favour of the favourite had basely recommended a divorce from Essex on the most indelicate ground. The King himself had used all his influence to procure it. Worse than that, the lady, finding herself opposed by the advice of Sir Thomas Overbury, who was Somerset's chief adviser, had procured the imprisonment and subsequent murder of that gentleman, a murder in which it is pretty certain that Somerset had borne a share. In another way events had turned out unfavourably for Somerset. On the death of Northampton there had been a rush for office, and the King, to fill his coffers, had put vacant places up for sale, and thus George Villiers, a gentleman of Leicestershire, had been able to purchase the office of cupbearer. The overbearing character of Somerset had secured him many enemies. While his alliance with the Howards gave just cause of apprehension to the Puritan party; he had acted so entirely as the minister and adviser of the Crown that the counsellors felt themselves virtually put aside. They therefore fixed upon young Villiers—who at that time showed signs of an amiable and pliant disposition, and was as good-looking and more courtier-like than Somerset—to supplant him, and persuaded Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was Puritanic in his tendencies, to use his influence with the Queen to induce her to recommend the new favourite. The King was speedily caught by his beauty, and he rose rapidly in favour. But something was wanted to complete the overthrow of Somerset, and this was found in the circumstances attending his marriage. Elwes, Lieutenant of the Tower, desirous of obtaining the favour of Winwood, the Secretary of State, divulged to him the suspicious circumstances attending Overbury's death. James, weary of his old friend, and longing for his new one, allowed the matter to be carried forward; and, with detestable double-dealing, suffered Somerset to be apprehended in his very presence, while he was still lavishing on him his usual repulsive tokens of affection. It is needless to follow the details of the nauseous story. There was sufficient proof that the Countess had employed a certain Mrs. Turner to supply poisons for the destruction of Overbury. The lesser agents were condemned and executed. An unsolved mystery hangs over the rest of the story. Both the Earl and Countess were found guilty. The Countess indeed confessed her crime, but the Earl not only refused to acknowledge his guilt, but threatened James with certain revelations if the charge were pressed. What those were was never known;

The second
favourite,
Villiers.
1615.

but that he held the King in his power was very plain, for James showed every sign of fear, and finally both the chief actors in the tragedy were pardoned. Somerset's enemies had, however, obtained their object, and from this time forward the destiny of England was in the hands of Villiers.

The reign of James had in fact entered into a second period at the death of Cecil. The government of statesmen had given place to that of favourites. The same phenomenon was to be observed both in France and Spain, and the consequence was a general want of determined outline in the foreign policy of the three countries. In England all high national policy, all idea of assuming vigorously and in arms the leadership of the Protestant party, entirely disappeared. Even Cecil had been averse to a war with Spain if it could be honourably avoided. But now James and his favourites desired peace at any price, and sought that peace by entering into very friendly relations with Spain. James was always strongly attracted by the thoroughness of the monarchical institutions of Spain, and hoped by close alliance with that country, and at the same time by keeping up his relations with the Protestant powers of Germany, to be able to play the part of peace-maker in Europe. Lerma, the Spanish prime minister, had somewhat similar views. He believed that Spain had need of rest, and that its position would be best secured by marriage treaties with the nations most likely to be hostile to it, namely, France and England. When then, after the death of Prince Henry, negotiations with France for the substitution of Charles in his brother's place as the husband of the French Princess Christine came to nothing, the Spanish Government suggested a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta Mary, daughter of Philip III. Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, in intimate relation both with Rochester and Villiers, obtained by his ready wit and social character much influence with the King, and the Spanish match thus became a fixed idea in his mind, for which he was willing to make great concessions.

It is impossible not to connect the peaceful policy of the King and his favourites with their position at home. James had never liked the necessity of summoning Parliaments. His wishes had been more than once thwarted by them, and the language used in 1609 by no means harmonized with his own view of his prerogative. An attempt to produce a more docile assembly in 1614 was singularly unsuccessful. Certain members of Parliament, who thought they understood the temper of the Commons,

Consequent degradation of English politics.

The Addled
Parliament.
1614.

undertook to manage that House for the King. They were spoken of at Court as the Undertakers. Both the fact and the title became known, and the attempt at indirect influence was not calculated to improve the temper of the Commons. They at once proceeded to their old grievances, especially discussing the legality of the impositions (as the additions to the customs were called) and of monopolies. In anger at the total failure of his scheme, James hurriedly dissolved the Parliament before it had completed a single piece of business. The humour of the time christened this futile Parliament "The Addled Parliament." With these experiences, neither the King nor his friends wished to be driven to the necessity of again appealing to the Commons. But such an appeal would have been inevitable to supply the money necessary for a war. For seven years, therefore, between 1614 and 1621, there was no Parliament summoned; and the King devoted all his skill in statecraft, of which he was inordinately proud, to the maintenance of peace in Europe.

During the ministry of Cecil, encroachments on the right of self-taxation had been common enough, yet, on the whole, constitutional means of raising money had been chiefly employed. These now gave way to illegal means. The cautionary towns, which the Dutch had lodged in the hands of the English as security for the money Elizabeth had advanced, were resold at about a third of their value. Free gifts were demanded from the nobility. Benevolences were collected, some of which appear never to have been repaid. Money was raised by writs under the Privy Seal. Patents and monopolies were multiplied, and finally peerages below earldoms were publicly sold.

The growing attachment between the King and Spain was not regarded favourably by the nation. It speedily produced effects which excited much angry feeling. In the first place, it was impossible for the King to carry out his foreign policy without granting considerable concessions to the Catholics; he was obliged, in order to gain credit with the Spaniards, to allow the sharpest of the persecuting laws to remain in abeyance. And again the popular voice accused him of meanly truckling to Spain in his treatment of Raleigh.

Weary with his imprisonment, Raleigh had at length found means to gain his freedom by judicious bribery of the family of Villiers, and by mentioning to Winwood, the Secretary, his belief that he could, if allowed to command a fleet, open a mine on the Orinoco river first discovered by Captain Keymis in 1596. To secure this prize, James granted him liberty,

Raleigh's last voyage to Guiana.
1617.

and put him in command of several ships; but, to please the Spaniards, gave him strict instructions not in any way to come to hostilities with them. He seems also to have placed the whole plan of the expedition in the hands of his intimate Gondomar, by whom it was at once forwarded to the Spanish Court and thence to South America, so that on Raleigh's arrival at the river full preparations had been made to receive him. The consequence was an inevitable collision. Raleigh had arrived with forces much weakened by disease, and himself in a high fever. The expedition he sent up to discover the mine was attacked by the Spaniards; it in turn assaulted and took the town of St. Thomas, where Raleigh's son was killed. The expedition proceeded further upwards under the command of Captain Keymis, but there were such signs of preparation and opposition everywhere that that commander thought it more prudent to retire. Among the spoils taken at St. Thomas were the despatches, which disclosed the King's treachery; and, excited by the failure of his plans, by the loss of his much-loved son, and by the gloomy prospects which these despatches opened before him, Raleigh censured Keymis so sharply that in despair he killed himself. Thoroughly disheartened, and aware of what was awaiting him, Raleigh returned home. He there found his Spanish enemies ready for him. He was at once apprehended, and, by a strange stretch of law, the old attainder of thirteen years before was revived against him; and though he justly argued that public service, with the right of life and death, had condoned his previous offence, the disappointment of James and the vengeance of Gondomar was too strong for him, he was condemned ^{His execution.} and executed. In prison, by his "History of the ^{1618.} World," and by his chemical studies, he had given proof of powers with which the world had before scarcely credited him; and now the death of so eminent a man caused bitter anger among the people, who regarded him, and justly, as a victim of Spanish intrigue.

At length, in the year 1618, it seemed as if James's policy of mediation could no longer be pursued. Questions in ^{Beginning of} which he was deeply interested had arisen in Germany. ^{the Thirty} Protestantism had spread widely through the dominions ^{Years' War.} of the house of Austria. Matthias, the reigning Emperor, had in his youth supported that religion. But the Catholic reaction, which, under the influence of the Jesuits, had been making its way in Europe, had laid hold especially of the higher ranks and of the younger men. Pre-eminent as its champions were the Duke of Bavaria, the head of the Catholic League, and Ferdinand of Gratz, a member of the younger branch of the Austrian house. Afraid of the democratic tendencies of the Reformers, which he knew by his own previous experience, Matthias, as he grew older, changed his policy, and when seeking for a successor, chose this Ferdinand of Gratz, in whose favour he induced the other Austrian Princes to renounce their claims. The kingdom of Bohemia was at once elective and hereditary. Ferdinand assumed by this double title the position of future king; although it was understood that he was bound not to interfere in the government, a change in the character of the administration became at once visible. Irritated by the destruction of some churches, which they believed they had had a right to build, the Bohemian Protestants rose under Count Thurm, stormed the Council Chamber at Prague, threw two obnoxious ministers out of the window, and, in conjunction with Silesia, Moravia, and Hungary, formed a vast insurrection, which was pressing victoriously onward when Matthias died. The insurgents sought assistance from the Protestant Princes. Ferdinand, the new King, called in the help of Spain, while his own dominions were still in danger. He succeeded in getting himself elected at Frankfort Emperor of Germany, and almost at the same time the crown of Bohemia was offered to the Elector Palatine; for the Protestants declared that the throne of that country was entirely elective, and refused therefore to give it to Ferdinand as the heir of Matthias. The Elector at once consulted his father-in-law; in fact, it depended upon James whether the throne should be accepted or not. But the desire of family aggrandizement on the one side, and the dread of touching the hereditary right of princes on the other, together with his generally wavering policy, induced him to give a perfectly equivocal answer. The general impression was that he meant to support the Elector, who therefore accepted the throne. In October 1619 he was crowned. The contest

Sympathy in England for the Protestant side.

gradually assumed the proportions of a general religious war, and excited violent enthusiasm in England. The Protestant party, though numerically powerful, were politically weakened by various causes, such as the dislike which existed between the Lutherans and Calvinists, the jealousy of the rising power of the Elector Palatine felt by Saxony, which had hitherto been the chief Protestant State of Germany, and finally the neutrality of France, on which country the Reforming Princes of Germany had formerly relied, but which had now fallen under Spanish influence during the regency of Mary de Medici. The undecided conduct of James, who should have been their head, completed the weakness of the party; while, on the other hand, Spain contrived to keep together the whole power of her house and the friendship of her chief allies. With regard to his son-in-law, James had refused to interfere in the main issue, as he himself said, "for conscience, because it was unlawful to dethrone a king on religious grounds; for honour, because the Elector had sought, but not followed his advice; for example, because he liked not that subjects should dethrone their king." But he consented to send a small and inefficient army for the protection of Frederick's hereditary dominions. His real policy, nowever, rested upon the hope, which nothing but an overweening belief in his own position could have inspired, that, once allied with Spain, that country would join with him in mediating a peace. He thus looked calmly on, busied in his idle negotiations, while the battle of Prague drove the Elector from his new-won kingdom, and the Spanish army, under Spinola, possessed itself step by step of the Palatinate.

But James refuses to interfere.

It nevertheless seemed to him desirable to turn the popular excitement to account; he therefore summoned a Parliament, hoping that it would grant him supplies for the defence of his son-in-law's dominions, and that the visible agreement between himself and his people would improve his position with regard to Spain. His expectations were not answered, though in his opening speech he apologized for his conduct to his last Parliament. "In my last Parliament," said he, "there was a kind of beast called undertakers, a dozen of whom undertook to govern my Parliament, and they led me." The Commons would not be enticed away from their chief object. Two subsidies were indeed granted, but the House then at once proceeded to draw up a petition against any alleviation of the penal laws against Catholics. Under the direction of Sir Edward Coke they then proceeded to attack the chief monopolists, Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Mitchell, not only because monopolies were in themselves odious, but because they denied the power of the Crown to grant them. They flew even at higher game, and Francis Bacon, who had been Lord Chancellor since 1617, with the title first of Lord Verulam, and afterwards of Lord St. Albans, was impeached for taking bribes. It was not the love of judicial purity alone which urged the Commons. Throughout the quarrel between the equity courts and the common law courts, which, as we have seen, involved the question of royal prerogative, Bacon had systematically upheld the royal claims. This conduct had been dictated, not probably by a

Takes advantage of the popular feeling to call a Parliament.
1621.

Their time spent in the impeachment
of Bacon.

mean love of power, but from an opinion that constitutional questions require to be judged from a higher and more political point of view than that afforded by technical law, and that that point of view was more likely to be occupied by the Chancellor, who was a great political officer, than by the judges, who were mere lawyers. The charges against him, which were very heavy, were unfortunately but too well grounded, no less than twenty-two instances in which he had received bribes were fully made out. He pleaded guilty—only alleging in excuse that the course of justice had never been influenced by them—was removed from his office, and heavily fined. Having finished these domestic questions, the House was proceeding to take note of foreign affairs. But its view was very different from that of the King; it was desirous that the country should act immediately and energetically in the interests of the Protestants abroad. The King regarded the discussion of international relations as trenching on his prerogative, and adjourned the House. During the recess he did not improve his position with regard to the Commons. He indeed reformed some abuses, but he did

James's behaviour during the recess, this by proclamation, one of those assertions of prerogative of which they were very jealous. He issued a second proclamation, forbidding all men to speak of state affairs. He appointed Williams, a clergyman whom he raised to the rank of Bishop of Lincoln, and who was a creature of Buckingham's, to the position of Lord Keeper, while the futility of his negotiations became evident when the Palatinate was transferred to the Elector of Bavaria. The makes them more angry. They protest against priests.

Parliament therefore when it met in November was more angry than before. It renewed its protest against priests and Jesuits, and begged that the Prince might be married to a Protestant. A long and angry dispute ensued, which terminated in a strong protest, in which the Commons declared that their privileges were not the gift of the Crown but the natural birth-right of English subjects, and that matters of public interest were within their province. This protest so angered the King that he tore it from the record with his own hand, and at once dissolved the Parliament. The dissolution was followed by the usual acts of vengeance. The most prominent of the opposition, the Lords Oxford and Southampton, with the Commoners Philip, Pym, Coke, and Mallory, were imprisoned.

Parliament dissolved in anger. Jan. 1622.

The old course was then pursued. Digby, afterwards Lord Bristol, was sent on the death of Philip III. to conclude, if possible, the Spanish match, and nothing of importance was done for the Palatinate. But at the same time it was evident, that while English troops were garrisoning the fortresses there, and the troops of the League were gradually conquering the province, the completion of the match would be impossible. James insisted on the restoration of his son-in-law's dominions as a necessary preliminary to the marriage. He promised that if that step were taken he would himself join his troops with the Spaniards against their enemies. But while trusting to these idle negotiations, the troops of the League were gradually driving the English from all their strong posts; and upon the King's complaints, he was told that this conquest was in fact necessary before the Palatinate could be restored. It was then that, rather than give up the match entirely, the Prince and Buckingham forced on the King the strange expedient of a personal visit on the part of Charles to the Court of Spain. For some time all went well; they met with a most flattering reception, and articles securing the perfect freedom of worship for the Infanta, together with the custody of her children till the age of ten, and a private promise that the worship of the Catholics should be tolerated at least in their own houses, were accepted, and sworn to both by King and Prince. But the behaviour of Buckingham, now raised to the rank of Duke, and as the Spaniards thought indecorously familiar with the Prince, rendered him very distasteful at Madrid. Besides this, he quarrelled completely with Olivarez, the all-powerful minister. He determined to break off the match, to secure which Bristol, the authorized ambassador, was in the meanwhile using his best endeavours. Afraid of that nobleman's influence in England, he returned thither, and persuaded the King to introduce what had hitherto not been mentioned, a clause in the treaty securing the Palatinate. The production of this new claim, after the preparations for the marriage had already been made, was regarded by the Spanish King as such an insult that he refused to proceed any further in the matter.

Negotiations for Spanish match continued.

Charles and Buckingham go to Spain. 1623.

The match broken off.

Buckingham at once rose to a high place in the popular esteem. He was credited with all virtues for having broken off the hated alliance. He allied himself with all the popular leaders, and at his instigation a new Parliament was summoned. He appeared before both Houses with the Prince standing by his side to support his story, and there gave his version of what had happened in Madrid. Although Bristol's friends and the Spanish ambassador accused him of want of veracity in his account, the Parliament believed him. The policy of Government was suddenly changed. A match was set on foot between Charles and Buckingham's popularity.

the French Princess Henrietta Maria. The Parliament voted fresh subsidies and three-fifteenths, and Mansfeld, the Protestant general, was allowed to raise 12,000 troops in England. In the midst of this sudden change of scene, and while the marriage was yet uncompleted, James died.

In following the course of English history it must not be forgotten that the King of England was now King also of Scotland and of Ireland. In both those countries events of some importance had happened during the reign. In Ireland James had shown some of that political wisdom which was mingled so strangely with his folly; in his own country he had acted as foolishly and as arbitrarily as in England. Enamoured of the Church of England, which had so readily accepted his claims to Divine right, and had received him in so humble a spirit, he had adopted the maxim, "no Bishop, no King." He determined, therefore, to introduce Episcopacy into Scotland. As early as 1606, he had induced the

James tries to introduce Episcopacy.
1606.

Estates to order the restoration of Bishops. At first this made little practical difference. The Bishops worked only as parish priests in the diocese to which they were appointed. In 1610, the Church was re-organized, but even then the Presbyterian system was in a great degree preserved. The General Assembly of the Church was allowed to exist, but distinctly under the authorization of the Crown. Provincial synods were also continued, but the Bishops became their permanent presidents. It was observed, also, that there was no room left for the lesser assemblies, called presbyteries. Matters which had hitherto been in their hands were now referred to the Bishops. In this mitigated form, Episcopacy was, in 1612, authorized by the Estates. The real difficulty which met the King was the endowment of the bishoprics. The Church property had been secularized, and could not be regained from the lay-holders. For many years the Bishops continually complained of their poverty. It was not till the year 1616, when James visited Scotland in person, that the full meaning of the change became obvious. The eyes of the citizens of Edinburgh were then shocked by the ornaments lavished on the Chapel of Holyrood, and the performances of the showy ceremonies of the English Church. Deans and chapters were also re-established. Bishops were ordered henceforward to be re-elected in the English fashion, by a royal congé d'élire, and the law was brought in, asserting that "whatsoever his Majesty should determine in the external government of the Church, by the advice

Authorized by the Estates.
1612.

of the Bishops and a competent number of ministers, should have the strength of law." The Presbyterians, who said "that this was like to cut the cords of the remanent liberties of their Kirk," protested, and the protesters were punished.

The King's assault upon the Presbyterian system was completed when, in 1621, the Estates ratified the Five Articles which had already been carried in the General Assembly at Perth. These Five Articles introduced innovations very distasteful to the Scotch. The Presbyterians, who had always given exclusive prominence to the social character of the Lord's Supper, regarding it as a meal to be taken in common, as a sign of communion, and who therefore received it sitting, were now obliged to receive it on their knees. It was also allowed to be given in private houses, which was again opposed to their view of its public and social nature. Private baptism was allowed, and that rite thus rendered a sort of process to be carried out between the priest and the person baptized, rather than the public reception by the Church of the baptized person. Episcopal confirmation was ordered, and what was perhaps the greatest grievance of all, especially when taken in connection with the recent relaxation of the observance of the Sabbath in England, the observance of the five great Church holydays was enjoined. It was not without much difficulty that obedience to these ordinances was obtained. The rising influence of Laud is visible in these enactments. As the King's chaplain, he had already succeeded in persuading James to accept the Arminian rather than the Calvinistic view of grace and free-will, although, earlier in his life, James had been so eager a Calvinist that he had persuaded the Dutch to persecute and expel their Arminian teachers, and had even, as late as 1618, been instrumental in securing the death of Barnevelt, the patriotic grand pensionary of Holland, for his heretical views. Before the close of the reign, Laud, at the instigation of Lord Keeper Williams, had been made Bishop of St. David's.

Anger excited
by the Five Articles of Perth.
1621.

In Ireland the King had succeeded in a great degree in carrying out those plans of colonization in which Elizabeth had failed, and had planted or colonized with Scotch Protestants a considerable portion of the province of Ulster. This subject will be more fully mentioned, when Ireland comes more prominently forward, in the next reign.

Scotch colonies
in Ireland.

CHARLES I.

1625-1649.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

France.	Germany.	Spain.	Denmark & Norway.	Sweden.
Louis XIII., 1610.	Ferdinand II., 1619.	Philip IV., 1621.	Christian IV., 1588. Frederick III., 1643.	Gustavus Adolphus 1611. Christina, 1632.
Louis XIV. 1643.	Ferdinand III., 1637.

POPES. —Urban VIII., 1624. Innocent X., 1644.

Archbishops.
George Abbot, 1611.
William Laud, 1633-1645.
Vacancy for fourteen years.

Chancellors.
Sir Thomas Coventry, 1625.
Sir John Finch, 1640.
Sir Edward Littleton, 1641.
Sir Richard Lane, 1645.

THE accession of Charles I. was regarded by his contemporaries with joy and hope. The late change of policy, which he and his favourite had been chiefly instrumental in producing, was highly popular in the country, and it was believed that changes of the same character would take place in other branches of the Government. This was a mistake. His accession in fact did not in any sense form the beginning of a new period, and the history of his reign is but a continuation of that of his father. The interests are identical, but strengthened and exaggerated. This is due principally to the character of the King. The kingcraft on which he prided himself had at all events taught

Characters of James and Charles
compared.

1625]

CHARACTER OF CHARLES

609

James the necessity of occasional pliancy. It is true that his total misapprehension of the character of the English sovereignty rendered his views of domestic government fundamentally false; while, from his mistaken belief in the power of Spain, and in the excellence of strong monarchical government, his foreign policy was constantly erroneous. But for all that his was not the character to irritate wilfully. On the other hand, Charles had been bred in the same school and imbibed the same ideas, but was wanting in that experience of the danger of popular opposition which James's youth had given him. He relied no less completely upon the advice of the shallow and impulsive Buckingham; but behind this apparent surrender of his will, he was possessed of an obstinacy which prevented him from making those prudent concessions which the temper of the times rendered necessary. Sir Ferdinand Fairfax gives the popular view of this defect when he says, "The King is in his own nature very stiff." Consequently, while the same abuses were perpetuated, the opposition to them met with a far stronger obstacle than in the preceding reign. The jar was proportionately stronger, and parties more embittered. It will be seen, in fact, that in the three first years of his reign Charles had succeeded in putting every branch of the nation—the Lords, the Commons, and the Church—in an attitude of hostility.

Consequent hostility of the nation.

We must be careful to recollect that the House of Commons, with which the King at first quarrelled, was not in any sense a popular one. It consisted of wealthy and powerful gentry, and of great lawyers, whose knowledge of constitutional precedent rendered them the natural and formidable opponents of the encroachments of the Crown. The changes of the last century, especially the freedom with which property was alienated, and the commercial wealth which followed on the new life of the Renaissance, had filled England with wealthy and independent gentlemen, among whom the old aristocratic spirit of liberty, no longer existing in the new Court nobility, had found a home. It is from this class that the representatives of the people were chosen, and against this spirit that the King had first to struggle.

Character of the House
of Commons.

There is another point to be borne in mind if we would understand the importance of the coming contest. It was in Parliament alone that any successful opposition to the Crown could be attempted. The character of the government of the Tudors had vastly increased the power of the executive. This is an essential part of that system of popular absolutism which

Nothing to restrain the King
but the Parliament.

they had established, and may be illustrated by the state of France during the Second Empire. The only hold which the nation had upon the action of the Crown was the Parliamentary power of granting supplies. In no other way, short of armed insurrection, could the royal power be withstood. The events of the two last reigns had rendered the national feeling intensely Protestant. Apart from their fear of loss of liberty at home, there was no point on which the whole body of the people felt so strongly as religion. In their own country this feeling was exhibited in the stringent laws enacted against Roman Catholics, and in the popular jealousy of any mitigation of them. Abroad, it was shown in the sympathy which was felt for the Protestant cause, at that time in danger of absolute ruin from the Catholic successes in the European war. It was mainly as a step against Catholicism, and as a blow to Spain, which was regarded as the head of Catholicism, that the French match had been hailed in England with such joy. The opposition of Richelieu, the great French minister, to the Austrian house was already understood; the purely political character of that opposition was not yet known.

The position of affairs abroad was indeed such as to excite the gravest apprehensions. After his great defeat at the battle of the White Mountain in 1620, Frederick, the Elector Palatine and nominal King of Bohemia, had trusted his affairs to three generals—Mansfeld, the Margrave of Baden, and Christian of Brunswick. The attempts of these generals to carry the war into the south or Catholic part of Germany had met with the worst success. Baden, in attempting to enter Bavaria, had been defeated at Wimpfen; Christian of Brunswick had crossed the river Main, only to be defeated at Höchst; Mansfeld's army was alone left. In these disastrous circumstances Frederick had trusted himself to the foolish advice of his father-in-law. James, always blinded by trust in his own diplomatic skill and in the good intentions of Spain, advised him to dismiss his troops. Thus Mansfeld and Christian found themselves masterless, and in the position of land pirates. They sought and found a refuge in the service of the Dutch, but were constantly kept in check by the skill of the Imperial General Tilly. These victories, and the Treaty of Niclasburg (1622), which relieved Austria from all pressure from Hungary, enabled the Emperor so to dominate Germany that he secured the transference of the Palatinate and the Electorship from Frederick to the Duke of Bavaria (the head of the Roman Catholic League). At the same time he bribed Saxony,

Protestant feelings of the country.

Position of
foreign affairs.

the chief of the Protestant powers, with the gift of the Province of Lusatia, and when the Huguenot insurrection in France was closed by the Treaty of Montpellier, there was extreme danger that the Protestant religion would be virtually annihilated.

Danger of the Protestant cause.

It was at this crisis that Richelieu appears on the scene. Under his influence a great League was formed, embracing Holland, Denmark, Venice and Savoy. To this League England was added, the price of its adherence being the French match. The parts the different nations had to play were accurately marked out. To England was given the war upon the sea coasts; to Holland, India; to Venice and Savoy, Italy; to the Northern Protestants, Germany; while Richelieu kept for himself the Valteline, a little strip of country terminating at the northern end of the Lake of Como, which formed the only road between the Austrian dominions north and south of the Alps, and the possession of which would go far to paralyze the power of that house. Of all this vast plan the French part alone took effect. Satisfied with the possession of the Valteline, and with the blow he had thus dealt to the Austrians, Richelieu suddenly concluded the Treaty of Monçon in 1626. Already, in the preceding year, Christian IV. of Denmark had undertaken the defence of the Northern German Protestants, and in 1626 suffered a disastrous and final defeat at the hands of Tilly at the battle of Lutter. It was the Protestants themselves who were chiefly to blame for the sudden collapse of Richelieu's plan. Absolutely careless of political considerations, and thinking only of their own selfish interests, the French Huguenots, who were closely connected with the great turbulent French nobles, had taken the opportunity of foreign war to renew their insurrection. The eyes of Richelieu were open to the fact that unity at home was necessary for powerful action abroad.

Richelieu forms
the League.

Treaty of Monçon.

It was just while Richelieu was making his great League, and seeking, as has been said, the co-operation of England, that the French match had been entered into. To the English it had first appeared a pledge of a consistent Protestant policy. But no such idea existed in the minds of either Charles or Buckingham; with them it was a mere whim, an act of spiteful insult to the Spanish Court, and nothing more. To Richelieu it was a political bargain without reference to religion. Its true character was soon displayed, and the disappointment of the English was proportionate to their hopes. It was soon known that the terms of the marriage-treaty were almost identical with those of the proposed Spanish marriage, and at least equally favourable to the Roman Catholics. The consummation of the marriage therefore, accompanied with the installation in the palace of the whole apparatus of Roman Catholic worship, dealt a heavy blow to Buckingham's new-born popularity, and excited the jealousy of the Protestants, which was still further augmented by an evident tendency towards toleration on the part of the Court. Again, not only had favour been shown to the Catholics, as an instance of which may be mentioned the pardoning of twenty priests, but the tone of the Court had become Arminian. Though the point at issue between Arminius and Gomar, his opponent in Holland, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, was of a very abstruse nature, and not calculated in itself to produce much practical result, the Calvinistic Puritans of England held, and held rightly, that the attack of Arminius upon their doctrine of absolute predestination would soon lead to other deviations from their doctrine and discipline. As a fact, in England the Arminians were much less bitter against the Roman Catholics, admitting that, but for the temporal claims of the Pope, there was but little to separate them. They were also admirers of the more pompous and showy worship of the English Church, and, to crown all, in most cases, strong upholders of the Divine right of kings. An instance of these tendencies had lately been given by Dr. Montague, one of the royal chaplains, in a tract called "An Appeal to Cæsar."

At the same time, Buckingham was the object of a strong opposition in the Council. Bristol had felt keenly the Duke's conduct to him with regard to the Spanish match, and a large party of the Lords, headed by the Earl of Pembroke, joined in his feelings of enmity towards him. The popularity therefore of Buckingham and the King had almost disappeared before the first Parliament, which assembled on June 18, came together. The Commons already felt considerable mistrust of the honesty of the Court and of their change of policy—a mistrust which the slowness with which the preparations for the promised war with Spain had been carried on tended to increase. This mistrust at once showed itself in an attack upon the Arminian writings of Montague, backed by a petition for the more stringent execution of the laws against recusants, and assumed a still more formidable shape when the King's demands for supplies came before the House. The Commons were told that, besides the heavy debts of the late King, large

Unpopularity
of the French match.

Arminian character of the Court religion.

Dislike of Buckingham.

First
Parliament,
June 18.

subsidies had been promised to the German Protestants, and a sum but little short of £1,000,000 was demanded from them. They only granted two subsidies,¹ which would amount to perhaps £150,000, and even went so far as to grant, for one year only, tonnage and poundage² (which, ever since Henry VI., had been granted for the King's life). The King was unwilling to receive it with this limitation, the proposition was therefore thrown out in the Lords, and the grant was not made at all. The King attempted to take the case of Montague into his own hands; and this matter and the grant of tonnage and poundage were still under discussion when an outbreak of the plague compelled the Parliament to adjourn to Oxford.

During the recess, an event happened which much increased the bitterness of the opposition. It seemed to change the indefinite suspicions which had existed, as to the purely political character of the French alliance, into a certainty. This event was the loan of eight ships to Richelieu to assist him in reducing La Rochelle, the stronghold of the French Protestants. Charles and Buckingham were indeed in an awkward position. To secure the match with France, they had promised to lend these ships to be used against any enemy of the Crown of France except the King of England, and they now found themselves compelled to risk their popularity by allowing them to serve against the Huguenots. They used their best efforts to put off the evil day, and it was not till news arrived that a peace had been made between Louis and the Protestants, that peremptory orders were issued to the English captains to surrender their ships. The anger of the crews was so great that they deserted, and the ships had to be manned by French soldiers. Great was the dismay of the King and Buckingham when they heard that the negotiations between Louis and his subjects had come to an end, and that the ships would after all be used against La Rochelle. It was thus after a complete failure of their policy, and with all the odium attaching to this unpopular act, that they had to meet the Parliament at its next session, which proved even more stormy than the

¹ A subsidy was 4s. on the pound on real property, and 2s. 8d. on the personal estates of £3 and upwards. Aliens and Popish recusants paid double this sum.

² Customs were the duties levied upon the staple commodities—wool, sheepskin, leather, and tin; these duties were granted in 3rd Edward I.; also duties upon woollen cloth, granted 21st Edward III. Tonnage and poundage was a tax varying from 1s. 6d. to 3s. upon every tun of wine or beer, and from 6d. to 1s. on every pound of merchandize imported or exported, except on the staple commodities. It was granted sometimes for a term of years, sometimes for life. It was originally given in 47th Edward III. Tonnage and poundage at this time was farmed for about £160,000 a year.

Loan of ships to Richelieu.

preceding one. Discontented with the amount which had been granted, Charles asked for two subsidies and two-fifteenths more. His demand was met by a renewed petition against the Catholics, with an implied charge of insincerity against the King, who since the last occasion had granted a pardon to eleven Papists; and the debates were directed so plainly against Buckingham, charging him with maladministration of the war, and with the loan of the French ships, that the King thought it necessary to order the Duke to make an explanation of his conduct before the two Houses. In his explanation Buckingham seemed to imply that the King would be satisfied with a new grant of £40,000.

Parliament
dissolved.
Aug. 12.

But when it became evident, after several attempts to hurry supplies, that even the small sum thus demanded would not be granted till grievances were redressed, Charles thought it better to dissolve the Parliament.

The temper of the Parliament had been clearly shown in the last session. The King and Buckingham could not but see that a distinct and successful Protestant policy was the only thing that could render

In hope of popularity, a fleet sent to Cadiz.

the Government tolerable to the nation. They resolved to strike a great blow for popularity. The expedition, the slowness and uncertainty of which had been one of the charges against Buckingham, was hastened forward. At the same time orders were given to disarm Popish recusants; and when the destination of the fleet was made public, it was found to be Cadiz. A grand attack was to be made upon Spain. But the same want of wisdom which pursued Charles through his life was already visible. These measures, in themselves popular, were rendered hateful by the way in which they were carried out. The necessary money was collected by the arbitrary and illegal use of demands under the Privy Seal; and when completed the fleet was intrusted, not to a trustworthy and popular officer, but, upon no grounds except favour, to Sir Edward Cecil, now Lord Wimbledon, a man universally acknowledged

Its complete failure.

as unfit for the work. The consequence was a disastrous failure. Cadiz was reached, but the shipping, which might have been destroyed, was left unharmed, and the drunkenness of many of the men induced the commanders to re-embark the army in haste after the capture of one unimportant fort. The main object of the expedition had thus failed; but it was still possible to intercept the Plate fleet from the West Indies. By some carelessness it was suffered to pass unobserved, and after twenty days of futile watching, a fierce contagious disease compelled the fleet to return to England (Dec. 8), having done absolutely nothing.

The King had promised to summon a new Parliament quickly, and the state of the finances rendered the step necessary.

Second
Parliament
Feb. 6, 1626.

On the 6th of February 1626, the second Parliament met. It was in no good temper, and the foolish means taken by the King to weaken the opposition were not likely to soothe it. When the list of those gentlemen who were fitted for the office of Sheriff was presented to him according to custom, he pricked¹ off the names of those who had been the leaders of the opposition in the last Parliament, including Sir Edward Coke and Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Lord Strafford. As the office of Sheriff prevented its holder from sitting in Parliament, he thought thus to rid himself of his chief enemies. Coke indeed disputed this view of the Sheriff's duties, and was elected for another county; but neither he, nor any of the other Sheriffs, appear to have sat in Parliament.² The Parliament at once proceeded to appoint three great Committees—one for Religion, one for Grievances, and the third for Evils and their remedies. ^{Appoints three Committees.} It was again against Montague that the Committee on Religion was pointed, and the King, finding himself unable to protect his chaplain, allowed him to be proceeded against and punished by the Commons. The Committee of Grievances found no difficulty in drawing up a formidable list. At the head stood illegal taxation. The expenses of Government had formerly, they said, been met by regular taxes granted by Parliament, by subsidies and fifteenths, by tonnage and poundage, by customs, according to a rate fixed from time immemorial, and by an occasional loan. But now, loans were raised arbitrarily under the Privy Seal; tonnage and poundage was collected, although not granted by Parliament; the customs were largely increased according to a new book of rates established by James I.; while the money thus illegally collected was wasted by the bad management of the Council of War, and produced nothing but loss of honour.

Meanwhile, the King was waiting anxiously for his supplies. His spokesman in the House said, "His Majesty desires me to tell you he wishes to know, without further delaying of time, ^{Charles's irritating speeches.} what supplies you will give for his present occasion." The answer he received was a list of grievances to be remedied. The King replied in anger, "I will be willing to hear your grievances, as my predecessors have been, so that you will apply yourselves to redress grievances, and not to inquire after grievances. I must let you know that I will not let any of my servants be questioned by you; much less such as are of eminent place and near to me. I see you specially aim at the Duke of Buckingham. I would you would hasten for my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves, for if any ill happen I think I shall be the last to feel it." This threat produced the very thing it was intended to avoid. Dr. Turner rose and proposed six questions, aimed against the mismanagement of the Duke, and resting upon common fame. It was questioned whether common fame was ground sufficient for a charge, but the great lawyers, especially Selden, held that no other evidence was possible in settling the preliminary question whether an impeachment of Buckingham was desirable. Upon this the Commons determined upon the impeachment, and resolved to "proceed to the great affair of Buckingham, morning and afternoon, till it was done, to the end that they might proceed to consider his Majesty's demand for supply." The threatened assault was met by Buckingham by a counter attack on the Earl of Bristol, whom he knew would be the chief witness against him.

¹ The King completes the election of Sheriffs by pricking the parchment opposite the names of the gentlemen eligible for the office.

² Rushworth gives a speech of Sir T. Wentworth in this Parliament; he must have confused Sir Thomas Wentworth and Mr. Wentworth.

Again the folly of the King ruined his hopes of success. The Lords, before whom the trial must ultimately come on, might have been supposed well affected to the King. He had taken measures to make them his enemies. Not only had he, from the moment of Bristol's arrival in England, kept him in confinement, he had also refused to send him his usual writ of summons to this Parliament. Of this Bristol had complained. The writ had then been sent, accompanied by a private letter, forbidding his attendance. The whole correspondence was placed before the House. Again, for some private matter, the King had issued his own warrant, and imprisoned Arundel, the Earl Marshal, an avowed enemy of Buckingham, and the holder of no less than six proxies in the House. The Lords had voted this a breach of privilege, and, after a quarrel of three months, obliged the King to restore the Earl to liberty.

With its dignity thus offended, the House was not inclined to listen to Charles's representations on behalf of his favourite. It ruled that the charge against Buckingham should be first heard, and then that against Bristol, and also permitted Bristol to be heard by counsel, which the King had refused to allow. On the 8th of May the impeachment took place. The chief speakers on the side of the Commons were Sir Dudley Digges and

Impeachment of Buckingham.
Charges against Buckingham.

Sir John Elliot. The charges were, that Buckingham had mismanaged the revenue, bought and sold offices, lent ships to France to the detriment of the Protestant religion, and finally had poisoned the late King. The last charge was entirely frivolous, and, as it threw an implied blame upon Charles, marks the extreme animosity felt by the Commons. The speeches of Sir Dudley Digges and Sir John Elliot, the latter of whom compared Buckingham to Sejanus, so enraged the King, that he at once apprehended them. Buckingham replied to the charge, and the Commons were preparing a rejoinder, when the King, after again trying to procure supplies by threats, determined at all events to save his favourite, and in spite of the remonstrances of the House of Lords, dissolved Parliament. He did not succeed in doing this quickly enough to prevent the Commons from drawing up a Remonstrance, so vigorous, that the King thought it necessary to have it publicly burnt.

Parliament
dissolved to save him.
June 15.

Two unsuccessful attempts at managing the Parliament made the King determined to try what he could do without one. From June 1626 to March 1628 the attempt was made. The conduct of public affairs during this interval was such as to supply the third Parliament, when it assembled, with a plentiful list of grievances. Money was an absolute necessity, and though the last Parliament had promised the King two subsidies and three-fifteenths, the promise was only provisional, and the grant never completed. All sorts of illegal means had therefore to be employed. Tonnage and poundage was collected under the Great Seal. Roman Catholic recusants were by law bound to pay monthly fines; in practice these had often been remitted; commissioners were now appointed to make arrangements with them, not exacting their fines to the full, but compounding for some immediate payment. From the City of London £150,000 was peremptorily demanded as a loan, and all the seaports in the country were ordered to supply ships. It was in vain that they pleaded precedents. They were met with the reply that they need not look for precedents, "the one precedent was obedience." Writs under the Privy Seal were largely issued for loans, and the soldiers and trainbands were called out and inspected, and billeted on the inhabitants. They were nominally under strict martial law, practically they pillaged mercilessly.

Money obtained by illegal means.

All this was done under the specious pretext that it was absolutely necessary to secure the country from an invasion. There were certainly no signs of any such invasion, but it was urged that the weakness shown by the ill success of the under the pretext of an invasion.

expedition to Cadiz could not but excite the Spaniards to reprisals. Another opportunity for still more extended operations shortly presented itself. Upon the defeat of the King of Denmark at the battle of Lutter (August 1626), a general loan was ordered. It was at the rate of cent. per cent. on landed property, though somewhat less upon goods. The instructions given to the judges upon whom the duty of collecting this loan devolved show the spirit in which it was levied. They were directed to choose their first victims from among those most likely to be frightened into paying; never to address themselves to bodies of men, to whom numbers might give courage, but to deal separately with each individual, and to send up to the Council the names of all those who refused to lend. It would seem plain, from this gathering of troops and money, that the idea had already entered into the minds of the King and his Court of ruling altogether without Parliament. This is rendered almost certain by the enlistment of a considerable body of German horse.

Attempt to govern without Parliament.

Nor were other signs wanting of the arbitrary tendencies of the Government. The Arminian and High Church clergy began to speak quite openly. In the course of 1627, sermons were preached advocating the absolute prerogative of the King in the plainest language. Thus Dr. Sibthorpe, preaching on the text "Render therefore to all their dues," asserted that "the Prince doth whatsoever pleaseth him. If princes command anything which subjects may not perform because it is against the laws of God or nature, or impossible, yet subjects are bound to undergo the punishment without either resistance or railing, and so to yield a passive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one." This Sibthorpe was the cause of the disgrace of two important clergymen. He brought information against Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, for allowing Puritans in his diocese; and Abbot, the Archbishop, fell into disfavour for refusing to license the sermon above quoted, a duty which Laud, at that time Bishop of Bath and Wells, and who was now rising in importance, performed for him.

Dr. Manwaring's sermon.

Again, Dr. Manwaring preached that "the King is not bound to observe the laws of the realm concerning the subject's rights and liberties, but that his royal will and command in imposing loans and taxes without common consent in Parliament doth oblige the subject's conscience on pain of eternal damnation." No wonder such doctrines as these from the pulpit excited uneasiness. Nor was the dread of the reintroduction of Catholicism so absurd as it now seems. A reaction had set in throughout Europe, supported by the great successes of the imperial arms under Wallenstein and Tilly. In every instance that reaction had sprung from very small beginnings, and been carried out by the Jesuits. There was every appearance of the same process having been begun in England. The Queen's chapels were constantly crowded. It was becoming a fashionable thing to attend mass there. It seemed by no means improbable, especially in the presence of the growing High Church tendencies of the clergy, that the same success would attend the efforts of the Jesuits in England as abroad. On this point, however, we may fairly acquit Charles. He loved the High Church chiefly because it supported his prerogative, but he was firmly attached to the Church of England. At this very time he refused all applications for the increase of church room for the Catholics. "If the Queen's chapel was not big enough, she might hold her service in the hall. If the hall was not big enough, there was the park."

Danger of a Catholic reaction.

However, illegal taxation, the gathering of armed men, the apparent growth of Catholicism, and the open assertion of the doctrine of passive obedience, excited grave discontent. These discontents were brought to a head by the imprisonment of many important gentlemen who refused to pay the loan. The King was much incensed at their refusal. "None dare," we are told, "move the King on behalf of any gentleman refuser, for his heart is so inflamed in this business that he vows a perpetual remembrance as well as present punishment." The gentry who were apprehended were confined, some of them to certain districts, and others distributed among the prisons. The poorer class were ordered to assemble in London, and were thrust into the army.

Discontent increases.

The King's imprisonment of those who refused to pay the loan.

Five of the imprisoned gentlemen, Corbett, Darnell, Earle, Edward Hampden, and Heveningham, demanded a writ of Habeas Corpus. This is a writ directed to the gaoler, ordering him to produce his prisoner for trial, and to state the cause of his detention. On this occasion, the return made to the writ stated no cause of imprisonment, alleging that the prisoners were detained by special command of the King, signified by warrant of the Privy Council. Upon this return the prisoners were produced, and the legality of their detention argued. The point at issue was a very important one. The right of every man to be tried when detained in prison rests on the 29th section of the Magna Charta: "No free man shall be taken and imprisoned unless by lawful judgment of his peers, or its legality questioned.

the law of the land." This enactment had been frequently overruled by the King's Council, which claimed extraordinary powers, a grievance which was provided against in the 25th of Edward III.: "No one shall be taken by petition or suggestion to the King, unless it be by indictment or presentment, or by writ original at the common law." It seems, however, to have been unquestioned that the Privy Council were allowed to commit a man to prison, and the real point to be decided was, Were they not, like any other magistrate, bound to show cause for such committal? To this it was replied that these prisoners were committed by special command of the King, and that that altered the case. All old precedents led to the belief that it was impossible for the King to supersede law, yet the decision of the judges was in favour of the Crown. The authority on which the Chief-Justice, Sir Nicholas Hyde, rested, was a petition or declaration of the judges in the thirty-fourth year of Elizabeth, addressed to Hatton and Cecil, which seemed to imply that if the committal were made at the King's special command the ordinary course of law was overruled: "We think that if any person shall be committed by her Majesty's special commandment or by order from the Council Board, is good cause for the same Court (the King's Bench) to leave the said person in custody." The sentence being ungrammatical, is not very clear, but such as it is it formed the chief basis of a judgment which virtually annihilated one of the most important clauses of the great Charter.

While this great trial was pending, the money and troops which the King had collected had been employed. The expedition directed against a new enemy had been as disastrous as its predecessor. Not content with having a war with Spain upon his hands, as well as his domestic difficulties, Charles had plunged into a war with France, and sent a great armament against the Isle of Rhé.

The junction between France and England had been a mere whim of Charles and Buckingham, but they had found that the hopes it held out of a Protestant policy had brought them popularity. Unable to understand the great views of Richelieu, the necessity under which he was of establishing domestic unity, and the importance to the general cause of Protestantism of united action, and bent solely upon the acquisition of popularity at home, the King and his Minister had been rapidly estranged from the French Court. The Treaty of Monçon, which appeared to them a desertion, gave the first blow to their friendship. Disappointed for the Crown.

Judges decide

War with France.

Charles's reasons for helping the Huguenots.

at the failure of the negotiations between Louis and the Protestants, which they had been mainly instrumental in setting on foot, and vexed at finding themselves after all compelled to bear the unpopularity which attended the loan of the ships, Charles and Buckingham had lent a willing ear to the persuasions of the Huguenot envoys. They had more than once interfered in no very conciliatory manner on behalf of the Protestants; and now, believing that an open support of that party would secure their immediate popularity, did not shrink from an entire reversal of their late policy. Private reasons made them the more ready to adopt this line of action. Buckingham quarrelled with Richelieu, as he had quarrelled with Olivarez, and is said to have insulted the French by his vanity in aspiring to the love of the Queen. Charles had found his wife's household so disagreeable, so inclined to make mischief between himself and his wife, and in their ostentatious Catholicism so repulsive to the nation, that he had felt himself compelled, after several stormy scenes, to drive them ignominiously from the country. The great fleet and army therefore, which was nominally intended for an attack upon the Algerines, directed its course towards La Rochelle. No step could have been devised more injurious to the Protestant interests; it drove France and Spain for the moment to lay aside their enmity, and to join to uphold the Catholic cause. Nor had proper measures been taken for the reception of the fleet at La Rochelle. Unable to understand so sudden a change of policy on the part of England, the inhabitants at first refused admission to the fleet, and were only after much persuasion induced to assume a position of open rebellion. Meanwhile Buckingham had attempted to secure a basis of operations by conquering the Isle of Rhé. The open country was easily mastered, but Toyras, the governor, retired to the strong fortress of St. Martin, and when a blockade of eleven weeks was rendered futile by the revictualling of the fort, Buckingham found himself compelled to withdraw his troops. He re-embarked them, after a disastrous action in which he lost more than 1200 men; and this second expedition of the reign returned home with as little success as the one which had preceded it. Its arrival added fresh difficulties to the King, fresh grievances to the people. Honour forbade that the Huguenots should be thus deserted. Without money any renewed effort was impossible. It became necessary to summon a new Parliament. Meanwhile the nation felt bitterly its loss of honour, and the country groaned under the outrages of the mutinous and unpaid soldiery.

Disastrous expedition
to Rhé.

The third Parliament of the reign assembled March 17, 1628. The King did what he could to secure a favourable election. More than seventy gentry who had been imprisoned for refusing the loan were liberated. Arundel and Bristol, who had been restored to confinement after the last Parliament, with Abbot the Archbishop, whose Puritan tendencies had brought him into disgrace, were allowed to take their seats in the House of Lords. These steps were taken in vain. Many of the released prisoners were returned to the Parliament. Even in Westminster the opposition candidates were elected, and all the four members for London were men who had suffered for refusing the loan. The King's opening speech was not conciliatory. "Take not this for threatening," he said, "I scorn to threaten any but my equals." The Lord Keeper Coventry, who had succeeded Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, on his disgrace in that office, added, "His Majesty is resolved that his affairs cannot permit him to expect aid over long." Unmoved by these admonitions, the House at once proceeded to consider grievances, and following the tactics they had already adopted, they promised five subsidies, but refused to pass the Bill granting them till grievances were redressed. The first point brought forward was naturally the late trial with reference to the Habeas Corpus. The discussion was long, and frequently interrupted by messages from the Crown to hasten supply.

With an ill-judged assumption of power, the King declared there should be no Easter holidays. This was a flagrant breach of Parliamentary privileges. "This House," said Coke "always adjourns itself." A fresh message demanded that a day should be appointed for the completion of the five subsidies. Then Sir Thomas Wentworth moved, in plain words, that "grievances and supplies should go hand in hand." On this the House acted; a succession of petitions were sent up against grievances, which were ultimately incorporated in one great petition, known as the Petition of Right. The points of that petition were four, meeting the great grievances under which the nation was at that time suffering. (1) That no man be compelled to pay loan, benevolence, or tax, without consent of Parliament, or be molested or disquieted for the refusal of it. (2) That no subject should be imprisoned without cause shown. (3) That soldiers and mariners should not be billeted on the people without their will. (4) That no commission should be issued in time of peace to try subjects by martial law. It was usual, when the King gave his consent to a petition, to use the words, "Let right be done as is desired." Instead of this comprehensive formula, the King

Third
Parliament.
March 17, 1628.

The Petition of Right.
May 28.

returned a lengthened reply in the following terms: "The King willeth that right be done according to the customs and laws of the realm, and that the Statute be put in execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrongs or oppression contrary to their rights and privileges, to the preservation whereof he holds himself as well obliged as of his prerogative."

The King's
evasive answer.
June 2.

This answer appeared very unsatisfactory to the House; it was regarded as the work of Buckingham. Till that time the Duke's name had been carefully kept in the background. "All this time," said Selden, "we have cast a mantle on what was done last Parliament, but now, being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with what was then well begun." A message came from the King announcing the speedy close of the Parliament, and bidding them undertake no new business, and least of all cast aspersions on the ministers. Sir John Elliot, speaking on this point, was checked by Finch, the Speaker, a creature of the Court. The House was much excited. "Let us sit in silence," said Sir Dudley Digges; "we are miserable." The excitement rose to such a pitch that tears were freely shed. At length Sir Edward Coke spoke the feeling of the House in a direct attack upon the Duke. The Speaker begged leave to retire for half an hour; and the House, that it might speak more freely, dissolved itself into Committee. The Speaker was absent three hours in conference with the King, during which time the House gave free vent to its pent-up indignation. On his return, the Speaker announced that the King would meet the Houses on the following morning. The members separated in full expectation of a sudden dissolution, but the Speaker seems to have made the King clearly understand the determined feeling of the House, and when Charles met them the following day (June 7th) he tore his evasive answer from the petition, and ordered the usual words, "Soit droit fait comme il est désiré," to be appended in its place.

Scene in the House.
June 8.

The Commons and the nation were alike triumphant at this success; their gratitude for it was at once shown by the completion of the grant of the five subsidies. But they naturally concluded that, having obtained sanction for the Petition of Right, they were at liberty to act at once upon it. They therefore proceeded to examine into those grievances which were most obviously in contravention of it. They first of all attacked and declared the illegality of a Commission, established just before the beginning of this Parliament, for examining into the possible means of raising

Triumph of the House.

money. This they regarded, not unnaturally, as an apparatus for discovering the best methods of illegal taxation. They then proceeded with their attack on Buckingham, and drew up a Remonstrance, declaring him the cause of all the evils which the Petition was to rectify. Thirdly, they asserted the illegality of the collection of tonnage and poundage in accordance with the Petition of Right. In all probability the King had really not understood these customs to be included; in the bill itself the word "imposition," which would have been the natural one to use for such a tax, had been omitted, and it is almost impossible not to regard this claim on the part of the Commons as an attempt to force on the King indirectly a new limitation of his power. They were still engaged in their remonstrance on this head, when the King, disgusted with the slight advantages his concessions had gained him, fearing for his favourite, and determined not to lose the tonnage and poundage, suddenly prorogued the House. This he did in a speech, putting his own interpretation on the Petition of Right, and concluding with the words: "That as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot be without, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure, to grant." The Parliament would not admit this interpretation of the Petition, they held that there was no ground for distinguishing tonnage and poundage from other sources of the revenue. It has been usual to assert that Charles's real intention was made clear the next day, when he stopped the printer, who had already struck off copies of the Petition and answer, and caused the first evasive answer to be reappended in the printed forms. In fact, however, he had both answers printed side by side, most probably with the intention of showing that their meaning was the same, though the expressions were different.

The Parliament was to reassemble in January 1629. In the interval affairs of considerable importance had taken place. In the first place, the Duke of Buckingham, the man whom the Commons had regarded as the cause of all evil, and who had kept their anger from falling direct upon the King, was assassinated. It had been thought necessary to continue the war-like attempts of the preceding year. An army was collected to relieve La Rochelle, against which the whole strength of the French kingdom, under the immediate orders of Richelieu, was now directed. Buckingham was to take charge of the expedition in person, to remove if possible the bad effects of his disaster. Preparations were being hurried on at Portsmouth, and the Duke was personally prorogued.

Parliament
June 26.

Assassination of Buckingham.
Aug. 23.

superintending them, when, as he was conversing with some of his subordinates, he was stabbed to the heart by Felton, who had served as a lieutenant in the expedition to the Isle of Rhé. The murderer declared that he had no accomplices, and was inspired solely by patriotic and religious zeal. It was indeed impossible but that the assaults upon Buckingham in Parliament should have produced an effect upon the popular mind. Already, before the adjournment, Dr. Lamb, the Duke's physician, had been murdered in London. Placards had been posted in the streets, asking "Who rules the Kingdom?—The King. Who rules the King?—Buckingham. Who rules Buckingham?—The Devil;" and the doggerel lines,

"Let George and Charles do what they can,
The Duke shall die like Dr. Lamb," were current in men's mouths. It was in spite of frequent warnings of the danger he would incur that the Duke had insisted on going to Portsmouth. There is no reason to disbelieve Felton's account, that it was the conviction of Buckingham's crimes that induced him to commit the murder. Buckingham had owed his elevation to his personal beauty, and to the dashing and attractive qualities he no doubt possessed. As a statesman he was absolutely inefficient. The cause of his extreme unpopularity among his contemporaries may well have been jealousy at the vast accumulation of titles and ranks which had been heaped upon him,¹ and the frivolous and overweening vanity which marked his public conduct. Graver charges, in the eyes of a student of history, are his misappreciation of the growth of popular force, and the ignorance of foreign politics, which induced him in mere caprice to plunge England into two important wars. He thus neutralized the power of both France and England, and by throwing France into alliance with Spain, in fact secured the defeat of that Protestant cause he was pretending to uphold.

On the immediate conduct of affairs in England his death produced no change. The King intended henceforward to be his own minister. Weston, lately made Lord Treasurer, hoped for a moment to secure some of the Duke's influence, but a greater man than he had now joined the Council of the King. The Court had induced several of its old opponents to throw aside their opposition. Saville and the lawyers Noy and Littleton had become devout courtiers; and ¹ He had been made Gentleman of the Bedchamber, Knight of the Garter, Lord High Admiral, Chief-Justice in Eyre, Master of the King's Bench, High Steward of Westminster, Constable of Windsor Castle, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and Warden of the Cinque Ports.

Buckingham's
character.

Wentworth, finding, it is probable, no career in what he regarded as a losing cause, had accepted a peerage, and became henceforward the mainstay of the Court. Meanwhile, the liberties of the subject, especially with regard to tonnage and poundage, were infringed as before. A man named Vassall had been imprisoned, and his goods seized, for refusing to pay extra customs, and the merchandize of Richard Chambers of London had been seized because he declined to pay tonnage and poundage. Nor had the sensitive religious jealousy of the people been left without fresh causes of irritation. Laud had been raised to the Bishopric of London, and Montague and Manwaring, though censured and condemned by Parliament, were pardoned and rewarded, the one with the Bishopric of Chichester, the other with large Church preferments. The mistrust with regard to religion had been still further increased by the discovery of a letter, among the papers of a Jesuit Society at Clerkenwell, which distinctly set forth that Arminianism was but the small end of the wedge, which the Jesuits had good hope of driving home.¹

The death of Buckingham, then, which might have softened the opposition, had had no such effect, and Parliament assembled, sore at the desertion of its leaders, at the continued disregard of the Petition of Right, and at what they regarded as a systematic effort to thwart their religious views. The violations of the Petition of Right were referred to a committee, which produced a speech from the Crown, urging the House at once to grant tonnage and poundage, and thus put an end to the matter. They chose rather to turn to their religious grievances. At the suggestion of Sir John Elliot, a general engagement was entered into to preserve the religion of the country; and the subject of the pardon of the Arminian clergy was again and again brought forward. The same spirit displayed itself with regard to the arbitrary taxes. All the instances of the neglect of the Petition of Right were brought forward; and at length Elliot made a personal assault on Laud, on Neil, Bishop of Winchester, and on the Lord Treasurer Weston. Upon the Speaker being requested to put to the vote the question before the House, he refused, saying he had received an order of adjournment from the King. Once again, after reassembling, the House was adjourned.

Finally, on the 2nd of March, the Speaker again declared that the

¹ "Now we have planted that sovereign drug Arminianism, which we hope will purge the Protestants from their heresy; and it flourisheth and bears fruit in due season."

Wentworth the mainstay of the Court.

Parliament
reassembles.
Jan. 20.

King had ordered him to adjourn the House, and refused to put the question. In expectation of what might happen, and fearing a speedy dissolution, two members of the opposition, Denzel Holles and Valentine, had placed themselves on either side of the chair, and by force held the Speaker down when he strove to leave it. A scene of considerable disturbance ensued. In spite of his tears and entreaties, the Speaker was kept in his seat till Holles had read a protest, declaring that any one who should favour or countenance Popery or Arminianism, or counsel and advise the levying of subsidies not granted by Parliament, or should voluntarily pay any such subsidy, should be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth. While this was being read, the doors were locked, to guard against interruption; nor were the expectations of the Commons mistaken, for the King was intending an immediate dissolution. He sent for the Serjeant of the House, who was however forbidden to obey. He then sent the Usher of the House of Lords with a message. He was refused admittance. Finally, the Guard was sent with orders to break open the door. The appeal to force was not necessary; the protest having been read, the House had hurriedly adjourned and dispersed. The King immediately, without summoning the Commons, dissolved Parliament.¹ The chief actors in this scene, Holles, Elliot, Selden, Valentine, and others, were at once apprehended by orders of the Council.

Parliament
dissolved.
March 10.

Holles, Elliot and Valentine, were committed close prisoners to the Tower, and their studies and papers sealed up. The conduct of the King throughout this session leads to the supposition that he had little hope of establishing amicable relations with Parliament. At all events the effort was now over. He was determined to rule without one. The false notion of the Stuarts with regard to the position of the sovereign in England, and their favourite theory of Divine right, had produced the natural result. Popular sovereignty was at an end, an undisguised arbitrary government had taken its place.

Clarendon asserts of this time, that it was one of such order and prosperity, that England was the envy of foreign countries; but on more than one occasion he suffers to escape him a list of evils which much modifies the assertion. In fact, it is probable that, as is frequently the case with despotic governments, Government without Parliaments, commerce was protected, wealth was acquired, and an external show of prosperity was the result. But the Government was such, that beneath the outward calm, violent passions and universal

Government
without Parliaments.

¹ The Proclamation of Dissolution, signed March 2, was issued March 10.

discontent were concealed; and this discontent was excited not only in England, but in the kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland also. In the absence of the Parliament, by which alone money can be legally granted, the great difficulty which must beset a government is the collection of revenue. For this purpose Charles had recourse to means all illegal, or at all events touching the verge of illegality, and all of them onerous. He at first proceeded on the assumption that the subsidy promised, but not completed, was fairly his. It was raised with the greatest severity throughout the country. He next revived obsolete laws, from which he hoped to derive revenue, and for this purpose he caused an examination of the boundaries of the forests. Grants, and the growth of cultivation, had undoubtedly much diminished the old extent of the forests. The object of the examination was to restore to the Crown all that had been separated from them, or at least to compel the present owners to pay heavy fines or large annual rents for what they held. It is said that the jurors in such cases were men living in the forest purlieus, and consequently open to undue influences, and liable to give unjust verdicts. Two or three instances will explain the importance of this measure. A correspondent, in 1635, writes to the Lord-Deputy of Ireland that "all Essex has become forest, and so they say will all the counties of England but three—Kent, Surrey, and Sussex." Lord Southampton, who held part of the New Forest, found his income likely to be changed from £2500 to £500. The bounds of Rockingham Forest were increased from six to sixty miles; and holders of grants in it from Queen Elizabeth were fined sums varying from £20,000 to £3000. In the same way Charles revived the old law of knighthood. All £40 holders who had not taken up their knighthood were fined, and as the change in the value of money rendered many men of that class wholly unfit for the rank of knighthood, they preferred being fined to taking the title. £100,000 is said to have been thus collected. The Statute of the 31st Elizabeth, passed with the intention of checking the extension of large holdings, had forbidden the erection of cottages on less than four acres of land. The execution of this law is said by a contemporary "to vex the poor mightily, it is far more burdensome than the ship-money." All sorts of matters beyond the cognizance of common law, such as quarrels, or speaking ill of the Government, were brought before the Star Chamber, and enormous and exorbitant fines exacted. No less than £6,000,000 is said to have been raised by fines during this period. The severity of these fines, and the trivial grounds on which they were exacted, is shown schemes.

Financial

by the fact, that Lord Morley was on one occasion fined no less than £20,000; while we find Strafford urging that Sir David Fowles and his son should be fined £2000 apiece to the King, and £2000 to himself, for having said that he, Strafford, was no more accounted of at Court than an ordinary man. In addition to these, the King found means to raise large sums of money by the establishment and sale of monopolies. Scarcely anything even of the most common use was exempted from this indirect form of taxation. Coal, salt, iron, soap, leather, tobacco, beer, butter, linen, hops, and buttons, were all in the hands of monopolists. The patents were usually granted to companies, who paid largely for them. Thus the patentees for a new soap, which experience proved to be very bad, agreed to pay £30,000 for two years, and £40,000 for ever after.

But these were after all temporary and extraordinary means. A fixed revenue was desirable, and a plan was devised by the renegade lawyer Noy, in 1634, for supplying this want. This was the famous ship-money, by which the counties were called upon to supply shipping, nominally for the defence of the country. It was at first inflicted on the maritime parts of the kingdom only; and the excuses that were alleged were the incursions of the Algerine pirates and the naval supremacy of the Dutch. From the first it was very unpopular. "I had rather," writes Garrard, the same correspondent of the Lord Deputy that has been before mentioned, "give ten subsidies in Parliament than this old new plan of Noy's." Subsequently, by the advice of Finch, Speaker of the third Parliament, and afterwards Chief-Justice, it was extended to all the counties. "When the whole kingdom was in danger," he said, "the whole charge ought to be maintained by all the subjects of the realm." It amounted to about £220,000 a year, and was at first employed according to its original intention. A large English fleet was kept in the narrow seas, with orders to assert the supremacy of the national flag. But the principle was so obviously capable of extension that Strafford said of it: "Let the King only abstain from war for three years, that he may habituate his subjects to the payment of this tax, and in the end he will find himself more powerful and respected than any of his predecessors." It is not to be supposed that so large a measure as this could be carried out without opposition, although Finch, a well-known and subservient instrument of the Court, had been made Chief-Justice for the express purpose of giving his judgment in favour of it, and had succeeded in persuading his fellow Judges to join him for that purpose. It was a gentleman of the name of John Hampden who undertook to bring the question of the legality of ship-money before the courts of law. Hampden's opposition to it. The trial was as important as the preceding one on the Habeas Corpus. In that the personal freedom of all Englishmen was at stake, in this nothing less than the possibility of the establishment of a non-parliamentary rule. The issue was tried on a small point. In 1637, John Hampden, a Buckinghamshire gentleman, was assessed at twenty shillings for his property in Stoke Mandeville. On his refusing to pay, the question was tried before all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber. For six days the argument continued—Banks and Littleton were counsels for the Crown; Oliver St. John for Hampden. The chief points relied on by Hampden's counsel were, that the precedents were not applicable, that the necessity was not urgent, and that the imposition of the tax was in distinct opposition not only to the old statutes, but to the Petition of Right. But the Judges, with Finch at their head, were creatures of the Court. Their judgments were couched in the strongest language in favour of the prerogative. "No Act of Parliament," said Finch, "can bar the King of his regality. Acts of Parliament to take away his royal power in defence of his kingdom are void, or Acts to bind the King not to command the subjects, their persons, their property, and, I say, their money too, for no Acts of Parliament make any difference." Importance of the decision to the Crown. Seven of the Judges gave their judgments in favour of the Crown, five in favour of Hampden, but of these, two only, Hutton and Crook, upon the merits of the case. The judgment seemed to make the King's position unassailable.

Ship-money.
1634.

If illegal oppression, for a moment triumphant, was producing a vast amount of suppressed discontent, the action of the High Church party was even more disastrous. Unpopular action of the Church. The principle of popular sovereignty, which lay at the bottom of both their creeds, closely united the patriotic party with the Puritans, and forced into strict alliance the upholders of high prerogative and the High Church. As the King's chief adviser in secular matters was Wentworth, though he was generally absent from England, so in Church matters was Laud, and they were both devoted to a plan of action which they called by the name of "Thorough," and which consisted in suppressing, with a strong hand and immediately, all attempts to question their authority. There were many things which excited the fears of the Puritans. Arminianism had become the Court religion. Laud was known to look with no great dislike upon the religion of Rome; and a plan of reconciliation with that Church had been formed. A Cardinal's hat had been demanded from Rome; it was at first believed for Laud himself, but as subsequently appeared for a Papal agent of the name of Conn. An accredited agent from the Roman Court was accepted in London; and a considerable number both of courtiers and Bishops had expressed to him their willingness to accept some scheme of comprehension. Moreover, the Court of High Commission had rendered itself disagreeable by intermeddling in private morality, and by the infliction of exorbitant fines, backed up by the authority of the Star Chamber. Laud, too, was evidently aiming at restoring the Church to something of its old political importance. He was himself in fact Prime Minister, and introduced Juxon, Bishop of London, to the Council, in the position of Lord-Treasurer.

Popular dislike to this conduct showed itself in four notable instances. In 1630, a clergyman of the name of Leighton Four instances of opposition. had written a book called "Sion's Plea against Prelacy," full of strong language against the Bishops and against the Queen. At Laud's instigation he was brought before the Star Chamber, fined £10,000, whipped, pilloried, branded, slit in the nostrils, and imprisoned for life. Prynne, a lawyer, had, in 1632, published a work against stage-plays called "Histrio-Mastix," which was held to reflect upon the conduct of the Queen in taking part in the Court masks. He also was Star-Chambered, fined heavily, deprived of his ears, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. From his prison he continued to write, and published a work called "News from Ipswich," in which the Bishops are spoken of by the somewhat scurrilous title of "Luciferian Lords." John Bastwick, a fellow-prisoner, followed his example in a book called "Elenchus Papismi." Henry Burton also produced his "Apology." The language of all these books is undoubtedly strong. With one the Bishops are like "devils in surplises," with another "dumb dogs, antichristian mushrooms, and limbs of the Beast;" but the punishment of the writers was scarcely proportionate to their offence. They were brought before the Star Chamber, and, besides being fined and cropped, were imprisoned for life beyond the limits of England; Bastwick in the Scilly Isles, Burton and Prynne in the Channel Islands. It might have shown the Government something of the hidden feeling of the country, that not less than 100,000 people are said to have lined the roads to watch their departure, as though it were a triumph.

The chief machinery on which the upholders of the "Thorough" system relied was the Star Chamber and the venal courts of law. How the Judges acted has been mentioned with regard to the ship-money. The Star Chamber was in fact the Privy Council acting in its judicial capacity. Historically the lineal descendant of the old "Concilium ordinarium" of the Plantagenets, its power, as a judicial body, had been reconstituted by Wolsey for the purpose of taking cognizance of failures of justice, or of illegal acts on the part of men too important to be safely left to the action of common law. This undefined authority the Council had now increased, till, as has been seen, nearly any speech or action, by which the authority of Government was questioned, was brought within its cognizance, to the total subversion of that personal freedom which the common law secures.

While thus, under a show of successful and even prosperous despotism, the seeds of the bitterest discontent were being sown in England, the same process was going on both in Ireland and Scotland. Wentworth, shortly after his desertion of the popular cause, had been appointed President of the Council of the North, a Council originally established in 1536, after the great Northern insurrection. Under Wentworth it was re-organized into an arbitrary court upon the model of the Star Chamber, with a right of staying proceedings at common law by injunction, and of apprehending persons by its serjeant in any part of the realm. In 1633, Wentworth was able to extend his arbitrary rule still further. In that year he was made Lord-Deputy of Ireland, without resigning his position in the North.

On the accession of James I. all the bygone treasons of the Irish were for the moment forgiven. O'Donnell, one of the rebel chiefs, was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and O'Neil reinstated in his position. Gentleness was mistaken for cowardice, and Tyrconnel and O'Neil were soon again conspiring against England. The failure of their conspiracy and their flight from the country allowed their property to be confiscated to the Crown, and a large part of Ulster, including Derry, Tyrone, Cavan, and Armagh, fell into the hands of the Crown—in all some 2,000,000 acres. Three quarters of the worst land was restored to the Irish, the rest was retained for systematic colonization. There was no difficulty in finding volunteers, mostly of Puritan opinions, who were willing to submit to the conditions imposed upon the intending colonists. The effect was extraordinary; the decaying trade revived; new industries were opened, especially the manufacture of linen, the breeding of cattle, and the growing of wool. In this prosperity the industrious Irish shared; all diversities of race were, as far as possible, destroyed.

The Star Chamber.

Wentworth President of the North and Lord-Deputy.

Colonization of Ulster. 1608.

There was, however, a large population of dispossessed landowners, who lived a life of idleness and disturbance, and against whom Acts of Parliament had to be passed. These formed a dangerous class, and the policy of England would have been to unite all the Protestant interests of the country to oppose it. Unfortunately there were two classes of Protestants, the one consisting of the Scotch colonists in the North, and many of the new settlers who were Puritans, and the other of those English who had passed over in Elizabeth's time, and who were drawn from a higher class, to whom Puritanism was hateful. Of course, to Laud and to Charles it appeared necessary, before all things, that this party should be raised to prominence, and the Northern Puritans suppressed. It was felt, too, that Ireland might supply troops, which, in case of difficulty, might help to suppress any Puritan movement in England. To carry out these views, Wentworth assumed the viceroyalty. His first measures were directed towards allaying the discontent which the Government of the last few years had caused, and which bade fair to neutralize all the advantages gained in the preceding reign.

The old Irish difficulties were reviving in all their vehemence, and Papists, Churchmen, and Puritans were on the verge of open fighting. The army had almost disappeared, 1350 foot and 200 horse were all that remained, and these consisted chiefly of substitutes, receiving about a fourth of their nominal pay, their officers (for the most part Privy Councillors) appropriating the remainder. A more efficient army was absolutely necessary. The country was put under the government of Lord Falkland. But the only way of supporting the new army was by putting it at free quarters. Driven to despair by this project, the Irish offered to pay a large voluntary contribution, £100,000, at the rate of £10,000 a quarter, if they could get certain concessions or graces granted. The list of these graces explains from what they suffered. They desired relief from illegal taxation by the courts, from illegal payments to the soldiery, from illegal monopolies, from the religious penal statutes, and from the constant inquiry into titles, which was a fruitful source of revenue, but which rendered every man's property insecure. All this was to be ratified by an Irish Parliament. But Falkland unfortunately issued the writs for that Parliament without attention to the requirements of Poyning's Law. Consequently the Parliament was declared null. Still the Catholics, believing that the relief contained in the graces would be given them, began openly to declare their rights, and to establish a Roman Catholic seminary. When Falkland issued a proclamation against their proceedings, the Catholics, full of anger, joined the Protestants in demanding the promised graces, and in refusing to pay the voluntary contribution till they were conceded. His government having proved a failure, Falkland withdrew to England. For a few months the government by Lords-Justices made things worse. Voluntary contribution was threatening to cease altogether.

Falkland's government. 1628.

The sole hope now lay in Wentworth. He at once changed the character of the government. He wrote to prohibit the action of the justices, and when they declared that the legal fine of a shilling a Sunday upon all recusants was the only visible resource left, he declared himself against it, as destroying the whole confidence of the Catholics, and asserted that he could with ease secure a new voluntary subscription. He came with almost full power. "It is impossible for me," he said, "to remedy the evils, unless I be entirely trusted and livelily assisted and countenanced by his Majesty." His views were the same as they had been in the North. In Ireland he had more scope for carrying them out. There, as in a conquered country, the King in Council had originally had the power of superseding the common law. By degrees, as civilization gathered strength, this privilege had sunk into disuse; Falkland had wholly abandoned it. But Wentworth did not intend to allow so good a means of establishing his arbitrary authority to lie dormant; whatever his words may have been, it is certain that he intended to treat Ireland again as a conquered country. "These lawyers," he writes, "would monopolize all judicature, as if no honour or justice could be rightly administered but under one of their bencher's gowns. I am sure they little understand the unsettled state of this kingdom that could advise the King to lessen the power of his Deputy. Therefore, I beseech you, assist me therein; I shall be answerable for my head." Consequently the Castle Court assumed as dominant a position as the Star Chamber or the Court of York in England. Wentworth's personal predominance secured the renewal of the voluntary grant. But he was not contented. He wanted an army to suppress opposition, the army must be paid, and the payment must not be precarious; there was no way to secure such an income but by Parliament. It was not without persuasion that he overcame Charles's dislike to such assemblies. In a most curious despatch he explained his plans, and removed his master's objections. His chief reliance was on Poynings' Law. By that law nothing could be proposed in the Irish Parliament which had not first been approved by government.

Wentworth's
1633.

the English Council. The Act was doubtless intended to place the initiative in the English Council as a safeguard against the influence of the great Irish chiefs or overweening deputies. But the letter of the law was with Wentworth; he made the best of it. "The mighty power," he said, "gotten by the wisdom of former ages must be preserved with hallowed care." It was thus he made use of it: the Parliament which was to be summoned was to be divided into two sessions—the first to be occupied entirely with matters of finance; the second, it was promised, should be given to the confirmation of the graces. The letter in which he explains his plans lays bare what is simply a monstrous trick to secure absolutism. The first session having been successful, and the money granted, in the second session, in virtue of Poynings' Law, only such graces should be introduced as the King may please. In other words, the money was to be taken and the price refused. If the Parliament refused the money, the world would approve of extreme measures, if they started aside, the general peace abroad admitted of their chastisement. But such extremes were not likely to be necessary; the Parliament was to be judiciously packed. A number of military officers were to be elected, while the remainder of the members were to be balanced equally between Catholics and Protestants. If the Catholics made objections to the supplies, the weekly shilling for recusancy was to be demanded from them; if the Protestants objected, they were to be told that the voluntary subscription must remain in force. With his usual pomp, and with the words, that "if they expected protection without contribution towards it, they looked for more than had ever been the portion of a conquered kingdom," Wentworth opened the session. His "bullying manner," he says, "answered well." Six subsidies were granted. But in the second session the Parliament found how they had been duped. Wentworth openly asserted that he had not even sent the graces to England, and, justifying himself with Poynings' Law, refused to introduce them. The Catholics made some feeble resistance, but before the close of the session Wentworth wrote, "The King is now as absolute here as any prince in the world can be, and may be still, if not spoiled on that side."

The Ulster Protestants were to be forced to become Episcopalians. High Church Bishops were sent among them, a Court of High Commission established, the Act of Uniformity universally applied, a new body of Canons passed, and Commissioners sent down to the North to secure the dismissal of Puritan ministers. The persecution was so severe that many men took refuge in the woods. The threatening position of the Roman Catholic Irish prevented the Puritans, thus persecuted, from thinking of insurrection. It was upon England alone, in some shape or other, that they could rely. Wentworth knew this when persecuting them. He felt he was secure from any effort of theirs.

He explains his plans in a letter.

Nor had he the least intention of letting Ireland fall back into its native anarchy. On the contrary, he determined to proceed with the colonization, and to settle Connaught. This country was still exclusively Irish. In order to get possession of it, Wentworth insisted on the examination of title-deeds. A vast number of the proprietors had no such deeds to show, and four-fifths of the land fell into the hands of the Crown. Wentworth's proceedings were of the most high-handed character. In spite of the King's promise, that no claim beyond sixty years should be revived, he set no limits to his inquiries; and the juries who failed to find verdicts according to his wishes fared but badly. He had thus succeeded in exciting the anger both of the Celtic Roman Catholic population and of the Puritans of the North. But he was still able, when the contest between parties was growing to a head, to take advantage of deep-set religious differences, and to array against the Puritans from Scotland an army of Roman Catholics. But when that army was subsequently disbanded on the demand of Parliament, the Puritans being hostile and the Roman Catholics estranged, there was no important party whom the King could trust, and the Great Rebellion of 1641 was the consequence.

The same ecclesiastical policy which had thus alienated the Puritans of Ireland was the chief cause of the hostility of Scotland. Charles determined to follow up the designs of his father. It will be remembered that the great difficulty that King had found in the restoration of Episcopacy was the transference which had taken place of Church property into the hands of the laity. In 1626 and 1628, Charles announced that all grants would be resumed, whether they had been given before or after the great Act of 1587. Even tithes were to be restored: "An Act which was the groundstone," says Sir John Balfour, "of all the mischief that followed it." To attempt the restoration of Church property was to touch the nobility in their tenderest point; and they thenceforward became the determined opponents of the Crown. Finally, after much disputing, the lay proprietors agreed to arbitration, and a series of private lawsuits settled the question. The tithes were

He attempts the colonization of Connaught. 1636.

Consequent discontent of natives and Puritans.

Scotland.

Church property resumed. 1628.

changed into a fixed rent charge; and these arbitrations and arrangements were ratified by the Parliament in 1633. Still there was much mistrust on the part of the laity, and they still feared, we are told, that the Church would find means, in spite of the arrangements, to get back all its property, which would amount to about a third of the kingdom.

In this same year Charles visited his Northern kingdom, and was there crowned; but, with his usual want of tact, contrived to quarrel with his Parliament. In the first place, he tampered with the election of the Lords of the Articles, as that Committee was called which prepared measures to be introduced into the Scotch Parliament. This body was very different in structure from the English Parliament. It consisted of Lords spiritual and temporal, deputies from the royal burghs, and representatives of the lesser tenants in capite; but though the voting was by order, there was no division into Houses, all orders sat together, and the vote was taken by a simple Yes or No on the measures introduced by the Lords of the Articles, no amendment being allowed. The consequence of this arrangement was to give the Lords of the Articles great influence, and they were frequently able to tack obnoxious clauses to bills which were too good to be wholly rejected; thus, on the present occasion, to a bill declaring the royal prerogative was added a clause arranging the apparel of the clergy. To make matters worse, Charles himself sat in the Parliament, and made note of those who voted against his wishes. This question of the apparel of the clergy gained more importance from the ritualistic observances of the King's Chapel, and when Laud returned to London, he issued an order that "the whites," as the clerical dress was called, should be universally worn. The whites were much hated by the Presbyterians; by some they were even regarded as an idolatrous remnant of the dress of the priests of Isis. From this time onward the efforts of Laud to assimilate the Church of Scotland with that of England were continued. He made Spottiswood of St. Andrews High Chancellor and President of the Council, and in pursuance of his plan for introducing the Church into the secular government, he obtained the admission of four other Bishops to the Council. Having become Archbishop of Canterbury, he assumed supremacy over the Scotch Church. At his orders, and without any ecclesiastical meeting, Canons were introduced. Thus arbitrarily promulgated, they were generally regarded at once as illegal and as "subjecting the nation to the discipline of a foreign Church." Thus, by the year 1636, everything had been done to excite discontent. The powers and privileges of Parliament had been tampered with by the King's presence, and in the election of the Lords of the Articles; the royal prerogative had encroached upon the freedom of the nation, by the publication of the Canons on its own authority; a forced submission to the English Church discipline had hurt the national feeling; ritualism had shocked

Charles visits Scotland, and quarrels with the Parliament. 1633.

Laud's ritualistic measures.

His illegal Canons.

Introduction of the Service Book.

the religious prejudices of the Presbyterians; the nobles had lost much of their ecclesiastical property. The introduction of the new Service Book was the spark which lighted the conflagration. Service Books had not been unknown in Scotland. Knox himself had issued one; but the use of such books was now rendered imperative; and not only were English forms introduced, but in the Communion Service changes were made which seemed to tend towards Popery. The new Service Book was to be read at Easter 1637. It was unwisely put off till July, during which time opposition grew stronger. The reading of it in St. Giles's Church in Edinburgh produced an uproar. A stool was thrown at the reader's head; the Bishop was with difficulty smuggled to his house. The opposition to the book was universal. By most of the clergy it was given up; but the Bishop of Brechin, we are told, did contrive to read the service, surrounded by his wife and servants, all armed, with locked doors. On coming out, however, he had to run for his life. The opposition took the form of supplications or petitions against the book. These were innumerable. At length a reply came to them, punishing Edinburgh by removing the Government to Linlithgow, and ordering the expulsion of all strangers. The effect of this was to make the excitement stronger. The Town Council was besieged; the Bishop of Galloway attacked; Lord Traquair, the Treasurer, hustled.

At last, so great was the disturbance, that, by the consent of all parties, an organization called The Tables was arranged. The Tables or Boards consisted of four representatives from each of the classes—nobles, lesser barons, burgesses and clergy, and being representative, it was virtually a Parliament, while the usual parliamentary balance of parties was wanting, as it consisted entirely of members of the opposition. The Tables and the Council entered into a constitutional struggle. Every proclamation of the Crown was met by a protest, which in Scotch law is held to postpone, at all events, the validity of the document against which it is directed. A game of hide and seek, ridiculous enough but for the important point at issue, was played between the Council and the Protesters, who made a point of being present with a protest whenever a proclamation was read. At length, on the advice of Hope, the King's advocate, and of Johnstone of Warriston, it was determined to renew the Covenant, which had been originally drawn up in Elizabeth's reign at the time of the Catholic crisis. The document was accepted in its old form, with all the vehement language due to the critical time in which it had been written.¹ It was first signed in the Greyfriars' churchyard, and then sent through Scotland for signatures. People crowded to the churches to accept it; some, we are told, in their excitement keeping their seats there from Friday to Sunday.

Uproars in Edinburgh.

The Tables.

*Renewal of the Covenant.
1638.*

Things had reached such a pitch that the King thought it necessary to send a High Commissioner. Hamilton, the King's cousin, was chosen. The Covenanters demanded the abolition of the Court of High Commission, of the Service Book and Canons, a free Parliament, and a General Assembly. The Commissioners required an entire renunciation of the Covenant. After a lengthened struggle, to the surprise of all men, the King suddenly surrendered. All the claims of the Covenanters were granted, and a General Assembly was summoned to meet at Glasgow, in which the Bishops were to be brought to trial. The meaning of this sudden change of policy was, that the King had determined to appeal to arms, and had desired Hamilton to gain time by any means in his power. In 1637, the outbreak of popular anger against the Service Book had occurred in Edinburgh. In April 1638 the unsuccessful issue of Hampden's appeal to law against the ship-money had been made known. In October of the same year the Tables had been organized, and the Covenant accepted by Scotland; and now, in November, the General Assembly met at Glasgow. The course of that Assembly was grand and orderly. The Tables had contrived that there should be a considerable number of lay members present in it, and these drawn from the highest ranks of the nobility. It thus became virtually, although not in name, a Parliament. It busied itself, however, as was its duty, with ecclesiastical matters. Hopes were entertained that Hamilton, the Commissioner who held it, would remain till it had completed its work, and give it a show of legality. He remained while the preliminary work was being done, but when the Assembly proceeded to its real business, and declaring itself competent to inquire into the conduct of the Bishops, prepared to hear charges against them,

Claims of the Covenanters granted to gain time.

General Assembly of 1638.

¹ See pp. 496, 534.

he withdrew, and made public declaration that the Assembly was dissolved. In spite of this, it continued its work, found all the Bishops guilty of Popish practices and immoral conduct, annulled all the Acts of preceding Assemblies from the year 1606,¹ thus abolishing the Five Articles of Perth, condemned the Service Book and the Canons, and closed its session with declaring that Episcopacy and the acceptance of the Five Articles of Perth were contrary to the Confession of Faith.

It was plain that war was inevitable, and the Tables had been engaged in preparing for it. Nor was the risk in truth very great. Scotland, with the exception of the country round Aberdeen, which was under the influence of the Marquis of Huntly and shared in the views of the Court, was united, and at this time stronger than England. The country was full of experienced soldiers, who had returned from the Thirty Years' War, and were glad to find employment in their own country, under the command of Field-Marshal Alexander Leslie, who had returned from abroad, and had been appointed commander-in-chief. An army thus organized was certain to be vastly superior to the raw levies of England. Moreover, although the ship-money trial had given a fallacious appearance of triumph to the Crown in England, and supplied it with a revenue sufficient for time of peace, the Scots were not ignorant of the real feeling of the bulk of the English nation. Their objects, and those of the English Reformers, were so much alike, that it was impossible but that there should be sympathy between them.

They had also applied successfully to France, where Richelieu was glad of an opportunity of revenging himself upon Charles for his former support of the Huguenots; for having more lately thwarted his plans in the Low Countries against Spain; and for having afforded asylum to Mary de Medici, the particular object of Richelieu's dislike. It was therefore with good heart that the Covenanters entered upon the war, with a formidable and well-drilled force of 22,000 foot and 500 horse. The numbers of this army, enormous in comparison with the population, show the general interest in the cause.

Charles had consulted his Council, and determined on war also. Strafford, indeed, conscious of the superiority of the Scotch discipline, recommended a war of defence, with the army occupying a threatening position on the Borders. But Charles, misled by the appearance of tranquillity in England, believing that for war.

Preparations
1639.

France helps
the Scotch.

Resources of England.

¹ See page 606.

the national dislike of Scotland would come to his aid, and with a ridiculous misconception of the strength of the Scotch, was inclined for stronger measures. A large army was to meet at York. Hamilton, with 5000 men, was to join Huntly at Aberdeen. Antrim, with the Irish Scotch, and Strafford, with the Catholic army he was organizing, were to attack the West of Scotland. But the whole preparations were a sham; of Hamilton's troops scarce 200 knew how to fire a musket. Montrose had already decoyed Huntly into his power, and captured Aberdeen, and the temper of England began to be evident when the Lords Brook and Say refused to sign a declaration which the King offered them, asserting that the Covenanters were rebels. The Scotch advance was admirably managed, the commissariat was well supplied, and in the drill and arrangements the knowledge of Leslie and his old soldiers left nothing to be desired. The Covenanters still wished not to drive matters to extremity. They obeyed a proclamation which forbade them to approach within ten miles of the Border, and took up a position on the Hill of Dunse,¹ commanding all the roads from Berwick into Scotland.

Leslie at Dunse Law.

The King found them so formidable, and had become so conscious of his own weakness, that he thought a treaty would be desirable. Indirect means were taken to convey this news to the Scotch; and before long commissioners appeared in the tent of the English general to discuss a pacification. During the first meeting (June 11), the King himself made his appearance among them, and from that time onwards conducted the negotiations in person. This was a characteristic error on the part of Charles; it rendered any subsequent disagreement a personal attack upon himself; and such a disagreement very speedily followed. The main points of the Pacification were, that a free Assembly and a free Parliament should be held, at which, if possible, Charles himself should be present; that meanwhile the royal castles should be restored, and the forces of the Covenanters disbanded. But though the Articles had been reduced to writing, there was a great deal of verbal matter not very clearly defined between the negotiators. Before the Scotch commissioners left Berwick, their view of the whole bearing of the treaty was drawn up in a paper and distributed among the chiefs of the English army. This paper Charles declared to be full of falsehoods, and caused it to be burnt by the hangman in London. Such conduct made it evident that the Pacification was not a real one. The Scotch,

Treaty of Berwick.

¹ The Hill of Dunse was within the ten miles, still the halt there may be regarded as a real obedience to the command.

on their part, hesitated to give up the royal castles, and, while disbanding their army, kept together their experienced officers. The Assembly and the Parliament were in due course held, but the King was not present. As the Covenanters well knew would be the case when they made the Pacification, these Assemblies only ratified completely the work of the Assembly of 1638. The Parliament, before the completion of its session, was prorogued by Charles, but resumed its sittings in spite of this order. To set their conduct right with Charles, they had despatched two commissioners to London, one of whom was Lowdon, afterwards

Arrest of Lowdon.

Chancellor. They were refused admittance to the King, and ordered to return, but were afterwards brought back to London, and Lowdon was there arrested. The cause of this arrest was a letter which had been intercepted, recommending a certain Mr. Colville as Scotch agent to Richelieu. Lowdon's name, with some others of the Scotch nobility, was appended to the letter, and there is indeed no doubt that negotiations were going on with France.

All these things showed the hollowness of the late truce. The King again determined upon war; but his money was now exhausted. He hoped for a moment to procure £150,000 for protecting a Spanish fleet which had been driven by the Dutch to take refuge in the Downs. But De Witt and Van Tromp forestalled the completion of the bargain, and attacked and destroyed the Spanish ships in the presence of the English fleet, which lay idly by. Charles was too weak to resent the insult, and accepted the apology of the Dutch. Disappointed of this means of recruiting his exchequer, he could find no resource left but an appeal to Parliament.

Short Parliament called in expectation of renewed war.

Both the King and his Council seem still to have believed in the general goodwill of the country, which he hoped still further to excite by the production of the Scotch letters to France. He had no intention of governing in a constitutional manner, but hoped that the spirit of England was sufficiently broken to enable him to use the Parliament as a means of obtaining supplies. The spirit in which it was assembled (April 13, 1640) is shown by the fact that the illegal exaction of ship-money and Privy Seals was continued without intermission. But when the opening for which they had been longing was once afforded them, the leaders of the popular party had no intention of allowing the oppor-

Parliament,
proceeding to grievances,
is dissolved.

tunity to slip. No sooner was the Parliament opened, than Pym began the old tale of grievances. In vain the King begged them for subsidies, in vain did he offer in exchange for twelve subsidies to resign for ever his claim on ship-money, the Commons felt that this would be acknowledging the legality of its previous exaction. The bargain was refused, or was on the point of being so, when the King in anger suddenly dissolved the Parliament, which had sat only from the 13th of April to the 5th of May.

With strange infatuation, all the old measures of exaction were continued with renewed energy. Laud, blind to the national feeling, insisted on the Convocation sitting illegally after the dissolution, and establishing a new code of Canons. These commanded that every clergyman should instruct his people in the sin of resistance to the Government, while in addition an oath was drawn up, in wide and indefinite terms, to be taken by all clergymen and all graduates, to uphold the doctrine and discipline of the English Church.

The army which was to be assembled at York was placed under the command of Lord Northumberland, while Lord Conway, as General of the Horse, was stationed at Newcastle. The English commanders still dreamed of a triumphant march. Northumberland writes to Conway that "there is no use thinking of fortifying towns, for we are going upon a conquest with such power, that nothing in that kingdom will be able to resist us." But when they came to assemble their army, their eyes began to be opened. Funds were scarcely procurable. The Londoners refused to pay when a forced loan was laid upon them, and it had to be given up. A scheme for the debasement of the coin had also to yield to the opposition of the merchants. It was with the greatest difficulty that the ship-money was collected; and the troops, as they were brought to the rendezvous, frequently mutinied and put their officers to death.¹ The army indeed was so little formidable that the Scotch, acting perhaps upon a forged letter which Lord Saville had shown to Lowdon and his fellow-commissioner when in England, and which promised support from the English Reformers, crossed the Tweed at Coldstream, beat Conway's forces at Newburn upon the Tyne, and established themselves in Northumberland and Durham; thus commanding the coal-fields of England, and putting a strong pressure upon the industry of the country.

Scotch invade
England.

¹ Colonel Lumford writes that a large number of his troops "had run away, that the hue and cry of the country have no effect in regaining them; we are daily assaulted by sometimes 500 of them together, and have hurt and killed some in our own defence, and are driven to keep together upon our guard." And again, "The Dorsetshire men in a barbarous manner murdered Lieutenant Moon, and threatened the rest of their commanders, insomuch that they all ran away, and the soldiers being now at liberty, in all probability will endanger the towns and country."—Bruce's Treaty of Ripon. Camden Society.

The King, now aware of his own weakness, determined to negotiate, and for that purpose summoned a great Council of Peers, a form of meeting which was in fact the old great Council of the Plantagenets, but which had been unused for centuries. Before this Council he laid the difficulties of the situation. A petition from London, signed by 10,000 names, and supported by a similar one from twelve Peers, entreated the King to summon a Parliament. The Council recommended a similar course. It became evident that that step was now necessary, and writs were issued for the 3rd of November. The Council of Peers was so far useful that their credit enabled them to supply the immediate want of money. On their own security they raised £200,000 for public purposes, and formal negotiations were opened at Ripon, where a preliminary arrangement was entered into, that until a final peace should be made, the Scotch army should remain in England, with a monthly payment of £40,000 from the English. The negotiations then adjourned to London, where the Parliament, subsequently known as the Long Parliament, was about to begin its session.

There was every appearance that this Parliament would be very different in character from the late one. The rapid dissolution of that assembly, and the continuation, in spite of its remonstrances, of the illegal actions of the Government, had removed all hope of compromise. The practical coercion which had been put on the King to oblige him to summon the present Parliament seemed to remove the danger of a speedy dissolution, and gave promise of an opportunity of making the national grievances at length heard. Pym had already used the words, "They must now be of another temper, they must not only sweep the house clean below, they must pull down all the cobwebs which hang round the top and corners. To remove all grievances, they must pull up the causes of them by the roots." It was with great unanimity of feeling that this was the necessary course, that the Parliament met. The leaders of the reform party were not, however, as yet either Destructives or Republicans, nor were they, for the most part, even Puritans. Their views were political, and in the truest sense conservative. They were desirous of removing those abuses which the Stuart Kings had introduced into the Government, and which overlaid the Constitution, and that ecclesiastical tyranny which, in the hands of Laud, had gone so far to extinguish all liberty of conscience. But in doing this they were but restoring the old constitution of England,

Great Council.
Sept. 22.

Treaty of Ripon.
Oct.

The Long Parliament meets.

The reform party.

rewinning those privileges which had been the fruit of centuries of parliamentary action. Behind these leaders, however, there were men of other views. Puritanism, which had taken its rise in the reign of Elizabeth, clung to that form of Church government which Calvin had founded. This was modelled largely upon the republic of Geneva, which had afforded him refuge, and where he was all-powerful. In accordance with his tenets, moreover, his followers held that the State ought to be subservient to the Church, that God's government, as they would have phrased it, should be superior to man's. The inevitable consequence of these views was a tendency towards Republicanism wherever Presbyterianism existed: it had already shown itself in the United Provinces of Holland and among the Huguenot Protestants of France. Roughly speaking, then, the Reformers formed two classes—one political, one religious. As was certain from the nature of things, the most enthusiastic and vehement of these classes was the religious one. Therefore, without any particular interest in the religious questions, the political party found it necessary to make use of the strength this enthusiasm gave to assist them in carrying out their own reforms, and to supply that warmth and energy in which mere political parties are apt to be deficient. It is thus that we must explain the constant introduction of religious topics, and that close connection between politics and religion which is characteristic of the epoch. Pym well expressed the position when, during the "No Bishop" riots at the end of 1642, he refused to interfere, declaring that it would not do to discourage friends.

It was in pursuance of the policy that the cobwebs which hung at the top of the house must be pulled down, that, after a few days had been spent in bringing before the notice of the House, by means of county petitions, the chief grievances of the country, Pym caused the door of the House to be locked and the key laid upon the Speaker's table, and proceeded with much solemnity to introduce the impeachment of Lord Strafford. "That ancient gentleman of great experience in parliamentary affairs," as the historian May calls Pym, was determined not to be thwarted, as the Earl of Bristol had once been in his attack on Buckingham, by the interposition of an impeachment on himself, which he knew Strafford was preparing. Before the doors were unlocked, the impeachment had been carried, and was at once taken up to the House of Lords. Strafford, at that moment with the King, heard with dismay the rapid action of his enemies. He hurried, with his usual

Its Puritan and Republican element.

Impeachment
of Strafford.
Nov. 11.

overbearing manners, into the House, only to be met with cries of "Withdraw, withdraw," and to find himself compelled submissively to listen to the charges against him, and to be carried off a prisoner, in charge of the Usher of the Black Rod. He saw at once that the charm of his personal authority was broken, and with extraordinary power of adapting himself to circumstances, assumed from this moment a submissive bearing very unusual to him. He directed his whole efforts towards the legal refutation of the charges brought against him, and appeared in a new character as the champion of the law. The charges were indeed heavy; but he at once saw their weakness, and wrote to his wife that he did not believe he could be brought within the law of treason on any of them. They referred to his conduct in each of his three great offices. He was accused of tyrannical and illegal conduct as President of the Council of York; of attempting to establish arbitrary government, and of several instances of personal oppression while Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland; and as minister of England he was said to have advised the King to employ his Irish army to reduce his English kingdom to obedience. It was difficult to make technical treason out of any of these charges. The real charge which lay below them was one which had been voted without a dissentient voice in the House of Commons,—that he had endeavoured to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government. This, the Parliament held, was the highest form of treason.

It was on the 11th of November that Pym had laid before the House of Lords the information of the impeachment. The actual trial did not begin till the 22nd of March. It was attended with all the solemn ceremony which the hearing by the Lords of an impeachment by the Commons, a form of trial long unused, required. Westminster Hall was prepared for the purpose. On a platform in the midst sat the Lords as judges; on their right ran the bar, at one end of which stood the managers on the part of the Commons, at the other was a desk for the counsel of the prisoner, who had a small desk for himself and his secretaries in the middle. The rest of the Hall was fitted with scaffolds, which were daily crowded by a thronging multitude, who came in the early morning to secure their places, and in their excitement never left them till the evening adjournment. Behind the Lords were erected boxes in which the King daily sat to listen to the trial of his great minister. It was a curious scene—the benches crowded with ladies eager in favour of the accused, and with his Puritan enemies longing for his blood. Every word and turn of against him.

Charges

His trial.
March 1641.

the trial was watched with the keenest interest. In the brief intervals of business the Hall was filled with loud talking, and the hungry audience fell upon the provisions they had brought with them, regardless of the august presence they were in. And there, in the midst of the excited throng, with no time allowed him to prepare his answers, Strafford would turn his back for a moment upon his judges, consult in a few words with his counsel, and then proceed with admirable coolness and eloquence to combat every point as it was raised. His whole object was to keep himself clear of the charge of treason.

His defence.

With this view he virtually acknowledged much of what was alleged against him. It was, in fact, impossible to deny that he had received an enlarged commission as President of the North; had given the Council there all the authority of the Star Chamber; had systematically refused to the subject the right of appeal to the common law. It was impossible to deny that he had followed the same line of conduct with regard to the Castle Court in Dublin; that he had so managed the Parliament there, by taking advantage of Poyning's Law, as to escape the necessity of ratifying the graces which the King, during the preceding administration, had promised to the Catholics, and, to use his own words, to render the King "as absolute there as any prince in the world can be;" that he had acted with the grossest despotism towards the juries who had hesitated to find the verdicts he required with regard to the title-deeds of the proprietors of Connaught; that he had raised an army formed almost exclusively of Catholics; or that he had acted, especially in the case of Lord Mount-Norris,¹ with tyrannical severity towards his personal enemies. It was useless to urge as a set-off that the customs had been increased fourfold, that the victualling trade had been established, and the manufacture of linen had been set on foot. Even if each of those improvements had not been clogged by conditions which increased either his own position or the royal power,² the success of his government would have been no justification of the means employed. But granting all this, he urged there was nothing to bring him under the meaning of the Treason Act of Edward III. There was but one point left. This was the advice he was said to have given to employ the Irish army against the English Reformers.

¹ This nobleman had been condemned to death by a court-martial for some trivial and hasty words against the Lord-Deputy. The sentence was indeed remitted, but he had to leave Ireland.

² He had obtained a large income from the tobacco monopoly; and by destroying the woollen trade, and monopolizing salt, had rendered Ireland dependent upon England both for food and clothing.

At this point in the trial the Commons demanded leave to introduce fresh evidence. At the same time, seeing that the trial seemed likely to lead to a conviction of the prisoner for felony, but not for treason, the Commons determined to take the matter into their own hands, to constitute themselves both accusers and judges, and to bring in a Bill of Attainder declaring Lord Strafford guilty. This, like any other Bill, would have to pass both Houses, and to receive the consent of the King, but it entirely nullified the judicial action of the Lords. The new evidence, which was also the ground for the Bill of Attainder, was admitted. It consisted of a copy of some notes purporting to have been taken by Sir Harry Vane the elder during a council. These notes were said to have been found accidentally by the young Sir Harry Vane, who had communicated them to Pym. Repeatedly pressed, the elder Vane confessed the genuineness of the notes. The important passage of them ran thus,—"Your Majesty having tried all ways, and being refused, shall be acquitted before God and man; and you have an army in Ireland that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience, for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months." As the question before the Council was the Scotch war, as the words immediately after the doubtful passage refer to Scotland only, a candid reader cannot but believe that "this kingdom" meant Scotland. Had the word been that instead of this, there could have been no question, and in the hurried blotted notes taken in the midst of the discussion, it was surely easy that the word might have been misreported. The evidence was really worth nothing. From the moment however that the Bill of Attainder was introduced, the trial, although continued, lost all meaning. The Bill itself passed rapidly, though not without opposition, through the House; it was read the third and last time on the 21st of April. In the minority against it there were fifty-nine members, among them Lord Digby, hitherto a staunch Reformer and one of the committee of the impeachment, together with the great lawyer Selden. Digby's speech, which, in spite of the character of the speaker, was a very dignified and noble one, was publicly burned by the hangman, and from this time Lord Digby himself became an ardent Royalist. The names of the whole fifty-nine were published, with the heading, "These are the Straffordians, betrayers of their country;" and the feelings of the people, which had already been exhibited in riotous crowdings about Westminster Hall, were thus still further excited. This pressure from without told upon the Commons introduced fresh evidence.

April 10,

and a Bill of Attainder.

Vane's notes.

House of Lords, with whom Strafford, as a self-made man, who had never shown much respect to their order, was far from popular. The Bill of Attainder met with no strong resistance in their House. The King's consent was now alone wanting. It seemed almost impossible that he should give it. Already he had committed one breach of privilege during the passage of the Bill, by coming personally to the Lords and entreating them to find Strafford guilty of misdemeanour only. Already twice he had pledged his honour as a king that his late minister should lose neither in person nor in fortune, but the selfishness, which was the great fault of his character, overpowered his better feelings. On the 10th of May, with infinite sorrow, he gave his assent to the Bill, saying as he did so, "The Earl of Strafford is a happier man than I am." The following day he made one more despicable effort to secure even a respite for his friend. But it was not probable that a letter which closed with such words as these: "If he must die, it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday," should have much effect. On the 12th of May, at noon, the great Earl was beheaded.

Charles's consent to the Bill of Attainder.
May 10.

Strafford's execution.

While the showy and dramatic character of the impeachment of Strafford renders it the most striking event of this period, much work as real and important had been carried on in the Commons. In every instance the political and religious parties moved hand in hand. They had each their enemies to overthrow, each their own abuses to remove, and each their future safety to secure. It was natural that the ecclesiastical head of the party of "Thorough," Archbishop Laud, should meet with a similar fate to that of Strafford. In December he was impeached; but, once removed from public life, he was regarded as harmless. More important matters demanded consideration, and his trial was postponed for some years. The two great leaders thus displaced, attention was turned towards other members of the Council. The fact that Mr. Secretary Windebank was a Catholic marked him out for the vengeance of the Puritans. Before three weeks of the session were over, the report of the Committee of Religion warned him that his time was coming. He accepted the warning, and before the articles of impeachment against him, which charged him chiefly with over-leniency to Catholic recusants, were produced, he had fled from England. The conduct of the Lord-Keeper Finch, the royalist Speaker of the third Parliament, the chief of the ship-money judges, made him equally obnoxious to the political reformers. Against him, too, articles of impeachment were produced, and he also sought refuge beyond the sea.

Impeachment of Laud.
Dec. 1640.

Flight of Windebank and Finch.

The vengeance of the Commons was by no means satisfied. All the Bishops were regarded as parties in the guilt of Laud, all the ship-money judges in that of Finch. Rudyard, a reforming member, well expressed the opinion in regard to the Bishops when he said that their real crime was their animosity against the Puritans. "Under the name of Puritan all our religion is branded, while, under cover of assaults upon a few Jesuits, all Roman Catholics are countenanced." The mixture of temporal power with ecclesiastical jurisdiction was the point which most grievously hurt the feelings of the Presbyterians. A Bill was brought in, known as the Restraining Bill, to deprive Bishops of their rights of voting in the House of Lords. The opposition it encountered in that House induced the Commons to follow it up with a more vehement measure, "for the utter abolition of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, Prebendaries and Canons," a measure known by the title of the Root and Branch Bill. By the skill of the royal partisans, this Bill was long delayed in Committee.

Meanwhile the measures of the late Convocation were declared illegal; and, passing to political questions, the Commons declared the collection of ship-money contrary to the law; the six judges were impeached for asserting that the right of collecting it was inherent in the Crown, and Berkley, the Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, was carried off from the very judgment-seat by the Usher of the Black Rod; while, to secure the purity of the judges, a law was passed changing the words of their commissions, which were limited no longer by the pleasure of the King, but by their own good behaviour. The work of destruction was completed by the abolition of the three Courts,—the Star Chamber, the Council of the North, and the Court of High Commission.

In the midst of all these stringent measures, Parliament had been perpetually beset by the dread of a forcible dissolution. It was doubtless part of the art of Pym to keep alive such fears, just as it was a part of his art to arrange tumultuous gatherings and petitions. It was probably with real pleasure that, in the beginning of May, he received information of the existence of what is known as the Army Plot. The North of England was still burdened with both the Scotch and English armies. The Treaty of Ripon insured the payment of the Scotch army, which Parliament indeed, regarding the Scotch as their natural allies, had been ready enough to secure. The pay of the English army, meanwhile, fell

Root and Branch Bill.

Ship-money declared illegal.

The three Courts
abolished.

The Army plot
discovered.

largely into arrears; the officers were for the most part hostile to the Parliament. Want of pay bred discontent both among them and their men, and several of them, with Wilmot, the Commissary General, at their head, determined on a threatening petition. Goring, Jermyn, and others, at the advice of the King, were admitted to the officers' counsels, and Goring, a man of no character, had apparently recommended desperate designs, among which were a march towards London and an attempt to rescue Strafford. His ambition led him to desire the position of general, and, on the King's refusal to accede to this request, the plot seems to have dropped; and Goring, whose peculiarity it was to betray his friends, but to choose a time for the betrayal when but little harm could follow to them, gave an account to Pym of the exploded negotiations. It was made the most of. A strong feeling of fear was established. A Protestation, a sort of English Covenant, was drawn up, taken by the members of both Houses, and distributed through the country; and, more important than this, the House of Commons, which had already passed a strict Triennial Bill to ensure the frequent holding of Parliaments, went a step further, and produced a measure securing themselves against dissolution without their own consent, thus depriving the King of his undoubted prerogative of dissolution.

This Bill was presented to Charles for his consent at the same time with Strafford's Bill of Attainder. He probably felt the truth of Pym's remark, who exclaimed, when he heard that he had signed the Bill of Attainder, "Has he given us Strafford? then he can refuse us nothing;" thoroughly beaten and reckless, he assented without scruple to the measure which virtually made Parliament his master. It is possible that at the beginning of his course of concession Charles was honest in his views, that he still hoped that by yielding some points he might keep the bulk of his authority untouched. But the fierce determination with which Strafford had been pursued, the self-contempt caused by his conduct to that minister, and the anger he must have felt against those who had driven him to such base conduct, had removed all real thought of honest compromise. Henceforward, when he yields, he yields with a purpose, the fixed purpose of revenge, and with a hope of one day triumphantly annulling all he may have conceded. He believed that he had still three things from which he could hope for help—the English army, the Scotch nation, and the Irish Catholics. With regard to the English army his plans had already failed; he had thrown the burden of passed.

Triennial Bill

Bill against dissolving
Parliament.

Charles's motive for yielding.

supporting them entirely upon the Parliament, and fostered the discontent to which their want of pay had given birth. And though a second scheme, very much resembling the first, of marching upon the Parliament was subsequently set on foot, it also came to nothing. Parliament, warned by the danger, took measures, by the imposition of a large Poll tax, to raise sufficient money to get the army paid and disbanded.

Charles had more hope of Scotland. In the midst of their most treasonable actions, the Scotch had always both expressed and felt great respect for Charles's person. The King had found means to tamper with the Commissioners in London, he had won Lord Rothes to his side, and even Alexander Henderson, the leader of the Covenanting clergy, had given signs of wavering. In Scotland itself, Montrose (whose influence with the Covenanters was eclipsed by Argyle, and who hoped, if he adopted the King's cause, to supplant Hamilton as his minister) had formed a Royalist party; and the King had been told that if the Scotch had satisfaction as to their religious and political liberties, they might be relied on. He determined to go thither, to grant everything that was asked, and to use the popularity thus acquired as a support against his own people. The English Commons, suspecting some such plan, were very slow to let him leave London. It was only on the urgent request of the Scotch Commissioners, with whom they were compelled to be on good terms, that they allowed him to begin his journey. It was in vain that, on giving his assent to the Bills for the abolition of illegal courts, he urged them to let him go, recapitulating all the concessions he had made. "I hope you will remember I have granted that the judges hereafter shall hold their places quamdiu se bene jesserint. I have bounded the forests not according to my right, but according to the late customs. I have established the property of the subject, as witness the free giving up, not the taking away the ship-money. I have established by Act of Parliament the property of the subject in tonnage and poundage, which never was done in any of my predecessors' times. I have granted a law for a Triennial Parliament, and have given way to an Act for securing of moneys advanced for the disbanding of the armies. I have given free course of justice against delinquents. I have put the laws in execution against Papists. Nay, I have given way to everything that you have asked of me."

The suspicion of the Commons was thoroughly roused, especially by the King's reluctance, even while disbanding the English and Scotch armies, to get rid of the army of Ireland. When therefore he started at length for the North, care was taken that a Parliamentary Commission should attend him, nominally to advise, really to watch him, and to keep up that close connection which had already proved so useful between the malcontents of the two kingdoms. On reaching Scotland he followed to the full the line of policy which Montrose and his friends there (known as the Plotters) had marked out for him. There was no demand the Parliament could make which he was not ready to grant. "The end of my coming," he said in his opening speech, "is shortly this, to perfect whatsoever I have promised." In pursuance of this policy all the Acts of the doubtful Parliament of 1640¹ were acknowledged, the Committee, called the Lords of the Articles, was reorganized on a more popular basis; an act of pacification and oblivion was passed, omitting by name some of the more ardent Royalists, and the whole royal patronage was surrendered and vested in the Estates. Charles's friends in England watched these concessions with fear, expecting that the English Parliament would make equal demands. A note in the King's hand, appended to a letter of remonstrance which they had sent him, shows his own views on the point:—"I believe when all be done, they (the English Parliament) will not have such great cause for joy." The reconciliation was concluded by a distribution of offices and titles among his former enemies. Lowdon was made Chancellor; Leslie, Earl of Leven; Johnston of Warriston, a Knight and Lord of Session; even Henderson was given a pension of 4000 marks, and made Dean of the Chapel.

The King believed that he had been quite successful, and he could say to his Parliament on his return to London, "I have left that nation a most peaceable, contented people, so that I was not deceived in the end of my going." Yet events had happened there which had but increased the mistrust of Parliament. A curious and somewhat mysterious event, known as "The Incident," had taken place, which was never cleared up. This was a plot, probably set on foot by Montrose, for killing or kidnapping Argyle and Hamilton. Although the King strenuously declared that he knew nothing of it, he never completely cleared himself of suspicion; and the leaders in England thought they saw in it an instance of a settled policy to seize and destroy the opposition leaders as occasion offered, a policy the existence of which the subsequent attempt on the five members renders probable.

¹ The Parliament had continued to sit after its formal prorogation.

Charles goes to Scotland.
Aug. 10.

The Incident
Oct. 11.

Much worse than this was the Irish insurrection, which broke out just before the King's return to England. In that country, as has been seen, there were three great parties. The Scotch population of the North, Puritan in its religion, strongly reforming in its views; with them may be classed the English Protestants round Dublin, in fact the bulk of the Protestant population of Ireland. Of the Catholics there were two classes; first the Anglo-Irish of the Pale, headed by the Lords Antrim, Gormanstown, Fingal, and Castlehaven; Ormond, himself an Anglican, but in other respects sympathizing with them, was their chief; they were loyal Royalist in their views, full of hatred to the Puritans, anxious to continue the connection with England, and hoping for toleration as a reward for their allegiance. And secondly, the native Irish, Catholic also in religion, but before all things eager to dissolve the connection with the English, whom they hated as a conquering race, which had but lately deprived them of much of their lands both in Ulster and Connaught. It is certain that the King looked to the Lords of the Pale for assistance. He applied directly to them, ordering them to seize the Castle of Dublin, where the arms of the disbanded army were stored, and to keep the soldiers together as much as possible. Antrim and the other leaders were in hopes of being able to carry out their plans in a parliamentary way, but such were not the views of the native Irish, with whom they were compelled to ally themselves. Early in October, a meeting was held in Westmeath to make their plans. At that meeting the majority were for moderate counsels, but the minority, refusing to be bound by their decisions, determined on instant and violent action. They chose for their leaders Sir Phelim O'Neil, the nephew of Owen Roe O'Neil, who was their natural leader, and joined with him the Lords Maguire and O'Reilly and the two Macmahons, one of whom was Bishop of Clogher. They chose their time well. Parliament was to meet in November, and on the first of that month taxes and rents were due. A blow struck immediately before that period would find the taxes collected, but not yet sent to the Dublin Treasury. The 23rd of October was fixed on as the day of insurrection, because it offered the advantage of being a market-day, when the presence of strangers would be unobserved in Dublin. Well laid though it was, their plot in part failed. The Lord Chief-Justice, Sir William Parsons, was informed of the scheme by a certain renegade Roman Catholic, called O'Connelly. His vigorous measures saved Dublin, but in all the open country scenes of insurrection.

Irish

Three parties
in Ireland.

Failure of the plot in Dublin.

Massacre
in Ulster

horrible violence took place, accompanied by all the horrors which mark the sudden insurrection of a savage people. Neither men, women, nor children were spared, and where their lives were given them, the wretched English settlers were stripped, and driven in naked, shivering herds by their savage pursuers to the nearest towns of refuge.

Such an insurrection was not what Charles desired, but it is impossible to free him from the charge of having called to his assistance a wild and barbarous people whom he could not restrain. The rebels continued to act nominally as the King's army, and displayed a commission under the Royal Seal of Scotland. This seal is said by many to have been torn from an old charter, but it is curious to observe, that on the very day on which the commission was purported to be issued the Great Seal of Scotland was not in the hands of the Lord-Keeper; it had already left Hamilton's possession, and had not yet been placed in the custody of Lowdon, the new Chancellor. The King, at all events, pretended extreme horror at what had happened, and followed one of his usual devices for making the Parliament unpopular by at once shifting the whole responsibility of suppressing the insurrection upon them. In the full belief that he had secured the allegiance of the Scotch, and unconscious, apparently, of the mistrust which the Irish rebellion and the "Incident" had created, he returned to London, expecting to find there too a party not opposed to him. In fact, there was a rising feeling among those classes, who had aimed solely at reform, that enough had been done, and that the King's concessions were sufficient to secure public liberty, as indeed, had they been honestly made, with no afterthought of revenge, they would probably have been.

Under these circumstances, the King determined to follow the same course in England that he had followed in Scotland. The Lord Mayor was a Royalist, and, apparently at the instigation of the Queen, had succeeded in winning the consent of the Common Council of London to give the King a magnificent reception. He was therefore received on his return to his capital with signs of joy and popularity to which he had been long a stranger. This still further raised his hopes, and, as in Scotland he had established a reforming ministry, so now he drew to him some of those who had hitherto been his enemies. St. John was already Solicitor-General, Falkland and Colepepper took office, and Hyde, though he did not actually accept any office, became one of the King's most intimate advisers. Charles was thus ostensibly pursuing a liberal course. But behind those ministers there was a more intimate

Question of Charles's
complicity.

Loyally received on his return to London.
Nov. 25.

band of advisers, headed by Lord Digby, who were the real confidants of the royal schemes.

But the leaders of the Commons were not to be deceived. They had probably been already warned by their Commissioners in Scotland that information had been there collected with a view to their impeachment, and they determined to meet the reaction which was setting in by a declaration which is known by the name of the Great Remonstrance. This was a recapitulation of every act of unconstitutional tyranny which had marked the reign, couched in strong language. It was in fact an appeal to the people, and a vindication of all that the Commons had done. To those, however, who trusted Charles, and could not see the necessity of it, it looked like a mere factious move, taken at a particularly ungracious time, just as the King appeared to be willing to accept constitutional government. It therefore met with much opposition in the House, and was carried, after a fierce debate, which lasted all through the night, by a small majority of eleven. So fierce was the strife, that an eye-witness¹ thus describes it: "I thought we had all sat in the valley of the shadow of death, for we, like Joab and Abner's young men, had caught each other by the locks, and sheathed our swords in each others' bowels, had not the calmness and great sagacity of Mr. Hampden, by a short speech, prevented it, and led us to defer our angry debate till next morning." The Remonstrance, which was from the Commons' House alone, was not only presented to the King, but published. It was, in fact, an appeal to the nation, and marks that point in the contest where the Commons began to act unconstitutionally, and when the House, hitherto almost unanimous, divided into two great parties, the one who thought enough had been done, the other resolved on more determined measures. Those measures were to be directed towards preventing any reactionary and violent step on the part of the Crown, which the leaders of the Commons, with just reason, dreaded. For that purpose they held it necessary that the command of the army should be in their hands, a wish which ultimately led to the demand that the militia, that was the only army at that time existing, should be put entirely into their hands. There were several intermediate steps leading to the final demand.

The Commons' mistrust of the King's intentions was much increased by his removal of the guard, with which, during his absence in Scotland, they had surrounded themselves.

¹ Sir Philip Warwick.

The Commons, undecieved, issue the Grand Remonstrance.

Again and again did they demand a renewal of this precaution, but the King constantly refused it, or at least refused such a guard as they considered necessary, to be placed under the Earl of Essex, at that time Lord-General South of the Trent, on whom they could rely. Their request was chiefly grounded upon the Constant riots in London. riots, which were of daily occurrence in London, fostered by Pym and the reforming party. These reached their height when the Bill for excluding Bishops from the House of Lords was again brought forward, and rose so high that the Prelates, after the 27th of December, found themselves unable to attend the House. Foolishly, at the instigation of Williams (subsequently Archbishop of York), they sent a formal protest, declaring all acts done without their consent null. For this they were impeached of high treason and imprisoned. But the Commons took advantage of the uproar to make a fresh demand for a guard. They had reason indeed to suspect that a violent coup d'état was in preparation. Numbers of gentlemen and discharged officers from the army had collected at Whitehall, where a public table was kept for them. Quarrels had "Roundhead" and "Cavalier." arisen between them and the tumultuous city Petitioners, the nicknames of "Roundhead" and "Cavalier" had already been coined, and on one occasion blood had been shed by the King's partisans. In spite of these disturbances, however, the King refused to give the guard. His presence, he said, would secure the safety of all his subjects. "He would solemnly engage, on the word of a King, the security of every one of them from violence." This answer was given on the 3rd of January (1642).

The word of a King was kept by the exhibition on the very same day of articles of treason against five members of the Lower House, Pym, Hampden, Holles, Haselrig, and Strode, and against Lord Kimbolton or Mandeville (afterwards Lord Manchester) in the Upper House. The King in fact believed that the hour of his revenge was come, and that he could play out the "Incident" on a larger scale than in Scotland. On the next day, having warned the Inns of Court, who were very Royalist in their feelings, to be ready at a moment's notice, he proceeded to the House, surrounded by his Attempt to arrest the five Members. own guard and the Whitehall soldiery, with the intention of arresting the five members. Timely notice had been given, and they had fled. But—leaving his soldiers about the door, where they eagerly waited for orders to act, and demanded with threatening gestures, "When comes the word?"—Charles entered the House. He took the Speaker's chair, looked around at the vacant places of the five members, and after a short address, remarking that the birds had flown, withdrew amid cries of "Privilege, privilege." The birds had indeed flown, and taken refuge among the citizens of London. Thither the House followed them, and appointed a great permanent committee to sit in the Grocers' Hall. It was in vain that the King went himself thither, requesting the city magistrates to surrender the five members. They were not forthcoming. He was reluctantly forced to confess that his blow had failed; and, unable to bear the sight of the triumphant return to Parliament of those he had accused, he left London, never to return to it till just before his death.

They demand a guard in vain.

He was now in the miserable plight of a plotter whose scheme has miscarried; he felt that his last card had been played, and that nothing was left but war. To carry on this with effect, and to give an opportunity for those who favoured him to rally round him, he determined to betake himself to a new capital, and settled upon York for that purpose. But before he could proceed to extremities, it was necessary to have his hands clear of domestic interests, and at the same time to find some means of collecting money. He therefore determined to send his wife abroad. He purchased a moment's respite by giving his assent to the Bill for the removal of the Bishops, and then hurried with his Queen to Dover, sending with her the Crown jewels, on which to raise money. The Commons, meanwhile, striking while the iron was hot, now demanded security from such violent measures as the King had lately taken. They entreated him to return to London, and to put the militia—that is, the trainbands of the country, the only constitutional army of that time—into their hands. The request was brought to the King at Newmarket. It was peremptorily refused. The King had taken his part, and meant to play it to the last.

The next few months were occupied in preparation by the rival parties. Unable to obtain the King's consent, Parliament passed the ordinance of the militia without it. By this they were empowered to nominate the Lords-Lieutenants of the counties to hold power during their will. The King, on the other hand, retired to York, and was there disappointed to find the feeling by no means so thoroughly in his favour as he expected. What may be called the first instance of armed opposition to his orders took place at Hull. In that town were stored the arms and ammunition of the late Northern army. It was intrusted to Sir John Hotham, and Parliament now

Charles leaves
London
for York.
Jan. 10.

Sends the Queen to Holland.

ordered that the magazine should be brought to London. The King, on the other hand, claimed it as his own, as no doubt constitutionally it was. On the Parliament's refusal to deliver it up, he attempted to use his personal influence, as he was throughout his life too prone to do. He appeared before the gates in person, but Sir John was true to his trust, and the King withdrew baffled. At once the ordinance of militia was put in force, and to meet it the King issued a Commission of Array. There were thus in every county two recruiting centres, the one attempting to carry out the Parliament's ordinance, and the other the King's commission. Active and energetic members betook themselves to their own counties to assist the Parliamentary claim, and England was filled with petty skirmishes and disputes.

It is difficult to draw a geographical line separating the Royalist from the Puritan party. It may be said roughly that the parts about London were belonging to the Parliament party, and the North and the counties near Wales were inclined towards the King. The only counties which were whole-hearted were those around London, and the Eastern counties, where Cromwell had already become important, and which speedily formed themselves into that great association which supplied subsequently the nucleus of the new-modelled army. As yet, however the levies on the Parliament side were either needy adventurers, to whom the pay was an object, or such men as the personal influence of the Parliamentary leaders could gather. Round the King, meanwhile, collected many nobles and gentry, bringing with them a train of dependants, what may be spoken of as their feudal followers, full of affection and reliance on their immediate leaders. Money was still wanting to the King. The arrival of a ship from Holland supplied this deficiency, while the young Princes of the Rhenish Palatinate, Rupert and Maurice, if they added no wisdom, at least brought military energy to his side. To Essex was given the command of the Parliamentary army, which gradually collected in the Midland counties. The Earl of Lindsey was nominally the Royalist general, but his counsel was practically overruled by the advice of the hot-headed Rupert.

At length the crisis arrived. On the 22nd of August the King raised his standard at Nottingham, and aware at last that he could not rely on the inhabitants of Yorkshire, moved to Shrewsbury, at once to collect the Catholic

Hull refuses him its arms
and ammunition.
April 23

Ordinance of Militia, and Commission
of Array.
June 12.

Division of
the country,
Royalist and Puritan.

Essex and Rupert made generals of the two armies.

The King raises
his standard.
Aug. 22

gentry of Lancashire and Cheshire, to receive the Royalist levies of Wales, and to secure the valley of the Severn. The movement was successful. In a few days his little army was increased fourfold, and he felt himself strong enough to make a direct march towards the capital. Essex had garrisoned Northampton, Coventry and Warwick, and lay himself at Worcester; but the King, waiting for no sieges, left the garrison towns unmolested and passed on towards London, and Essex received peremptory orders to pursue and interpose if possible between the King and London. On the 22nd of October he was close upon the King's rear at Keynton, between Stratford and Banbury. But his army was by no means at its full strength; some regiments had been left to garrison the West, others, under Hampden, had not yet joined him.

But delay was impossible, and the first battle of the war was fought on the plain at the foot of the north-west slope of Edgehill, over which the royal army descended, turning back on its course to meet Essex. Both parties claimed the victory. In fact it was with the King. The Parliamentary cavalry found themselves wholly unable to withstand the charge of Rupert's cavaliers. Whole regiments turned and fled without striking a blow; but, as usual, want of discipline ruined the royal cause. Rupert's men fell to plundering the Parliamentary baggage, and returned to the field only in time to find that the infantry, under the personal leading of Essex, had re-established the fight. Night closed the battle. The King's army withdrew to the vantage-ground of the hills, and Essex, reinforced by Hampden, passed the night upon the field. But the Royalist army was neither beaten nor checked in its advance, while the rottenness of the Parliamentary troops had been disclosed, so that Cromwell told Hampden, that "it was plain that men of religion were wanted to withstand these gentlemen of honour;"—the secret which ultimately decided the fortune of the war.

The Parliament determined to regard this somewhat doubtful battle as a victory, and formal thanks were voted to Lord-General Essex. At the same time it was plain that the parties were more evenly balanced than had been thought, and the Parliament began to think of making overtures for peace. While the preliminaries of the intended treaty were still undetermined, and while a cessation of arms was still under discussion, the King suddenly moved towards approaches

Charles
London.
Nov. 13.

London, and having advanced as far as Brentford, there fell upon an outlying regiment of Parliamentary troops. The alarm in London was great. The citizens were embodied in haste under Skippon; troops lying at Kingston were hurriedly brought through London. Essex himself took the command, and before long an army of no very good material, but sufficiently numerous for the purpose, prevented the further advance of the King. Essex indeed would seem to have been over-cautious, and, in his anxiety to put a strong force between the King and the City, made no attempt to disturb the retreat of the Royalists, who shortly fell back upon Oxford, which henceforward became the centre of their operations. ^{Retires to Oxford.}

The treaty, as was expected by the wiser Parliamentarians, came to nothing. As the terms demanded included the abolition of the Church, and the King's assent to the militia ordinance, it was not indeed likely that anything could have come of it. War was again the only resource, and speedily became universal.

The character of a civil war, when the question at issue is not one of geographical supremacy but of political feeling, ^{Character of the war.} precludes the possibility of any regular plan of action, and renders very difficult any consecutive narrative of events. There was local fighting over the whole of England. But it is possible to form some general notion as to the main centres of action. The headquarters of the King were constantly at Oxford, from which, as from a centre, Rupert would suddenly make rapid raids, now in one direction, now in another. Between him and London, about Reading, Aylesbury, and Thame, lay what may be spoken of as the main army of Parliament, under the command of Lord-General Essex. Not that this army was by any means the largest or best supplied of the Parliamentary forces. There was no very warm feeling between the Parliament and their general, and Essex had frequently to complain of the superior equipment and larger numbers of troops allowed to his subordinates. The other two chief scenes of the war were Yorkshire and the West. In Yorkshire the Fairfaxes, Ferdinando Lord Fairfax and his son Sir Thomas, made what head they could against what was known as the Popish army under the command of the Earl, subsequently Marquis of Newcastle, which consisted mainly of the troops of the Northern counties, which had become associated under Newcastle in favour of Charles. Newark, in Nottinghamshire, was early made a royal garrison, and formed the link of connection between the operations in Yorkshire and at Oxford. In the extreme South-west, Lord Stamford, the Parliamentary General, was making a somewhat unsuccessful resistance against Sir Ralph, afterwards Lord Hopton. Wales was wholly Royalist, and one of the chief objects of Charles's generals was to secure the Severn valley, and thus connect the war in Devonshire with the central operations at Oxford. In the Eastern counties matters assumed rather a different form. The principle of forming several counties into an association, already mentioned in reference to the North, was adopted by the Parliament, and several such associations were formed, but none of these came to much except that of the Eastern counties, which was known by way of pre-eminence as "The Association." Its object was to keep the war entirely beyond the borders of the counties of which it consisted. The reason of its success was the genius and energy of Cromwell, who, though not yet nominally commander of the Association (which was at first under Lord Grey and afterwards under the Earl of Manchester), was in reality its moving spirit. Beyond the exclusion of the war from their own borders, the object of the associated counties was to complete the conquest of Lincolnshire, and thus to connect London with the Fairfaxes in the North. The main obstacle to this—which remained an obstacle throughout the war—was the existence of the garrison of Newark on their north-western frontier.

The year 1643 was on all sides disastrous to the Parliament. The army of Essex lay idle and useless, in spite of the remonstrance of Hampden and the more energetic commanders. A great plan was formed to bring up the armies of the Eastern counties to join it, and to fall upon Oxford; but the cautious disposition of the general brought to nothing what was in itself a hopeful scheme. The fighting was confined to skirmishes with Rupert's horse, which would every now and then beat up the quarters of a regiment. In one of these raids the Royalists got into the rear of the Parliamentary army, piercing as far as Chinner. Such an isolated movement was of course speedily checked. Hampden led the pursuit of the retiring Royalists. In crossing Chalgrove Field a slight skirmish took place, of no importance except that it cost the life of Hampden, whose energy as a commander had been such, that men were beginning to think of him as a more efficient Lord-General than the sluggish Essex. While the chief army lay thus idle, the Fairfaxes had been almost driven from Yorkshire by the superior power of Newcastle; they had been thoroughly defeated at Atherton Moor (June 30), and driven backwards to Hull. The arrival of the Queen (Feb. 22), bringing with her commanders, and arms obtained by the Crown jewels, had also much improved the posi-

Inaction
of Essex.

Death of Hampden.
June 18.

Royalist conquest of
Yorkshire.

tion of the Royalists in the North. Even the Hothams, who had shown their apparent devotion to the Parliament in refusing to surrender Hull to the King, now wavered. Timely information was fortunately obtained of their treason; they were brought to London, tried, expelled from Parliament, and subsequently executed. Hull was intrusted to Lord Fairfax, and there he gathered the remnant of his forces. Some timely successes prevented the complete conquest of Yorkshire. His son Sir Thomas, with the Parliamentary cavalry, escaped across the Humber into Lincolnshire, and made a junction with the Eastern troops. In company with Cromwell he succeeded in defeating his pursuers near Horncastle, at what is known as Winceby Fight. Meanwhile Lord Fairfax, breaking out of Hull, defeated Newcastle's army, and thus retaining his foothold in Yorkshire, gave an opportunity for a subsequent re-establishment of Parliamentary affairs in the North. In the West even greater disasters had befallen the Parliament. Lord Stamford had been defeated at Stretton by Sir Ralph Hopton; and Sir William Waller, whose early successes had gained him the title of William the Conqueror, was sent to re-establish the affairs of Parliament there. He was opposed by Hopton and Prince Maurice, suffered a heavy defeat in the neighbourhood of Bath on the 5th of July; and again, on the 13th of the same month, while besieging Hopton in Devizes, he was beaten, with the complete destruction of his whole army, by Lord Wilmot, who had marched from Oxford for the purpose of fighting him. Nathaniel Fiennes, too, to whom Bristol had been intrusted, had let that city fall without difficulty into the hands of Rupert (July 27). The West was thus almost entirely lost. In the East alone the energy of Cromwell had met with constant success. The battle of Horncastle has been already mentioned. Lincolnshire had been for the most part subdued, and added to the Association.

Except in this one point, the affairs of Parliament seemed in a bad condition. They did not, however, despair. Waller, after his defeat, met with an honourable reception, and was even thanked for what he had done; and as hopes were felt that the Scotch might be induced to afford assistance, messengers were despatched to re-establish a treaty between the countries. The acceptance of the Covenant was made an indispensable condition of the alliance. The condition was accepted. The two Houses of Parliament, the army, and subsequently by slow degrees and Winceby.

Checked at Hull
Oct. 10.

Waller's disasters in the West.

Cromwell alone successful
in the East.

To secure Scotch help the Covenant is taken.
Sept. 18.

the nation, the larger part of which was under Parliamentary influence, solemnly took the required oath. The management of the war, hitherto in the hands of a Committee of Safety, was vested in a joint committee known as the Committee of the Two Nations, and the Scotch at once set on foot an army of 22,000 men under Lord Leven. This treaty fully counterbalanced the late disasters of the Parliament.

Meanwhile the King had lost his opportunity. On the destruction of Waller's army he could probably have marched almost unopposed to London. The Lord-General's army had dwindled almost to nothing, he had constantly to be demanding reinforcements of men and money. It is possible that the refusal of the troops of Newcastle to join in the great movement may have been the cause of the King's blunder. However that may be, instead of marching to the capital, he turned westward to complete the conquest of the Severn valley, and laid siege to Gloucester (Aug. 10), the one important place there still held by the Parliament, expecting its immediate surrender. But Massey, the commander of the town, aided by the citizens, made a firm defence, and Essex for once exhibited some of those qualities which befitted his high command. His army was raised to 12,000 men, and he was intrusted with the duty of relieving the town. With a steady pertinacity, which was part of his character, he performed this duty. In spite of much opposition, after a march of twenty-six days, he reached Presbury Hill, overhanging the Severn valley, and made known by cannon shots his presence to the inhabitants.

But the Royalists did not wait to fight; they immediately burnt their camp and withdrew. Having revictualled the place, Essex returned in the same dogged fashion to London. He chose the road across the Wiltshire Downs, and, as he came off them down to Newbury, he found the place already occupied by the King's army. A great battle was there fought, as indecisive as the battle of Edgehill. The trainbands of London, however, which formed the bulk of Essex's army, exhibited their soldierly qualities, and held their own against the numerous cavalry of the King. In this battle fell Lord Falkland, who, since the Grand Remonstrance, had been one of the King's chief advisers. A patriot at heart, though he had felt it his duty to follow the King, his chief wish had been the restoration of peace; the continuance of the war had thrown a settled gloom over his life; he seems to have sought rather than avoided death. Essex was able to continue his march to London, and the King again went to Oxford. The close of the year

The siege of Gloucester saves the Parliament.

Essex relieves it. Sept. 5.

Indecisive Battle of Newbury. Sept. 20.

thus saw the fortunes of the rival parties still wholly undetermined, and the great crisis which might have proved fatal to the Parliament had passed.

While the war had thus been going on neither party had been politically idle. On both sides financial difficulties had to be met. On this point the Parliament were in a better position than the King. In the first place, they were backed by the willing generosity of the wealthy population of London, and had besides, in their apparent position as representatives of the nation, the power not only of laying on taxes, but also of pledging the national credit. Besides the collection of the regular taxes, and the tonnage and poundage, their chief financial means were assessments upon the city and upon the counties which owned their government, loans on the national credit, raised at an interest of eight per cent., free gifts and subscriptions, the confiscated or sequestered property of their enemies, and finally, an excise or inland tax levied upon a great number of commodities of home manufacture, especially upon liquors, but extending even to meat. They were even thus barely able to sustain their troops, and, early in the year 1644, we read of complaints addressed to Lord Fairfax by troops in the East, threatening immediate dissolution of the army unless money was forthcoming. One extraordinary tax, though it could not have been very lucrative, is so characteristic that it is worth mentioning. It was customary to have a weekly fast, and commissioners were appointed to collect from each household the price of one meal, whether they fasted or not, on those days.

The King's resources were of a less regular sort. He relied mainly at first upon the large gifts of his devoted followers, and upon the free service which many of them gave him. But subsequently, observing the advantage which the show of legality would give, he summoned to meet him at Oxford, in the form of a Parliament, all members who were his partisans, or had been rejected by the House in London, and any Peers who sided with him. Of the Peers a large majority joined him, of the Commons in all about 180, or about a third of the whole number. This quasi Parliament copied the expedient of the Parliament at Westminster and granted an excise, while the King again had recourse to the old plan of privy seals. This step gave him the further advantage of being able to speak of his opponents at Westminster as a small incendiary remnant, and as no real representative Parliament at all.

Another difficulty which, as King, he contrived to throw in the Financial resources of the Parliament.

Resources of the King.

way of his opponents, was the adjournment of all the law courts to Oxford. It thus became necessary for the Parliament, for the purpose of carrying on the course of justice, to make a new great seal.¹

Besides these questions, the Parliament was much occupied with ecclesiastical matters. To settle these an Assembly of Divines met at Westminster in the beginning of June.

Assembly at Westminster.
June 6.

Though the Presbyterians were in considerable majority, the ability of the few Independents amongst them rendered their action very slow, but they did at length produce a Directory in the place of the Prayer Book; and after the Covenant had been taken, and a treaty made with the Scotch, promising as far as possible unity between the two kingdoms, the Presbyterian form of worship may be regarded as established. Yet it never took a firm hold of the people; it was only here and there that it was to be seen in its complete working. This diversity in the form of worship, making each parish in some degree isolated from its neighbours, gradually prepared England for the ascendancy of that Independent party which was rapidly rising in importance.

It must not be supposed that even in the districts most devoted to Parliament there was no opposition. One reason probably for the inaction of the King in the early part of the year was his hope that he could raise a party in London. This hope was frustrated by the discovery of a plot, called Waller's Plot from the part which Edmund Waller the poet took in it. It had been the intention of the conspirators to publish a Commission of Array in London, to raise troops there in the King's name, and with assistance from the royal army to secure the person of the King's children, to apprehend the chief Parliamentary leaders, and to open the city to the King. The conspiracy was found out in time, its chief leaders punished (July 5), and Waller himself, who showed but a mean spirit on the occasion, was allowed to go abroad after paying a fine of £10,000.

In the beginning of the following year (1644) new combatants appear upon the field; on the part of the King the Irish, on the part of the Parliament the Scotch. Since the fearful outbreak of 1641 affairs had become much entangled in Ireland. The disputes at home had paralyzed the efforts of the English in that country. After the first surprise was over, some sort of opposition to the rebels had been organized. An army

Irish and Scotch take part in the war.

¹ The Lord-Keeper Littleton having fled to the King, a Commissioner sat in Chancery, and the only three judges who remained true to Parliament, Bacon, Reeve, and Trevor, presided in the three other Courts.

of Scotch, under Munro, had taken possession of Ulster, and Lord Ormond, as the King's Lieutenant, had collected an English army round Dublin. On the other hand, the Irish, headed by their clergy, had established a general council at Kilkenny. They had there received a benediction from the Pope upon their efforts, and had entered into communication with the Catholics abroad. There still existed among them the same diversity of opinion which had marked the beginning of the insurrection, the Catholic Lords of the Pale being desirous to make peace with the King, the Irish and Catholic Churchmen being for more extreme measures. The natural difficulties of the position were still further increased by the turn which affairs had taken in England, which in fact rendered the organization of a combined national effort against the rebels impossible. All these parties—Ormond, the Scotch and the Irish—equally declared that they were fighting for the King: the Scotch, now that their country was in treaty with Parliament, refused to take orders from Ormond, the King's Lieutenant, and held Ulster as in their own right. Ormond's army was Royalist, and took its commands from the King. The Parliament had thus no representative of their own interests. Though the King tried to throw the responsibility of continuing the war upon them, and they in some degree accepted it, their efforts to send assistance were not earnest, and when their commissioners went to Dublin, by the King's orders they were sent home again. In fact, the interests of the parties in England led them to hold exactly opposite views as to the line of policy to be pursued in Ireland. The King, to whom England was more important than Ireland, longed to bring the Irish army to oppose his English enemy. The Parliament hesitated to strengthen what might be an instrument of offence against themselves, and yet could not but be desirous to support the Protestants and Puritans of Ireland. The King thus became anxious for a cessation of the war, which would set the army at liberty; the Parliament, unable to join heartily in the support of Ormond, yet wished to continue the national opposition to the rebels. But the King was in this instance master of the game. Early in 1643 he began to speak of a truce, and before the conclusion of the year, in spite of the remonstrances of Parliament, a cessation of arms for a whole year was arranged.

It was concluded at almost the same time that the siege of Gloucester was raised; and early in the winter such of the Irish army as could be spared from garrison duty landed in Wales under the command of Lord Byron.

Truce with the rebels
in Ireland.

enables the King's army to act. It lands
in Wales.

It was against these troops that the Parliamentary efforts in the next year were first directed. Fairfax was hurried from Lincolnshire into Cheshire, and there, at Nantwich, destroyed the newly arrived Irish, capturing among other prisoners Monk, afterwards so famous, who, after a short imprisonment, took service in the Parliamentary army. On

Is defeated at Nantwich
Jan. 25.

The Scotch
enter England.

Gathering of the armies in Yorkshire.

the very same day as the success at Nantwich the Scotch army crossed the Border. Their advance was not wholly triumphant; they were foiled at Newcastle by the Marquis of Newcastle, but still that nobleman found himself obliged to fall back towards York, fearing to be enclosed by the army of Fairfax coming from the South and the Scotch coming from the North. There seemed every opportunity of at length destroying the royal influence in Yorkshire. There, therefore, all available troops were hurried. Sir Thomas Fairfax, after his success at Nantwich, had advanced to the siege of Latham House, held gallantly for the King by the Countess of Derby; this siege he shortly resigned into the hands of Mr. Rigby, who completely failed in his attempts, and had to retire in disgrace upon the advance of Prince Rupert. But meanwhile Fairfax had hurriedly joined his father in Yorkshire, where it soon became plain that a critical battle would be fought, for there the armies of both parties were concentrating. Rupert was ordered to join Newcastle at York, and Manchester, who had assumed command of the Association with Cromwell, was brought up to reinforce the Fairfaxes. The Prince, evading the armies which were lying round York, crossed the Ouse, and effected a junction with Newcastle. The three generals, having united their armies, appeared with their combined forces upon the plains of Long Marston. The armies were not in presence till five in the afternoon, and it seemed as if even then no battle would take place. But about

Battle of Marston Moor.
July 2.

seven in the evening the Parliamentary generals began the fight. For the first time the Association troops, carefully formed and organized by Cromwell, in accordance with the principle he had laid down after Edgehill, met the dashing cavalry of Prince Rupert. The men of religion had at length been found to meet the gentlemen of honour. The victory of the Parliament, which was complete, seems to have been due to Cromwell. The Association troops were upon the left wing, opposed to Prince Rupert's horse. In his own description of the battle, Cromwell writes: "We never charged but we routed the enemy. The left wing, which I commanded, being our own horse, saving a few Scots in our rear, beat all the Prince's horse. God made them as stubble to our swords; we charged their regiments afoot with our horse, and routed all we charged." While thus victorious upon the left, the Parliamentary troops had been so thoroughly worsted upon the right, that several generals, Leven among the number, had left the field, believing that the day was lost. But Cromwell's victorious wing, held back from pursuit by his prudence, fell upon the Royalists, disordered by their victory, and completely re-established the battle. It was with difficulty that Rupert could collect, after his flight, 4000 or 5000 men, while Newcastle, always at enmity with the Prince, and attributing his defeat to Rupert's bad management, withdrew to the coast, and retired in dudgeon to the Continent.

The fruits of the victory were the cities of York and Newcastle. The North of England was in fact conquered, and the troops and generals available elsewhere, where they were much wanted. It was Cromwell, and Cromwell's troops alone, who seemed able to secure success. In the rest of England all had been disaster. The two armies of Waller and Essex had attempted in vain to enclose the King at Oxford. By a simple stratagem he had got out of the city unsuspected, and passed between the two armies to Worcester. Essex was ordered to follow him wherever he went, while for Waller was intended the command of the army in the South and West. Between Essex and Waller there was a standing jealousy, and Essex, indignant at the important work being given to his rival, insisted upon leaving the pursuit of the King to Waller, while he himself undertook the Western campaign. Waller's pursuit was useless. The King succeeded in getting safely back to Oxford, and in inflicting a defeat upon his pursuer at Copredy Bridge. After this, Waller found his army disappearing, and had to return to London. Essex pursued his march into Devonshire and to Cornwall; but the King's forces, now free to act, gradually closed round him. His horse cut their way through the enemy, but the Earl himself, leaving his army to its fate, escaped by sea to Plymouth, and from thence to Portsmouth. His infantry, under Skippon, were forced to capitulate.

Parliamentary disasters elsewhere.

Copredy Bridge.
June 29.

Essex defeated in Cornwall.
Sept 1.

The Parliament received its fugitive general without complaint, speedily reconstituted armies both for him and Waller, and summoned Manchester and Cromwell from the East to their aid. The combined forces of these generals

After Marston
Moor, Cromwell
joins the Southern army.

met the King at Newbury, as he marched from Basingstoke to Oxford. This second battle of Newbury was as indecisive as the first. The King, who in the general opinion was worsted, marched off unmolested in the night, although there was a bright moon, to Wallingford, and thence to Oxford. He left his baggage and artillery in Dennington Castle, a stronghold close to Newbury, and fetched it thence, again unmolested, twelve days after. As Essex was absent from ill-health, the blame of this transaction rested with Manchester, whose want of activity brought to a point a quarrel which for some time had been rising between him and Cromwell, a quarrel which, though it took at first a personal form, was in fact one of principle, and the first step in the great contest between the Independents and Presbyterians.

It has been already mentioned that the political views of the leaders of the Long Parliament were at first conservative; that conservative reform and the restoration of the old liberties of England under trustworthy safeguards were the objects they had in view. At the same time, the Presbyterian form of religion, which, as the only organized rival to English Episcopacy at that time existing, was the form to which the majority of the Puritans naturally inclined, was essentially republican. Its republicanism, however, was of a very dogmatic and tyrannical sort. Now the real fault of the Roman Catholic and English forms of religion—that fault which had excited the opposition of the greater part of the religious men of England—was their want of spirituality. For a time the less sensuous and more spiritual character of Presbyterianism seemed to satisfy the want of men's minds. But as that form of religion had become predominant, as its dogmatic character had become more obvious, the same class of deeply religious minds which had supplied the enthusiasm necessary to carry out the early reforms of Parliament gradually awoke to the feeling that the spirit cannot be confined under arbitrary forms at all, that different minds will of necessity form different ideas upon religious subjects. There had thus grown up a large number of earnest men to whom the tyranny of Presbyterianism was scarcely less irksome than the Episcopal tyranny it had superseded. By far the most prominent of this class was Cromwell, whose genius and energy had rapidly forced him forward into a position of great prominence. To him spiritual religion was everything, the outward form which it took mattered little. But his mind was not only devoted to spiritual religion, it was also in the highest degree practical, and the ill effects of Newbury.

Second battle
Oct. 22.

Rise of Independency.

Cromwell's practical,
religious, and political views.

of Presbyterian tyranny had forced themselves upon his notice in more ways than one. He had set before himself the duty of forming an army, the members of which should be all of them thoroughly in earnest, and inspired with an enthusiasm capable of withstanding that enthusiasm which the sentiment of loyalty inspired, and who should at the same time be excellent practical soldiers. In carrying out this plan he had found himself frequently thwarted by the narrow theological views of the Presbyterians. Again and again we find in his letters marks of the opposition upon religious grounds which had been made to the employment of officers whom he could trust, and calumnious reports appear to have been set on foot against himself as a favourer of Anabaptists and sectaries.

The same practical tendency of his mind had led him and others of the same way of thinking to arrive at some political and social conclusions different from those which as yet had been prevalent. The conservative feeling of the English Reformers, and the loyalty of the Scots, with whom they worked in common, had induced them as yet to employ in all high places men of large property and high social rank, irrespective, in some degree at least, of their capacities, and to maintain on all occasions, even when most opposed to him, an outward respect for the King. In their most violent assaults upon Charles's policy it had been usual to introduce the clause "seduced by evil counsellors." Now Cromwell saw that this constitutional but illogical state of feeling tended only to prolong the war, while his practical knowledge of the working of the army led him to see that far abler generals might be found than the wealthy lords at first employed, who, moreover, were restrained, by the greatness of the interests they had at stake, from wishing to drive matters to extremity. The representative to him of these lukewarm, inefficient commanders was his own immediate superior, the Earl of Manchester. In him he seemed to see personified the ill effects both of the dogmatism of Presbyterianism and the undue respect for social position as contrasted with the real worth of the individual. The wasted success at Newbury brought matters to a crisis. Cromwell publicly charged Manchester in the House with having wilfully neglected to render that victory decisive. It was in vain, he said, that he had urged the General to allow him to fall with his horse on the retreating enemy and complete their defeat; and he accused him further of wilful mismanagement of the Association troops before his junction with Waller. Manchester, backed by the Presbyterians, and especially by Crawford, a Scotchman, whom the Presbyterian party had made his Major-General, defended himself, and recriminated upon Cromwell. But the sense of the nation, weary of the lengthened war, justified Cromwell's attack; and the open assault upon the aristocratic general tended much to hasten a project which had already been formed, of reorganizing, or, as it was then called, remodelling the army.

His quarrel with
Manchester.

Cromwell and his friends—who never did things by halves, and who were bent, even at their own expense, at getting the war into more energetic hands—introduced, as a preparation for this reorganization, what is known as the Self-denying Ordinance. By this all members of either House of Parliament were made ineligible for commands in the new army. This at once, in an honourable way, would remove Manchester, Essex, Denbigh and Waller, and Cromwell himself, from the list of new commanders. The arguments by which it was supported—such, for instance, as the necessity for supporting the dignity of Parliament against the attacks of the King by keeping its numbers as full as possible; the danger which the Parliament ran of being accused of being self-seeking, and of wilfully prolonging the war for the sake of the authority with which it invested many of its members; and the certainty that as good or better generals were to be found among men of lower social rank—prevailed without much difficulty in the Lower House. In the Upper House, where the Presbyterian party was strong, after some debate it was rejected, on the ground that before passing such an ordinance it was necessary to know the form that the new modelled army would take. The object of the Self-denying Ordinance was no secret. It was understood to be a delicate way of getting rid of the old commanders. Cromwell urged the acceptance of the measure in a noble and patriotic speech. After remarking the danger the House ran of being charged with selfishness in continuing the war, he went on: "But this I recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander-in-chief on any occasion whatsoever, for as I must acknowledge myself guilty of oversights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs. Therefore, waiving strict inquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy, which is most necessary. And I hope we have such true English hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother country, as no members of either House will scruple to deny themselves and their own private interests for the public good."

Checked by the Lords, the Commons proceeded to remove

Self-denying Ordinance.
1645.

the objection urged, and to settle what the new form of the army should be. This remodelling of the army was in fact neither more nor less than the foundation of a great standing army. The cavalry had for some time had in some degree the character of regular troops. The length of time necessary to form an efficient horse soldier, and the wealthier class which the superior comforts of that service had induced to join it, had given it a character of permanence. But the infantry seem usually to have been hastily raised and ill-trained levies, collected more or less on the principle of the old militia. Thus, half-soldier, half-labourer, the infantry men had shown a constant tendency to desert. This explains the frequent melting away of the Parliamentary armies, and the great part played in all the battles by the cavalry. By the new model the army was to become a regular and permanent body. The great question seems to have been whether the new commander-in-chief was to get his commission direct from the Parliament or to hold it indirectly from the Lord General, in which case his power would have been shackled by the Presbyterian party. The triumph of the supporters of the plan was great when Essex surrendered his commission, and Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed commander-in-chief, with a commission held direct from both Houses, and with the power of nominating all the officers of the army. One further triumph the Independents won. Unable as yet to put aside the Covenant, they contrived that, though it had to be taken sooner or later, its acceptance should not necessarily form a preliminary step to appointment, but might be postponed to such convenient time as the Parliament might direct. By this relaxation it became possible to fill the ranks with efficient Independents. When the Lords were thus supplied with the shape of the new modelled army, a new Self-denying Ordinance was introduced, and finally passed on the 3rd of April. Essex was rewarded with a large pension, and died some two years after; while Manchester, whose virtues were civil rather than military, was put upon the Committee of both kingdoms.

While these important measures had been taken at Westminster with a view to the completion of the war, the Presbyterian party had had sufficient influence to set on foot some more useless negotiations with the King at Uxbridge. The demands of the two parties were found to be wholly irreconcilable; for Parliament still demanded the abolition of Episcopacy, the command of the army and navy, the continuation of the war with Ireland, and the right to nominate the great officers army.

Remodelled
Failure of Presbyterian negotiations
at Uxbridge.
Feb. 22.

of state. The three great points—religion, the army, and Ireland—were to be debated in rotation; twenty days was the limit for the whole negotiation. The twenty days elapsed, and nothing had been done. The Houses refused to prolong the term, the treaty therefore came to an end. The presence of Vane and St. John, who were both Independents, may have had something to do with this result. Certainly the King seems to have retired from the negotiations with the knowledge of the complete division which had arisen in Parliament, and of the very destructive views held by the Independents.

Alarmed at the discovery of the danger that awaited him should he fall into the hands of the Independents, whose influence was constantly on the increase, and hoping something from the weakness which it was reasonable to suppose would be caused by the rivalry of party among his enemies, Charles was led to seek support on all sides and at any price. He instructed Ormond to change the cessation of arms at present existing in Ireland into a treaty, even at the price of the suspension of Poynings' Law, and of all penal acts against the Catholics. He thus hoped, as he said, that the Irish might freely and vigorously engage themselves against his rebels of England and Scotland, "for which no conditions can be too hard, not being against conscience or honour."

He had already formed the idea of obliging the Scotch allies of the Parliament to retire to their own country, by raising a Royalist army there. Even as early as April 1644, Montrose had made his appearance for that purpose at Dumfries. His efforts had been entirely unsuccessful, but the Earl of Antrim, with whom he had formed a combined scheme of action, had met with somewhat better success. He had been despatched to Ireland with the unscrupulous commission to treat both with the Scotch in Ulster and with the combined Catholics, and had been able to send some 1500 men, raised among his dependants, to the West Highlands, under the command of Alaster Macdonald, surnamed Colkitto. To this little army, while lying at Blair Athol, Montrose, who, after his unsuccessful visit to Scotland, had again withdrawn to the South, appeared in August 1644, and immediately found himself in command of a considerable army of mountaineers. His success at first was great. Lord Elcho's defeat at Tippermuir put Perth into his hands. In September Aberdeen surrendered. Argyle, Lieutenant of the kingdom, and a personal enemy both of Montrose and Antrim, succeeded indeed in checking his further advance, and then retired to

The Truce
in Ireland changed to peace in the King's interest.

Montrose in
Scotland.

Inverary for the winter; but the difficulties of the season were overcome by the energetic Royalist commander. Inverary was surprised, the country of the Campbells laid waste, Argyle thoroughly beaten at Inverloch, and the north of Scotland was placed entirely in Montrose's hands. Although he was subsequently driven by Baillie from Dundee, he still kept the mountains, and succeeded in beating Hurry (May 4, 1645) at Alderne, not far from Inverness, and Baillie at Alford, near Aberdeen; he was then able to advance into the Lowlands, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, where he again won a complete victory over Baillie at Kilsyth (Aug. 15). For the moment he seemed master of Scotland, and the hopes of the King, whose affairs had not gone well in England, rested on him.

The remodelling of the army had been attended with considerable difficulty. The old troops were much inclined to mutiny at the loss of their officers, and had Essex put himself forward in their interest, much damage to the Parliamentary cause would have ensued. Even when that difficulty was overcome, some time had to be spent in forming the new troops, and while Fairfax was thus employed during the month of April, the Parliament was in fact almost without an army. Even when it was formed, one of the new officers tells us that the disaffection was great, and that the chances were in favour of the King should he move rapidly and avoid a general engagement. During this time Cromwell, who had not yet laid down his command, was employed with Massey and Waller in restraining the Royalist army in the South-west, commanded by Goring. The expedition was tolerably successful, but its completeness was marred by the threatening attitude taken up by Rupert, who however subsequently withdrew to Worcester, intending, apparently, to march across England and assault the associated counties. For that purpose he summoned the King with a convoy from Oxford. To Cromwell was intrusted the duty of destroying that convoy, which he successfully performed. This duty was specially given him after he had returned to bid adieu to the general and resign his command. Again, on his return from Oxford, he withdrew into the Eastern counties, acting only in his civil capacity as one of the committee for those counties.

Meanwhile, early in April, Fairfax with his new army advanced westward to raise the siege of Taunton, which city Goring was besieging. Before that task was completed he received orders to enter on the siege of Oxford. This did not suit his own views or those of the Independents. They had joined their new army upon the

First campaign of the newmodelled army.

implied condition that decisive battles should be fought. It was therefore with great joy that Fairfax received orders to proceed in pursuit of the royal forces, which, having left Worcester, were marching apparently against the Eastern Association, and had just taken Leicester on their way. Before entering on this active service,

Cromwell continued in his employments.

Battle of Naseby.
June 14.

Fairfax demanded and obtained leave for Cromwell to serve at least for one battle more in the capacity of Lieutenant-General.¹ He came up with the King in the neighbourhood of Harborough. Charles turned back to meet him, and just by the village of Naseby the great battle known by that name was fought. Cromwell had joined the army, amid the rejoicing shouts of the troops, two days before, with the Association horse. Again the victory seems to have been chiefly due to his skill. In detail it is almost a repetition of the battle of Marston Moor. Cromwell commanded the right wing, Ireton the left; Rupert annihilated Ireton's troops, Cromwell was equally successful against the troops opposed to him. Checking the pursuit, he charged upon the flank of Rupert's returning wing, and the King's infantry seeing both its wings destroyed, broke and fled.

The only army which now remained to Charles in England was that of Goring in the West; and by the confession of writers on his own side, the King's sole hope rested on the success of Montrose in Scotland, and on the negotiations he was carrying on with the Irish rebels. Into Ireland he had sent Herbert (son of the Marquis of Worcester), now made Lord Glamorgan, with secret instructions to grant, if necessary, the supremacy of the Catholic religion in that island,—terms which he had not ventured to grant in his public negotiations carried on through Ormond, but which were insisted upon by the Irish and clerical party in the Council of Kilkenny. In September Lord Digby writes to Ormond: "If his Majesty can once see his person secure from being thus daily hazarded and chased about, I see no reason why we should be at all dismayed with our many misfortunes here, since no man can think England divided (though the major part against the King), able to resist Scotland and Ireland entire for him with any considerable party here." Relying on these treacherous hopes, the King withdrew to Wales, and attempted there to form a new army, while Fairfax advanced triumphantly to the West, raised the siege of Taunton, defeated Goring at Langport (in July), and stormed Bridgewater, hitherto regarded as impregnable. Leaving the completion of his victory in that quarter for some future time, Fairfax then turned towards Bristol, which with Chester and with Hereford formed a line of Royalist fortresses across the West of England. Brereton, with the help of a certain number of the Scotch, was pressing Chester hard; the Scotch army was advancing to attempt the capture of Hereford. Charles, scarcely knowing where he was going, advanced across England to Newark, then back to Oxford, in time to hear that the victory of Kilsyth had had its effect, it had summoned the Scotch horse under David Leslie back to their own country. With renewed confidence he therefore advanced to Hereford, and raised the siege (Sept. 10), and was proceeding southward to do the same at Bristol, which he had regarded as safe in the hands of Prince Rupert, when he heard of the storm of that city. It was still possible that Chester might be saved. Thither the King now turned, but his troops were defeated outside the walls at Rowton Heath (Sept. 23). Almost at the same time he heard the news of the disastrous defeat of Montrose at Philiphaugh (Sept. 12). Victory, as is not unusual with Highland armies, had been more fatal than defeat; the bulk of Montrose's followers had withdrawn to their own country, and he had marched with some 500 or 600 men to the Tweed, hoping to form a junction there with some troops which the King had promised him. While encamped upon Philiphaugh, in the neighbourhood of Selkirk, he was surprised by David Leslie and the Scotch horse, and his army annihilated. He himself escaped to the Highlands.

Fairfax victorious in the West.

¹ This commission was subsequently renewed again and again for periods of forty days.

The war was now in fact over. In August, before the siege of Bristol, Cromwell had suppressed an organization which had been formed in Somerset and the neighbouring counties—really in the Royalist interest, though nominally to keep the war from their own borders—by the countrymen of those districts, who, from their rude weapons, were spoken of by the name of Clubmen. He had subsequently, in October, reduced most of the royal strongholds between Somerset and London. Lord Hopton's army in Devonshire was all that was now left to conquer; for the secret treaty of Glamorgan with the Irish had been discovered, and the King had been compelled to disown his own instructions, so that help from that quarter was no longer available. Against the Western army Fairfax advanced triumphantly, besieged Exeter, beat Hopton at Torrington, and finally enclosed him in Cornwall, where he was obliged to disband his army in March 1646. Almost immediately afterwards, Astley, the last of the King's generals, was defeated at Stowe-on-the-Wold (March 22); and the King, left without an army, remained in Oxford, the only point of great importance which still belonged to him. There were, however, other fortresses as yet unsubdued. These were one by one reduced, and finally, the King having left Oxford on the 22nd of April, Fairfax sat down before that city, which surrendered with the royal sanction on the 20th of June.

Fall of Bristol.

Defeat of Montrose at Philiphaugh.

No hope from Ireland.

Destruction of the King's army in the West.

In the month of April the King had seen all his fortresses reduced, and was convinced that, as nothing further could be done in the field, he must himself leave Oxford, unless he was willing to run the risk of falling a prisoner into the hands of his enemies. From arms he turned to negotiation and intrigue. He had always an overweening idea of his own diplomatic skill, which indeed was not slight, while the duplicity of his character fitted him well for the pursuit of tortuous intrigues. He saw the jealousy which existed between the Presbyterians and Independents, and even more strongly between the Independents and the Scotch, strengthened, as in this instance it was, by national differences. Ignorant of the strength of the feeling which formed the basis of the union of these parties, relying upon the still powerful influence exercised by the name of royalty, and trusting to his personal skill, he began a threefold intrigue. He sent propositions containing considerable concessions to the Parliament, but was met either with refusal, or by silence which was worse than refusal, and when it was thought that he intended to appear in London, stringent orders were given to prevent intercourse with him. To Colonel Rainsborough, the commander of the troops about Oxford, he suggested that he should put himself into the hands of the army. Colonel Rainsborough answered that he could not act without Parliament. Thwarted by the good faith of these two parties in the plan which he had opened to Digby, being, as he said, "not without hope that I shall be able so to draw either Presbyterians or Independents to side with me for extirpating one another, that I shall be really King again," he applied to the Scotch. It has been observed that through all their opposition the Scotch had kept their loyalty. He hoped his appearance among them would further kindle this feeling. It was by French agency that he intended to set the negotiations on foot: direct aid from France, although in the course of the war it had been sometimes afforded, could not be relied upon, as that country was involved in a war with Spain; but an agent of the name of Montreuil was obtained to act as a go-between in the transactions with the Scotch. How far the King's hopes in this matter went he himself tells us in a letter to Ormond (April 13). "We are resolved," he says, "to use our best endeavour, with their assistance and with the conjunction of the forces under Montrose, and such of our well-affected subjects of England as shall rise for us, to procure an honourable and speedy peace with those who have hitherto refused to give ear to any means tending thereto." Montreuil was so far successful, that the Scotch Commissioners at London, where party spirit was at its highest, appear to have promised the King a favourable reception, and freedom from coercion both for his conscience and his honour. The Scotch Commissioners, with the army, although they probably knew of the promise of their compatriots in London, carefully avoided implicating themselves in it, and nothing but a vague pledge of honourable reception could be got from them. On this, however, the King determined to rely, and fled from Oxford (April 27), disguised as a servant of John Ashburnham, and attended by a clergyman of the name of Hudson. His own Council were ignorant of his designs, which were indeed such as could scarcely be avowed. Further to hoodwink them, he had directed his course towards London, but, turning northward, took refuge with Montreuil and the Scotch army before Newark. He was received with a show of respect, but soon found himself only in honourable captivity. The Covenant was at once pressed upon him, and it is not clear what the conduct of the Scotch might have been had he honestly made common cause with them. But he still believed in his power of temporizing; and, urged by some threatening votes of the English Parliament, the Scotch determined upon acting honourably and remaining true to their engagements. They declared that they had no idea of separating themselves from their alliance with the English Parliament, asserted that the King's letter to Ormond, which implied that they would join with Montrose to destroy it, was a damnable untruth; and, upon the Parliament of England voting that they could now do without the Scotch assistance, they retired northward, bargaining only for the due payment of their arrears of pay. This, to the amount of £400,000, was given, and they withdrew to Newcastle (Jan. 30, 1647), whither the English Parliament, whose jealousy was thoroughly aroused, ordered them to be followed by the

Charles tries in vain to divide his enemies.

Files to the Scotch at Newark.

They refuse to join his intrigues.

Their arrears being paid, they withdraw, and give up the King.

English army under Poyntz and Fairfax. One further chance of honest and straightforward treaty was given the King at Newcastle. Upon his refusing the articles offered him, which were similar to those offered at Uxbridge, but rendered a little more stringent, he was given over to the English Commissioners, and the Scotch army withdrew beyond the Tweed (Feb. 3).

It was during his residence with the Scotch, and in order to facilitate a treaty with any of the three parties, that the King had issued orders for the surrender of the rest of the fortresses which still held out for him in England. Even while at Newcastle, in the midst of the difficult negotiations between the Parliament and the Scotch, Charles, unable to accept the terms of any party, was still continuing his underhand treaties with the Irish rebels. In the autumn of the year before, the treaty which Glamorgan had contracted with them having come inopportunately to light, had been given up, and Glamorgan disowned and thrown into prison; but now two letters were written to Ormond, the one public, forbidding him to treat, the other private, and with exactly opposite orders, in obedience to which Ormond made a treaty in March on much the same terms as the disowned arrangement of Glamorgan. But even this did not satisfy the Irish clerical party, who, under the Pope's Nuncio, were holding a synod at Waterford. Victorious over the Scotch at a great battle at Benburb, O'Neil, the leader of the Ulster army, gave them his support; all who favoured the treaty were threatened with excommunication, and the war was pressed on, till Ormond, finding himself reduced to the alternative of surrendering Dublin to the Irish or the Parliament, honourably chose the latter course, and a certain number of troops under Colonel Michael Jones came from Chester, and upheld, though with much difficulty, the sinking English cause.

In obtaining the King from the Scotch the Presbyterian party had won a complete victory. They were now at the height of their power. They were freed from the presence of the Scotch army, yet on good terms with that country; they had the King in their possession, whom they now kept as a prisoner at Holmby House, and with whom they could refuse to treat except on the basis of the propositions offered in common with the Scotch at Newcastle. After some trouble in settling the rival claims of Church and State with the Assembly of Divines, they had succeeded in passing an ordinance establishing Presbyterianism, and the system was being set on foot both in London and in Lancashire. Their

Ormond places
the Irish war
in the hands of the Parliament.

Triumph of the Presbyterians in Parliament.

triumph was everywhere complete, and they meant to enjoy it, having no real thoughts, even though the war was over, of re-establishing the old government of the country.

One danger still lay before them, and that was the army, which all those who disliked Presbyterian tyranny regarded as their safeguard. It was, in its turn, regarded with disfavour by the Parliament, which consisted in part of the displaced colonels of the old army, and which observed that many of the soldiers had not yet taken the Covenant. The City of London, of great importance as the chief source of revenue to the Parliament, was Presbyterian in its tendencies, and now petitioned for the disbanding of the army. This step the Parliament proceeded to take. The order was given that the armies should be broken up, with the exception of certain troops, which, under the command of the Presbyterian Generals Massey and Skippon, were to be sent to Ireland. But the Presbyterian majority did not appreciate either the strength of religious feeling, or of esprit de corps in the army, as created by the new model. When the regiments received the orders, they refused to dissolve, or to serve in Ireland under the officers appointed; advancing perfectly just claims for the payment of arrears (which were in some instances due for forty-three weeks), for an Act of indemnity for all acts done during the war, and for pensions for the widows of those slain. On these points they addressed a remonstrance to the House through Fairfax. These claims were further supported by the removal of the army to Saffron Walden (March 21). The Parliament attempted to suppress the rising spirit of the troops with a high hand, and votes were passed, in one of which they were spoken of as "enemies of the State and disturbers of the public peace." This was an insult which distressed them much. Believing that their claims were just, that among them the real patriotic spirit was alive, and regarding the leaders of Parliament as men who were wilfully postponing the settlement of the country for their own aggrandizement, such terms as applied to themselves seemed particularly misplaced. The Declaration in which the words were used was passed on the 30th of March. The army proceeded to organize a sort of Parliament, in which the privates were represented by men elected by themselves, and called agents or adjutators, a word generally changed into agitators. Several deputations from Parliament produced no effect. The Presbyterians, led by Holles, passed a new ordinance for raising the London militia to act as a counterbalancing power, and placed it in trustworthy Presbyterian hands. In May a third deputation, consisting of

They attempt to disband
the army.

Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood and Skippon, was sent down to inquire into the army grievances, and eight weeks' pay having been given, the orders for disbanding were repeated. But eight weeks' pay was but a small instalment of what was due. A great meeting of agitators, under the authority of Fairfax, was held at Bury St. Edmunds, and a rendezvous of all the troops called at Newmarket. At that rendezvous Fairfax and the officers demanded their pay and the removal of the slur which the Declaration had put upon their character. Matters assumed so threatening an aspect that even the strong Presbyterians, Holles, Stapleton, and Glyn, began to give way, and the offensive Declaration was expunged from the records of the House.

Meanwhile a step had been taken which somewhat changed the aspect of affairs. Cornet Joyce and 500 troopers appeared before Holmby House (June 2), acting without authority, but as they knew the army would approve. The King, who thought that at length the opportunity he had watched for had arrived, when the Presbyterians and Independents would destroy each other and make room for the restoration of his authority, was by his own consent taken to the army. He indeed insisted upon a form of coercion, apparently yielding to Joyce's significant reply that his commission consisted in the troops he had with him, "a commission," as the King said laughing, "written in characters fair and legible enough." But when Fairfax offered to release him from Joyce, he positively declined. He was taken to Newmarket, and treated with all respect. On the 10th of June a great rendezvous was held at Royston, or Triploe Heath, near Cambridge. The army assembled to the number of 21,000. The question was put to them by the Parliamentary Commissioners whether they were satisfied with the Parliament votes, and the answer was constantly given in the negative. The same afternoon they moved towards London, Advances towards London.

The army gets possession of the King.

sending before them a letter to the City of London, declaring that their sole objects were their just claims, and the immediate settlement of Government, "Prevented by a few self-seeking men, who aimed at the privileges both of Parliament and people." At the same time the army demanded a termination of the present Parliament, and the dismissal of eleven of the most obnoxious Presbyterian leaders. As they still continued to approach London, these eleven thought it wise to withdraw. The Independents thus became for a time the majority in the House, and the leadership of the Presbyterian party devolved upon the City of London. For six weeks, from June 16th to July the 26th, the army lay round London, approaching or withdrawing as its demands were refused or complied with.

The purified House had declared Fairfax's army to be the army of Parliament, and the new militia ordinance was repealed; and, although the parties were almost evenly balanced, the fear of the army gave such predominance to the Independents that it seemed as if the settlement which the army demanded might have been brought about. That settlement was gradually being arranged by Fairfax and a council of officers. It was considerably more liberal than the propositions which the Parliament had offered the King. The objects of the Independents were before all else the quiet settlement of the country and freedom of conscience. For these objects they were willing to sacrifice a good deal. They offered to go so far as to allow of the existence of the Church side by side with the Presbyterian worship, if only all coercive power was removed from both. They consented to except only five individuals from the general pardon, and even to restore the army and navy to the Crown at the end of ten years. At the same time they saw the necessity of restraining not only the Crown, but the Parliament which had introduced the Presbyterian tyranny. They consequently demanded biennial Parliaments and a reform of the constituency; and, as general improvements, desired the removal of the excise, an equalized land-tax, the abolition of tithes, and a shortening of the processes of law. On these terms they were willing to re-establish Charles in his power. For, as in one of their papers, probably written by Cromwell (June 10), they declare, "We desire no alteration in the civil government, as little do we desire to interrupt the settlement of the Presbyterian government, only we wish that every good citizen, and every man who walks peaceably in a blameless conversation, and is beneficial to the commonwealth, might have liberty and encouragement, this being according to the true policy of all states, and even to justice itself."

Moderate terms offered by the army.

The quiet progress of this settlement was suddenly interrupted by a great outbreak of Presbyterian London on the 26th of July. On that day the apprentices, "and many other rude boys and fellows among them, came into the House of Commons, and kept the door open, and their hats on, and called out as they stood, 'Vote, vote,' and in that elegant posture stood till votes passed," replacing the London militia in the hands of Presbyterians, and recalling the eleven. This scene of violence induced the Speakers of both Houses and the Independent members, on the plea that they were under coercion, to withdraw from Parliament and take refuge with the army, which at once set itself to march towards the capital. It was in vain that the Presbyterian remnant of the House attempted to organize opposition, and to enlist forces under Massey, Waller and Poyntz. The approach of the army dissolved all these preparations; the Southwark militia fraternized with the troops, and at last the Common Council "resolved to send the General a humble letter, beseeching that there might be a way of composure." The army then marched through London, and subsequently took up its position round Putney and Hampton Court.

Presbyterian reaction in London.

The army
marches through the capital.
Aug. 6.

It might have been hoped that Charles would have embraced the opportunity thus offered him for a prosperous settlement of affairs. But in his folly he still hoped that the rival parties would extirpate each other; and when the final propositions were brought to him, to the astonishment of his old friends no less than of his enemies, although the terms had they believed been already settled with him, he returned a flat negative. The secret reason of this was probably that, by the instrumentality of Lauderdale, one of the Parliamentary Commissioners, he was again intriguing with the Scotch, and not with the Scotch only, but at the same time with both Ormond and Capel, for a movement in his favour among his own followers. His constant duplicity, and the impossibility that was found of bringing about any treaty with him, was rapidly changing the views of the army. Cromwell, who had been foremost in the late negotiations, began to see his error and to throw himself more and more into the general feelings of the troops, among whom a stern and angry feeling was rapidly rising, leading them to demand the execution of the King. Indeed, a democratic and destructive party was being formed

His duplicity renders compromise hopeless.

among them, known as the Levellers, whose influence gradually spread through all the ranks, reaching even those who did not thoroughly hold with them. Charles's residence at Hampton Court, where at first he had been well entertained, gradually assumed more and more the appearance of an imprisonment. He began to fear for his life. An unsigned warning, coming it is said from Cromwell himself, of approaching danger, and a belief in the probable success of the intrigues he was carrying on, induced him to fly (Nov. 11). The anonymous notice and a letter giving the reasons of his flight were found upon his table, while he himself pursued his course through the South of England. Ultimately, about the middle of November, he took refuge in the Isle of Wight, where he hoped that Colonel Hammond, the nephew of one of his chaplains, would give him a favourable reception. From Carisbrook Castle, out of immediate reach of his enemies, Charles continued his negotiations on all sides. Their first effect was to make an open breach between the Parliament and the Scotch. Fresh efforts were made by the Parliament to bring about a final treaty. Four clauses were drawn up as an ultimatum; but before they could be arranged the feeling of the Scotch was shown by an attempt of their Commissioners to object to them. Parliament, in anger, passed a strong vote against any "foreign" interference, and the bills were laid before the King. But meanwhile the Scotch had obtained access to Charles; he had made a private treaty with them, and rejected the four clauses. Parliament at once broke with the Scotch, dismissed their Commissioners, re-established the old Committee

Flight to Carisbrook.

He intrigues with the Scotch 1648.

of Public Safety, and passed (Jan. 15) what is known as the Vote of Non-addresses, by which it was resolved that no message should be received from the King, or application made to him, under the penalties of high treason. But the delay of any final settlement, now that the war appeared over, was beginning to have an effect upon the nation. While the Scotch were thus estranged, a reaction was taking place in England, and as a natural consequence the feelings of the army were becoming more and more envenomed against the King. In vain Cromwell tried to bring the views of the army and Parliament into unison. It became plain that he must choose between one party and the other. The course of affairs during the last year, and the danger of a total subversion of all the work of the civil war which began to show itself, induced him frankly to embrace the side of the army. A curious description is given us of a prayer-meeting in which he took part, where the army arrived at the conclusion that the present uneasy state of affairs arose from their turning aside from the simplicity of their course, and attempting to act politically, by entering into negotiation with Charles in the preceding year.

The storm was soon to break, and the Scotch, the Presbyterians, and the Royalists to make common cause against the army. Hamilton, whose conduct had throughout the war been so questionable that the King had once imprisoned him in Pendennis Castle, had now, by a pretence of strict Presbyterianism, succeeded in procuring a vote from the Scotch Estates that 40,000 men should be raised for the invasion of England. In March, Poyer, a Reaction.

Scotch invade
England.

Presbyterian colonel, had declared for the King in Wales. An insurrection under Capel had broken out in Kent; the fleet had declared for the King; and in London a sufficient reaction had taken place to re-establish the Presbyterian influence. In fact, a second civil war had begun; and if the whole work of the Revolution was not to be swept away, it was necessary that the army should return to its proper work, and leave for the time political affairs in the hands of its enemies. It was not long in asserting its pre-eminence. While Fairfax defeated the Kentish men at Maidstone, and Capel was driven to take refuge in Colchester, Cromwell reduced Wales, and in union with Lambert defeated and annihilated at Preston Hamilton's Scotch army. This, with the subsequent fall of Colchester and the retirement of the fleet to Holland, completed the defeat of the Royalists. But during the absence of the army in service, the general feeling of the nation had induced Parliament to consent once more to attempt a reconciliation, and to open a final personal treaty with the King at Newport. But the success of the army had been too complete and too rapid to allow of its completion. Strengthened by their victories, the Independents began to raise their demands. Formidable hints occurred in their petitions suggesting the punishment of the King and the substitution of elective for hereditary monarchy. In vain the Treaty of Newport was hurried forward. The King still contested every point, trusting to the chapter of accidents.

Are defeated at Preston.

He procrastinated too long. The appearance of Colonel Ewer, with orders to take the King from the charge of Hammond, and the summons of Hammond himself to London, induced him, when too late, hurriedly to agree on the two chiefly disputed points. He allowed that seven of his friends should be excepted from the pardon, and that the Bishops should be suspended. The concession came too late. The army was again predominant. The King was carried off and confined in Hurst Castle. The army marched to London, and on the Parliament declaring by a majority of forty-six in favour of the Newport treaty, extreme measures were adopted. On the following day Colonel Pride appeared at the door of the House. Lord Grey of Groby stood beside him; and, as the most important members of the majority approached, on a whisper from Lord Grey, Pride ordered his troopers to carry them off one by one to prison. Thus, on the whole, more than a hundred were excluded. The transaction is known as "Pride's Purge," and the remnant of the House, about fifty in num-

Negotiations
at Newport.

Charles taken from Carisbrook.

Pride's Purge.

ber, is spoken of as "The Rump." The army was now absolutely supreme, Parliament was its obedient subject, and government was really carried on by two military councils—an upper one, consisting of the officers, which was regarded with some suspicion by the mass of the army, and a lower one, consisting of representatives of the soldiers. Measures approved of by these councils were brought to the Parliament and there obediently sanctioned.

By this time the King's fate was sealed. On the 7th of December Colonel Harrison brought him from Hurst Castle to Whitehall. On the 23rd a bill was passed ordering his trial. On the first of the new year, to levy war against the Parliament and Kingdom of England was declared high treason, and a High Court of Justice was appointed to decide whether Charles had been guilty of that treason or not. The Lords indeed had the courage to refuse it, but the Commons determined to act upon their own authority. Though treated with much indignity as a prisoner, Charles seems still to have had hope. But the War of the Fronde incapacitated the French from coming to his assistance. The suppression of the late war had rendered the power of the army too absolute for opposition at home. On the 20th of January the High Court assembled in the Painted Chamber, under the presidency of Bradshaw, and with all the solemn apparatus of a court of justice. When called upon to plead, Charles refused to acknowledge the authority of the court. By the letter of the law no doubt he was right; but, as Bradshaw replied, the objection was not to the point, no court would allow its own jurisdiction to be questioned. Charles attempted in vain to demand a conference with a joint-committee of the Lords and Commons; and as he still refused to plead, sentence of death was passed upon him. He bore himself, as usual on public occasions, with calm dignity; and the words in which he declared himself the champion of the liberties of the English people, and the calm and religious temper in which he passed the last days of his life, went far to obliterate from the popular mind the tyranny of his earlier, and the duplicity of his later life. He was beheaded, before Whitehall, on the 29th of the month, saying upon the scaffold, "Sirs, it is for the liberties of the people that I am come here; if I would have assented to an arbitrary sway, to have all things changed according to the power of the sword, I needed not to have come hither, and therefore I tell you, and I pray God it be not laid to your charge, that I am a martyr to the people."

Trial and death
of the King.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

1649—1660.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES

France.	Germany.	Spain.
Louis XIV., 1643.	Ferdinand III., 1637. Leopold I., 1658.	Philip IV., 1621.

POPES.—Innocent X., 1644. Alexander VII., 1655.

THE death of the King was followed immediately by the declaration of the Commonwealth. In February both Kingship and the House of Lords were abolished, and the House of Commons was declared the supreme power of the nation, the executive power being placed in a Council of State of forty-one members, who were to hold their office for a year. Of these, three-fourths were members of the House of Commons. Although the House of Lords was abolished, some of the Peers still clung to the popular party. There were five among the number of the Council of State, and two at least got themselves elected members of the House of Commons. The administration went on without much apparent change. The Houses of Parliament had indeed so long exercised the supreme power that the formal assumption of it by one of them made but little difference. A new Great Seal was made, and six of the judges resigned, but the rest consented to keep their places on a pledge that the fundamental laws of England should be unaltered; and in other respects the administration continued as before. In some degree, to lessen the glaring absurdity of calling the few members who were left in Parliament the national representation,

Establishment
of the Republican Government.

1649]

THE LEVELLERS

689

their numbers were increased. All excluded members, except those who had been the victims of Pride's Purge, were readmitted, a certain number of vacancies filled up, and by these means the number of the House was raised to about 150. The punishment of some of the leaders of the second civil war completed the work of the establishment of the Government. The Lords Hamilton, Holland, Norwich, Capel, Goring, and Sir John Owen, were tried and found guilty, and although they had been admitted to quarter upon the field of battle, it was held that this did not extend to their civil guilt. The two last were alone spared.

Having set themselves firmly in the seat of power, the new rulers of England had to turn their thoughts towards the completion of their work in the other two kingdoms. The Royalist party being entirely suppressed in England, an opportunity was at length afforded of prosecuting with vigour the war against the Irish rebels, which domestic difficulties and the constant intrigues of the King had hitherto enfeebled. It was determined that Cromwell, whom all now recognized as the ablest soldier of the time, should be intrusted with the management of this war, and he took upon him, not without some hesitation, the office of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and the duty of modelling or organizing the army for that purpose. He was met at the threshold with very considerable difficulties.

The Levelling tendencies already mentioned had been suppressed for a time at a rendezvous held at Ware by the summary execution of Arnold, one of the ringleaders, but they had not ceased to spread. They had been kept in abeyance by the active work afforded to the troops; but now that the war was over, they again showed themselves in a more alarming form. Originally the fruit of mistaken religious views, they now acquired a more practical shape. Sometimes they were exhibited in a way that was harmless enough, as when certain men proceeded to dig and plant the waste lands in Surrey, declaring their expectation that England would shortly accept their view of community of goods. But in the army the effect was more dangerous. John Lilburne, always an open-mouthed upholder of individual liberty, became the leader of the movement. He, and those who thought with him, had expected as the fruit of their work some sort of millennium, and were disappointed when it seemed that a change of masters was all that they had gained. He published two famous pamphlets, one entitled "England's New Chains Discovered," and the other "The Hunting of the Foxes from

His difficulties with the Levellers.

Triploe Heath to Whitehall by five Small Beagles," the foxes being the army grandees, the five small beagles certain troopers who had been punished for insubordination. Filled with these views, the troops refused to serve against Ireland. The regiments selected had been chosen perfectly fairly, but the idea got abroad that those were to be sent upon the service who were most opposed to the new order of things. The first actual mutiny, however, broke out in Colonel Whalley's regiment, which was not one of the Irish regiments. When ordered to quit London they refused, and at "The Bull," in Bishopsgate, an open mutiny showed itself, which was rapidly suppressed by Fairfax and Cromwell in person, and one of the ringleaders, Lockyer, was shot in St. Paul's Churchyard. He was a man of good character and religious life, and his death excited the strongest sympathy. His funeral was made a public demonstration: "a hundred went before the corpse, five or six in file, the corpse was then brought, with six trumpets sounding a soldier's knell, then the trooper's horse came, clad in mourning and led by a footman; the corpse was adorned with bundles of rosemary, one half stained in blood, and the sword of the deceased along with them; some thousands followed in rank and file, all had sea-green and black ribbon tied on their hats and to their breasts; the women brought up the rear." Immediately after this demonstration, the Levellers produced their programme in a petition against the new Constitution, which was known as the Agreement of the People. The petition suggested sweeping measures, such as annual Parliaments, the abolition of tithes and of the Court of Chancery, and the continued close adherence to the Self-denying Ordinance. At a review in Hyde Park many sea-green badges were seen, and though the influence of Cromwell suppressed disorder, the men's temper was not good; and news reached London that both in Oxfordshire and in Salisbury open mutiny had begun. In Oxfordshire, Captain Thompson broke from his quarters with about 200 followers, while Cornet Thompson, his brother, marched from Salisbury with the intention of joining him, or of getting to Gloucestershire, where there were other disaffected troops. Fairfax and Cromwell started rapidly in pursuit, and after an extraordinary march of nearly fifty miles, came upon the mutineers at Burford, broke in upon them when they were asleep, and took all the chief of them prisoners. Those who were selected for punishment were placed upon the leads of Burford Church, overlooking the place of execution. Thompson and two corporals were shot. This was considered vengeance enough;

They are suppressed.

the rest were pardoned. Captain Thompson in the meanwhile had been killed in arms in Northamptonshire.

This was in May. On the 10th of July, Cromwell, as Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, set out with much pomp for Bristol. It was uncertain what enemies he would there meet; for the death of the King, accepted in England, had had the effect of re-establishing the Royalist party both in Scotland and in Ireland, and the young King Charles II., who had taken refuge with his relative, the Prince of Orange, in Holland, pressed by both countries, was uncertain as yet to which he would betake himself. The Scotch universally recognised the King as an integral part of the Government, and in that country all parties were almost equally shocked with the turn affairs had taken in England. The professed Royalists were in exile with the young King, but the Presbyterian Estates and Church also at once determined to send Commissioners, offering to acknowledge him if he would but accept the Covenant. He hesitated on two grounds; on the one hand, Ormond, who had returned as his Lieutenant to Ireland, had gone far towards harmonizing all parties in opposition to the Parliament, and urged his presence there; on the other, Montrose and the Royalists were eager to try their fortunes again in Scotland, and Charles preferred to await the issue of their enterprise before purchasing the general national assistance at the price of acknowledging his father's faults and of accepting the Covenant, which he heartily disliked. The murder of Dr. Dorislaus, who had assisted at the late King's trial, and was put to death by some of Montrose's Royalist friends, compelled him to withdraw from the Hague. He sent an unsatisfactory answer to the Scotch, and withdrew to St. Germain, having resolved to try his fortune in Ireland.

Uncertainty of Charles II.'s movements.

Proposals of the Scotch.

Things there meanwhile promised well for him. Michael Jones had been with difficulty making head against the various rebel armies. He had defeated Preston at Dungan Hill, while Lord Inchiquin had beaten Taaffe with the Munster troops at Clontarf. Disputes had as usual run high among the Irish. The Papal Nuncio had fallen out with the Council of Kilkenny, and had first fled to his friend Owen Roe in Ulster, and subsequently had withdrawn from the Island. But the King's death had for a moment healed all differences. Lord Inchiquin had himself changed sides. Even the Scotch Presbyterians, true to the letter of their Covenant, had declared against Parliament, and with the exception of Owen O'Neil, who was attempting negotiations with Monk in Ulster, the whole country seemed combined under Ormond; while that part of the fleet which had revolted rode triumphantly on the coast under the command of Prince Rupert. Dublin and Londonderry were the only strongholds which still held out for Parliament. Even the quarrel with O'Neil was before long healed. The Parliament refused to acknowledge any negotiations with the instigator of the Irish massacre, his own soldiers refused to obey Monk's orders, and O'Neil's Irish, after his death, which occurred shortly after these events, joined the great mass of Royalists. It was therefore to Ireland that Prince Charles first intended to go.

and of the Irish.

The difficulty of organizing his army kept Cromwell some time at Milford. His first intention was to land in Munster, but a great success won by Jones induced him to change his plan. Ormond bringing his army to Dublin, in the hope of triumphantly closing the war, was completely defeated, and his army destroyed by Jones at Rathmines (Aug. 2). An opening was thus afforded to Cromwell in the capital, whither, in company with Ireton, his son-in-law, as third in command (Jones ranking as second), he betook himself on the 15th of August. The arrival of Cromwell with his troops entirely changed the aspect of affairs. The army, which had become lax, was brought under the most rigorous discipline. All plundering and injury to the inhabitants was forbidden under pain of death, and with the determination to make

Cromwell goes to Ireland.

His campaign there. a final end of the disturbances in the Island, Cromwell set sternly to work. From Dublin he advanced northwards towards Drogheda, waited some days in hopes of bringing on a pitched battle, then breached the walls and stormed the town. Thither the best of the English troops in the island had been sent under the command of Sir Arthur Ashton, an officer of known courage, who had declared his ability to hold the town. The defence of the breaches, as was to be expected, was obstinate, but ultimately (Sept. 11) the Parliamentary troops, led by Cromwell in person, forced them, and bursting into the town, refused quarter, putting to death all those who were found in arms. Some isolated strong points were surrendered at discretion, the officers and priests alone were killed, the common men taken prisoners and sent to the Barbadoes. Much has been said of the cruelty of this storm, but there seems no proof that any were put to death except the garrison, who were between 3000 or 4000 in number; and the hope which Cromwell himself expressed in the words—"The enemy upon this were filled with much terror, and truly I believe this bitterness will save much effusion of blood, through the goodness of God"—was fully realized.

From Drogheda, leaving Venables and Coote to relieve Londonderry and conquer Ulster, Cromwell turned southward. At Wexford he followed his unvarying plan of summoning the governor, with the warning, that if the summons was refused he must expect the extreme severity of a storm. The governor consented to treat, but upon terms ridiculously high; and while the negotiations were still pending, a chance quarrel brought on an assault, the city was stormed, and the same sharp measure dealt to the garrison as at Drogheda (Oct. 12). In this instance there seems to have been no distinct intention of such a thing in Cromwell's mind. The fate of the garrison arose from the accident of war. The effect of these two fearful victories was, however, instantaneous; few fortresses henceforward refused the summons. Before the close of the year all the South of Ireland, with the exception of Waterford, was in Cromwell's hands. While giving his troops a short rest during the winter, it had been determined that the Lord-Lieutenant should be summoned home to assume the command against the Scots. But he was again in action before the order reached him, and in the first months of 1650 had taken the town of Kilkenny, overrun the county of Tipperary, and completed its conquest by the capture of Clonmel (May 10). This closed his victorious career in Ireland. His presence was required in England, whither he at once returned, leaving the completion of his work to Ireton and Ludlow, who found but little difficulty in finishing what he had so well begun.

Recalled to England.

The victory of Rathmines and the subsequent successes of Cromwell had changed the views of the young King. He had brought himself to accept the bitter terms which the Scotch Church and Estates offered him, even though pressed home by their envoy, Winram of Liberton, with most uncompromising harshness. He had promised to make a final arrangement at Breda, in Holland, anxious to wait a little longer to see whether Montrose and the genuine Royalists might not still be successful. But disaster had throughout followed that nobleman. He had collected troops among the kingdoms of the North of Europe, but his transports were all wrecked on their way to Scotland, and it was with little more than 1000 men that he proceeded through the counties of Caithness and Ross-shire. There, at a place called Corbiesdale, he was entirely routed by the Covenanters (April 27), and subsequently taken prisoner, and executed (May 21) with all the vindictive insult which his hereditary enemy, Argyle, at that time paramount among them, could inflict upon him. The news of these disasters brought Charles to submission. With the singular selfishness and meanness which marked both himself and his father under similar circumstances, he disowned Montrose's efforts, accepted all the limitations required, and betook himself to Scotland in the capacity of a Covenanted King.

Charles accepts the Scotch proposals.

Montrose's defeat and death.

The command against Scotland was given to Fairfax, but Fairfax, though he had supported the action of the army at the time of the change of Government, had not approved of the execution of Charles, and was much under the influence of his wife, who was a Presbyterian. He declared that he had conscientious scruples against fighting the Scotch, with whom the kingdom had so lately been bound in the Covenant. The command was therefore transferred to Cromwell. It was not without great pain that he brought himself to fight against those whom he acknowledged as belonging to the great party of which he considered himself the champion, and which he spoke of as "the godly party" or "the good men." But to him it appeared that the cause for which he had hitherto been fighting—the cause namely of civil and religious liberty—was still at stake. Religious liberty meant to him freedom of conscience within far larger limits than could be hoped for under the supremacy of Presbyterianism; nor could he believe that civil liberty would be secured under a Stuart King still accompanied by large numbers of the old Royalist party.

He passed the Tweed with an army of 16,000 men on the 16th of July. The Scots had placed themselves under the command of the old Earl of Leven and of David Leslie. As yet their army was a purely Covenanted one. By an act of the Scotch Church, called the Act of Classes, all known Malignants, and the Engagers (as those men were called who had joined Hamilton's insurrection), had been removed from the army. The country between the Tweed and Edinburgh had been wasted; and the inhabitants, terrified by ridiculous stories of the English cruelty, had taken flight; but Cromwell's army, marching by the coast, was supplied by the fleet. He thus reached the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh; but Leslie skilfully availed himself of the advantages of the ground and refused to be brought to an engagement. It became necessary for Cromwell to withdraw towards his supplies. He fell back to Dunbar, which lies upon a peninsula, jutting out into the Firth of Forth. The base of this peninsula

Wins the Battle of Dunbar.
Sept 3.

is at a little distance encircled by high ground, an offshoot of the Lammermuir Hills. These heights were occupied by the Scotch army, as was also the pass through which the road to Berwick lies. Cromwell was therefore apparently shut up between the enemy and the sea, with no choice but to retire to his ships or surrender. Had Leslie continued his cautious policy, such might have been the event. A little glen, through which runs a brook called the Broxburn, separated the two enemies. Between it and the high grounds lay a narrow but comparatively level tract. Either army attacking the other must cross this glen. There were two convenient places for passing it: one, the more inland one, towards the right of the English, who stood with their back to the sea, was already in the hands of the Scotch. Could Leslie secure the other at the mouth of the glen, he would have it in his power to attack when he pleased. The temptation was too strong for him, he gradually moved his army down from the hills towards its own right flank, thereby bringing it on to the narrow ground between the hill and the brook, intending with his right to secure the passage at Broxmouth. Cromwell and Lambert saw the movement, saw that it gave them a corresponding advantage if they suddenly crossed the glen at Broxmouth, and fell upon Leslie's right wing, while his main body was entangled in the narrow ground before mentioned. The attack was immediately decided upon, and early on the 3rd of September carried out with perfect success. The Scotch horse of the right wing were driven in confusion back upon their main body, whom they trampled under foot, and the whole army was thus rolled back upon itself in inextricable confusion.

From Dunbar Cromwell advanced to Edinburgh. The town fell easily into his hands, but the castle offered resistance; and while he was lying before it political differences began to show themselves among his enemies. Three parties were gradually apparent; one purely Royalist; another, a middle party, embodying the bulk of the Presbyterians and the high officials, of which party Argyle was the head; and in the West of Scotland a more extreme party, who considered any union with their Malignant King injurious to the cause. The Royalists contrived to entice the young King to fly from Edinburgh (Oct. 4), with the idea of putting himself in their hands. But as Charles found no troops to support him, and was quickly followed by the Covenanted troops, he returned. The Royalists made some movements in the Highlands, and required to be repressed by David Leslie, but the greater part of them thought it prudent to join themselves to Argyle's party. The Start, as Charles's sudden flight was called, alarmed the Covenanters so thoroughly that they henceforward treated the young King with more respect, and a resolution was passed, that in the present crisis all Scotchmen might be employed in the service of the country, thus repealing the Act of Classes. This resolution called out much opposition in the West, where a protest was drawn up against it, and the two parties assumed the names of Resolutioners and Protesters. The support of the Protesters Cromwell, trusting to the character of their religious views, had some hope of securing, and negotiations were set on foot with them; but though subsequently, on the settlement of the country, he succeeded in winning the friendship of some of them, and was constantly inclined to show them favour, they at pre-

Takes Edinburgh.

Division among the Scotch.

Protesters and Resolutioners.

